PREFACE

My intention in beginning the work which has resulted in this Dictionary was only to supply students of Shakespeare with a brief account of the places which are mentioned in the Plays, and to add illustrative quotations from the contemporary Dramatists. None of the existing dictionaries furnish adequate information as to Shakespeare's place-names. In Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon all the place-names are given; but the definitions are vague and meagre, and the passages in which they occur are not quoted in full, except in a very few cases; and no quotations from writers other than Shakespeare are cited. Thus, in the page of Schmidt which I casually open, Fish St. is defined as "street in London"; Flanders as "county in the Low Countries"; Fleet as "the prison for insolvent debtors in London"; which is not only insufficient, but misleading; Flint Castle is "a castle in Wales"; Florence is "town and dukedom in Italy." In Dyce's Glossary, and in Cunliffe's and Marian Edwards' Dictionaries place-names are not included. There seemed therefore room for a work which would give more adequate definitions, and such illustrative quotations as would do for these words what the Oxford English Dictionary has done for the rest of the language.

But in hunting through the other dramatists for parallel passages I soon found that they needed elucidation even more than Shakespeare; and I enlarged my design so as to include them also. A limit, however, had to be fixed; and I decided to draw the line at the Restoration of 1660; partly because the Elizabethan and Jacobean Drama forms a fairly homogeneous body of Literature and has been thought worthy of separate treatment in such a monumental work as Schelling's Elizabethan Drama; and partly because the topography of London, which is so fully illustrated in these plays, was radically changed by the Great Fire of 1666. It may be asked why the dramatists only are included and not the whole body of Elizabethan literature; the answer is, first, that life is short, and I could not hope to have time to read so large a mass of writings with the necessary attention to detail required for my purpose; and then, that the dramatists of this period form a clearly defined group, deserving and repaying special study. Whilst, however, I have confined myself, generally speaking, to the plays enumerated in Schelling's second volume, I have not pedantically refused to add illustrations from the earlier Mysteries and Moralities; as well as from Chaucer and Langland, and from contemporary poems and prose works, especially those written by the dramatists themselves. Such was the limit of my original design; but the War having rendered it impossible to publish what I had practically completed, until this calamity had passed, I have added all the place-names in Milton, who really belongs to our period, and by his Comus and Arcades established his claim to count as one of its dramatists, although the Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes, fall a few years beyond the limit I had fixed for myself. For this students of Milton may perhaps be grateful. Moreover, without aiming at completeness in this case, I have added a large number of illustrations from Spenser, who throws a good deal of light on the quasi-historical plays concerned with early British myth, such as Lochrine, Ferrex and Porrex, The Mayor of Quinborough, Nobody and Somebody, and others.

Through the help furnished by Mrs. Cowden Clarke's Concordance and Schmidt's Lexicon I have been able to ensure that every place-name in Shakespeare's Plays and Poems should be dealt with; and the passages in which they occur have been quoted with sufficient fullness to be intelligible, except when they threw no light at all on the meaning or the usage of the word in question. This method involves a considerable expenditure of space; but my experience has taught me that students do not often look up references for themselves; if they are to be of general use they must be quoted. In this procedure the Oxford English Dictionary has been my model and must be my justification. Apart from Shakespeare, I have read between six and seven hundred plays written in the great century from 1550 to 1650; and, as far as human care could ensure it, I have dealt with every place-name that occurs in them, and wherever it seemed worth while I have quoted the passages in full. In the case of Shakespeare exact reference is made in every instance to act, scene, and line; in the other plays I have usually had to be content with act and scene. But to facilitate reference and to make the meaning clearer, I have mentioned the name of the speaker, and, where necessary, the circumstances under which the words were spoken. I have not followed the Oxford English Dictionary in prefixing the date to every quotation; within the century dealt with there is not much development of meaning from decade to decade; but an alphabetical list of the plays with their authors and dates of first production has been prefixed to this volume, from which the exact date of any quotation can be readily ascertained. Where a quotation is given from a contemporary work, other than those plays and poems whose dates are given in this and the following list, the date of publication has been usually added.

Shakespeare's Plays and Poems have been quoted by means of abbreviated titles, and without the author's name. In all other cases the author's name and play are both mentioned. Where a play is the joint production of two or more authors, the name of the author in whose collected works the play is most often found is given; my object being, not to express any opinion on the authorship, but to facilitate reference. All the plays in Darley's edition of Beaumont and Fletcher are quoted as B. and F. without distinction; the most likely authorship of each is indicated in the Bibliography.

Except in the case of the few quotations from Chaucer, Langland, and two or three other middle English writers, the spelling has been modernised; but the original spelling of the place-name, where it could be ascertained, has been kept; and cross-references have been abundantly supplied, so as to save the student from needless bewilderment.

In two respects a certain liberty has been taken with the first plan, which was to include only names actually occurring in a play and used topographically. First, names of places connected with the history of the Drama and with the lives of the Dramatists have been admitted; amongst these will be found the names of almost all the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge with some account of the part they each played in the development of the drama, and of dramatists whom they numbered amongst their alumni. Then under the names of places which gave territorial titles to nobles and bishops and the like personages, it has been thought worth while to give a brief account of such of those as move across the historical stage, both in Shakespeare and his fellow-dramatists. This is hardly justifiable on logical grounds, but students will probably be grateful for assistance in distinguishing between the various Buckinghams and Bedfords and Warwicks and the rest who play their part in this brilliant pageant.

As the book was completed before the end of the Great War and the readjustments made by the Treaty of Versailles, it is probable that some changes in the boundaries and political connections of the countries concerned may have been overlooked. In this matter I claim the indulgence of my readers.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge the help I have received; first of all, from Stow and Fynes Moryson, and Coryat, and Peter Heylyn; and then from Wheatley's London Past and Present, Cassell's Old and New London, Salaman's London Past and Present, Ordish's Shakespeare's London, Harper's Summer Days in Shakespeare Land, Bell's Fleet Street in Seven Centuries, Gordon's Old Time Aldwych, and the usual Geographical Dictionaries and Gazetteers. Nares's Glossary and the Oxford English Dictionary have furnished several useful references. Harben's Dictionary of London came too late to be used in the actual writing of my work; but I have carefully revised it with Harben's valuable collection of facts before me, and have made some slight additions and corrections.

I desire to thank my fellow-trustees of the Public Library, Melbourne, for the unrestricted use of their excellent collection of Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists; and the Librarian, Mr. E. La Touche Armstrong, M.A., and his staff for much help in hunting up books and references. I wish also to express my obligation to Miss Griffin and Miss Howard, who showed the greatest interest and skill in executing the type-script of this work.

I acknowledge with unfeigned gratitude the generous encouragement and helpful advice that I have received from Professors Le Gay Brereton and Macallum, both of Sydney University, who did me the honour of reading the first draft of this book and have enriched it with many valuable suggestions. My friend, Professor Wallace, of this University, has also assisted me at many points; and my near neighbour, Mr. E. H. Oliphant, has placed at my service his unique knowledge of the Elizabethan Drama, and of Beaumont and Fletcher in particular.

For permission to use the maps which appear in the volume I am grateful to the following: To Messrs. A. and C. Black, Ltd., for (1) Agas' Map of London, (2) Norden's Map of London, and (3) the Plan of Westminster; to the Editor of The Studio for Visscher's View of London.

I am deeply indebted to Professor H. B. Charlton, of the University of Manchester, for the great trouble he has taken in drawing the Sketch Map of the Streets of Elizabethan London which appears in the book. In preparing the map Professor Charlton has had the assistance of Dr. H. Guppy, of the John Rylands Library, Manchester.

The difficulty of producing a work like this, when half the circumference of the world separates the author and the publishers, could hardly have been overcome had it not been for the unselfish and enthusiastic help given by the late Professor C. E. Vaughan. Some time before his death he was good enough to read through the whole of the type-script, and to suggest out of the fullness of his knowledge and experience many improvements in the arrangement of the matter of the various articles; and in particular he greatly increased the value of the work by the omission of much in my first draft that was unnecessary or unimportant. His advice was always at the service of the publishers, and in the decision of countless points of detail he most effectively took my place, and saved the time which otherwise must have been lost in correspondence. I need not say how grateful I am to him for the energy he devoted to so thankless a task; a large share of whatever value the work may have is due to him.

The conditions of publication have imposed a great burden upon Mr. H. M. McKechnie, the Secretary of the Press Committee of the University of Manchester; and I desire to thank him most cordially for his interest in the work, and his patient attention to its countless details. The tables of abbreviations are entirely his work, and many improvements in the grouping of the matter of the articles are due to him. He also is mainly responsible for the typographical devices which will so materially assist the reader.

Finally, I am under the deepest obligation to my friend, Mr. J. T. Tweddle, of Melbourne, for his generous offer to guarantee the heavy cost of publication; and to the Committee of the Manchester University Press for their grant in aid of the expense.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.—In this Bibliography are included :

- (1) A. A list of editions which contain plays by more than one author, with the abbreviated titles used for them in the following list. These are not in all cases the best editions, but at this end of the world I have had to be content with what was accessible, and where there is any doubt as to their readings I have noted it.
- (2) B. A list of all the plays from which quotations have been taken." First I have given the abbreviated title used in the body of the work, then the full title of the play, followed by the author's name and the date of the first production of the play as nearly as could be ascertained, and then the edition I have used.
- (3) C. A list of the principal non-dramatic poets from whose works illustrative quotations have been taken. This does not include poems from which only one or two passages have been quoted. In this and the following list, as a general rule, abbreviations come at the end of each entry.
- (4) D. A list of the principal prose works from which quotations have been given. This again is not complete, but only contains those works which have furnished several passages of illustration.

NOTE.—Where a play is in two parts, they are indicated by the use of A. for the first and B. for the second part. For example, H4 B. ii. 2, 6 means the sixth line of the second scene of the second Act of Shakespeare's Henry the Fourth, the Second Part; Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 1 means the first scene of the fourth act of Marlowe's Tamburlaine the Great, Part One.

For invaluable assistance in the compilation of these lists and the selection of abbreviated titles I have to thank Mr. H. M. McKechnie, the Secretary of the Manchester University Press (E. H. S.).

Abbreviations within a section : In most cases a list of the abbreviations used within a section is printed at the beginning of the section. As a general rule, however, when the name or names contained in the heading of a section are repeated within the section, the names are not printed in full, but are represented by the initial letter or letters only. Words formed from the names, or variations in the ending of the names, are represented by the initial letter with the addition of the necessary suffix. Example under Dutch, when this word appears within its particular section it is represented by the initial letter D. only, Der being used for Dutcher and Dman for Dutchman.

A TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY TO THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE AND HIS FELLOW DRAMATISTS

A

ABARIM. The range of hills stretching along the E. side of the Dead Sea, N. of the r. Arnon. The highest peak was Nebo or Pisgah. Milton, P. L. i. 408, describes the land of Moab as reaching "From Aroer to Nebo and the wild Of southmost A." The ridge of which Mt. Nebo forms part was the N. boundary of Moab, but it is wrongly called "southmost A." It was rather at the N. end of the range.

ABASSIN (i.e. ABYSSINIAN). Abyssinia is a modern form of Abasine, the country lying S. of Nubia, on the W. of the Red Sea, included by the Elizabethan geographers in Æthiopia Superior. Milton, P. L. iv. 280, speaks of Mt. Amara, "where A. ks. their issue guard." See under Amara.

ABBANA or ABANA (now the BARADA). A river rising in the Anti-Lebanon range which waters the plain of Damascus with its 7 streams, and dies away in a marsh some 25 m. E. of the city. Milton, P. L. i. 469, speaks of "Fair Damascus, on the fertile banks Of A. and Pharphar, lucid streams." Cf. II Kings v. 12.

ABCHURCH LANE. A st. in Lond., running from Cannon St. to Lombard St., now cut in two by K. William St. Named from the ch. of St. Mary A., which stands on its S.E. side. A certain Mother Wall kept a shop there for the sale of pies. In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco says, "I have the scent of Lond. Stone as full in my nose as A. L. of mother Wall's pasties." In Dekker's Northward iv. 4, the Bawd says, "I will have . . . some of mother Wall's cakes."

ABEHUNDIS (or ABER HONDDRU). The Welsh name for Brecknock, q.v.

ABERGANY (i.e. ABERGAVERNNY, for which it is still a recognized shortening). A market town of some 5000 inhabitants in Monmouthsh. It is supposed to be the old Roman station of Gobannium. It gives his title to the Lord A. mentioned in HS i. 1, 211; i. 2, 137. He was George Nevill, the 3rd holder of the title, born 1471. He married Mary, daughter of the D. of Buckingham, and was imprisoned in the Tower for concealment of the D.'s treasonable words; but was soon released and restored to favour. In 1530 he was the premier baron of England. He died in 1535. The 2nd Baron, who was knighted at the battle of Tewkesbury, is mentioned in Ford's Warbeck iii. 1 as George A. He died in 1491. Henry, the 4th Baron, is mentioned in Stucley 153, where Newton tells old Stucley, "Th' other day I saw him [young Stucley] come up Fleet st. with the Lord Windsor and Lord Aburganny." His town house was at the N. end of Ave Mary Lane. It was subsequently bought by the Stationers' Company for their Hall, and was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. Jonson, in Wales, gives a string of Welsh names beginning with Aber—, including A., Abercromy, Abertau, Aberdugledhaw, Aberhondhy, and Aberconway.

ABIDAS, ABIDOS. See ABYDOS.

ABINGTON. An ancient town, the capital of Berks., at the junction of the Ock and Thames, 56 m. N.W. of Lond. It had a famous abbey, founded in the 12th cent., of which one of the gateways may still be seen. It is the scene of Abington; in ii. 2, Coomes boasts that he has "drunk all the alehouses in Abington dry." Yellowhammer, in Middleton's Chaste Maid, belongs to "the Yellowhammers in Oxfordsh. near A." A. is close to the boundary between Oxfordsh. and Berks., some 5 or 6 m. S. of Oxford. There was a fine cross in the Market Pl., set up in the reign of Henry VI; but it was destroyed by the Puritans in the course of the Civil War of Charles I's time. In the Conference between the Monarchs of France and Spain (1642), the K. of France says, "It is buzzed abroad in England that the crosses shall all be pulled down; of which I have heard that A. and Cheapside crosses excell all."

ABIS. See ABUS.

ABSYRTIDES. Two islands, now Cherso and Osero, in the N.E. corner of the Adriatic, at the entrance of the Gulf of Fiume. Said to have been called after Absyrtus, the brother of Medea, reported to have been killed by her there. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Homer says, "In memory of this inhuman deed These islands where his slaughtered limbs lie spread Were called A."

ABUS (or ABY). The old Roman name for the r. Humber, which falls into the N. Sea between Yorks. and Lincs. In Locrine ii. 6, 25, Humber, after his victory in Scotland over Albanact, calls on his Huns to march "to Abis silver streams"; which, he says in iii. 2, 4, "shall be agnominated by our name." In iv. 4, 31, Humber, abt. to drown himself in the r., says, "Gentle Aby, take my troubled corpse." Spenser, F. Q. ii. x. 16, mentions "the ancient A." and tells how Humber was drowned in it.

ABYDOS (now AVIDO). A city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont, a little E. of its narrowest part, where it is something less than 1 m. across. According to the old Greek legend, which was very popular in Elizabethan times, Leander used to swim across from A. to Sestos, where his mistress Hero lived; a distance of abt. 3 m. He was at last drowned on one of these excursions. In Taming of a Shrew, Haz. p. 529, Philema says that if her lover were Leander, "With bended knees upon Abidas shore I would. . . . Importune Neptune and the watery gods To send a guard . . . to be our convoy." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Leatherhead, introducing his puppet-play of Hero and Leander, says, "Leander yet serves his father, a dyer at Puddle-wharf Which place we'll make bold with to call it our Abydus; At the Bankside is our Sestos; and let it not be denied us." Marlowe begins his poem Hero and Leander thus: "In view and opposite two cities stood, The one A., the other Sestos light." Nash, in Lenten, p. 317, says of Leander, "At Sestos was his soul and he could not abide to tarry in A." W. Smith, in Chloris xxv. 10 (1596), says, "Love made Leander pass the dreadful flood Which Cestos from A. doth divide." In B. & F. Wife v. 3, Valerio says, "A. brought me forth": suggesting that he has come over to seek the love of Evanthé. See also SESTOS.

ACADEME (Gk. Acadēmeia). A garden on the N. side of Athens, abt. 1 m. from the walls, where Plato taught. The name came to be applied to any place where Philosophy was cultivated, as in L. L. L. i. 1, 13: "Our court shall be a little A." Biron thinks that "women's eyes are the books, the arts, the a.s. That show, contain, and nourish all the world," L. L. L. iv. 3, 352. In Massinger's Believe i. 1, Antiochus, in exile, is exhorted to "Practise the golden principles read to you In the Athenian Academy." In Histrio iv. 152, Chrisogonus laments the decay of learning; "pale Artizans Pine in the shades of gloomy A's, Faint in pursuit of virtue and quite tired, For want of liberal food for liberal art"; which is intended as a satire upon the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In the old Timon ii. 1, Gelasimus says, "By Jupiter, I am no Academician, no fool." Middleton, lamenting the poverty of scholars, says in Hubburt (1604), p. 101, "No A. makes a rich alderman." In preface to Tiberius the publisher says of the author: "By his speech it should seem that his father was an Academician," i.e. a university man. Marston, in Scourge of Villanie ii. 6, 201, says, "Then straight comes Friscus, that neat gentleman, that new discarded Academician." In Greene's Friar ii. 6, Bacon addresses the University dons: "Now, masters of our Academic state, That rule in Oxford." Milton, P. R. iv. 244, says, "See there the olive-grove of A., Plato's retirement, where the Attic bird Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long." In B. & F. Elder B. v. 1, Eustace speaks of the Court "That is the abstract of all academies To teach and practise noble undertakings." Note that the word is here accented on the 3rd syllable.

ACANTHA. Mentioned in Marlowe Tamb. B. ii. 1, along with Belgasar, Antioch, and Casarea, as places to which the Turk had sent his forces after the battle of Nicopolis. Probably Acanthus is meant: a town on the E. side of the peninsula between Acte and the mainland on the E. coast of Greece. It was a place of some importance in ancient times; the modern vill. of Erisso occupies its site.

ACARNANIA. District on W. coast of Greece, between the Gulf of Arta and the Gulf of Corinth. It is a hilly and forest-covered land. In Com. Cond. (A. P. iv. p. 210), Nomides says, "Clotted hard Acarnan's frost doth freeze on dale and hill." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 3285, Demeas praises Timon for his valour "when he against the Achernenses fought." He never did any such thing, as he himself protests, the Acarnanians being on the Athenian side in the Peloponnesian war. In his B. Age i. 1, the r.-god Achelous says, "Ne'er let my streams wash A.'s banks . . . till . . . we lodge bright Deianeira in our arms." The Achelous is the boundary between A. and Ætolia.

ACARON. See ACHERON.

ACCARON (i.e. EKRON). One of the cities of the Philistine Pentapolis, now Akir, 24 m. W. of Jerusalem. Milton, P. L. i. 466, says that Dagon was "dreaded through the coast Of Palestine in Gath and Ascalon, And A. and Gaza's frontier bounds." In S. A. 981, Dalila says, "In Ecron, Gaza, Ashdod, and in Gath I shall be named among the famousest Of women."

ACHAIA. Originally a small dist. in the North of the Peloponnesus in Greece. After the formation of the Achæan League 280 B.C. the name was applied to all the dist. which it included; and after the Roman conquest the S. Province, comprising the Peloponnesus and the greater part of Greece proper, was called Achæa. The dramatists of our period use it in this wider sense.

The hero of Massinger's Believe is Antiochus the Gr., who fought unsuccessfully against the Romans in Greece in 191 B.C., and was defeated at Thermopylæ. In i. 1, he tells us how the "bodies, gashed with wounds, Which strowed A.'s bloody plains," haunt him, "exacting a strict account of my ambition's folly." In i. 2, a Greek merchant, complaining of the tyranny of the Romans, exclaims: "O Antiochus! Thrice happy were the men whom Fate appointed To fall with thee in A." In B. & F. Corinth iii. 1, Crates charges Euphanes with putting up the tithes "of every office through A." In Barry's Ram i., Teiresias is referred to as "the blind An. prophet"; as a matter of fact, he was a Theban. In Hercules iv. 2, 2255, Jove says, "I [am] that Amphitruo that slew those outlaws . . . who with their piracy awed all Archæia"—where Archæia is an obvious misprint for A. In Tiberius 2151, Maximus relates how Germanicus, on his way to Armenia in A.D. 18, "sailed to Brundisium, So to A., and from thence to Rhodes." In York M. P. xlvii. 292, Andrew undertakes to go "To A. full lely that lede for to leche." According to the consensus of tradition Andrew was martyred at Patra, on the coast of A., where a ch. dedicated to him preserves his memory.

ACHARON, ACHARUSIAN. See ACHERON, ACHERUSIAN MARSH.

ACHE. See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

ACHELOUS. A r. of ancient Hellas, now the Aspropotamo, rising in the Pindus range and flowing S. between Ætolia and Acarnania to the Ionian Sea. The r.-god was widely worshipped throughout Greece. The story of his fight with Heracles for the hand of Deianeira, the daughter of Æneus, K. of Calydon, is the subject of Act I of T. Heywood's B. Age. He speaks of himself as "eldest son Unto the grave and old Oceanus And the nymph Nais, born on Pindus Mt."

ACHERNENSES. See ACARNANIA.

ACHERON. Properly a r. of Epeirus, in Thesprotia, supposed to be the entrance to the lower world. The name was later transferred in other legends to other regions; and ultimately to one of the r. of the lower world itself. Homer, Odys. x. 513, says, "There into A. Cocytus glides, streaming from Styx, and Pyriphlegithon." In Tit. iv. 3, 44, Titus says, "I'll dive into the burning lake below, And pull her out of A. by the heels." In Mac. iii. 5, 15, Hecate summons the witches to meet her "at the pit of A." In M. N. D. iii. 2, 357, Oberon commands Puck to cover up the starry welkin "With drooping fog as thick as A." The Renaissance writers all identified the Greek with the Christian underworld, for which they could quote Dante's warrant. According to him, the A. is the stream over which Charon ferries the departed souls and which encircles the mouth of Hell. The Styx fills the 5th circle. The Phlegethon is a r. of boiling blood; and all the waters of Hell collect into the frozen lake of Cocytus. In Lochine iv. 2, 67, Humber speaks of "The hunger-bitten dogs of A. Chased from the ninefold Puriflegiton." In Span. Trag. v., we find "the loathsome pool of A."; and "boiling A." In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust swears by "the kingdoms of infernal rule, Of Styx, of A., and the fiery lake of ever-burning Phlegethon." In Mason's Mulleasses i. 2, 579, Eunuchus proposes to kill Bordello, "whose humorous soul Shall in his passage over A. Make Charon laugh." Massinger, in Parl. Love v. 1, speaks of a sulphur brand plucked from "burning A." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iii. 1, Forobosco threatens to "call a host up from the Stygian lakes Shall waft thee to the Acherontic fens." Hall, in Satires iii. 6, 2, tells how the drunkard Gullion, when he died, wanted to drink; but Charon was afraid lest he "would have drunk dry the r. A." Milton, P. L. ii. 578, calls it "Sad A. of sorrow, black and deep." In Philotus 123, Flavius conjures the spirits "By Matthew, Mark, by Luke and John, By Lethe, Stix, and A." Hence A. is often used without any specific reference to the r. as a synonym for Hell. In Locrine iv. 4, Humber appeals to the "damned ghosts of joyless A." In Kyd's Cornelia ii., Cornelia says, "I am an offering fit for A." In Brewer's Lovesick King iv., Grim talks of raking "hell and Phlegitan, Acaron and Barrathrum." In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 1, Vandome arrests St. Anne "in the names Of Heaven and Earth and deepest A." In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Pope Alexander says, "In spite of grace, conscience, and A., I will rejoice and triumph in my charter"; and in iii. 5, Bagnoli addresses Frescobaldi as "foul fiend of A." In W. Rowley's All's Lost iv. 1, 119, Julianus says "I brought thee to a shame Stains all the way twixt earth and A." In Milton's Comus 604, the Elder Brother speaks of "all the grisly legions that troop Under the sooty flag of A." Barnes, in Trans. of Moschus Idyl i., says of Cupid: "Even so far as A. he shooteth."

ACHERUSIAN MARSH. A small lake in Campania, between Cumæ and Cape Misenum. The name was probably given to it in consequence of its propinquity to Acheron, whose reputation for being connected with the infernal world it shared. There were several lakes of this name in Greece, the best known being the one in Thesprotia, through which the Acheron flowed. In Richards' Messalina ii. 821, Messalina prays that she may "win the misty souls of men And send them tumbling to th' A. fen." In Mason's Mulleasses 1835, Borgias speaks of "Those mists felt by the souls of men When they descend to th' A. fen."

ACON (better known as ACRE or, more fully, ST. JEAN D'ACRE). The ancient Accho, a port on the coast of Palestine, at the N. extremity of the Bay of Acre, immediately N. of Mt. Carmel. It received the name of Ptolemais from Ptolemy Soter. It was taken from the Saracens in 1110 by the Crusaders, recovered by Saladin in 1187, retaken in 1191 by Richd. I, and handed over to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who held it for exactly a century. In 1271 it was visited by Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I, and his Q. Elinor, who is reported to have saved his life there by sucking the poison from a wound made by an envenomed dagger. Here his daughter Joan was born. Edward says, in Peele's Ed. I, p. 37, that when Elinor "progressed in the sts. of A. and the fair Jerusalem" she walked on nothing but arras, tapestry, and silk. Later, p. 50, Elinor pleads with the K.: "Good Ned, let Joan of A. be his (Gloster's) bride." In Trouble. Reign Robert relates how his father was knighted "at kingly Richd.'s hands in Palestine, When as the walls of A. gave him way" (Hazlitt's edn., p. 227). In Downfall Huntingdon iv. 1, John says, "Richd. is a k. In Cyprus, A., Acre, and rich Palestine." A. and Acre are the same, and the sense as well as the metre requires the omission of Acre from the line; it was, no doubt, a gloss on the less familiar A. Later in the same scene Leicester says, "Thus did Richd. take The coward Austria's colours in his hand And thus he cast them under A. walls." Drayton, in Barons' Wars ii. 45, speaks of the English barons "Who summoned A. with an English drum."

ACROCERAUNIA. A promontory in the Ionian Sea on the coast of Epirus; also applied to the mtn. range in N. Epirus, which terminates in the promontory. In the old Timon i. 2, Eutrapelus swears "by the An. mtns." And Abyssus retorts, "Thou shalt not fright me with thy bugbear words, thy mtns. of A."

ACTEAN. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass v. 5, 2261, England is addressed as "more fruitful than A. plains." The earliest k. of Athens, according to Pausanias, was Actæus; so possibly the meaning is "the plains of Attica." The name Acte was given to the most easterly of the 3 promontories of Chalcidice; but it is hard to see how this could be regarded as specially fruitful.

ACTIACK SEA. The portion of the Adriatic near Actium, q.v. In May's Agrippina iii. 210, Seneca speaks of the civil discords which dyed "the A. and Sicilian seas" with Roman blood. The reference is to the defeat of Antony by Octavian 31 B.C.

ACTIUM. A promontory in Acarnania on the W. coast of Greece to the S. of the Bay of Previsa, where the decisive battle was fought between Octavian and Antony 31 B.C. A. & C. iii., Scenes 7-10, are laid here. "Our overplus of shipping we will burn," says Antony (iii. 7, 52), "And with the rest full-manned, from the head of A. Beat the approaching Cæsar." F i. reads "action," but Pope's emendation "A." is generally accepted. Chaucer's glorious description of the battle in Leg. Fair Wom. 624 seq. should be read. In Antonie iii. 1114, Antony cries: "One disordered act at A. . . my glory hath obscured."

ADAM AND EVE. The sign of the first shop in Goldsmiths' Row on the S. of Cheapside. In Marston, Malcontent Prol., Sly says, "I'll lay 100 pound I'll walk but once down by the Goldsmiths' Row in Cheap, take notice of the signs and tell you them with a breath instantly. . . They begin, as the world did, with A. and E.; there's in all just 5 and 50." It was also a bookseller's sign. Middleton's Old Law was "Printed for Edward Archer at the sign of the A. and E. in Little Britaine. 1656."

ADEA. A country in E. Africa, placed by Heylyn between Ade and Habassia (Abyssinia); it was therefore on the E. and S.E. of Abyssinia. Pory (1600) places it on the E. coast between Cape Guardafui and Zanzibar. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Corionil, disguised as a negro, professes to be ambassador "from the Emperor of both the Ethiopias and of the mighty kingdoms and vast countries of Goa, Caffares, Fatigar, Angola, Barns, Balignosa, A., Vagne, and Goyame." This is identical with the list of the titles of the Emperor of Ethiopia, given by Heylyn in the section on Æthiopia Superior.

ADDLE HILL. A st. in Lond., running from Upper Thames St. to Gt. Carter Lane. The S. end of it was demolished by the formation of Q. Victoria St. Here Dekker's Shoemaker's was printed by Valentine Sims "at the foot of Adling H. near Baynards Castle at the sign of the White Swan."

ADERSTOE. In the True Trag., p. 113, Richmond says, "Therefore let us towards A. amaine. . . From thence towards Lichfield we will march next day." Atherstone, a town in Warwicksh., is intended. It is exactly 100 m. from Lond., Liverpool, and Lincoln, and 8 m. S.W. of Bosworth Field.

ADIABENE. Province of the Assyrian Empire, lying between the Tigris and the Zab, near to Nineveh. Milton, P. R. iii. 320, speaks of troops "From Atropatia, and the neighbouring plains Of A."

ADRIA. See ADRIATIC.

ADRIAN (SAINT). See HADRIAN.

ADRIANOPOLE. The 2nd city in the Turkish Empire. It was enlarged and embellished by the Emperor Hadrian, from whom it took its name. It lies on the Maritza (the ancient Hebrus), some 75 m. from its mouth and 135 m. N.W. of Constantinople. Taken by the Sultan Murad I in 1360, it has since remained in the Turkish Empire. In Selimus 518, Mustapha exhorts Baiazet, "Make haste, my Lord, from Adrinople walls And let us fly to fair Bizantium." This was in 1512, when Selim rebelled against his father Baiazet and deposed him.

ADRIATIC SEA. Between Italy and Illyria. In Shr. i. 2, 74, Petruchio says, "She moves me not . . . were she as rough As are the swelling A. Seas": a natural simile for an Italian. Herrick, in Dial. between Horace and Lydia (1627), makes Lydia call Horace "Rough as the Adriatick S." In K. K. Hon. Man. D. 3, Sempronio speaks of Venice as "Built in an angle of the Andrie arctic sea": a curious miswriting or misprint. In Marlowe Jew i. 1, Barabas conjectures that the Turkish fleet which has been sighted intends "to pass along Towards Venice by the A. Sea." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, Brainworm claims, "I have been at Marseilles, Naples, and the A. Gulf, a gentleman-slave in the galleys." Prisoners-of-war were employed both by the Venetians and the Turks as galley-slaves. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 7, 14, tells of the evils endured by the man "Who in frail wood on Adrian gulf doth fleet." Milton, P. L. i. 520, speaks of the Greek gods "who with Saturn old Fled over Adria to the Hesperian fields."

ADRUMENTUM (HADRUMETUM). A spt. on the N. coast of Africa, 80 m. S. of Carthage; extensive ruins at Susa marked its site; but even these have mostly disappeared. In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 2, a messenger, giving an account of the battle of Zama, says, "500 only live Of 40,000, which to A. Are fled with Hannibal."

ÆAS (Aous). Chief r. of Epirus, rising in Mt. Læmaon in the N. part of the Pindus Range, and flowing N.W. into the Adriatic, close to Apollonia.

In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5245, Io mentions the A. amongst the rs. in the neighbourhood of the Vale of Tempe. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 5, 24, Cæsar, who is at Apollonia, says, "This r. Anius (in whose mouth now lies A pinnacle I would pass in to fetch on My army's dull rest from Brundissium) That is at all times else exceeding calm By reason of a purling wind that flies Off from the shore each morning, driving up The billows far to sea, in this night yet Bears such a terrible gale, put off from sea, . . . that no boat dare stir." The description of the r. is taken from Plutarch's Cæsar 38. The A. or Aous is almost certainly the r. intended by Anius, though some have taken it to be the Apsus, a river falling into the Adriatic abt. 11 m. N. of the mouth of the Aous.

ÆGEAN SEA. The part of the Mediterranean now called Archipelago, between Asia Minor and Greece. In Chapman's Cæsar v. 1, Pompey is at Lesbos "compassed in With the Æ. sea that doth divide Europe from Asia." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says, "To chase the flying Pompey have I cut The great Ionian and Egean seas." This was after the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalia in 48 B.C. In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iii., Tytan says, "From the Æ. Sea That of our son Ægeon bears the name We have assembled infinites of men." In Randolph's Muses v. 1, Mediocrity speaks of the Isthmus of Corinth as "the small isthmus That suffers not the Æ. tide to meet The violent rage of the Ionian wave." In Hercules iv. 3, 2256, Jove claims to have overthrown the pirates who "aved . . . the Ionian, Ægean, and Cretick seas." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 7, 26, says,

"Not half so fast, to save her maidenhead, Fled fearful Daphne on the Æ. strond," i.e. the shore of Thessaly. Milton, P. L. i. 746, calls Lemnos "the Æ. isle." In P. R. iv. 238, he says, "behold Where on the Æ. shore a city stands . . . Athens." Tofte, in Laura (1597) iv. 1, says, "In the Egean dangerous sea of love. . . A new Arion, there myself I find."

ÆGEON'S HILL. Mt. Ætna, so called from the legend which affirmed that after the war between the Gods and the Giants Zeus buried Ægeon, or Briareus, under this mtn. In Middleton's Family iv. 2, Gerardine speaks of "the Titanian god when Æ. H. 'a mounts in triumph."

ÆGERIAN WOOD. A grove in a valley at Rome, S. of the Cœlian Hill, just outside the Porta Capena. It was so called from the legend that the nymph Egeria used to meet Numa Pompilius there. In Tiberius 2663, Tiberius directs "Hie to the altars, the Æ. W."

ÆGINA. An island of Greece, in the Saronic Gulf, over against the Piræus. In the early days of Greece a great centre of trade, it originated the Æginetan standard of weights and measures generally adopted throughout Greece, the rival standard being the Euboic; the former was abt. one-sixth larger than the latter. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 3499, Thrasicles begs from Timon "but 2 Æ. bushels [of gold], that's all."

ÆLEFT. In Larum A3, Danila says, "From Æ. 2000 more [Spanish troops] Follow the conduct of Emanuell." Later on (Ba) he calls it Aleft. The author's spelling is very erratic, and he probably means Delft; he may have taken the initial "D" for the French preposition, and thought the town was called D'Æleft. See DELFT.

ÆMATHIA. See EMATHIA.

ÆMILIAN PLACE. The Basilica Fulvia et Æmilia in the middle of the N.E. side of the Forum at Rome. Built by M. Fulvius Nobilior and M. Æmilius Lepidus in 179 B.C., restored in 54 B.C. by L. Æmilius Paullus, and again restored and decorated by Paullus Æmilius Lepidus in A.D. 22. Pliny considered it one of the most beautiful buildings in the world. In Jonson's Sejanus i. 2, the Emperor approves of the grant of the Senate to Lepidus "for his repairing the Æ. P. And restoration of those monuments."

ÆMILIAN ROAD. One of the great Roman rds., constructed by M. Æmilius Lepidus 187 B.C. It started at Ariminum, and proceeded by way of Placentia, Mediolanum, and Aquileia. At Ariminum it joined the Via Flaminia from Rome. It was the chief artery of communication with N. Italy. In Milton P. R. iv. 69, the Tempter points out embassies coming to Rome "In various habits, on the Appian rd., Or on the Æ."

ÆNON. Mentioned in Gospel of John iii. 21 as a place where John the Baptist exercised his ministry, because there was much water there. It has been identified by Conder with Ainun, in the Wady Farah, 7 m. from Salim. Milton, P. R. ii. 27, describes the disciples seeking for Jesus "in Jericho, The city of palms, Æ., and Salem old."

ÆOLIANS. One of the 4 tribes into which the Hellenes are usually divided. Apparently their original settlement was in the centre of Thessaly; but later they migrated into Boeotia, and established colonies in Lesbos, where the Aeolian dialect was spoken in its standard form and immortalized by the lyrics of Sappho and Alcæus. Milton, P. R. iv. 257, speaks of "various-measured verse, Aeolian charms and Dorian lyric odes"; "Aeolian charms" is a translation of Horace's "Æolium carmen," meaning the lyrics of Sappho.

ÆSQUILINE. See ESQUILINE.

ÆTHIOPIA. See ETHIOPIA.

ÆTNA (ETNA). The largest volcano in Europe, in N.E. Sicily, near the coast. Of its 60 recorded eruptions, 17 occurred during the 16th and 17th cents., the most memorable being that of 1537, which continued for a year and shook the whole island. As Vesuvius had been quiescent ever since the great eruption in which Pompeii and Herculaneum were destroyed in A.D. 79 until it once more gave signs of its inward fires in 1631, and as Hecla was below the horizon of our dramatists, Æ. was practically the only active volcano they knew anything about, and had to do heavy duty as the stock figure for passionate feeling of any kind, whether of love or of agony. The breath of Lucrece "Thronging through her lips, so vanisheth As smoke from Æ., that in air consumes" (Lucrece 1042). Falstaff (M. W. W. iii. 5, 129) protests, "I will be thrown into Æ., as I have been into Thames, ere I will leave her thus." Marcus (Tit. iii. 1, 242) prays, "Now let hot Æ. cool in Sicily, And be my heart an ever-burning hell." In Peele's Ed. I., p. 42, the Lady Elinor will follow Luellen even if he builds his bower "on Æ.'s fiery tops." Argalio, in Kirke's Champions iv. 1, talks of "The black compounded smoke the Cyclops send From the foul sulphur of hot Æ.'s forge," alluding to the ancient legend that the Cyclopes were the assistants of Vulcan, who had his forge beneath the mtn. Tamburlaine speaks of "Æ. breathing fire" (B. v. 3). Fowler, in Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, would "rather take a nap on the ridge of E." than endure a visit from a physician. Sciarrha, in Shirley's Traitor iv. 2, wishes that he "could vomit consuming flames, or stones, like E." to destroy Lorenzo. Sim, in W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 1, speaks of "the parboyled Æ." of Randal's bosom, who is in love with Moll. Bassanes, in Ford's Heart iv. 2, prays: "Fall on me, if there be a burning Æ., and bury me in flames." Aretus, in B. & F. Valentin. v. 1, "swells and burns like flaming Æ." In Massinger's Milan v. 2, Sforza, poisoned by Francisco, feels "an Æ. in his entrails."

"Princes' discontents," says Janin in Chapman's Trag. Byron iii. 1, "Being once incensed, are like the flames of Æ., Not to be quenched or lessened." In his Bussy iii. 1, Montsurry threatens to strike D'Ambois "under the Æ. of his pride": with reference to the story of the giant Enceladus, on whom Æ. was flung in the war between the Giants and Zeus. In Jonson's New World, the Herald announces that there are 3 ways of going to the moon: "the third, old Empedocles' way; who, when he leaped into Æ., the smoke took him and whiff him up into the moon." In T. Heywood's Dialogues xvi. 4606, Menippus asks Empedocles, "What was the cause Thou threw'st these headlong into Æ.'s jaws?" Milton, P. L. iii. 470, refers to him "who, to be deemed A god, leaped fondly into Æ.'s flames, Empedocles."

In Looking Glass iii., the Magus describes an eruption of Æ.: "The hill of Sicily Sometime on sudden doth evacuate Whole flakes of fire and spews out from below The smoky brands that Vulcan's bellows drive"; and in v., the Usurer anticipates the Day of Judgement as "a burden more than Æ." In Marston's Insatiate iv., Guido says, "Love is Æ. and will ever burn." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 618, Orlando says, "Æ., forsake the bounds of Sicily For now in me thy restless flames appear." In Alimony i. 3, Haxter tells how he caught the Neapolitan disease (syphilis): "ever since which hot Æthiopian service my legs have been taught to pace iambics." In Davenant's U. Lovers v. 4, there is a song containing the lines "If you want fire, fetch a supply From Æ. and Puteoli." In Lady Mother i. 2, the Lady says, "I have shed tears enough to extinguish Æ." In Chapman's Usher i. 2, Strozza describes the charge of a boar "With the enraged Æ. of his breath Firing the air." In Sweetnam ii., Lisandro professes his readiness to "scale the flaming Æ.'s top Whose sulphurous smoke kills with infection," to win his lady. In Dekker's Babylon ii. 271, in the description of the defeat of the Spanish Armada, the 3rd K. cries, at the sight of the fire-ships: "The sulphurous Æ. belcheth on our ships." Spenser, F. Q. i. 11, 44, describes how "burning Æ. from his boiling stew Doth belch out flames and rocks in pieces broke." Milton, P. L. i. 233, speaks of "a hill Torn . . . from the shattered side of thundering Æ." In Mason's Mulleasses 1831, Borgias prays that he may "be thrown Like Æn. balls from heaven and strike you down." Watson, in Tears of Fancie (1593) xviii. 7, speaks of his heart "like Æ. burning" with love. Barnes, in Parthenophil lxxv. 11, asks whether the father of Cupid was "Vesuvius, else? or was it E. rather?" Lodge, in Phillis (1593), asks the sea-nymphs "To quench the flames from my heart's Æ. streaming." W. Smith, in Chloris (1596), says of his love, "The flames of E. are not half so hot."

ÆTOLIA. A dist. of ancient Greece lying N. of the Corinthian Gulf between Locris and Acarnania. The Æens took part in the Trojan war. In Marlowe's Dido iii., Sergestus recognizes one of Dido's suitors as "a Persian born; I travelled with him to Æ." In T. Heywood's B. Age i. 1, "Cneus the Æens' K." presides over the contest between Achelous and Heracles for the hand of his daughter Deianeira. He was K. of Calydon (q.v.) in Æ. Diomedes was of Æn. descent, and being expelled from Argos after the siege of Troy returned thither and there died. In his Iron Age B i., Cressida speaks of him as "Diomed K. of Æ.", which is not strictly correct. In Hercules iv. 3, 2256, Jove claims to have overcome the pirates who "awed all Archæa; Æ., Phocis."

AFRICA (usually spelt AFFRICK; Ac. = Afric, Afk. = Affrick, An. = African). The An. countries on the coast of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea were well known; and the Portuguese navigators had explored most of the coastline. The interior was almost a terra incognita. It was believed to be mainly a huge desert, fertile in uncouth monsters, and rich in gold and gems and spices. To the Elizabethans A. meant chiefly the states on the S. coast of the Mediterranean—Egypt, Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Fez, and Morocco, all the inhabitants of which, except the Egyptians, are classed together as Moors. In Marlowe's Tamb. A iii. 3, Tamburlaine describes the pirates of Argier as "the scum of A.," and he repeatedly declares his intention of conquering A., by which the N. states only are meant. In v. 1, he speaks of his dominions as including "Egyptians, Moors, and men of Asia, From Barbary unto the Western India"; and says, "From the bounds of Ac. to the banks Of Ganges shall his mighty arm extend." He speaks a little before of being with his triumphant host "in Ac. where it seldom rains." In i. 1, Ortygius proclaims Cosroe "D. of A. and Albania." In Faustus vii., Mephistopheles mentions "the high pyramids Which Julius Cæsar brought from A.": where Egypt is meant. Greene, in Friar ix., talks of "rich Alexandria drugs Found in the wealthy strand of A." In Faustus iii., one of the projects of Faustus is "To join the hills that bound the Ac. shore And make that country continent to Spain." In his Dido iii., Dido is called the "Q. of Ac." In Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 24, Medina speaks of "the streights of Gibraltar whose watery divisions their Affricke bounds from our Christian Europe."

In Temp. ii. 1, 71, Gonzalo declares, "Our garments are now as fresh as when we put them on first in Ac., at the marriage of the K.'s fair daughter Claribel to the K. of Tunis"; and in ii. 1, 125, Sebastian reproaches the K. with having lost his daughter "to an An." Milton, P. L. i. 585, speaks of the troops "whom Biserta sent from Ac. shore When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell By Fontarabbia." In P. R. ii. 347, he mentions amongst table delicacies "fishes caught on Ac. coast." In P. R. ii. 199, he speaks of Scipio Africanus as "He surnamed of A.," and in iii. 101, says of him, "Young An. for fame His wasted country freed from Punic rage." In Sonn. xvii. 4, he calls Hannibal "the An. bold." Barnes, in Parthenophil (1593) lxxv. 4, says to Cupid: "Hence into Ac. I There seek out thy kin Amongst the Moors!"

The English traded with the countries on the N. and W. coasts, particularly with Barbary and Guinea. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly speaks of the time "when my brother the merchant went into Ak, to follow his great trade there." It appears later that he went to Guinea. H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier tells the story of Genseric the Vandal's conquest of Carthage, his persecution of the Christians, and his death. It deviates very much from historical accuracy. Genseric is represented as a heathen, whereas he was an Arian Christian, and the objects of his persecution were the orthodox Catholics. Belisarius is introduced as one of his generals, and is put to death by him for becoming a Christian; whereas he does not come upon the scene until A.D. 533, more than 50 years after the death of Genseric, and then as the opponent and vanquisher of the Vandals in A. In i. 1, Genseric speaks of the perfecting of his great work in Afk., the "general sacrifice of Christians." In B. & F. Valentin i. 3, the soldiers pray to be sent to "Egypt Or sandy Ac., to display our valours." This was at the time of Genseric's invasion of A.

It is interesting to note that the usual course taken by seamen for America was to go S. till they sighted A., and then strike across the Atlantic. So in Jonson's (and others) Eastward iii. 3, Seagull, speaking of Virginia, says the voyage thither will take "Some 6 weeks; and if I get to any part of the coast of A. I'll sail thither with any wind." The heat of the An. deserts was proverbial. In Troil. i. 3, 370, Ulysses says, "We were better perch in Ac. sun Than in the pride and salt scorn of his eyes." In Stucley 2569, it is stated, "The sands of Ac. are so parching hot That when our blood doth light upon the earth The drops do seethe like caldrons as they stand." Their vast extent made them a type of utter loneliness. In Cym. i. 1, 167, Imogen wishes that Posthumus and Cloten "were in Ac. both together, Myself by with a needle, that I might prick The goer-back."

A. was rich in spices and gold. In H4 B v. 3, 104, Pistol, bringing the news of Prince Hal's accession, says, "I speak of A. and golden joys." In Taming of a Shrew, Haz. p. 532, Philotus speaks of "rich Afk. spices." In Ford's Sun. iii. 2, Folly says, "I drop like a cobnut out of A."

A. was full of fierce and venomous beasts. In Cor. i. 8, 3, Aufidius declares, "Not Ac. owns a serpent I abhor More than thy fame." In the old Timon iv. 2, Timon prays, "Me transform into a dire serpent Or grisly lion, such a one as yet Ne'er Lybia or A. hath seen." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 5, Scipio says of Hannibal: "We'll hunt this Afk. lion into a stronger toil." Above all, it was the home of strange monsters. Pliny, in Hist. Nat. viii. 16, had said, "Semper novi aliquid affert A." In Fraunce's Victoria 2165, Onophrius asks, "Quid novi affert A.?" Jonson, Ev. Man O. iii. 1, speaks of "some unknown beast, brought out of A." Antiochus, in Massinger's Believe ii. 2, asks, "[Why do] you gaze upon us As some strange prodigy ne'er seen in A.?" and in Guardian ii. 2, says that for a woman to love a man "is no Ac. wonder." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forobosco thinks that the exhibition of an English ox roasted whole in Madrid would bring in more money "than all the monsters of Ac.," and in Cupid's Rev. iii. 4, Dorilaus maintains that a good woman is "stranger than all the monsters in Ac." In Massinger's Emperor iv. 5, the jealous Theodosius will show his wife to be "a prodigy Which Ac. never equalled." In the old Timon iii. 5, Timon speaks of woman-kind as "more monstrous than any monster bred in A.," and in v. 2, he speaks of "Some strange monster hatched in A." In Shirley's Duke's Mist. iv. 1, Valerio says, "Unless this face content you, you may stay Till Ac. have more choice of monsters for you." In Milton's Comus 606, the Elder Brother speaks of "all the monstrous forms Twixt A. and Ind." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, Phantastes says, "Either A. must breed more monsters or you make fewer gentlemen, Mr. Herald, for you have spent all my devices already": i.e. in coats-of-arms for new knights. In Brome's Queen's Exch. ii. 2, Jeffrey exclaims, "What monsters are bred in Affrica! I take you but for one." R. Linche, in Diella (1596) xxx. 5, asks who can count "What misshaped beasts vast A. doth yield"? Gosson, in preface to Ephemerides of Phialo (1579), says, "There is ever a new knack in a knave's hood, or some kind of monster to be seen in Affrik." Bacon, in Sylva v. 476, says, "It is held that that proverb, A. semper aliquid monstri, cometh, for that the fountains of waters there being rare, divers sorts of beasts come from several parts to drink; and so, being refreshed, fall to couple, and many times with several kinds." In Cowley's Cutter iv. 6, Worm says, "He was a stranger thing than any monster in Afk. where he traded."

AGANIPPE. A spring dedicated to the Muses on the slopes of Mt. Helicon in Boeotia. It may still be found, midway between Paleo-panaghia and Pyrgaki. In T. Heywood's Mistress i. 1, Apuleius says, "Can'st thou conduct my wandering steps to A.'s spring?" Sir P. Sidney, in Astrophel (1581) lxxiv. 1, says, "I never drank of A.'s well."

AGIDON (probably a misprint for ALGIDON). Mt. Algidus is meant, in the N.E. part of the Alban Range in Latium, abt. 20 m. S. E. of Rome. Here the Æquians had their camp in the war in the time of Appius Claudius the Decemvir. In Webster's A. & Virginia i. 1, Appius says, "The army that doth winter fore A. Is much distressed, we hear."

AGINCOURT (or AZINCOUR). A vill. in France in Pas-de-Calais department on the rd. from Abbeville to St. Omer. Here Henry V inflicted a great defeat on the French on St. Crispin's Day, 25 October, 1415. The scene of H5 iii. 7, iv., and v. 1, is laid in the French or English camps at A. It is mentioned in prol. 15: "May we cram Within this wooden O the very casques That did affright the air at A.?" iv. prol. 52, "We shall much disgrace With 4 or 5 most vile and ragged foils . . . the name of A.;" and iv. 7, 92, "What is this castle called that stands hard by?"—"They call it A."—"Then call we this the field of A." Holinshed says: "He [Henry] desired of Mountjoie to "understand the name of the castell neere adjoining"; when they had told him that it was called A., he said, "Then shall this conflict be called the battell of A." Jonson, in Prince Henry's Barriers, says that the very name of Henry V "made head against his foes; and here at A., where first it rose, It there hangs still a comet over France, Striking their malice blind." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 1, George Cressingham declares, "It was no impeachment of the glory won at A.'s great battle that the achiever of it in his youth had been a purse-taker." In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 1, D'Olive says that after his embassy "A. battle shall grow out of use" for the dating of events, which will all be reckoned as so many years from the great embassy. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A 52, there is a three-man song: "Agencourt! Agencourt! know ye not Agencourt! Where the English slew and hurt All the French foemen." Drayton, in Ballad of Agincourt (1606) 11, says that K. Harry, "taking many a fort Furnished in warlike sort Marcheth towards A. In happy hour."

AGINER. Mentioned in Stucley 2461 as one of the towns held in Africa by the Portuguese. The list runs "A., Zahanra, Seuta, Penon, Melilla." The last 3 are on the coast of Morocco, close to the Straits of Gibraltar; and I am disposed to think that A. is a misprint or mis-spelling of Tangier; which would come 1st in a list running from W. to E. along the coast. Moreover, Tangier was one of the ports in Africa which had been retained by the previous K. of Portugal, John III. In the Coventry M. P. of The Nativity, the Angel addresses the 3 Ks. as "K. of Taurus, Sir Jaspas, K. of Araby, Sir Balthasar, Melchior, K. of Aginar." I suppose Tangier may be meant here also.

AGORA. The market-place of Athens, lying W. of the Acropolis and S. of the Areopagus. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 200, Diogenes, who should have known better, says to the Athenians, "When you meet in the A. to make up the body-politic, 'tis like the meeting of humours in the natural body." The Athenian assembly did not meet in the A., but at the Pnyx to the W. of it.

AGRA. Capital of the N.W. Provinces, India. It lies on the Jumna, 740 m. W. of Calcutta. It was made the capital of the Mogul Empire by Akbar the Gr. (died 1603). Its chief glory is the Taj Mahal, built by Shah Jehan abt. the middle of the 17th cent. as a memorial to his favourite wife. Milton, P. L. xi. 391, mentions amongst the seats of mighty empire "A. and Lahore of Gt. Mogul."

AGRIPPA (BATHS of). The 1st public baths in Rome, built by Agrippa 21 B.C. They were in the Campus Martius, just S. of the site of the Pantheon. The building was magnificent, and was adorned with costly paintings and statues. The water was the coldest and freshest in Rome, and the Baths were in use until the 6th cent. Some ruined fragments still survive. In May's Agrippina i. 339, Vitellius mentions "A.'s Baths and Pompey's Theater" amongst the greatest buildings of Rome.

AGRIVARI (a misprint for ANGRIVARI). A tribe of Germans dwelling between the Weser and the Elbe. They revolted against the Romans in A.D. 16, but were conquered by Germanicus in 2 battles. See TACITUS, Ann. ii. 19-24. In Tiberius 1131, Germanicus says, "The savage A. kept their den, Who ranging now and then would snatch their prey"; and he then tells the story of the battle in which "The savage A. all were drowned"; though he turns the Weser absurdly into "great Danubius."

AGUILEME (ANGOULEME). The capital of Angoumois Province, France, on the Carente, 250 m. S.W. of Paris. Angoumois was ceded to England by the Treaty of Bretigny 1360, but was recovered by Charles V. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 94, Edward claims from France "all these Dukedoms following: Aquitaine, Anjou, Guyen, A."

AIALON (or AJALON), Valley of. In S. Palestine, leading down from the foothills to the plain of Philistia, abt. 12 m. N.W. of Jerusalem. Scene of the victory of Joshua over the Canaanites recorded in Joshua x. 12, 13. Milton, P. L. xii. 266, quotes Joshua's command, "Sun, in Gibeon stand, And thou moon, in the vale of A."

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE (the German AACHEN). An ancient city in the Province of the Lower Rhine, 80 m. S.E. of Brussels and 38 W. of Cologne. Charlemagne made it the capital of the N. portion of his empire, and his favourite residence during the latter part of his reign. His tomb may still be seen in the cathedral. The Emperors of Germany were often crowned here. Now chiefly famous for its medicinal baths. In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 3, 28, Richd. of Cornwall says to himself, "Here rest thee, Richd. . . . And vow never to see fair England's bounds Till thou in Aix be crowned Emperor." Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 2, 5, says Charlemagne " . . . dwelt at Ache, built a fair house in the midst of the marsh, and a temple by it where after he was buried, and in which city all his posterity ever since used to be crowned."

ALADULE. Armenia Major, so called from its last K., Aladules. It is marked Aliduli in Hexam's Mercator (1636). Milton, P. L. x. 435, says that the Tartar, retreating from his Russian foe, "Leaves all waste beyond The realm of A."

ALANI. A Scythian tribe, first found living partly round the Sea of Azov, partly on the Danube in the Sarmatian country. They joined with the Goths and Vandals in the invasion of the W. Empire. Of their language only one word has been preserved, "Ardaba," which means the city of the 7 gods. In Glaphthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood, pretending to be a scholar, says to Grace, "I'll read the dialect of the Alanits, or Ezion Geber."

ALARKES. "Approved A." are mentioned in Stucley 2471 as amongst the "brave resolved Turks and valiant Moors" in the army of Abdelmelek at the battle of Alcazar. Heylyn (s.v. BARBARIE) mentions Alarach as one of the 6 principal towns of Morocco. I should guess it to be El Araish or Larash at the mouth of the r. of the same name a little S. of Tangier.

ALBA LONGA. Ancient city of Latium, on E. side of Lake Alban, on the N. side of Alban Mt. Said to have been founded by Ascanius, the son of Æneas, and thus became the mother city of Rome. Destroyed in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. In Peele's Polyhymnia 174, we read of "The 3 Horatii in the field Betwixt the Roman and the An. camp." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 43, says that Iulus, i.e. Ascanius, "in Long A. placed his throne apart."

ALBAN (SAINT) HALL. University of Oxford, named after Robertus de Sancto Albano, who owned the property in John's reign. The Hall is one of the oldest in Oxford, and stands on the S. side of King St., next to Merton. Massinger, the dramatist, was entered at St. A. H. in 1602.

ALBANIA. A country on E. coast of the Adriatic Sea, between Montenegro and the N. boundary of Greece. After belonging in turn to Bulgaria and the Normans, the Ans. achieved their independence, but in spite of the heroic resistance of the national idol, George Castriote, called by the Turks Iskander, or Scanderbeg (died 1466), the country was finally conquered by the Turks in 1478. Castriote was the hero of the lost play "Scanderbeg." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 2, Stephen calls the servant "Whoreson Scanderbeg rogue." Scanderbeg's life appeared in an English translation in 1596. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 12, 10, describes Doubt as having "sleeves dependent Albanesewise."

ALBANIA. Ancient country of Asia at the E. end of the Caucasus, now part of Russian Georgia. Subdued by Pompeius 65 B.C. In Marlowe Tamb. A. ii. 2, the Persian Meander promises, "He that can take or slaughter Tamburlaine Shall rule the province of A."; and in i. 1, Cosroes is crowned "D. of Africa and A." In the account of Pompey's conquests in Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, it is said, "The An. ks. he from their kingdoms chased And at the Caspian Sea their dwellings placed." As a matter of fact, though Pompey conquered them, he was only able to exact from them a nominal submission. In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Amurack commands Bajazet to "post away apace to Siria, Scythia, and A." In B. & F. Friends iii. 2, the scene of which is laid in the time of the ks. of Rome, Titus says that his mistress will appear "a white An. amongst Æthiops set." Probably it was the idea that the word was derived from albus (white) that suggested the comparison. Mandeville (ch. xiii.) falls into the same error: "After is A., a full great realm; so called because the people are whiter there than in other countries thereabout."

ALBANIA (or ALBANY). The old name for all Gt. Britain N. of the Humber; later used for Scotland. Holinshed, i. 396, says, "The 3rd and last part of the island he [Brutus] allotted unto Albanecte his youngest son. This latter parcel at the first took the name of Albanactus, who called it A." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 14, says, "Albanact had all the N. part, Which of himself A. he did call." Really the name is derived from the root Alp, which means a mtn. The husband of Goneril in Lear is the D. of A. In Sackville's Ferrex v. 2, we read, "Pergus, the mighty d. of A., Is now in arms." In Lochrine ii. 6, Humbert decorates Hubba with a wreath for his chivalry "declared against the men of A."; which was the kingdom of Albanact. In Peele's Ed. I ix., Baliol addresses the Scottish peers as "Lords of A."; and throughout the play A. is used for Scotland. In Fisher's Fuimus i. 3, Cassibelanus says, "Haste you to the Scots and Picts, 2 names which now A.'s kingdom share." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. ii. 3, Gawin is described as the Alban k., i.e. the k. of Scotland. Albanois is used for a Scotchman. In Dekker's Babylon 237, Palmio says to Paridel, an Englishman, "I'll bring you to a gentleman next neighbour to your country, an Albanois."

ALBAN'S, ST. (A. = Alban, A.'s = Alban's). A town in Herts., on the Ver, a tributary of the Colne. Close by is the site of the old Roman town of Verulam, from which Lord Bacon took his title. A., the British proto-martyr, suffered death here in the persecution of Diocletian in A.D. 297, and in his honour a Benedictine monastery was erected by Offa of Mercia in 796. The story of the martyrdom of A., or Albon, is told in W. Rowley's Shoemaker: in v. 2, 186, Crispin says, "A ch. then and a beauteous monastery On Holm-hurst Hill, where Albon lost his head, Offa shall build; which I'll St. A. name In honour of our 1st English martyr's fame." There is a wrong identification here of Offa, the son of Alured, and the later Offa of Mercia. The modern town was founded by Ulsig, the 6th Abbot. It lies 24 m. N.W. of Lond., with which it is connected by the old Roman Watling St. 5 m. E. is Hatfield, which Henry VIII made into a royal palace. The old Abbey Ch., with its embattled tower and the longest Gothic nave in the world (284 ft.), still remains. In St. Michael's Ch., dating from the 10th cent., is the tomb of Lord Bacon.

Falstaff (H4 A. iv. 2, 50), on his march through Coventry, tells us that the only shirt amongst his tattered demalions was stolen "from my host at St. A.'s or the red-nosed innkeeper of Daventry." Both places are on the rd. from Lond. to Coventry. Shakespeare may probably enough have gone that way sometimes from Warwicksh. to Lond. Pains (H4 B. ii. 2, 185) warrants Prince Hal that Doll Tearsheet was "as common as the way between St. A.'s and Lond.," this being the rd. upon which all travellers from Lond. to the N. would necessarily go. In H6 B. i. 2, 57, Gloucester is summoned "to ride unto St. A.'s Whereas the k. and q. do mean to hawk"; and Sc. I, Act II is laid there. . . . We are told in i. 4, 76, that the K. "is now in progress towards St. A.'s," and on his arrival the hawking takes place, followed by the incident, taken from Sir T. More, of the pretended miracle wrought on a blind man "at St. A.'s shrine," which Gloucester discovers, and then orders the Masters of St. A.'s to flog the imposter out of town. It is a curious coincidence that this very D. of Gloucester was buried in the Abbey Ch. near the shrine of St. A., where his monument may still be seen. Indeed, his body was disinterred in the 18th cent. and found to be almost perfectly preserved.

Two battles in the Wars of the Roses were fought at St. A.'s: the 1st on 22 May, 1455, in which the Yorkists were victorious, Somerset was killed, and Henry VI taken prisoner; the 2nd on Shrove Tuesday, 1461, in which Margaret defeated the Yorkists under the Earl of Warwick and retook K. Henry. The 1st is described in H6 B. v. 2 & 3: "St. A.'s battle won by famous York Shall be eternized in all age to come" (v. 3, 30). The 2nd is reported by Warwick in H6 C. ii. 1, 111-141. In ii. 2, 103, Margaret taunts Warwick, "When you and I met at St. A.'s last, Your legs did better service than your hands"; and in iii. 2, 1, K. Edward relates how "at St. A.'s field This lady's husband, Sir Richd. Grey, was slain, His lands then seized on by the conqueror"; and adds that "in quarrel of the house of York This worthy gentleman did lose his life." These statements are plurally inaccurate; for the gentleman's name was John, not Richd.; he was fighting on the Lancastrian side; and it was Edward himself who seized his lands. Gloucester corrects one of these errors in R3 i. 3, 130, where he says to the unhappy Elizabeth, "Was not your husband In Margaret's battle at St. A.'s slain?" During the 1st battle of St. A.'s the D. of Somerset was killed under the sign on the Castle Inn (H6 B. v. 2, 68), "Underneath an alehouse' paltry sign, the Castle in St. A.'s, Somerset Hath made the wizard famous in his death." Hall, Chron., p. 233, says that Somerset "long before was warned to eschew all castles." The inn has disappeared, but was most likely in Holywell St.

There were many inns in the town, on account of its position on the rd. to Lond. Most of Act V of Oldcastle takes place at St. A.'s, where Oldcastle takes refuge in a carriers' inn called the Shears (v. 5).

In Abington i. 2, the boy says to Coomes, "Thou stand'st like the Bull at St. A.'s"; "Boy, ye lie," says Coomes, "the Horns." I am not able to find any trace of these 3 inns; the last seems like a mere joke. In Randolph's Muses, Banauus, amongst other projects, proposes to build a pyramid at St. A.'s "upon whose top I'll set a hand of brass with a scrawl in it, to shew the way to Lond., for the benefit of travellers" (iii. 1). There was already a signpost there, for in Shirley's Fair One iv. 6, Brains says, "I have asked her 2 or 3 questions, and she answers me with holding out her hand, as the post at St. A.'s that points the way to Lond." In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 1, Humphry prays, "At St. A.'s let all the inns be drunk, not an host sober to bid her worship welcome." By the Ver are still visible the ruins of Sopwell Nunnery, founded abt. 1100, where it is stated by Camden that Henry VIII was married to Anne Boleyn. Dame Juliana Berners was once its Prioress: she who wrote the Boke of Sainte Alban's. In B. & F. Thomas iv. 2, Sebastian, anxious to be satisfied that his son is no Puritan, asks him about his amours, and Thomas plays up to him. At last he inquires if he has seduced the Sisters of St. A.'s; in reply he holds up 5 fingers. "All 5," cries the delighted father; "dat's my own boy!" In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 4, Lance sarcastically asks if Valentine's troubles are to make the whole town shake, "Wits blasted with your bulls, and Taverns withered as though the term lay at St. A.'s." I take him to mean that if the law courts were to be removed to St. A.'s the taverns of the City of Lond. would be withered for lack of the patronage of the lawyers. Dekker, Lanthorn, says, "The m. between Hell and any place upon earth [are] shorter than those between Lond. and St. Albones." James Shirley was at one time a teacher at the Grammar School at St. A.'s.

ALBIA. See ALBION.

ALBIGENSES. A religious sect deriving its name from the city of Albi, in France, on the Tarn, 347 m. S. of Paris. After being condemned by several Councils, the A. were practically exterminated in the terrible crusade during the early years of the 13th cent. In Bale's Johan, p. 219, Dissimulation says, "The A. like heretics detestable shall be brent because against our father they babble."

ALBION. The earliest name for Gt. Britain as distinguished from Ireland. Aristotle, De Mundo 3, says, "Beyond the pillars of Hercules the ocean flows round the earth, and in it are a very large islands called British, A. and Ierne, lying beyond the Kelti." The word is used appropriately enough in the pseudo-Chaucerian prophecy attributed by the Clown to Merlin in Lear iii. 2, 91: "Then shall the realm of A. Come to great confusion." The D. of Bourbon speaks contemptuously of "that nook-shotten isle of A." (H5 iii. 5, 14). Margaret appeals to Suffolk in the name of "the royalty of 'A.'s k." (H6 B. i. 3, 48). Later on (iii. 2, 113) she speaks of "A.'s wished coast." In H6 C. iii. 3, 7, she declares, "I was great A.'s Q. in former golden days"; and in the same scene (49) Warwick announces himself as the messenger to K. Lewis "from worthy Edward, K. of A." The word is commonly used as a poetical name for England. "Now t' eternize A.'s champions Comes lovely Edward from Jerusalem" (Peele Ed. 1 i. 1); English warriors "conquered Spain And made them bow their knees to A." (Span. Trag. i. 5); "Welcome," says K. Henry, "To England's shore whose promontory cleaves Show A. is another little world"

(Greene, Friar iv.). The erroneous derivation of the word is given in Heywood's Prentices, Sc. 15: "England Whose walls the ocean washeth white as snow, For which you strangers call it A."; and in Peele's Old Wives i. 1. we find "the chalky cliffs of A." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 6, says that the mariner, "Learning his ships from those white rocks to save. . . For safety that same his sea mark made, And called it A.," but in iv. 11, 15, he derives the name from "Mighty A.," the son of Neptune, who was "father of the bold And warlike people which the Britaine Islands hold."

The form Albia occurs in Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, 100: "I'll fetch from Albia shelves of margarites." So in Greene's Orlando i. 1, 77, Brandemart speaks of "orient pearl More bright of hue than were the margarets That Cæsar found in wealthy A." See Suetonius Vit. Cæsaris 47. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Antony refers to Cæsar's conquest of Britain: "Thou in maiden A. shore The Roman eagle bravely didst advance." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, Bonavide says, "This A., That fitly bears name of his chalky cliffs, Breeds wondrous choice of beauties, wise and lovely, Scarce to be matched in all the world besides." In Skelton's Magnificence the famous K. is called "Arthur of Albany." In Trouble. Reign, p. 319, the Dolphin says, "It boots not me, Nor any prince nor power of Christendon, To seek to win this island A."

ALBRACCA. The capital of Gallaphrone, K. of Cathay, besieged by Agricane, K. of Tartary, in order to win the fair Angelica, Gallaphrone's daughter. The story is told in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato i. 10, where Agricane is represented as bringing into the field 2,200,000 men. Milton, P. R. iii. 339, says "Such forces met not. . . When Agrican with all his N. powers Besieged A., as romances tell, The city of Gallaphrone." So Cervantes, in Don Quix., speaks of "men more numerous than those that came to A. to win Angelica the Fair."

ALCAIRO. See CAIRO.

ALCANTARA. City in Estramadura in New Castile, at junction of the Tagus and Alagon. The commendador of A. is mentioned in Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1. It was the seat of an order of knighthood, founded by Ferdinand of Leon in the 12th cent.; their dress was a white robe with a green cross on the breast.

ALCAZAR (or AL-KASR). Town in Morocco abt. 60 m. S. of Tangier. Some 6 m. N. of the town was fought in 1578 the famous battle in which Don Sebastian of Portugal was defeated and slain by the Moors. Sir Thomas Stukeley, who was on his way with a body of mercenaries to free Ireland from Elizabeth, was persuaded by Sebastian to join him, and was also killed in the battle. Sir Ruinous Gentry, in B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 2, says, "The first that fleshed me a soldier was that great battle at A. in Barbary where the noble English Stukeley fell, and where that royal Portugal Sebastian ended his untimely days." Peele's Alcazar and Stucley (2656) tell the story of the fight: "Thus of A. battle in one day 3 ks. at once did lose their hapless lives." T. Heywood, in I. K. M. B., speaks of "that renowned battle, Swift Fame desires to carry round the world, The battle of A.; wherein 2 ks., Besides this K. of Barbary, was slain. . . With Stukely that renowned Englishman That had a spirit equal to a K." Nash, in Lenten, p. 326, says of certain gaping fools: "With them it is current that Don Sebastian, slain 20 years since with Stukely at the Battle of A., is raised from the dead, like Lazarus, and alive to be seen at Venice."

ALDERMANBURY. A Lond. st., running N. from Gresham St., opposite the corner of Milk St., to Lond. Wall. So called from the fact that the original-Guildhall stood on its E. side, to the W. of the present Hall built in 1411. In Alderman Garroway's Speech (1642), he says, "I have been Lord Mayor myself and should have some share still in the government; before God, I have no more authority in the City than a porter, not so much as an A. porter." Woodes' Conf. Cons. was "Printed by Richard Bradocke dwelling in A., a little above the Conduict, 1581." The conduit was in the middle of the st., and was erected by William Eastfield in 1471, the water being brought from Tyburn. Henry Condell, joint-editor of the 1st Folio of Shakespeare, was a sidesman of the parish of St. Mary's A. Swanston, the actor, "took up the trade of a jeweller and lived in A."

ALDERMARY CHURCH. A very ancient ch. of St. Mary, on the S. side of Budge Row and the E. side of Cordwainer St., now at the corner of Bow Lane and Q. Victoria St., Lond. Rebuilt early in the 16th cent., destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt by Wren. Richd. Chaucer, vintner, gave the ch. his tenement and tavern, and was buried there in 1348. He was the grandfather of the poet Chaucer; not the father, as Stow says. There was a printing house in the churchyard, from which Mandeville's Travels were issued in the form of a chapbook: "Printed and sold in A. Ch.-Yard, Lond."

ALDESGATE. One of the 4 oldest gates of Lond., lying between Cripplegate and Newgate, near the Charter House, close to the Castle and Falcon Inn, now at 62 A. St. It was rebuilt in 1618, with a figure over the central arch of James I to commemorate his entrance into Lond. in 1603. It was pulled down in 1761. Here lived John Day, the famous printer, who issued the edition of Matthew's Bible in 1549, Foxe's Actes and Monuments, and other religious works. Cartwright, in The Ordinary iii. 1, discusses the derivation of the name: "A. Is gotten so from one that Aldrich hight; Or else, of elders, that is, ancient men; Or else of alder trees which growden there; Or else, as Heralds say, from Aluredus." But most probably it simply means the old gate. A. St. ran S. from the gate to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and so into the W. end of Cheapside. Here was Master Francklin's house, where Arden lodged on his visit to Lond. "He is now at Lond., in A. ste.," says Greene (Feversham ii. 1). The town houses of the Earls of Northumberland, Westmorland, and Thanet, and of the Marquis of Dorchester, were in this st. There was "a cook's feast in A. St. yearly upon Holy Rood Day" (Laneham's Letter, p. 39). In De-loney's Gentle Craft ii. 11, one says to the green k. of St. Martin's, "I dwell at A. and am your near neighbour." Heywood's Witches was "Printed by Thomas Harper for Benjamin Fisher and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the Talbot without A., 1624."

Dekker, in Seven Sins (1606), makes Candlelight enter Lond. "at A., for though the st. be fair and spacious, yet few lights in misty evenings use there to thrust out their golden heads." John Milton lived in A. St. from 1640 to 1645. The house was on the E. side of the st., where Maidenhead Court now is.

ALDGATE. One of the principal gates of the old City of Lond., between the Tower Postern and Bishopsgate. It was granted to Chaucer in 1374, and he lived in the rooms over the gate whilst he was writing the Canterbury Tales. It was pulled down in 1606, and a new one built with figures of Peace and Charity copied from 2 Roman coins, which had been unearthed in digging for the foundations. This new Gate took 2 years to build. "How long," says Truewit, "did the canvas hang afore A. Were the people suffered to see the City's Love and Charity while they were rude stone, before they were painted and burnished?" (Jonson Epicoene i. 1). Donne, in Elegy xv. (1609), says he talked with a citizen "of new built A." This gate was removed in 1760 and re-erected by a Mr. Mussell in the grounds of his own house at Bethnal Green.

"Little Ned of A." is referred to by The Citizen in B. & F. Pestle v. 1, as a drummer of the train-bands. Moll Bloodhound, in Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 1, is described as "dwelling near A. and Bishop's-gate just as between hawk and buzzard"; this last phrase is explained in Janua Linguarum (1662) 146 as meaning between a good thing and a bad of the same kind; the reference appears to be to the splendour of the newly erected A. as compared with the more ancient Bishopsgate. A. being at the extreme E. and Temple Bar at the extreme W. of the City, "as far asunder as Temple Bar and A." is used in Marmion's Companion v. 2 to express the greatest possible remoteness. In Middleton's Quarrel i. 1, Chough lodges "at the Crow at A.," probably because his name is Chough. Possibly the Pye Inn is intended, mentioned as the Pie at A. in Book of New Epigrams (1659). In B. & F. Thomas iv. 1, there is a capital description of the painting of the town red by a company of young bloods; the watchman's shoes are stolen, sign-boards sent to Erebus; curs and pigs set loose in out-parishes: "Oh, the brave cry we made as high as A.!" that is, as far as A., where at last a constable of the City takes a hand. In Lyly's Pappe With an Hatchet, p. 73, the author says, "We hope to see him [Martin Marprelate] stride from A. to Ludgate, and look over all the City at Lond. Bdge.," i.e. be carted from end to end of the City and his head stuck up on Lond. Bdge., after execution. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby reports, "As I was passing through A. this morning, I saw the Shreeves set towards to Newgate to fetch your father." In Heywood's Ed. IV A. 13, the Recorder says that the rebels will "either make assault at Lond.-Bdge. or else at A., both which entrances were good they should be strongly fortified." In the same play, B. 161, Mrs. Shore is condemned to walk in a white sheet "from Temple Barre until you come to A., barefooted." Dekker, in Seven Sins (1606), makes Cruelty enter the City "at All-gate, being drawn that way by the smell of blood abt. the Bars." Evidently there were Shambles near A.

In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii. 1, the Widow bids her maid, "Pray go to A., to my sempstress, for my ruff." The famous A. Pump stood at the corner of Leadenhall St. and Fenchurch St. It was replaced by a drinking-fountain in 1876.

ALEIAN PLAIN. A barren wilderness in Cilicia, into which, according to Homer Il. vi. 200, Bellerophon was flung from the back of Pegasus. Homer doubtless connected the name with the Greek Ale, wandering. Milton, P. L. vii. 19, prays for help, "Lest from this flying steed unreined (as once Bellerophon, though from a lower clime), Dismounted, on the A. field I fall, Erroneous there to wander and forlorn."

ALEMPHA. Mentioned in H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier as one of the fortresses in which Huneric the Vandal K. has Christian slaves confined. I have not succeeded in identifying it.

ALENÇON. The chief town of the department of Orne, France, situated near the confluence of the Sarthe and the Briante, abt. 108 m. W. by S. from Paris. The castle was founded in the 10th cent., and 3 of its massive towers still remain. Towards the end of the 14th cent. it was created a duchy by Charles VI. The D. of A. is one of the peers summoned by Charles VI to fight against Henry V (H5 iii. 5, 42). Henry says (iv. 7, 161), after the battle of Agincourt, "When A. and myself were down together, I plucked this glove from his helm; if any man challenge this, he is a friend to A." Fluellen wears the glove, and in the next scene is challenged by Williams as a friend of the D. of A.'s (H5 iv. 8, 19). John, D. of A., is in the list of the dead given H5 iv. 8, 101. This was John I: he was succeeded by his son John II, who was condemned to death for treasonable communication with the English in 1458; and again for assisting Charles the Bold against Lewis XI in 1474. He was pardoned on both occasions, but died in prison in 1476. In H6 A. i. 1, 95, it is reported that "the dauphin Charles is crowned K. in Rheims; The D. of A. fieth to his side." He is blamed by Charles for the success of the English attack on Orleans: "D. of A., this was your default" (H6 A. ii. 1, 60). Talbot (H6 A. iii. 2, 65) appeals, "unto thee A., and the rest; will ye, like soldiers, come and fight it out?" to which A. answers, "Signior, no." He is spoken of in iv. 1, 173: "Charles, A., and that traitorous rout." He is still fighting along with Charles in iv. 4, 27, and Talbot, in the battle near Bordeaux, "beat down A., Orleans, Burgundy" (iv. 6, 14). He was present at the espousal by Suffolk of Margaret of Anjou to Henry VI (H6 B. i. 1, 7). In H8 iii. 2, 85, Wolsey declares his intention of marrying Henry VIII "to the Duchess of A., the French k.'s sister," after his divorce from Katharine of Arragon. This was Margaret, daughter of Charles of Orleans, who in 1509 married Charles, D. of A., and in 1527 became the wife of Henry of Navarre, 5 months before Wolsey set out on his embassy to secure a wife for his royal master. Still, he may have thought of gaining her hand for Henry before her marriage made it impossible.

In L. L. L. ii. 1, 61, Katharine says that she has seen Dumain "at the D. A.'s once"; and later on (ii. 1, 195) Boyet tells Dumain that Katharine is the heir of A.; the Ff. and Qq. all read "Rosaline," but the editors are unanimous in correcting the reading to "Katharine." Shakespeare took the names, but not the characters, of his French Lords in L. L. L. from contemporary history: in this case from the Duc d'A., who was brother to Henry III and at one time suitor to Elizabeth.

ALEPPO. A city of Syria, 70 m. from the Mediterranean, at N.W. entrance of the Syro-Arabian desert. By the port of Iskanderun it used to have a great trade with the W. It came into the possession of the Turks in 1517. Heylyn, in his Microcosmus, says, "This town is famous for a wonderfull confluence of merchants from all parts who come hither to traffique." Its population has much decreased, but still numbers 100,000. The sailor whose wife has insulted the witch in Macbeth "has to A. gone, the master of the Tiger" (Mac. i. 3, 7). In Hakluyt's Voyages, mention is made of a trading expedition to A. in a vessel called the Tiger, which sailed in 1581 and disembarked at Tripoli. Othello (v. 2, 352) says, "In A. once, Where a malignant and a turban'd Turk Beat a Venetian and traduced the state, I took by the throat the circumcized dog And smote him, thus." The action of Othello is supposed to take place in 1570, so that A. was then in the hands of the Turk. Brainworm (Jonson, Ev. Man I. ii. 2) was "twice shot at the taking of A.," i.e. in 1517. It is suggested that Sir Pol should be shipped away "to Zante or A." (Jonson, Volpone v. 2). Evidently there was trade between A. and Venice. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Delph, Leghorn, A., and the Venetian Isles are mentioned as places where a Lond. merchant would be likely to have factors. In Mayne's Match i. 4, it is made a mark of a merchant that he wears a "velvet jacket which has seen A. twice, is known to the great Turk, hath 'scaped 3 shipwrecks." Dekker, in Lanthorn, makes a prostitute say, in order to entrap merchants, that "she is wife to the Master of a ship and they bring news that her husband put in at the Straytes, or at Venice, at A., Alexandria or Scanderoon." A. is mentioned as furnishing a contingent to the Turkish Army which opposed Tamburlaine (Marlowe, Tamb. B. iii. 1). It is used as a synonym for great wealth in B. & F. Malta v. 1, where Miranda says, "I would not, for A., this frail bark no better steersman had than has Montferrat's," i.e. for all the wealth of A. The Basha of A. is one of the principal characters in Massinger's Renegado. In Marston's Parasitaster (1606) i. 2, Hercules, being asked what he thinks of the D.'s overture of marriage, says, "May I speak boldly, as at A." i.e. at a place outside of his jurisdiction. There may be a reminiscence of the passage in Othello, quoted above, in which the Turk traduces Venice at A.

ALEXANDRIA. A city of Egypt founded by Alexander the Gt. 332 B.C., on the Mediterranean 12 m. W. of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, and opposite the island of Pharos, with which it was connected by a mole abt. 1 m. long. It was the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, and the following scenes in A. & C. are laid there, either in the Palace of Cleopatra or in the Roman camps near the city: i. 1, 2, 3; ii. 5; iii. 3, 11, 13; iv. and v. It is mentioned 5 times in the course of the play as the scene of Antony's intrigue with Cleopatra. In Brandon's Octavia 2226, Byllius relates "how Antony abode at A. with this fearful Q." i.e. Cleopatra, after the battle of Actium. In Marlowe, Tamb. B. i. 1, Tamburlaine is represented as "Marching from Cairo northward to A."; and Callipine, the son of Bajazeth, is with him as a prisoner, and in i. 3 attempts to escape by means of a Turkish galley lying in A. Bay. As a matter of fact, Tamburlaine defeated Farag, the Sultan of Egypt, in Syria in 1400, but he never actually entered Egypt. A. was a port of great commercial importance in the 16th cent. Barabas had an "Argosy from A. Laden with riches and exceeding store Of Persian silks, of gold, and orient pearl" (Marlowe, Jew i. 1); and he has "at A. merchandise untold" (iv. 1). In Greene's Friar ix. 261, the Friar promises the Emperor Frederick "for thy cates, rich A. drugs [i.e. spices] Fetched by carvels from Ægypt's richest streights." In K. K. K. vi. 570, Alfrida speaks of "arras hanging, fetched from A."

Dekker, in Lanthorn, makes a prostitute who wants to catch a merchant say that "she is wife to the Master of a ship, and they bring news that her husband put in at the Straytes, or at Venice, at Aleppo, A., or Scanderoon etc." The scene of B. & F. False One is laid at A. in the time of Cleopatra, and describes the visit of Julius Cæsar there in 48 B.C. In Kyd's Soliman 1439, "Augustus spared rich A. for Arrius' sake." The famous Library is said to have been burnt by the Arabs when they took the city in A.D. 640; and Jonson, in his Execration upon Vulcan (Underwoods 61), compares the destruction of Paul's steeple by fire to "your fireworks had at Ephesus or A." Laneham, in Letter, p. 48, speaks of "The Egyptian Pharos reluctant unto all the An. coast." This father of Lighthouses was built by Ptolemy Soter on the E. end of the Island of Pharos, and was 400 ft. high. In Chapman's Blind Beggar the scene is laid in A. Clearchus relates in Sc. X. that Leon has "cast his desperate body From th' An. tower into the sea." The Pharos is doubtless intended. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says, after the battle of Pharsalia, "Now wend we lords to A., Famous for those wide-wondered Pyramids." The Pyramids are, however, at Ghizeh, more than 100 m. from A. In Wilson's Pedler 473, the Pedler boasts, "I can tell what is done at Alexandry," i.e. in the remotest part of the world.

ALGIERS. See ARGIER.

ALICANTE. A spt. of Valencia on E. coast of Spain. It gave its name to a kind of wine of a deep blood-red colour, made from the mulberries which grow plentifully there.

Matheo, in Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 1, warns Hipolito that if he kills the D.'s 3 officers he will "blood 3 pottles of Aligant." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, we read of "battered beer, coloured with Aligant." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. v. 1, Sim, trying to prevent a quarrel, says, "There's Alegant i' the house; pray set no more abroach." In Taylor's Life of Thomas Parr (1635) we are told: "The vintners sold no Alicant, nor any other wines but white and claret, till the 33rd year of Henry VIII (1543)." In B. & F. Chances i. 8, "your brats, got out of A." means children which were the result of drunken incontinence. The Nomenclator translates Vinum atrum by "Redde wine or Allegant" (1585). In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagnoli swears "by purple Aligant the bloody giant." When Quickly, in M.W.W. ii. 2, 69, speaks of "aligant terms," she is using the name of a wine for a less familiar word; just as above she says "canaries" for "quandary." In Richards' Messalina i., the Bawd mentions as provocatives to lust, "snails, oysters, alligant." In the old Timon ii. 5, Pseudocheus says, "In Ganges Isles I 30 rs. saw Filled with sweet nectar . . . 30 rs. more With Aligant." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, the Clown says, "My hogshead runs elegant and your nursling broached it"; i.e. broke my head and made it bleed. The scene of Middleton's Changeling is laid at A.

ALL-GATE. See ALD-GATE.

ALLHALLOWS. The following Lond. chs. were dedicated to A.: (1) A., Barking, q.v. (2) A., Bread St., at the corner of Watling St. Here Milton was baptized. It was deconsecrated and destroyed in 1876. (3) A. the Great, or A. in the Ropery, in Upper Thames St.; destroyed in the Gt. Fire, rebuilt by Wren, and restored in 1877. Was finally removed in 1893, and its site occupied by a brewery. (4) A. the Less, in Upper Thames St.; and (5) A., Honey Lane, near the Standard in Cheapside, were both destroyed in the Fire and not rebuilt. (6) A. Grass Ch., in Ball Alley, with its entrance in Lombard St. Rebuilt by Wren after the Fire. Thersites was "Imprinted at Lond. by John Tysdale, and are to be sold at his shop in the upper end of Lombard St., in A. Churchyard, near unto Grace Ch." (7) A. in the Wall, in Lond. Wall. It escaped the Fire, but was removed and a new ch. built in 1767. (8) A. Staining, in Mark Lane; it escaped the Fire, but fell down in 1761. It was removed, all but the tower, in 1870, and the site bought by the Clothworkers

Company. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 63, one Cheap-side Prentice asks another, "What is't a'clock?" and is answered, "6 by Allhallowes": either the Bread St. or Honey Lane ch. is meant.

Nash, in his Burlesque on Gabriel Harvey's Encomium Lauri in Hexameters, has the lines: "O thou weathercock, that stands on the top of All Hallows, Come thy ways down if thou darst for thy crown, and take the walls on us."

ALLHALLOWS, BARKING. Ch. in Lond. on N. side of Gt. Tower St., near Seething Lane. The ch. derives its name from its having been originally connected with the Abbey of B., in Essex. It escaped the Gt. Fire. From its proximity to the Tower it was used as a temporary place of interment for many persons executed there, notably the Earl of Surrey, Bp. Fisher, and Archbp. Laud. In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy, who has been attended by the Witch's dog, says to him, "If ever we be married, it shall be at B. Ch., in memory of thee; now come behind, sweet cur." The Ch. had a fine peal of bells. In Fair Women ii. 209, Old John says, "I dreamed that I heard the bells of B. as plain to our town of Woolwich as if I had lain in the steeple."

ALL HALLOWS, NEWCASTLE (better known as ALL SAINTS). A ch. about the centre of N. It was rebuilt in the 14th cent. by Roger Thornton, the Mayor of the city; and he was buried there in 1430, where his brass still remains. In Brewer's Lovesick King iv., Thornton says, "I will re-edify Alhallowes ch."

ALLIA. A small r. flowing into the Tiber on its left bank, abt. 11 m. N. of Rome; probably the modern Fonte di Papa. The scene of the terrible defeat of the Romans by Brennus and his Gauls in 390 B.C. on July 16, the Dies Alliensis, ever afterwards regarded as an unlucky day. In Vero iii. 3, Seneca, lamenting the tyranny of the Emperor, cries: "Let Cannæ come, Let A.'s waters turn again to blood; To these will any miseries be light." In Fisher's Fuinus (Induction), Brennus taunts Camillus, "Doth A. yet run clear?" (i.e. from Roman blood). In ii. 8, the Britons sing a war song: "Black A.'s day And Cannæ's fray Have for a third long stayed."

ALLIGANT, ALLEGANT. See ALICANTE.

ALLOBROGES. A Gallic tribe living on E. bank of the Rhone, between the Rhone and the Isere. They sent an embassy to Rome in 63 B.C.; and when Catiline and his fellow-conspirators tried to engage them in their plot they revealed the whole affair to Cicero. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 2, the arrival of these "ambassadors from the A." is described; and in v. 4, their revelation of the plot is related.

ALL SOULS COLLEGE (OXFORD). Founded in 1438 by Chichele, Archbp. of Canterbury. It stands on the N. side of High St., between St. Mary's and Q.'s College. The constitution provides for a warden, 20 fellows, 20 scholars, and 2 chaplains.

Armin, in the preface to his Ninnies, says, "I was admitted in Oxford to be of Christs Ch., while they of Allsoules gave aim"; i.e. apparently he migrated from A. S. to Christ Ch.

ALMAIN (a German). From the name of one of the principal German tribes known to the Romans, the Allemanni. Iago makes merry over the prowess of the Englishman in drinking, declaring, "He drinks you with facility your Dane drunk; he sweats not to overthrow your A." (Oth. ii. 3, 86). In Peele's Ed. I i. 1, the Q.

mother Elinor tells her son, "your brave uncle, Ae's Emperor, is dead." This was Richd. of Cornwall, the brother of Henry III, who was elected Emperor in 1257, though some of the Electors afterwards went back on their decision and elected Alfonso X of Castile. He died in 1272, 7 months before the K. In Greene's Friar vii., "Frederick, the A. emperor," visited Oxford to hear a dispute between Vandermast and Roger Bacon. Apparently Frederick II (1212-1250), the grandson of the great Barbarossa, is intended; though Prince Edward was only 11 when he died, and therefore hardly ripe for the flirtation with Margaret of Fressingfield which forms the plot of the play. He was interested in philosophical and religious questions, and was regarded as a heretic and placed by Dante in hell (Inferno, canto x.). In Ed. III i. 1, the K. begs the D. of Hainault to solicit the Emperor of Almaine. Valdes promises Faust that the spirits shall attend on him "like A. rutters [i.e. reiters: knights] with their horsemen's staves," or lances (Marlowe, Faustus i. 1). "A. rutters" are among the Christian enemies of Orcanes of Natolia (Marlowe, Tamb. B. i. 1). Lady Ample undertakes, unless she can fool Engine and his fellows, to "cry flounders and walk with my petticoat tucked up like a long maid of Ay" (Davenant, Wits ii.). Presumably she means a German fish-wife. A. is one of the long list of countries in which Hycke-Scooner claims to have travelled. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, "Frederick Barbarossa, Emperor of A. once, but by Pope Alexander now spurned and trod on when he takes his horse," is instanced as an example of the fickleness of Fortune.

A. is the name for Germany in Experience's lecture on the map of the world in Elements, Haz. i. 32. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cæsar's ghost recalls his exploits in "Spain, Britain, Almayne, and France." In Brome's Sparagus iii. 4, Wat tells of the wonders the precious plant Asparagus "hath wrought in Burgundy, Ae., Italy, and Languedoc." Borde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) xiv., heads the chapter, "Of high Almayne or high Doch land." In Larum F. 2, Stuppe says, "A those Aes. I they cried Live Spaniards! they were called high Aes. but they are low enough now. You may call them blanchied Aes. [quasi almonds!] and you will, for their guts are blanchied abt. their heels." [High A. = High German, as opposed to the Low Germans of the Netherlands.] In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cassius says of Cæsar, "The restful As. with his cruelty He rashly stirred against us without cause." In Brome's Novella iv. 2, Nicolo says that Fabritio "appears as like the noted Ae. late come to town, if he had but his beard." See under German for an account of this notorious person, who was an expert fencer.

The A. was the name of a stately dance of German origin. In Peele's Arraignement ii. 1, the direction is, "Enter 9 knights treading a warlike a. by drum and fife." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan mocks at the Vice's ideas of making a sensation: "at the tail of a sheriff's dinner he will take his A.-leap into a custard." In Tancred and Gismunda, the 3rd act is introduced by the hautbois sounding "a lofty A." In Two Gent., between acts iv. and v., "The consort soundeth a pleasant Allemaigne." In Philip's Grissill 969, the Marques enters "singing to the tune of the latter A."—I suppose the last A. which the band had played. In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 151, Bohemia says, "We Germans have no changes in our dances, An A. and an up-spring, that is all." In Hercules i. 8, 467, Dromio, describing his experiences at sea, says, "We in the ship practised the Amound leap, from one end to the other."

ALMONRY. The almshouses for poor men and women respectively, erected by Henry VII and his mother, the Lady Margaret. They were W. of Westminster Abbey, the great A. being in 2 parallel parts running E. and W. with the entrance from Dean's Yard; and the little A. at its E. end, running S. It was in the great A. that Caxton set up the first printing press in England, from which he issued in 1474 The Game and Playe of Chesse. His house was on the N. side of the A., in Little Dean St., close to the present Westminster Palace Hotel. It was a narrow 3-storey building with a gable and attic, and was in existence till 1845, when it was removed along with the other buildings of the A. Here Caxton died in 1490, and was buried in the neighbouring ch. of St. Margaret. The word was, and is, popularly pronounced Ambry. Jonson, in Staple, makes gossip Mirth say that she knows "all the news of Tuttle-st., and both the Alm'ries, the 2 Sanctuaries, long and round Woolstaple, with King's st. and Canon-row to boot" (iii. 2).

ALPHEUS. The largest r. in the Peloponesus, rising in S.E. Arcadia and flowing W. through Arcadia and Elis to the Ionian Sea. Near Tegea it disappears underground for a certain distance; and this gave rise to the legend that the river flowed beneath the sea to join its waters with those of the fountain of Arethusa in the Island of Ortygia, near Syracuse, in Sicily, owing to the passion of the r.-god for that nymph. In Milton's Arcades 30, the Genius sings of "divine A. who by secret sluice Stole under seas to meet his Arethuse." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, calls it "A. still immaculate"; i.e. unmixed with the waters of the sea, through which it was supposed to have passed to Sicily. In Lycidas 132, Milton says, "Return, A.; the dread voice is past That shrunk thy streams; return, Sicilian Muse," where A. is regarded as the patron of pastoral poetry, interrupted by the stern speech of St. Peter. Hall, in Satires (1597) iv. 3, 75, says, "A. waters nought but olives wild."

ALPS (Ae. = Alpine). The mtns. separating France, Switzerland, and Austria from Italy. Travellers visited them in Shakespeare's day, and talked of "the A. and Apennines, The Pyrenean and the r. Po" (K. J. i. 1, 202). Mowbray is prepared "to run afoot Even to the frozen ridges of the A.," to meet and fight Bolingbroke (R3 i. 1, 64). The French K. describes Henry V as rushing on with his army "as doth the melted snow Upon the valleys, whose low vassal seat The A. doth spit and void his rheum upon" (H5 iii. 5, 52). Note the use of the word as a singular. Following Plutarch's authority, Cæsar tells how, after the battle of Modena, Anthony suffered the greatest privations: "On the A., it is reported, thou didst eat strange flesh Which some did die to look on" (A. & C. i. 4, 66). To the traveller the A. stood for the boundary between the culture of Italy and the illiteracy of the rest of Europe. In Jonson's Cynthia i. 1, Amorphus protests, "Since I trod on this side the A. I was not so frozen in my invention." In Webster's Law Case i. 1, Contarino says, "I have heard of divers that, in passing of the A., have but exchanged their virtues at dear rate for other vices." The snow of the A. furnished an obvious hyperbole for whiteness. In Tomkins' Albumazar ii. 4, the hero speaks of "Two sucking lambs, white as the Ae. snow." Their bulk was also impressive. "Though you were in compass thick as the A.," says Palatine (Davenant, Wits ii.), "I must embrace you both"; and in Day's Parl. Bees ch. iii., we read of "Ae. hills of silver." In Massinger's Madam v. 3, Luke says, "The rain That slides down gently from his flaggy wings [shall sooner] O'erflow the A. than tears . . . Shall wrest compunction from me."

In Ret. Pernass iv. 3, there is a burlesque allusion to Kemp's famous feat of dancing the Morris from Lond. to Norwich: "God save you, M. Kemp; welcome, M. Kemp, from dancing the morrice over the Alpes." William Kemp was the well-known comedian who created the parts of Dogberry in Much Ado, and Peter in R. & J. Sciarra, in Shirley's Traitor ii. 1, has breath "hot enough to thaw the A." The prologue to Marlowe's Jew is spoken by Machiavel, who begins by saying, "Albeit the world thinks Machiavel is dead, Yet was his soul but flown beyond the A. . . . to view this land." In Nero v. 1, "a courier from beyond the A." brings letters from Gaul to the Emperor. In B. & F. Shepherdess ii. 2, Thenot speaks of Clorin's body, "which as pure doth show in maiden-whiteness as the Alpen-snow." In Wild Goose i. 2, Mirabel affirms that "our women o' this side the A. are nothing but mere drolleries . . ." In Trouble. Reign (Haz. p. 315) the K., tormented by the poison, cries: "Oh for the frozen A. To tumble on and cool this inward heat." "Here's a peacock," says Montsurry in Chapman's Bussy iii. 1, "seems to have devoured one of the A., she has so swelling a spirit and is so cold of her kindness." In Lyly's Endymion v. 3, Endymion swears that the affections of Tellus are to his own "as valleys to A., ants to eagles." In the old Taming of a Shrew, p. 534, Aurelius wishes that he had charge "to make the topless Alpes a champion field To kill untamed monsters with my sword." In Val. Welsh i. 1, the Bard speaks of "man's highest A., intelligence." Jonson, in Wales, makes Evan claim for the Welsh mtns. the title of the "British Aulpes." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Jolly asks the Capt.: "Have you ventured o'er the A. to see the seat of the Cæsars?" In S. Rowley's When You A. 3, Wolsey says, "Hannibal with oil did melt the A. To make a passage into Italy." The reference is to Hannibal's crossing of the A. in 218 B.C. Livy tells the impossible story of the softening of the rocks by the use of vinegar (not oil), Livy xxi. 37. In Milkmaids ii. 2, Raymond speaks of his aged head "wrap like the Alpes in snow." In Kyd's Cornelia v., the Messenger speaks of N. winds "that beat the horned A." In Dekker's If it be, p. 331, Shackle-soul says, "The Ae. snow at the sun's beams does melt; So let your beauties thaw his frozen age." In his Wonder iii. 1, Torrenti says, "I wish there were no worlds, yet not to conquer but to sell For Ae. hills of silver." In Cockayne's Obstinate i. 1, Carionil says of his lady, "The Alpin snows are not more cold." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass v. 2, 2009, Rasni cries: "Oh had I tears like to the silver streams That from the Ae. mtns. sweetly stream." Milton's sonnet On the late Massacre in Piedmont begins, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones Lie scattered on the Ae. mtns. cold." Alp is used as a generic name for a mtn. Milton, P. L. ii. 620, says, "They passed. . . . O'er many a frozen, many a fiery Alp." In S. A. 628, he speaks of "breath of vernal air from snowy Alp." In Tetrarch 182, he speaks of "This adamant alpe of wedlock."

ALSATIA. A name applied to the sanctuary of Whitefriars, q.v. The 1st example of this use of the word is in 1623 in Thomas Powell's Wheresoe'er you See Me, Trust unto yourself; but it did not come into common use till the end of the 17th cent. A. was a kind of no-man's land between France and Germany; and consequently the laws of either country were inoperative there, as the laws of England were inoperative in Whitefriars.

ALTHORP PARK. Seat of Earl Spencer, near Northampton. Here Sir Robert Spencer entertained the Q. and eldest son of James I on their way from Scotland to Lond. in 1603, when Jonson's 1st masque, The Satyr, was produced.

ALATOMONTE. The highest point of the mtn. mass of Aspromonte, in Calabria, at the extreme S. of Italy. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Pope Alexander allots to Cæsar Borgia the provinces from Tuscany, "even to Monte Alto in Calabria."

AMALEKITES. A nomad tribe inhabiting the desert between the S. of the kingdom of Judah and the Sinaitic Peninsula. They attacked the Israelites on their way from Egypt, and were subsequently almost exterminated by Saul. The remnant of them seems to have settled in the mountainous dist. of Edom. In Bale's Promises iv., the Almighty says, "Over Amalech I gave them the victory." Milton, Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 26, speaks of "hateful Amalec." Blount, in Glossographia, s.v., says, "Enemies to the children of God or good people, or enemies to good proceedings, are commonly called A."

AMARA. See GAMARA.

AMASIA. A town in Asia Minor on the Irmak, 60 m. from its mouth in the Black Sea. Birthplace of Strabo, who describes the tombs of the ks. excavated in the rock below the castle. It was regarded as the metropolis of Pontus, and is mentioned in Marlowe, Tamb. B. iii. 1, as supplying forces to the K. of Trebizond to fight against Tamburlaine. In Selimus 966, Acomat, the brother of Selim, is addressed as "Acomat, Soldan of A." In 2391 Selim takes A. and murders his brother's wife. This was in 1512. Heylyn (s.v. CAPPADOCIA) says that the Turkish emperors send their eldest sons to A. "Immediately after their circumcision; whence they never return again till the death of their fathers."

AMATHON (more commonly AMATHUS). Town on S. coast of Cyprus, some 50 m. E. of Paphos. A famous seat of worship of Aphrodite (Venus). In T. Heywood's B. Age ii. 2, Venus says, "Adonis, thou that makest Venus leave Paphos and A."

AMAZONIA, or AMAZONE (An.: Amazon, Aæn. Amazonian). The country inhabited by the Ans., a legendary race of female warriors, usually located in the neighbourhood of the Caucasus on the Thermodon, near Trebizond. Glanville, De prop. rerum xv., says, "A., Women's land, is a country, part in Asia, part in Europe, and is nigh unto Albania." The 9th labour of Hercules was the capture of the girdle of the Q. of the Ans. He went to the Thermodon, and there killed her and took her girdle. In Marmion's Leaguer iii. 4, Trimalchio says he is going to the Leaguer "upon the same employment that Hercules did once against the Ans."; i.e. to vanquish the women there. The Athenian hero Theseus married Antiope, sister of Hippolyta, Q. of the Ans., who was presented to him by Hercules after his conquest of these warlike ladies. Shakespeare, however, follows Chaucer in making Hippolyta herself the wife of Theseus. "The bouncing An. To Theseus must be wedded," says Titania (M.N.D. ii. 1, 70). The Bastard represents the women of England arming to resist the French invader, "like Ans. tripping after drums" (K. J. v. 2, 155). "Thou art an An," says Charles to Joan of Arc, "And fightest with the sword of Deborah" (H6 A. i. 2, 104). When Edward hears of the warlike purpose of Q. Margaret he exclaims, "Belike she minds to play the An." (H6 C.

iv. 1, 106); and York calls her "an Aan. trull" (H6 C. i. 4, 114).

As the Ans. had no beards, Aan. is used in the sense of beardless: "At 16 years Coriolanus with his Aan. chin drove The bristled lips before him" (Cor. ii. 2, 95).

The word is often used for a woman who acts independently—the "new woman" of modern phrase. Thus, in B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca and Livia propose "to seek out a land Where, like a race of noble Ans., We'll root ourselves . . . and despise base men." The scene of B. & F. Sea Voyage is laid in an island where certain Portuguese ladies have fled for refuge from the French, and have resolved "thus shaped like Ans., to end our lives" (v. 4). In B. & F. Woman Hater ii. 1, Gondarino says, "The much praised Ans. made of themselves a people, and what men they take amongst them they condemn to die, perceiving that their folly made them fit to live no longer that would willingly come in the worthless presence of a woman." In Massinger's Lover i. 2, Hortensio thinks, if Gonzaga gives his daughter to the D. of Tuscany against her will, "The women will turn Ans., as their sex in her were wronged." Jonson introduces "Penthesilea, the brave An.," into his Queens: and in a learned note explains that she was present at the siege of Troy and "was honoured in her death to have it the act of Achilles." In T. Heywood's Iron Age iv., Æneas announces "Penthesilea Q. of Ans. With mighty troops of virgin warriors . . . for the love of Hector . . . are entered Troy"; in act v. Pyrrhus kills her and brings in on his lance's point "the An's lopt off head." In Lochrine ii. 1, 90, Hubba tells how "the warlike q. of An., Penthesilea . . . cooped up the faintheart Gracians in the camps." In Greene's Alphonso iii. 3, 1047, Fausta says, "My sword with help of all Amazones Shall make him soon repent." In Barnes' Charter iv. 4, Caesar Borgia speaks of Katharine of Forli as "that proud Aan. Katherine," because she dared to hold Forli against him. In Brome's Covent G. iv. 1, Anthony addresses Bet and Francisca as "ye Aan. trulls." In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, Leonora says, "Like an An. Lady, I'll cut off this right pap that gave him suck, to shoot him dead." The Ans. were said to cut off their right breasts in order to free the hand for shooting with the bow. Milton, P. L. ix. 1111, says that Adam and Eve's figleaves were "broad as Aan. targe." In Day's Gulls, Lisander appears disguised as an An. Marlowe, following another tradition, locates the Ans. in Africa, somewhere between the Upper Nile and Zanzibar. He speaks of "A. under Capricorn" (Tamb. B. i. 1), and tells how Téchelles, on his way from Machda on the Upper Nile to Zanzibar, marched to Cazates, "Where Aans. met me in the field, With whom, being women, I vouchsafed a league" (Tamb. B. i. 3). In the map prefixed to Leo's Africa, translated by Pory (1600), the Ans. are marked in the centre of Africa, opposite N. Madagascar.

AMBOISE. Town in France, on the left bank of the Loire, 12 m. E. of Tours and 110 m. S.W. of Paris. Its ancient castle was used as a royal residence by several of the French ks. It was here that the name Huguenots was first used of the Calvinist Protestants in 1560. From it Bussy d'Ambois, the hero of Chapman's Bussy and The Rev. Bussy, took his title. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Guicciardine, as chorus, says, "Meanwhile K. Charles sick of an apoplexy Dies at Ambois." This was Charles VIII of France, who died at A. in 1498. In Chapman's Bussy iii. 2, 79, Guise says to Bussy, "Th'art not nobly born, But bastard to the Cardinal of Ambois." This was Georges d'Ambois, Archbp. of Rouen, who died in 1510, 39 years before the birth of Bussy.

AMBOYNA. One of the Molucca Islands, lying between Celebes and Papua. It belonged first to the Portuguese, but they were dispossessed by the Dutch in 1605. In 1615 the English formed a settlement there, but the Dutch destroyed it in 1623, when the famous A. massacre was perpetrated. It is rich in spices, particularly in pepper and cloves. In B. & F. Fair Maid i. iv. 2, Forbosco threatens to send the Clown "to Greenland for a haunch of venison . . . thence to A. i' th' E. Indies for pepper to bake it." "To A.?" answers the Clown, "so I might be peppered!" The reference is to the A. massacre. In Davenant's Plymouth v. 1, when Bumble, the Dutch capt., threatens the English skipper, "Ick sall meet you at sea," he replies: "Ay, or in A.; There you shall swing for 't." In Shirley's Honoria i. 2, Conquest says to Alamode, "Thou wilt sell thy countrymen to as many persecutions as the devil, or Dutchmen, had invented at A." In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, the Surgeon remonstrates with Contarina, who is proposing to go to the E. Indies: "So many Hollanders gone to fetch sauce for their pickled herrings! Some have been peppered there too lately." In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, when one prays for a blessing on Buz, the Dutchman, the Register adds: "Yes, for A., and the justice there!"

AMBRACIA. A very hilly dist. on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea, to the N. of the Gulf of A.; now the S. part of Albania. In Nash's Summers (Dods. 70), Christmas says, "I must rig ship . . . to A. for goats." In the list of table dainties given by Sensuality in Nabbes' Microcosmus iii. we find "An. kids."

AMERICA. The W. continent discovered by Columbus in 1492. The name was suggested by Waldseemüller in his Cosmographie Introductio (1507): "A 4th part of the world, which, since Amerigo found it, we may well call Amerige or A.," and again: "Now a 4th part has been found by Amerigo Vespucci, and I do not see why we should be prevented from calling it Amerige or A." Columbus thought that the islands he found were connected with India, and consequently the usual name for A. in the 16th cent. was "the Indies"; and the name still survives in the words "W. Indies" for the islands and "Red Indians" for the aboriginals of N. A. The earliest use of "An." in English is quoted in the N.E.D. from Frobisher's voyage, 1578. Heylyn, in Microcosmus, says, "The most usuall & yet somewhat improper name is A., because Americus Vespucius discovered it. . . . The most improper name of all, yet most usuall among Marriners, is the Westerne Indies" (1621). He divides it into 2 parts, Mexicana and Peruana. In Elements, Haz. i. 32, Experience, lecturing on the map of the world, says, "But this new lands found lately been called A., because only Americus did first them find." He gives a long and interesting account of A. just previously, and laments that the Frenchmen have found the trade, and bring large quantities of fish thence. The inhabitants know neither God nor devil, but worship the sun. They have no iron, and though there is copper there, they do not dig for it. They have great abundance of woods, mostly fir and pine-apple; and they have abundance of fish. In the S. they go naked, but in the N. they dress in skins. Shakespeare only uses the word once, in Err. iii. 2, 136, "Where," asks Antipholus of Dromio, interrogating him abt. his cook-maid, was "A., the Indies?" to which Dromio answers:

"Oh, Sir, upon her nose, all o'er embellished with rubies, carbuncles, sapphires, declining their rich aspect to the hot breath of Spain." What it suggested to Shakespeare and his contemporaries was Mexico and Peru with their fabulous treasures of gold and silver and gems, contributing to the wealth and glory of Spain. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 72, says of Elfin, "Him all India obeyed, And all that now A. men call."

The natives were supposed to be cannibals; so Jonson, Staple iii. 1, tells of "a colony of cooks to be set ashore on the coast of A. for the conversion of the cannibals." In Gamester iii., Europe, Asia, Africa, and A. are named as the 4 parts of the world. In Randolph, Muses iii. 4, Eiron professes to know all the languages of Europe, Asia, and Africa; "but in A. and the new-found world I very much fear there be some languages that would go near to puzzle me." In Webster's Malcontent ii. 4, the powder of pearl of A. is one constituent of a universal restorative of which the receipt is given. By a more than usually daring anachronism, Brutus, in Locrine i. 11, the date of which is shortly after the siege of Troy, speaks of his daughter as "a gift more rich Than are the wealthie mines Found in the bowels of A." Valdes promises Faust (Marlowe, Faustus i.) that the spirits shall drag "from A. the golden fleece That yearly stuffs old Philip's treasury"; and Callipine (Marlowe, Tamb. B. i. 2) offers to his keeper as the price of his freedom "1000 galleys, which Shall bring armadoes from the coasts of Spain Fraughted with gold of rich A." The reference is to the annual plate-fleet, which Raleigh nearly captured in 1596.

In Dekker's Fortunatus v. 1, Andelocia, posing as a French doctor, asks for money that he may buy for his medicine "many costly tings dat grow in Arabia, in Asia, in A." In B. & F. Malta v. 2, Norandine says of the Moorish woman Zanthia, the paramour of Montferrat, "Do you snarl, you black Gill? She looks like the picture of A." The reference would seem to be to some picture of an An. Indian, represented as a black, malevolent savage; but I have not been able to find any other account of it. In their Fair Maid i. ii. 2, mention is made of "bawdy E. Indian pictures worse than ever were Aretine's." This picture of A. may have been something of the same kind. In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 240, the D. of Guise affirms, "Philip, K. of Spain, Ere I shall want, will cause his Indians To rip the golden bowels of A." Taylor, Works (1659) 36, says, "The barbarous Brasilians, Ans., and Virginians do adore the devil." Lodge wrote his Margarite of A. (1596) on a voyage to the W., and began it in the Straits of Magellan. In K. K. K. vi. 557, Dunstan says that ks.' favours are "like the violets in A., that in summer yield an odoriferous smell, and in winter a most infectious savour." In Grim ii. 1, Castiliano says, "Now shall you see a Spaniard's skill Who from the plains of new A. Can find out sacred simples of esteem." In Massinger's Madam iii. 3, Luke says to the supposed Red Indians, "You are learned Europeans and we worse than ignorant Ans." In Shirley's Riches iii., Riches says, "My mother was a Clod; she married rich Earth of A. where I was born." The reference is to the fortunes made in A. Milton, P. L. ix. 1116, says that Adam and Eve after the Fall, and their construction of garments of fig-leaves, were such as "of late Columbus found the An., so girt With feathered cincture, naked else and wild." Barnes, in Parthenophil (1593) xlviii. 4, speaks of "rubies of A., dear sold." Davies, in Nosce, says that the sun "makes . . . The An. tawny." Barnefield, in Praise of Pecunia (1598) 6, calls Pecunia "The famous Q. of rich A."

Donne, in Elegies (1633) xx. 27, addresses his mistress, "O my A., my Newfoundland!" In Shirley's Love Tricks ii. 2, Rufaldi says to Selina, "O my dove, my A., my new-found world!"

AMESBURY. A very ancient town in Wilts., on the Avon, 8 m. N. of Salisbury. In King and Queen's Entertainment at Richmond (1636), 214, Richd., a Wilts. man, says, "Chill so vecze the Taylor of Anisburies coat at the next wake."

AMIAS. See EMMAUS.

AMIENS. An ancient episcopal city of France, the capital of Picardy, 92 m. N. of Paris. The cathedral, founded in 1220, is one of the most glorious Gothic churches in the world. "My lord of A." is one of the characters in As ii. 1, 29. It is only abt. 100 m. W. of the forest of Arden, which may have suggested the choice of the name. It is mentioned in B. & F. Prize as on the rd. from England to Paris. Jacques says (v. 2), "We'll get us up to Paris with all speed; For, on my soul, as far as A. She'll carry blank." A. was taken by the Spaniards in 1597, but recovered by Henri IV. of France after a short siege. In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 1, v. 1; and Trag. Byron i. 1, v. 1, Byron claims to have actually taken the city: "I alone Took A. in these arms and held her fast." In Consp. Byron iii. 2, 168, Byron, describing his proposed statue, says, "Within my left hand will I hold a city Which is the city A., at whose siege I served so memorably." There is an Earl of A. in B. & F. Hon. Man. In Day's B. Beggar i. 1, Playnsey brings the letter, "Sent from A. to Momford," which charges him falsely with the surrender of Guynes. Donne, in Satire iv. (1597), mentions "all states and deeds that have been since The Spaniards came, to the loss of A.," i.e. from 1588 to 1597. The rhyme with "since" gives the pronunciation of A.

AMMONITES. A Semitic tribe living E. of the Jordan, around the sources of the Jabbok. The capital was Rabbah, now called Amman. In Conf. Cons. ii. 3, Hypocrisy says, "Joab was glad the A. in Rabah to confusion to bring." The story is told in II Sam. x-xii. In Bale's Promises v., David says of Israel, "They were 18 years vexed of the cruel A." (see Judges x. 8). The war between the A. and David is the background of Peele's Bethsabe. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 25, says, "Gebal and Ammon there conspire And hateful Amalec." In P. L. i. 396, he says of Moloch, "Him the Ammonite Worshipped in Rabba and her watery plain." In S. A. 285, the Chorus recalls how Jephtha "Defended Israel from the Ammonite" (see Judges xi.).

AMOND. See ALMAIN.

AMORITES. One of the peoples of pre-Hebraic Palestine. Sihon, K. of the A., ruled over the dist. E. of the Jordan, between the Jabbok and the Arnon. In the Puritan slang of the 16th cent. the A. meant the worldly and unsanctified enemies of the true people of God. Hence, in B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Jacques speaks of "those A. That came to back her cause, those heathen whores."

AMPHRISUS. A small r. in Thessaly, flowing into the Pagasæan Gulf near Alus. It was on its banks that Apollo fed the flocks of Admetus. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5245, Io, speaking of the vale of Tempe, says, "Next poplar-shadowed Enipeus glides; Not far A., Æas." In his B. Age iii., Medea says, "Thence must I fly unto A. fords And gather plants."

AMPTHILL. A market town in Beds., 45 m. N.W. of Lond. A. Castle was near the town, and was the residence of Katharine of Arragon during the divorce proceedings. The site of the castle is marked by a cross erected in 1773 by the Earl of Upper Ossory. In H8 iv. 1, 28, a Gentleman says, "The Archbp. Of Canterbury . . . Held a late court at Dunstable, 6 m. off from A., where the princess [i.e. Katharine] lay."

AMSTERDAM. The capital of Holland, on the Amstel. It was the most important commercial centre in Europe in the 16th cent. It became the refuge of all sorts of Puritan sectaries, who took refuge there from the persecution of Elizabeth's reign; most of the references in the dramatists are to the extreme types of Puritanism which flourished there.

In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 2, Vandal, the Dutchman, instead of making love to Laurentia, informs her, "The men of A. have lately made a law that none but Dutch may traffic there." This was at the time of the Union of the Netherlands in 1579. It was a place of refuge for insolvents from England. In Brome's Moor i. 2, Theophilus complains, "Crafty merchants often wrong their credits and Londoners fly to live at A." A lost play by Fletcher, Massinger, and Field was entitled The Jeweller of A. In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Sconce boasts, "My ancestors kept the Inquisition out of A." This was in the time of the D. of Alva and the Revolt of the Netherlands.

In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Subtle talks of "the holy brethren Of A., the exiled saints"; and in v. 3 Lovewit says to Ananias, "I shall send you To A., to your cellar." In his Staple iii. 1, one of the items is "The Grand Signior is turned Christian . . . and means to visit the ch. at A. . . . and quit all marks of the beast." In Middleton's Witch i. 1, Almachides says to Amoretta, "A. swallow thee for a Puritan and Geneva cast thee up again!" In his Chaste Maid iii. 2, one of the Puritan women rejoices that Mrs. Allwit's baby has been "well kursenned i' the right way, without idolatry or superstition, after the pure manner of A." In his Queenborough v. 1, when Simon compels Oliver, the Puritan, to stay and see a play, Oliver exclaims: "O devil! I conjure thee by A." Dekker, in Catchpol (1613), says, "Hypocrisy was put to nurse to an Anabaptist of A." In Sampson's Vow iii. 2, 53, we are told that "our learned brother Abolt Cabbidge, Cobler of A.," has decided that vessels used to cook meat on Sunday are unclean. In Cockayne's Trapolin iv. 1, Bulflesh says of a Puritan, "He hath writ a paltry book against the bps., printed it in A. in decimo sexto." Donne, in The Will (1633), says, "I give . . . all my good works unto the Schismatics of A." Heylyn quotes a proverb, "If a man hath lost his religion let him to A., and he shall be sure to find it, or else believe it is vanished." Burton, A. M. iii. 4, 1, 5, says, "In Europe, Poland, and A. are the common sanctuaries."

Gazet, in Massinger's Renegado i. 1, does not approve the doctrine "as your zealous cobbler and learned botcher preach at A." In Shirley's Venice iii. 1, Malipiero affirms, "If I live, I will to A., and add another schism to the 200, fourscore, and odd." In his Bird iv. 1, Bonamico, exhibiting his birds, says, "This was a rail, bred up by a zealous brother in A. Name but Rome, and straight she gapes as she would eat the Pope." Taylor, ii. 231, says, "From dogs our Separatists and Amsterdamans may see their errors"; and in iii. 3, "May the Separatists live and die at Amster and be damned." In Brome's Covent G. iv. 2, the Puritan Gabriel says, "I may suppose you brought this well-disposed gentlewoman from A." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood speaks of "opinions far more various Than all the Sectaries of A. Have ever vented." Again, in v. 1, the watchman says the Inquisition is a monster such as will swallow "all the brethren at A." In Middleton's Tennis, Simplicity says, "The first brick in A. was laid with fresh cheese and cream because mortar made of lime and hair was wicked and committed fornication." There is a double allusion: rst, to the cheese and butter for which Holland was famous; and then to the austere morals of A. In John Hackett's Latin Comedy Loiola (1623), one of the characters is Martinus, a canting elder of A.; the scene is laid there. In Wise Men i. 1, Proberio says, "What if I should read a sermon preached at A. by a man of most pure profession, of the right cut of Carolstadius?" Andrew Bodenstein, of Carlstadt, was an extreme Protestant, and was chiefly responsible for the Ordinances of Wittenberg (1522), in which the new evangelical ideas were stated and made law in that city.

One of the sects which originated in Holland in the 16th cent. was that of the Familists or Family of Love: a kind of free lovers. In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Ferdinand says to the doctors, "When you have found simples to cure the lunacy of Love, administer it unto the Family at A." Middleton's Family is a satire on them.

AMWAS. See EMMAUS.

AMWELL HEAD. One of the principal sources of the New R., lying a m. or two E. of Ware in Herts. See NEW RIVER. In Middleton's Triumphs Truth, a masque written for performance at the letting in of the water to the New R. Head at Clerkenwell, the title speaks of "the running stream from Amwell-Head into the cistern at Islington, being the sole cost of Mr. Hugh Middleton of Lond. 1613."

AMYENS. See AMIENS.

ANCALITES. A British tribe, living in the basin of the Thames, possibly in Oxfordsh. In Fisher's Fumus iv. 4, Mandubratius says to Cæsar, "By me the Trinobantes submit and A." See CÆSAR, B. G. v. 21.

ANCONA. An ancient spt. of Italy on the Adriatic, 132 m. N.E. of Rome. In Webster's Malfi iii. 2, Antonio is sent by the Duchess from Malfi across the sea to A., which was in the Papal States, and so outside the jurisdiction of her brother Ferdinand of Calabria; and she is advised by Bosola to "feign a pilgrimage to our Lady of Loretto, scarce 7 leagues [really only abt. 15 m.] from fair A.," in order to rejoin Antonio. But through the influence of the Cardinal he is "banished A." (iii. 5). Barabas, in Marlowe's Jew iii. 4, tells how he bought a poisonous powder from "an Italian in A."—which he had doubtless visited in the course of trade. In Barnes' Charter iv. 5, Bernardino tells how he "knew a noble Frenchman at Anchona 20 years since at tennis took his death with over heating of himself at play." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "A., praised for the Port Loyal." It was the only decent port on the Adriatic between Venice and Manfredonia, and belonged to the Papal States. In Lælia iii. 1, 13, Petrus says, "Ego hic fui cum legato de A. consors a duce datus."

ANCYRUS. In Alimony i. 2, Trillo desires that "all crop-eared histriomastixes who cannot endure a civil, witty comedy . . . may be doomed to A., and skip there amongst satyrs." The reference is to Prynne, who published his Histrio-mastix in 1632, and was condemned to stand in the pillory and have both his ears cut off. A. is probably a mistake or a misprint for Anticyra, q.v.

ANDALUSIA. A dist. in S. Spain. The inhabitants have a good deal of Moorish blood in their veins, and smugglers and robbers are plentiful among them. In B. & F. Cure iv. 3, the Alguazier says of Pachico and his companions, "They are pilfering rogues of A. that have perused all prisons in Castile." In their Pilgrimage some of the scenes are laid in A. (ii. i, iii. 3). In World Child, Haz. i. 251, Manhood claims to have conquered clean "Salerno and Samers and Andalus"; referring to the conquest of A. from the Moors by Ferdinand of Spain in 1492. In Alimony iv. 2, Madam Medler says, when the Vintress asks the ladies to take a turn in the garden "to procreate yourselves," "Does she take us for A. studs [i.e. mares] that can breed by the air, or procreate of ourselves?" Fuller, Church Hist. (1656) i. 5, 32, speaks of the Spanish mares "impregnated by the wind alone." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 335, Ricaldus mentions "11 tall ships of Andelosia" as forming part of the Gt. Armada. In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 25, Medina speaks of "the Straights of Gibraltar whose watery divisions their Affricke bounds from our Christian Europe in Granado and A." In B. & F.'s Wit Money i. 1, Valentine speaks of the "singing shepherds" that "Andeluzia breeds."

ANDREN. Hall and Holinshed's spelling of Ardres, adopted by Shakespeare, H8 i. 1, 7. Speaking of the Field of the Cloth of Gold, Buckingham says, "An untimely ague Stayed me a prisoner in my chamber when Those suns of glory, those two lights of men, Met in the vale of A."; to which Norfolk adds, "Twixt Guines and Arde"—Arde being another variant spelling of the same name. Ardres is a vill. 10 m. S. of Calais, and in the valley between it and Guisnes the famous meeting of the Ks., Francis and Henry, was held in 1519.

ANDREW'S, ST. There were 3 churches dedicated to this saint in old Lond.: one on the S. side of Holborn Hill, now Holborn Viaduct, next door to the City Temple—completely rebuilt by Wren in 1687; another, known as St. A.'s Wardrobe from its proximity to the Royal Wardrobe, on the E. side of Puddelock Hill, now St. A.'s Hill; and the 3rd, and most interesting, St. A.'s Undershaft, at the corner of Leadenhall St. and St. Mary Axe. Here the May Pole used to be set up every year until the riot of 1517 caused its abolition. The Pole, which was higher than the ch. steeple, was stored for 32 years afterwards on hooks in front of the houses of Shaft Alley, and was then destroyed as an idol by the Puritans. The ch. fortunately escaped the Gt. Fire, and contains a monument to that prince of antiquarians John Stow, who was buried there in 1605. It is to one of the 2 latter churches that reference is made in Middleton's Michaelmas i. 1, "Against St. A.'s, at a painter's house, there's a fair chamber ready furnished to be let." John Webster, the dramatist, is said to have been for a time the clerk of St. A.'s, Holborn. But this is a late and unsupported statement.

ANDREWS, SAINT. An ancient city in Fifesh., on St. A. Bay, 40 m. N.E. of Edinburgh. Its university is the oldest in Scotland, and was founded in 1411. In Greene's James IV iii. 2, Ateukin says, "Come, wend we to St. Andrewes, where his Grace is now in progress." The Bp. of St. A. is one of the characters in the play.

ANGEL. The sign of many taverns in Lond. (1) At No. 1 High St., Islington, was a famous house where travellers lodged on their 1st night out of Lond. The old inn was pulled down in 1819. (2) On the S. side of St. Giles St., now 61 High St., next St. Giles' Ch.; the half-way house on the rd. to Tyburn, where the convicts had a parting draught on their way to execution. (3) In the Strand, behind St. Clement's.

ANGEL. A common booksellers' sign in Lond. (1) Of Andrew Wise's bookshop in Paul's Churchyard, where the 1st and 2nd quartos of H. A. and R. were published. (2) Of a bookshop without Newgate. Alimony was "Printed by Tho. Vere and William Gilbertson and are to be sold at the A. without New-gate 1659." (3) Of another bookshop in Popes-Head-Alley. T. Heywood's Fortune was "Printed for John Sweeting at the A. in Popes-head Alley 1655."

ANGEL. The sign of an inn in Ferrara. In Gascoigne's Supposes iv. 4, Philogano "lighted at the A. and left his horses there." The gate on the N. of Ferrara is the Porta degli Angeli, and the inn was probably near by.

ANGEL. A tavern in Gravesend. In Look About vi., Skink says, "My Lady lies this night at Gravesend at the A."

ANGELO (CASTLE and BRIDGE of St.). In Rome. The castle was originally built as a Mausoleum by the Emperor Hadrian A.D. 130, but was subsequently converted into a fortress during the 5th cent. Also used as a prison. It stands on the right bank of the Tiber, and is reached by the Ponte St. A., which is the old Pons Aelius. In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Mephistopheles says, "Upon the bidge. called Ponte A. Erected is a castle passing strong Within whose walls such stores of ordnance are And double cannons, framed of carved brass, As match the days within one complete year." In Webster's White Devil v. 4, Flamineo speaks of "a gentlewoman taken out of her bed and committed to Castle A." But as this scene is laid in Padua it is a strange oversight. In Nash's Lenten, p. 324, when K. Red-Herring was carried in procession through Rome, "the ordnance at the Castle of St. A. went off." In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, the Pope, on the approach of Charles VIII., "coops himself in Castle A.," and the latter part of the scene takes place before its walls. It was used as a residence by the Popes. In Tarlton's News out of Purgatory (1590), we are told that Boniface, after being made Pope, "departed home to Castle A." In Day's Travails, p. 40, the Pope says, "First to St. A. thus hand in hand." Latimer, in Sermon v. before K. Edward (1549), tells of a "lord mayor of Rome" who was suddenly "cast in the castle Angel."

ANGELO (FORTRESS of St.). A castle of great strength on the point of the Dockyard Creek in Malta, between Fort St. Elmo and Fort Ricasoli. In B. & F. Malta i. 1, Astorius announces, "6 fresh gallees I in St. A. from the promontory this morn descried."

ANGIERS (ANGERS) The capital of Anjou Province, in France, built on a hill on the left bank of the Mayenne, 218 m. S.W. of Paris. Has a fine cathedral, in which Margaret of Anjou was buried, and a strongly situated castle which was the residence of the Ds. of Anjou. Here Shakespeare lays the scene of K. J. II and III, following the Trouble. Reign. As a matter of fact, iii. 2 and 3 ought to be 2 years later, and the scene should be Mirabeau; but Shakespeare places them all continuously at A. and in the plains near A. In Dist. Emp.

ii. 1, Didler speaks of Orlando as the Earl of Angeres. The scene of B. & F. Triumph Death (in Four Plays in One) is laid at A.

ANGLESEY. An island off N.W. coast of Wales on the other side of the Menai Straits. It was an ancient seat of Druidical worship, and was annexed to the English Crown along with the rest of Wales by Edward I. In Peele's Ed. I, p. 51, the "proud Lord of A." is one of the 4 Barons of Wales who come to congratulate the k. on the birth of the Prince of Wales, afterwards Edward II. "Noble Morgan," Earl of A., comes to help Octavian against the traitor Monmouth in Val. Welsh. i. 2.

ANGLES, EAST. The inhabitants of E. Anglia, which included the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. In Massinger's Virgin v. 1, Theophilus reads from his dispatches, "E. A.; bandogs . . . worried 1000 British rascals." The reference is to the persecution of the Christians by Diocletian A.D. 303, in the course of which St. Alban was killed and 1000 citizens of Verulam suffered martyrdom in the same place. But this was at least 150 years before the A. came to England. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 56, speaking of a fictitious Saxon virgin Angela, says, "The other Saxons . . . do, for her sake And love, themselves of her name A. call." Puttenham, Art of Poesie ii. 5, says, "Ryme is a borrowed word from the Greeks by the Latins and French, from them by us Saxon A."

ANGLETERRE. The French word for England. Used in the dialogue between Princess Katharine and Alice in H5 iii. 4, 1, 41; by the French soldier in H5 iv. 4, 61; and in the articles of agreement between the English and French ks. in H5 v. 2, 368.

ANGLIA. Latin for England. In H5 v. 2, 369, the English k. is called "Henricus rex Angliæ."

ANGLIS. A form of English used by a Fleming in Webster's Weakest ii. 3, where Jacob says, "Mein lieber broder, A. beer i."

ANGLOIS. Used for the English language. In H5 iii. 4, 5, Katharine asks: "Comment appelez-vous la main en A.?" (see also lines 13, 21). In v. 2, 200, she says to the K., "Le François que vous parlez, il est meilleur que l'A. le quel je parle."

ANGOLA. A country on W. coast of Africa, between the rs. Dando and Coanza; but often used for the whole dist. S. of Cape Lopez as far as Benguela. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1486; the capital, San Paolo de Loanda, was built by them in 1578. The Dutch held it from 1640 to 1648, when it was recovered by the Portuguese. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Carionil, disguised as a negro, professes to be the ambassador of the "Emperor of both the Ethiopias, and of the mighty kingdoms of Goa, Caffares, Faugar, A., etc." Amongst the kingdoms shown in vision to Adam in Milton, P. L. xi. 401, are "the realm Of Congo, and A. farthest S."

ANGUS. A dist. in Forfarsh., Scotland, which gave its name to an Earldom in the Douglas family, now extinct. The A. mentioned in H4 A. i. 1, 73, was George Douglas, only son of William, 1st Earl of Douglas, by Margaret Stewart, his 3rd wife, who was Countess of A. in her own right. He was one of the prisoners taken by Hotspur at Holmedon. Holinshed calls him "Roberte earle of A." A. is one of the minor characters in Macbeth.

ANHALT. A duchy of Germany in the middle of Prussian Saxony. Its capital is Dessau. In Marlowe's Faustus xi., Faust is invited to visit "the D. of Vanholt"; and responds, "The D. of Vanholt! an honourable gentleman to whom I must be no niggard of my cunning." Scene xii is laid at the court of the D. of Vanholt, which was probably at the castle of Ascharen, near Aschersleben. The last letter of of was transferred in a softened form to the beginning of A.

ANIUS. See Æas.

ANJOU. A province of France, practically the same as the modern department of Maine-et-Loire. It was bounded on the N. by Maine; on the E. by Touraine; on S. by Poitou; and on W. by Brittany. The 1st authentic D. of A. is Ingelgar (circ. 870). Geoffrey Plantagenet was D. of A., and his son Henry II of England inherited the dukedom, which remained in the possession of the Ks. of England till it was forfeited to Philip Augustus by John in 1204. The last D. was René, father of Q. Margaret of A., the wife of Henry VI of England. The duchy was taken from him and annexed to the Crown of France in 1481. Since then the title has been borne by several members of the French Royal Family, but without any territorial rights. Its capital was Angers, q.v. In K. J. i. 1, 12, Philip claims it for Arthur in the right of his descent from Geoffrey Plantagenet, and repeats the claim in ii. 1, 152. In ii. 1, 528, John surrenders it to Lewis, the Dauphin, on his marriage with Blanche. In H6 A. i. 1, 94, it is announced that Reignier, D. of A., has taken the side of the Dauphin Charles. The Ff. read "Reynold"; René is meant. Reignier himself appears in H6 A. v. 3 on the walls of Angiers, and offers to give Margaret in marriage to Henry on condition that he may quietly enjoy his own, "the country Maine and A." These terms are repeated and confirmed in H6 B. i. 1, 50, to the indignation of Gloucester and Warwick, who exclaims (119), "A. and Maine! myself did win them both; Those provinces these arms of mine did conquer." Apparently Shakespeare has confused Richd. Neville, the "Kingmaker," who is here speaking, with his father-in-law, Richd. Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, who was deputy-regent of France in 1425 and regent in 1437. Neville was only 17 at the time of Henry's marriage, and was not made Earl of Warwick till 1449, 5 years after. In H6 B. iv. 1, 86, Suffolk is charged by the Capt. with having sold A. and Maine to France. It was through him that the negotiations for the marriage of Henry were carried on.

The D. of A. is one of the characters in Marlowe's Massacre. He was the brother of K. Charles IX, and succeeded to the throne in 1574 as Henri III. He and his sister Margaret of Navarre were at first warm adherents of the Huguenot cause, but through the influence of their mother, Catherine de Medici, they went over to the side of Rome. He was elected K. of Poland in 1573. He was driven by the Guises into the arms of Henry of Navarre; and it was through him that the Guises were assassinated in 1588. He joined with Navarre in the siege of Paris in 1589, and was there murdered by the Dominican Friar, Jaques Clement. In Webster's Weakest, prol., "The D. of A., fatally inclined Against the family of Bullen, leads A mighty army into Burgundy." This was Charles of A., brother of Louis IX. In Barnes' Charter i. 1, Sforza hails Charles VIII of France as "heir unto the crown of Naples by lawful right of that great house of A." He based his claim on the fact that Joanna I, Q. of Naples, had adopted Louis of A., brother of Charles V of France, as her heir. In spite of the Angevin claim, Alphonso of Arragon had seized Naples in 1442 and reunited it to Sicily, though the support of the Pope was given to the Angevins. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 94, Edward claims from France "all these Dukedoms following: Aquitaine, A., etc., etc." In Davenport's Matilda i. 2, Fitzwater reproaches K. John with delivering up to Philip of France "A., Brittain, etc., etc." In Mason's Mulleasses 652, Borgia, an imaginary D. of Florence, speaks of "the Cardinal of A., my kinsman."

ANKOR. R. in Warwickshire, falling into the Tame at Tamworth. It flows past Hartshill, the birthplace of Michael Drayton. Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 13, says, "Arden's sweet A., let thy glory be That fair Idea only lives by thee"; and in liii. 14, "Thou, sweet A., art my Helicon."

ANNE'S (St.). There was a ch. of St. Anne within the precincts of Blackfriars, near the theatre, to the N. of Glasshouse Yard, which was new-built and enlarged in 1597. It was destroyed in the Fire and not rebuilt. It is possible that this is the ch. by which the Clown's house stood (Tw. N. iii. 1, 7), and that it was therefore natural for him to swear by St. Anne, as he does ii. 3, 125.

ANNE'S (SAINT) CROSS. A cross in the city of Julio, the scene of Whetstone's Promos. Whetstone transfers many Lond. sts. to Julio; and by St. A. C. I think he means the Cheapside Cross, q.v. The name was suggested by St. A. Ch. and St. A. Lane, which are close to the Cross. In the same play, B. i. 4, Phallax, arranging for a city pageant, directs: "Let your man at Saynt A. C., out of hand, Erect a stage that the Wayghts in sight may stand."

ANNE'S (St.) LANE. Lond., named after the Ch. of St. Anne-in-the-Willows, which stood at the corner of it. It ran from Gresham St. to Falcon St., between St. Martin's and Noble St. The ch. was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. It contained a monument to Peter Heywood, the man who apprehended Guy Fawkes. It is now the Ch. of St. Anne and St. Agnes. "Faith Harrie," says Robin in More ii. 1, "the head drawer at the Miter by the great Conduit called me up and we went to breakfast into St. A. L." The Mitre was in Bread St., close to Cheapside, where the great Conduit stood, and therefore only a few steps from St. A. L.

ANNET (or ANET). French town near Dreux on the Eure, 70 m. E. of Paris. The superb castle was built in 1552 by Henri II for Diana of Poitiers, and demolished in the Revolution; part of the façade was, however, re-erected at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris. In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, Byron relates that "the D. d'Aumale had his goodly house at A. razed to the earth" for his disloyalty to the K. This D. was Charles de Lorraine, who had joined the League, but subsequently became reconciled to the K.

ANNIS A CLEARE. A spring in Hoxton, near Shoreditch, afterwards made into an open-air bathing pool. In Nichols' Discourse of Marriage (1615), the origin of the name is given. "An Alderman's wife of Lond." . . . being deserted by her and husband, "went into a spring near Shoreditch, and there ended her days and sorrows by drowning; which font to this day is christened by her name . . . and called by her name Dame A. a Clare." In Greene's Thieves Falling Out (1637), Kate, a woman of the town, defends her profession thus: "The suburbs should have a great miss of us; and Shoreditch would complain to Dame Anne a C. if we of the sisterhood should not uphold her jollity." In Brome's M. Beggars ii. 3, Patrico speaks of his wife as having "a throat as clear as was dame Annisses of the name." In Tarlton's News out of Purgatory, we have, "Upon Whitson Monday last I would needs to the Theatre to a play, where when I came I found such a concourse of unruly people that I thought it better solitary to walk in the fields. Feeding my humour I stepped by dame Anne of Cleeres well, and went by the backside of Hogsdon." In Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 248, Tucca says to Miniver, "Thou shalt, my sweet dame A. a cleere, thou shalt, for I'll drown myself in thee." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii. 2, the Clown, who is weeping, says, "O mistress, if ever you have seen Demoniceclear, look into mine eyes," where Dame A. a C. is meant. In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Whit, the Irish Bawd, promises Mrs. Littlewit, "Tou shalt ha' de clean side o' de tablecloth, and di glass vashed with phatersh of Dame Annesh C."

ANN'S (SAINT). A ch., apparently in Nottingham or Clifton; I can find no other reference to it. In Sampson's Vow. iii. 2, 61, Joshua asks his cat, "Hast thou not seen the whole conventicle of brothers and sisters walk to St. Anns, and not so much as a fructifying kiss on the high[day]"; i.e. Sunday.

ANTARCTIC POLE. Usually spelt Antartick; the S. Pole. Tamburlaine, in urging his sons to extend his empire after his death, bids them "from the A. P. eastward behold as much more land, which never was descried, Wherein are rocks of pearl" (Marlowe, Tamb. B. v. 3). In Histrio. iii. 40, we read of "merchants, that from E. to W., From the A. to the Arctic Poles" bring treasures. In Shirley's Courtier iv. 1, Depazzi says, "I'll toss the a. p. with like ease as Hercules could a bullrush." In Val. Welsh. v. 5, Caradoc says, "Were Cæsar lord of all the spacious world, Even from the Articke to the Antarticke poles, I'd keep my legs upright." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 2, Furor says, "I'll make the antarticke p. to kiss thy toe." In Milton, P. L. ix. 79, Satan is described as searching sea and land first to the north, and then "Downward as far a." Barnes, in Parthenophil canz. 3, speaks of "that great monarch, Charles [i.e. the Emperor Charles V], whose power did strike From the Arctic to the A."

ANTELOPE. A tavern in Milan, at which Matheo, in Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. ii. 1, arranges for a supper; "for there's wine and good boys." But most likely Dekker was thinking of the A. Inn on the W. side of W. Smithfield, Lond.

ANTENORIDES. The 6th Gate of Troy. Troil. prol. 17, "Priam's six-gated city, Dardan, and Tymbria, Helias, Chetas, Troien, and A." Fl. read "Antenoridus," but the emendation is certain, the list being taken from Caxton's Destruction of Troy iii.: "In this city were 6 gates; the one was named Dardane, the 2nd Tymbria, the 3rd Helias, the 4th Chetas, the 5th Troyen, and the 6th A." Lydgate (A.D. 1535) calls it "Antinorydes." The name is obviously formed from that of Antenor, one of the sons of Priam.

ANTHEDON. Evidently meant for some r. in E. Thesaly, near Lake Boebeis; the only A. I can find in Hellas is, however, the town on the Euripus, on the coast of Boeotia. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea goes to gather simples "where rushy Bebes and A. flow."

ANTHOLINS (St.). An ancient ch. in Watling St., on N. side of Budge Row, Lond. Destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren with a curious composite column at the top of the spire. It was pulled down in 1874, but the site is marked by a memorial. A number of clergymen of Puritan views established a morning lecture here in 1599, the bell for which began to ring at 5 a.m. and was a great nuisance to the neighbourhood. Dugdale says, "it was the grand nursery whence most of the seditious preachers were after sent abroad throughout all England to poison the people with their antimonarchical principles." Baneswright, in Mayne's Match iv. 5, describes Madam Aurelia: "She will out-pray a preacher at St. Ant'lin's and divides the day in exercises." Mrs. Flowerdew, a Puritan lady who has come to criticize the play at the Salisbury Court Theatre, says, "This foppishness is wearisome; I could at our St. Antlins, sleeping and all, sit 20 times as long" (Randolph, Muses ii. 4). In Mayne's Match i. 5, Sea-thrift, the brother of the virtuous Dorcas, says, "Do you think I'll all days of my life frequent St. Antlins, like my sister?" Openwork, in Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, complains that his wife has a tongue "will be heard further in a still morning than St. Antling's bell." In the Puritan the 2 servants of Lady Plus, the widow of Watling St., are named Nicholas St. Antlings and Simon St. Mary-Overies. They enter (i. 3) "in black scurvy mourning coats, with books at their girdles, as coming from ch."; and are addressed by Corporal Oath as "Puritanical scrape shoes, flesh-o-good-Fridays." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 5, Hearsay hopes to have "all sorts repair as duly to us as the barren wives of aged citizens do to St. A." Davenant, in Plymouth i. 1, speaks of "these 2 disciples of St. Tantlins that rise to long exercise before day." John, in Heywood's I. K. M. B. 255, says, "Instead of tennis court my morning exercise shall be at St. Antlins." Quomodo, in Middleton's Michaelmas v. 1, knew "a widow about St. Antling's so forgetful of her first husband that she married again within the 12 months." In Bromes's Damoiselle iii. 2, Magdalen, the wife of Bumpsey, says, "we'll find Lecture-times [to take lessons in dancing] or baulk St. Antlin's for 't the while."

ANTHONY (SAINT). San Antonio, the 2nd largest of the Cape Verde Islands. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 333, the Chorus tells how "Francis Drake and Christopher Carlisle set on Cap de Verd, then Hispaniola; setting on fire the towns of S. A. and S. Dominick." This was in the famous Island Voyage of 1585.

ANTHONY'S (ST.). Mentioned in Middleton's Women Beware iv. 1, as a ch. in Florence. Two ladies are discussing the time. One has set her watch by St. Mark's, the other affirms that "St. A., they say, goes truer." "That's your opinion," retorts the other, "because you love a gentleman o' the name." There is a ch. of San Marco in Florence, but none of San Antonio as far as I can ascertain. Probably both names are introduced at random and the and for the sake of the little joke. In the 1st draft of Jonson's Ev. Man I., the scene of which is laid in Florence, Dr. Clement's house is said to be "yonder by St. A."

ANTHONY'S (ST.) GATE. Mentioned in Gascoigne's Supposes iv. as one of the gates of Ferrara. Erostrato, going for a ride into the fields, "passed the ford beyond St. A. G." Probably the present Porta di Roma, at the S. E. corner of the city, is the one intended; the Bastion di San Antonio is close by it.

ANTHONY'S (ST.) GATE. One of the old gates of Paris, in the Faubourg de St. Antoine, close to the Bastille. Byron, confined in the Bastille, hears "the cries of people," and is informed "'tis for one wounded in fight here at St. A. G." (Chapman, Trag. Byron v. 1).

ANTHONY'S (ST.) HOSPITAL. Almshouse and free school in Lond., founded in the reign of Henry III on the site of a Jewish synagogue on N. side of Threadneedle St. Originally a cell of St. A. in Vienna, but in the reign of Edward IV was annexed to St. George's, Windsor. The proctors, remembering that St. A. was the special protector of pigs, used to rescue starved or diseased pigs from the markets, tie a bell round their necks, and let them feed about the place; and "if the pig grew to be fat . . . the Proctor would take him up to the use of the Hospital." So Stow testifies from personal observation. In his time, however, the hospital was dissolved and the chapel assigned to the use of the French Protestants of Lond. It was pulled down about 1840.

In Bale's Laws viii. 6, Infidelity says, "Good Christen people, I am come hither verily as a true Proctor of the house of S. A."; and amongst the charms he boasts of possessing is "a bell to hang upon your hog, and save your cattle from the biting of a dog." In Bale's Johan 262, Sedition says, "Let S. A. hog be had in some regard." In Chapman's Usher iv. 2, Poggio says to Vincentio, "I have followed you up and down like a Tantalus pig": a curious perversion of St. A. pig. The school was a famous one, and had among its pupils Sir Thomas More and Archbp. Whitgift. It was the rival of St. Paul's, and there were many fights between the "A. pigs" and the "Paul's pigeons," as the boys nicknamed one another. The Bank of England now occupies its site. Laneham, in Letter 61, says, "I went to school forsooth both at Pollez and also at St. Antoniez."

ANTHONY'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond. See ANTONY'S. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Gregory says to Cunningham, "I have been seeking for you 't the bowling green; Enquired at Nettleton's and A. o."

ANTHROPOPHAGI. Cannibals, of whom many stories were brought home by travellers. Oth. i. 3, 145: "The cannibals that each other eat, the A." The Host, in M. W. W. iv. 5, 10, bids Simple knock at Sir John's door and warns him, "He will speak like an Anian. unto thee"; meaning—if he means anything—that he will give him a savage reception if he disturbs him. In Dekker's Satiro iv. 2, 87, Tucca says to Horace (Jonson), "Art not famous enough yet for killing a player but thou must eat men alive? thy friends, thou Ate.?" In Lochrine iii. 6, 34, Humber speaks of the shore "where the bloody A. With greedy jaws devours the wandering wights." He is thinking of Polyphemus and the Cyclops.

ANTICYRA. Town in Phocis, on the N. shore of the Corinthian Gulf. Famous in antiquity as the place where the best hellebore was grown; and as hellebore was the recognized specific for madness, it was commonly said of a foolish person "Naviget Am."—"Let him sail to A." The town lay on a peninsula which is often erroneously described as an island. Jonson, in Fortun. Isls., says, "This fool should have been sent to A., the isle of Hellebore." Burton, A. M. ii. 4, 2, 2, says, "The ancients . . . sent all such as were crazed or that doted to the Ae. . . . where this plant [hellebore] was in abundance to be had." In Cowley's Riddle v., Alupis says, "He's mad beyond the cure Of all the herbs that grow in A." See also ANCYRUS.

ANTIOCH. The capital of Syria, on the Orontes, founded by Seleucus Nicator 300 B.C., and named after his father Antiochus. Enlarged and embellished by subsequent ks., and became one of the greatest and most famous cities of the East. Here is laid Sc. I of Pericles. Gower says, prol. 17, "This A. then; Aus. the Gt. Built up this city for his chiefest seat." The supposed time of the play is the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. Aus. the Gt. reigned 228-187 B.C. It is mentioned in Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, as one of the Syrian towns which the K. of Natolia has gone to defend against Tamburlaine. In B. & F. Hum. Lieut. v. 4, Seleucus laments "the fortune I lost in A. when my uncle perished"; and again, "you both knew mine uncle Enanthes I lost in A. when the town was taken, mine uncle slain; Antigonus had the sack on't." Seleucus must have had a short memory, for he himself founded A. in 300 B.C., the year after Antigonus was slain at the battle of Ipsus; nor had he any uncle as far as history relates. In Day's Travails, p. 50, Sultan Ahmed I claims to be "Emperor of Babilon, Catheria, Ægypt, Ae." In Tiberius 2020, Germanicus, leaving Armenia, says, "Farewell, good Piso, I'll to Ae." He went there, and died, as it was suspected, of poison administered by Piso. Christianity was early introduced into A., as related in Acts xi. 19, and it is said "The disciples were called Christians first in A." (Acts xi. 26). In Tiberius 2182, Maximus says of Germanicus, "We marched to the city Ae., Whereas my lord had heard were Christians, Judean priests, the which did magnify An unknown god, in daily piety." As this was in A.D. 19 the anachronism is rather extraordinary. Milton, P. R. iii. 297, says of the E. kingdoms, "All these the Parthian . . . under his dominion holds From the luxurious ks. of A. won." In Heming's Jewes Trag. 590, Titus says that the ammunition "is brought from A. within a day's journey of Gamala." Bacon, in Sylva x. 936, says, "Groves of bays do forbid pestilent airs; which was accounted a great cause of the wholesome air of Aia."

ANTIOCH. The capital of the Roman province of Pisidia. It lay in the S. of the Phrygio-Galatic dist., abt. 250 m. E. of Smyrna. In Conf. Cons. iv. 5, Suggestion says, "Paul at A. dissembled to be dead." The reference is to the incident recorded in Acts xiv. 19; but it took place at Lystra, not at A.; though Jews from A. were amongst the instigators of the assault on the Apostle.

ANTIPODES. Those who live on the opposite side of the globe, so that their feet are planted over against ours. The 1st quotation given in the N.E.D. is from Trevisa (1398): "Yonde in Ethiopia ben the A., men that have theyr fete ayenst our fete." Benedict will go "on slightest errand now to the A." to escape from Beatrice (Ado ii. 1, 273). Hermia thinks that "this whole earth may be bored and that the moon May through the centre creep and so displease Her brother's noontide with the A." sooner than Lysander would leave her (M. N. D. iii. 2, 55). Bassanio greets Portia on her return: "We should hold day with the A. If you would walk in absence of the sun" (Merch. v. 1, 127). Richd. complains that Bolingbroke "all this while hath revelled in the night Whilst we were wandering with the A." (R2 iii. 2, 49). York abuses Q. Margaret: "Thou art as opposite to every good As the A. are unto us" (H6 C. i. 4, 135). Tamburlaine urges his sons to prosecute his conquests still further after his death, "whereas the sun, declining from our sight, Begins the day with our A." (Marlowe, Tamb. B. v. 3); and Callapine speaks of the starry night as "That fair veil that covers all the world When Phœbus leaping from the hemisphere Descendeth downward to the A." (ibid. B. i. 2).

In Kirke's Champions the A. are regarded as a region of perpetual darkness, and Calib, speaking of his gloomy cave, says, "We are sunk in these A., so choked with darkness that it can stifle the day" (i. 1). "Above the A." is used in Massinger's Virgin iv. 2, meaning "on this side of the world." Brome has a play called The A., in which everything is turned topsy-turvy, and, amongst other things, "all the poets are Puritans." In l. 231 he speaks of his soul being "hurried to the Antipodian strand." Laneham (Letter, p. 48) says that Kenilworth was so radiant during Elizabeth's visit, "at though Phœbus for his ease would rest him in the Castle and not every night go to travel down unto the A." We gain much information about the A. from Pseudolus, who lived there "about 3 years, 6 months, and 4 days"; they are about 100 m. from the fields Gurgustidonian; and he wears a ring which the K. of the A. gave him (Timon i. 4). In Shirley's Courtier i. 1, Orsino says to Volterre, "Thou hast been a traveller and conversed with the A." In his Ct. Secret ii. 2, Mendoza speaks of hurricanes boisterous enough to strike a ship "clean through o' t'other side to the A." In Chaunticleers i., Bristle says, "I'd dig to the A. with my nails, but I'd find a mine." In Davenant's Britannia it is pronounced with a long "o," and the accent is on the 3rd syllable, as the rhyme shows: "I'll strike thee till thou sink where the abode is Of wights that sneak below, called Antipodes." In Brome's Lovesick Ct. v. 1, Philargus says, "Rather I'll travel to th' A. than here linger the vain impediment of your joys." In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 1, Lorece says, "They at the A. hear with their noses, smell with their ears, see by feeling, but taste with all their senses, and feel not anything, for they cannot be hurt." Constable, in Diana ii. 3, 4, says of the sun, "Though from our eyes his beams be banished Yet with his light the A. be blest."

ANTIUM. An ancient city of Latium on a promontory on the sea-coast, 38 m. from Rome. It still survives as Porto d'Anzo. It became the leading city of the Volscians, and engaged vigorously in their wars against the Romans. Here Shakespeare places the house of Tullus Aufidius, and the scene of Cor. iv. 4, 5, v. 6 is laid in A. See Cor. iii. 1, 11; and iv. passim. It is at A. that Coriolanus is killed (488 B.C.).

ANTLING'S, SAINT. See ANTHOLINS (St.).

ANTOINE, RUE DE SAINT. A st. in Paris, running E. from the Place de la Bastille to the Place de la Nations. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner, in his description of Paris, says, "Lae Rue St. A., St. Honoré, and St. Denis are large enough for the Vista." Fyne Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 188, says of Paris, "The sts. are somewhat large, and among them the fairest is that of St. Dennis, the 2nd St. Honoré, the 3rd St. A., and the 4th St. Martine."

ANTONY'S. Another name for the Rose Tavern in Russell St., Lond., close to Drury Lane, Antony being apparently the name of the host. A room in the Rose is depicted in the 3rd plate of Hogarth's Rake's Progress. It had an evil reputation as a gambling hell and a haunt of women of the town. In Barry's Ram, Capt. Puff declares it to be his ambition, if he can get hold of a rich wife, to eat at Clare's Ordinary and dice at A. (iii. 1). In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 1, when Venture and Bonavent begin to quarrel and draw their swords, Lord Bon-vile comforts the agitated ladies by assuring them that "A cup of sack, and A. at the Rose Will reconcile their furies." In B. & F. Wit S.W. iv. 1, Gregory says to Cunningham, "I have been seeking for you i' the bowling green; Enquired at Nettleton's and A. ordinary."

ANTWERP (ANTWERPEN, ANVERS). One of the greatest spets. of the 16th cent., lying on the right bank of the Scheldt, abt. 50 m. from the open sea. It had a population of 200,000, and 2000 vessels could be seen at one time in the harbour. The English wool trade was largely carried on through A., and in 1296 an English factory received its charter. In 1550 an English Bourse was established, and in 1558 the Hop van Lyere was given to the English merchants. It was known as Dives A.-ia., and its fairs attracted merchants from all parts of Europe. For the Exchange see under BURSE. The Castle, or Citadel of the S., was built by Alva in 1567.

A. was involved in the Spanish wars of the later 16th cent. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1576, and given up to a 3 days' pillage, known as the Spanish Fury. It was again besieged by the D. d'Alençon in 1583; and after an obstinate resistance was taken by the D. of Parma in August 1585. Larum is concerned with the siege of 1576; though Alva, who in the play appears as the general of the Spaniards, had left Holland in 1574. During the siege of 1584-5 a fire-ship launched by the besieged effected a breach in the D. of Parma's bidge. over the Scheldt, to the astonishment of Europe. In Marlowe's Faustus i. 91, Faust says, "I'll . . . chase the Prince of Parma from our land . . . Yea, stranger engines for the brunt of war Than was the fiery keel at A.'s bidge. I'll make my servile spirits to invent." Act II of Cromwell is laid in A., during Cromwell's tenure of the office of secretary to the English factory. In ii. 1, prol., the Chorus says, "Now, gentlemen, imagine that young Cromwell [is] In Antwarpe leiger for the English merchants." In the alliterative nonsense-rhymes in Thersites i. 218, the couplet occurs, "Andrew All-Knave, alderman of A., Hop will with hollyhocks and harken Humphrey's harp." Is there a possible reminiscence of the Hop van Lyere? In Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, Barabas has debts owing in all the great trade centres of Europe, including A. In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 2, Laurentia complains that when her Dutch lover comes to court her all he has to say is that "cloth is dear at A." In Peele's Alcazar ii. 4, 70, the D. of Barceles is sent to A. by Sebastian "To hire us mercenary men-at-arms." In Gascoigne's Government iv. 5, Eccho says, "There are not many towns in Europe that maintain more jollity than Ae." In Larum A. 3, Danila says that A. is "the flower of Europe"; and that she is in "every part so rich and sumptuous As India's not to be compared to her." In Middleton's No Wit i. 3, the Dutch Merchant says of Grace, "I saw that face at A. in an inn." Dekker, in induction to Seven Sins (1606), says, "A., the eldest daughter of Brabant, Hath fallen in her pride."

In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 296, a lord, speaking of Gresham's Exchange, says, "The nearest, that which most resembles this, Is the great Burse in A., yet not comparable Either in height or wideness, the fair cellarage, Or goodly shops above." In Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus, in prefatory verses, says, "Galdbrech Fame rode bare-ridge To spread the news in Ae. Pawne." In Larum i. 1, the scene is laid in the castle which commands "the S. Port." From it the Spaniards fire a shot which strikes the state-house, or Hotel de Ville, and so begin the attack on the unsuspecting city. Spenser, F. Q. v. 10, 25, describes the Spanish oppression of A., and says that the Spaniard "had defaced clean Her stately towers and buildings' sunny sheen, Shut up her havens, marred her merchants' trade, Robbed her people that full rich had been, And in her neck a Castle huge had made." Borde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) x., says that "Handwarp is a well-favoured merchant town; it has a curious ch.-spire, the fairest flesh-market in Christendom, and a fine Burse." In Ford's Warbeck iv. 3, Durham says, "The English merchants, Sir, have been received with general procession into A." This is a slight ante-dating of the treaty of commerce made with the Flemings by Henry VII in 1506. A lost play by Dekker and Haughton, produced in 1601, was called Friar Rush and the Proud Woman of A. The scene of Gascoigne's Government is laid in A.

AONIA. The dist. around Thebes, in Boeotia. The Soldan, in Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 3, refers to the hunting of the wolf, "that angry Themis sent to waste and spoil The sweet An. fields," by Cephalus and the Theban youth. This wolf, or fox, was fated never to be overtaken by any pursuer; and Amphitryon, in order to catch it, borrowed the dog of Cephalus which was fated to overtake any animal it pursued. Fate got over this problem of the irresistible force and the immovable mass by turning both animals into stone. Milton, P. L. i. 15, uses "An. Mt." for Mt. Helicon, which was in this part of Boeotia.

AOUS. See ÆAS.

APPENNINES. The chain of mtns. running down the centre of Italy. In K. J. i. 1, 202, the Bastard scoffs at the travellers who talk of "the Alps and A., the Pyrenean and the r. Po." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 3, the D. of Milan swears that he will starve his daughter "on the Appenine" ere Hipolito shall marry her. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Sigismund says, "My royal host . . . seems as vast and wide . . . as the ocean to the traveller That rests upon the snowy A." In B. & F. Bonduca iii. 2, Suetonius says to the Roman soldiers, "Loud Fame calls ye Pitched on the topless Appenine." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 3, Hannibal boasts, "We will triumph, or I'll level all the rugged A." In the old Shrew, Haz., p. 513, Ferando addresses Kate, "Thou whiter than are the snowy Apenis." In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says he will with mangled bodies "make such hills as shall surpass in height The snowy Alps and aery Appenines." Beaumont, in The Glance 28, says, "Those glances work on me like the weak shine The frosty sun throws on the Appenine." Daniel, in prol. to Cleopatra, pleads for the extension of England's literary influence, so that "we May plant our roses on the Apinines." In Mason's Mulleasses 2239, Mulleasses speaks of a love "cold as the white head of the A."

APHERYCA. A curious spelling of Africa in Stucley 1563.

APIDANUS. A r. in Thessaly, rising in Mt. Othrys in Phthia, and flowing N. into the Enipeus. Said to be the only r. in Thessaly which was not drunk dry by the army of Xerxes. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5243, 10, speaking of Thessaly, says, "There old A. steals murmuring by." In his B. Age iii., Medea says, "What simples grow in Mt. Pindus, Otheris, Ossa, Appidane, I must select."

APOLLO. The name of the room where Jonson's Tavern Academy used to meet, in the Devil Tavern in Fleet St., next to Temple Bar. It was on the 1st floor at the back.

The Latin rules of the Academy are given in full in Gifford's edition of Jonson. Marmion, in Companion, puts a bit of his own experience into the mouth of Careless, who, in ii. 4, enters drunk and says, "I am full of oracles; I am come from A. . . . From the heaven Of my delight where the boon Delphic God Drinks sack and keeps his Bacchanalias, And has his incense and his altars smoking, And speaks in sparkling prophecies: thence do I come." In Shirley's Love Maze i. 2, Capewit says, "If I meet you in A., a pottle of the best ambrosia in the house shall wait upon you." In his Fair One iii. 4, Fowler says, "To the Oracle, boys, Come, we'll have thy story in A." In Brome's Moor ii. 2, the Boy cries: "Jerome, draw a quart of the best Canary into the A." In Jonson's Staple ii. 5, Pennyboy Canter advises his nephew, "Dine in A. with Pecunia, At brave D. Wadloos"; and he replies, "Content, i' faith. . . . Simon the K. Will bid us welcome." Simon Wadloe was the Host of the Devil Tavern, q.v. Accordingly, Act IV, Sc. I is laid "In the Devil Tavern, The A." The bust of A. which adorned the room is still preserved in Child's Bank. In Herbert's Travels (1639), the word is used in the sense of a Banqueting Hall: "the sultan was ushered into his A. where upon rich carpets was placed a neat and costly banquet."

APOLLO, TEMPLE OF. Erected on the Palatine Hill at Rome by Augustus after the victory of Actium, and dedicated in 28 B.C. It was frequently used for meetings of the Senate, and Jonson's Sejanus v. 10, is laid here. "The consuls . . . shall hold a Senate in the temple of A. Palatine."

APOLLONIA (now POLLONA). City of Illyria, on the Aous, some 8 m. from the sea. In Misogonus, the twin brother of Misogonus is carried off while an infant and lost; but it subsequently appears that he is in Apolonia or Polona. I suppose the Illyrian A. is meant; but there are As. in Sicily and Chalcidice and Crete and Asia Minor and half a dozen other places.

APOTHECARIES' HALL. In B. & F. Prize ii. 6, Livia, says to Moroso, "There is no other use of thee now extant But to be hung up, cassock, cap and all, For some strange monster at A." The A. H. in Water Lane, Blackfriars, was not erected till 1670; up to that time the a. were connected with the Grocers' Company. I suspect that in this passage the Barber-Surgeons' Hall is intended, where certainly "anatomies," or skeletons, were preserved and exhibited. See under BARBER-SURGEONS' HALL, for instances.

APPIAN WAY. The most famous of the ancient Roman rds., connecting the capital with Brundisium, by way of Capua. It was commenced by Appius Claudius Cæcus 312 B.C., and completed abt. the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. It entered Rome by the Porta Capena. For some m. outside the city it is lined with tombs. In B. & F. Prophetess iii. 1, Geta inquires of a petitioner, "What's your bill? For gravel for the A. W. and pills? Is the way rheumatic?" Milton, P. R. iv. 68, describes embassies coming to Rome "In various habits, on the A. road Or on the Æmilian."

APPIDANE. See APIDANUS.

APULIA. Dist. of ancient Italy, on the E. coast, E. of Samnium and Lucania. Venusium, the birthplace of Horace, was on the borders of A. and Lucania. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 2, Horace says, "Lucanian or An., I not [i.e. know not] whether, For the Venusian colony ploughs either." See Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 35.

AQUILEIA. A Roman colonia founded 181 B.C., near the head of the Adriatic, 21 m. N.W. of Trieste. Its walls were 12 m. in circumference, and it became a great trading centre. It was one of the oldest bishoprics in Italy and, according to tradition, St. Mark was its 1st bp. and wrote his Gospel there. Destroyed in A.D. 452 by Attila and his Huns; the remnant of the inhabitants fled to the islands at the mouth of the Brenta and founded Venice. In Marmion's Antiquary iii., the hero tells of certain MSS. which he possesses, "which were digged out of the ruins of A. after it was sacked by Attila."

AQUINUM (now AQUINO). A town of the Volscians, lying on the Via Latina, abt. 70 m. S.E. of Rome, birthplace of the satirist Juvenal. Hall, in Satires iv. 1, 2, asks, "Who dares upbraid these open rhymes of mine With blindfold Aquines or dark Venusine?" i.e. with the obscure satires of Juvenal or Horace.

AQUITAINE. The subject of dispute between the Ks. of France and Navarre in L. L. L. It lies in S.W. France, between the Garonne and the Pyrenees. Shakespeare regards it as part of the kingdom of France at the date of the play, for the K. of France has mortgaged it to the K. of Navarre as security for his payment of 200,000 crowns which he had promised him for his services in his wars. Its chief towns were Bordeaux and Toulouse. Corineus, the brother of the legendary Brutus who gave his name to Britain, claims, with a fine disregard of chronological conditions, to have conquered "all the borders of great A." (Lochnis i. 1). Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 437, says, "In A. at last the Ilion race arrive," and proceeds to describe the defeat of Groffarius of A. by Corineus. Jonson, in Blackness, characterizes it as "rich A." The D. of A. is one of the characters in Greene's Orlando. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight, in a list of table-dainties, mentions salmon from A. Pliny, Hist. Nat. iv. 32, says, "In Aquitania salmo fluviatilis marinis omnibus præfertur." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, the Herald says that the 3 lions in the English arms "are 1 coat made of 2 French dukedoms, Normandy and Aquitain." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 94, Edward claims from France "all these Dukedoms following: A., Anjou, etc."

ARABIA (Ab. = Arab, Ay. = Araby, An. = Arabian). The peninsula between the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean, and the Persian Gulf. The ancients divided it into 3 parts: Petrea in the N., Deserta in the centre, and Felix in the S.W. A., however, only comes into prominence as the result of the work of Mahomet (A.D. 622-632). After effecting the religious reformation of A., he proceeded to conquer in succession Syria, whose capital, Damascus, is still an Ab. city; Persia, Egypt, N. Africa, and Spain. Hence Ab. is used for the inhabitants of all these countries, and is often equivalent to Moor. From 750 onward the greatness of A. began to decline, until in the early part of the 16th cent. it became part of the Ottoman Empire, and remained so until 1919.

Historical and local allusions. Milton, P. L. iii. 537, speaks of "Beersaba, where the Holy Land Borders on Egypt and the An. Shore." In A. & C. iii. 6, 73, "K. Malchus of A." is one of the ks. summoned by Cleopatra to help Antony. F. i., following North's Plutarch, reads "Manchus"; but the real title of this monarch was Malchus, the Hebrew Melech, i.e. K.; he ruled over A. Petrea. An An. K., Silleus (Syllæus), is one of the characters in Mariam. In Greene's Aphonusus iv. 2, 1315, Carinus, pretending to be an An., says, "I still [am] desirous, as young gallants be, To see the fashions of A. My native soil." Cracon, K. of A., is one of the characters in this play; he is entirely imaginary, as is the Rhesus "K. of sweet A.," who, in Chapman's Blind Beggar ix., is marching against Ptolemy. In Coven-try M. P. of The Nativity, Balthasar, one of the Three Kings, is called "K. of Ay." In York M. P. xvii. 16, the 2nd K. of the three who come from the East says he has come "Out of my realm, rich Arabie." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 4, Tamburlaine sets the bounds of his Empire thus: "The Euxine Sea, N. to Natolia; The Terrene, W.; the Caspian, N.N.E.; And on the S., Sinus Arabicus."

In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, we read of troops from "A. Desert." In Massinger's Virgin iv. 3, Dorothea says, "The Power I serve Laughs at your Happy Ay." In his Great Duke ii. 3, Sanazzaro speaks of "those smooth gales that glide O'er Happy Ay, or rich Sabæa." In Mariam i. 4, Salome says, "Oh, blest A. in best climate placed!" Milton, P. L. iv. 163, speaks of "Sabæan odours . . . from Ay, the Blest." The Abs. were believed to be good archers; but they were credited with a savage disposition, and, like the modern bedouin, were reputed thieves. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 2, Cassius enumerates amongst his allies "The warlike Mede and the An. Boe"—where "Boe" is meant for "Bow," i.e. archer. In Kirke's Champions iii., Ormandine speaks of the "cruel Tartar and An. Ks." Ithamar, the villain of Marlowe's Jew (ii. 3), was "born in Thrace; brought up in A.," i.e. was savage both by birth and education. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 227, the Londoner says that at Pont Neuf, in Paris, "robbery is as constant a trade as amongst the Abs." Heylyn (s.v. A.) says, "The people hereof are greatly addicted to theft, which is the better part of their maintenance." A. seems to the Elizabethans a vast and desolate region. In Cor. iv. 2, 24, Volunnia wishes that "my son Were in A., and thy tribe before him, His sword in his hand"; i.e. that he could fight Scincius and his tribe single-handed without fear of interruption. In Merch. ii. 7, 42, Morocco says, "The vasty wilds Of wide A. are as thoroughfares now For princes to come view fair Portia." Milton, P. R. iii. 274, says, "To S. the Persian bay And, inaccessible, the An. drouth."

A. was, par excellence, the land of spices. In Mac. v. 1, 57, Lady Macbeth cries: "All the perfumes of A. will not sweeten this little hand." In Oth. v. 2, 350, Othello speaks of eyes dropping tears "as fast as the An. trees Their medicinal gum." In Dekker's Fortunatus v. 1, Anelocia, pretending to be a physician, says, "I must buy many costly things dat grow in A., in Asia, and America" for the making of his medicine. In Tiberius 2248, Agrippina, hearing that Germanicus is poisoned, says, "Mine eyes shall drizzle down An. myrrh To garnish all Armenian infections." In B. & F. Philaster iii. 1, Arethusa's breath is described as being "Sweet as An. winds when fruits are ripe." In Davenant's Italian iv. 4, Sciolto says, "I'll be as calm as are An. winds." In Lyly's Sapho prol., he says, "The Ans., being stuffed with perfumes, burn hemlock, a rank poison." In his Gallathea v. 2, Hæbe says, "Whoso cutteth the incense-tree in A. before it fall, committeth sacrilege." In Marmion's Leaguer v. 1, Philautus says, "Let happiness Distil from you as the An. gums." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xviii., Magnificence says, "There is no balm, no gum of Arabe More delectable than your language to me." In Tiberius 150, Asinius speaks of "the An. spices." Greene, in Mourn. Gar. 9, speaks of "The Arabick tree that yields no gum but in the dark night." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier ii. 3, Bellizarius says, "Indian Aramaticks nor An. gums Were nothing scented unto this sweet bower." In Dist. Emp. iv. 3, Richd. says, "The ravens which in A. live Having flown all the field of spices o'er Seize on a stinking carcass." In Milkmaids v. 1, Ranoff compares his lady's breasts to "lemons of A. which make the vessel so sweet it can never smell of the cask." Milton, P. R. ii. 364, says, "Winds Of gentlest gale An. odours fanned From their soft wings." Barnes, in Parthenophil (1593), Ode xvii., speaks of "rich An. odours."

A. is the abode of the Phoenix; the belief being that there was only one phoenix at a time, which lived in A. for 500 or 600 years, and then cremated itself on a pyre of spices from which a young phoenix arose. It is "the bird of loudest lay On the sole An. tree" in Phoenix 2. In A. & C. iii. 2, 12, Agrippa ironically exclaims, "O Antony! O thou An. bird!" In Temp. iii. 2, 22, Sebastian, after seeing Prospero's spirits, professes that he "will believe . . . that in A. There is one tree, the phoenix throne, one phoenix At this hour reigning there." In Cym. i. 6, 17, Iachimo, at first sight of Imogen, declares, "She is alone the An. bird." In Dekker's Fortunatus ii. 2, Anelocia says, "He that would not be an An. Phoenix to burn in these sweet fires, let him live like an owl for the world to wonder at." In Ford's Trial ii. 1, Guzman declares that his lady "Shall taste no delicacies but what are dressed With costlier spices than the An. bird Sweetens her funeral bed with." In Histrion iii. 1, Pride bids her attendants "Fetch me the feathers of th' An. bird!" In Lyly's Endymion iii. 4, Eumenides complains, "Friends to be found are like the An. phoenix, But one." In Selinus 2010, we read: "Thus after he hath 5 long ages lived, The sacred Phoenix of A. Loadeth his wings with precious perfumes And on the altar of the golden Sun Offers himself a grateful sacrifice." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii., Isabel says, "He's perhaps travelled to A. Felix and from thence to bring the Phoenix hither." In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas proposes to send "to A. for phoenixes." An An. woodcock is one of the birds exhibited by Bonamico in Shirley's Bird iv. 1. In Tiberius 100, Tiberius says, "One only Phoenix in A. Presents a sacrifice to heaven's eye." In Milton's S. A. 1700, the Chorus speaks of "that self-begotten bird In the An. woods embost That no second knows nor third, And lay erewhile a holocaust. . . . And though her body die, her fame survives A secular bird, ages of lives."

A. was believed to be rich in gold and gems (see Psalm lxxii. 15); though it really had no mineral wealth. Those precious things, however, came thence in the course of trade. Barabas, in Marlowe's Jew i. 1, says, "Well fare the Ans. who so richly pay The things they traffic for with wedge of gold." In Calisto 231, Calisto speaks of Melibœa's hair as "far shining beyond fine gold of Ay." Barnes, in Parthenophil (1593), xlviii. 1, says, "I wish no rich refined An. gold." Silks were also brought from the East by way of A. In the old Shrew, Haz. p. 532, Philotus promises to fraught the ships of Alfonso "with An. silks."

The wild asses of the An. deserts were proverbial for recklessness and folly. In the old Timon i. 4, the arms of Gelasimus are described as bearing "3 gilded thistles"; and "3 fat asses Drawn out the deserts of A."

The great physicians of the Middle Ages were mostly Ans., belonging to the Moorish kingdoms in Spain. See the list of physicians in Chaucer, C. T. A. 429. In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "The An. physical." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 125, Selinthus alleges, as authorities on a point of physiology,

"Averroes and Avicen, With Abenhuacar, Baruch, and Abolhafi, And all the Arabic writers." In Jonson's Tub iv. 1, Scriben says, "One Rasis was a great Arabic doctor." The Arabic language was only known to a very few scholars. In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, when Brisac scornfully calls his son's manuscript "pot-hooks and and-irons," he replies: "I much pity you; it is the Syrian character or the Arabic." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood, affecting to be a scholar, says to Grace, "I'll Court you in the Chaldean or Arabick tongues." The pillar raised by Tamburlaine (B. iii. 21) in memory of Zenocrate has an inscription in "An., Hebrew, Greek." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Worm says that Cutter writes "in such vile characters that most men take 'em for An. pot-hooks."

The opening of Com. Cond. is laid in A. It is also the scene of Chapman's Rev. Hon., where A. stands for the whole Turkish Empire; it is altogether unhistorical.

ARACHOSIA. A province of E. Persia, lying immediately W. of the Indus, and corresponding roughly to the modern Afghanistan. Milton, P. R. iii. 316, mentions A. as the first of the Eastern provinces, the hosts of which are shown to our Lord by Satan.

ARAGON. See ARRAGON.

ARAIN. See ARRAN.

ARANIS (a misprint for ARARIS). See under ARAR.

ARAR. The ancient name of the r. Saone in France. It rises in the Vosges, and has a S. course of abt. 300 m. till it joins the Rhône at Lyons. It was the boundary between the Sequani on the E. and the Ædui on the W. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts, "A. and proud Sarmata speaks my praise." In Lyly's Endymion ii. 1, Endymion says, "That fish (thy fish, Cynthia, in the flood Araris) which at thy waxing is as white as the driven snow, and at thy waning as black as deepest darkness." It is misprinted Aranis in Fairholt's edition, but that Araris is right is shown by a passage in Euphues Anat. Wit 74, "The fish Scolopidus in the flood Araris at the waxing of the moon is as white as the driven snow, and at the waning as black as the burnt coal." The original of this idea is found in the pseudo-Plutarchian De Fluvii vi.

ARARIS. A r. mentioned in Marlowe, Tamb. A. ii. 1, as the rendezvous of the forces of Tamburlaine and Cosroes in the war with the Parthian K.; later, in ii. 3, Tamburlaine says, "The host of Xerxes . . . is said to have drank the mighty Parthian A." Either, therefore, we must suppose that Marlowe has simply coined the name; or that in each case we should read Araxis, which, though not in Parthia, is perhaps sufficiently near it for poetic purposes. The chief objection to the latter supposition is the accent, which, in both cases, falls on the 1st syllable. Marlowe is capable of dealing freely with the accents on foreign names ("Oh! Pythagóras' Metempsychosis"—towards the end of Faustus). But in this case the accentuation seems very unnatural. The former supposition seems therefore the more probable.

The r. said by Herodotus to have been drunk dry by Xerxes' army is neither Araris nor Araxes, but the Lisus, in Thrace.

ARAXES. A r. flowing E. through Armenia into the Caspian Sea. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, speaks of "Ooraxes, feared for great Cyrus fate." Cyrus crossed the Araxes before his fatal encounter with Q. Thomyris. Milton, P. R. iii. 271, speaks of "A. and the Caspian Lake" as the bounds of the empire of Assyria. In Strode's Float. Isl. iv. 9, Irato says, "Stop A. floods, Then mayst thou stop my wrath." Virgil, Æn. viii. 728, calls it "pontem indignatus A."

ARAYS. I cannot find this place. Is it a misprint for "Araby"? In Lyly's Endymion iii. 4, Eumenides speaks of birds called Philadelphí "in A.," of which "never above 2" coexist—a sort of embroidery on the phœnix legend.

ARBILA (or ARBELA, now ARBIL). City of Adiabene in Assyria, between the Greater and the Lesser Zab, abt. 50 m. S.E. of Nineveh. The last battle between Alexander the Gt. and Darius is often called the battle of Arbela, though it was actually fought at Gaugamela, some 20 m. N.W. In Bacchus the 12th guest was "Gilbert Goodfellow, from A., an Assyrian; this Gilbert was a butcher."

In the argument to the Tragedy of Darius, Sir W. Alexander writes: "He [Darius] fought beside Arbella, with no better fortune than before."

ARCADIA (Ay. = Arcady, An. = Arcadian). A dist. of ancient Greece, in the centre of the Peloponnesus. Isolated from the seacoast and from its neighbours by its rugged mtns., it became proverbial amongst the Greek and Latin poets for its rusticity and simplicity. Sannazaro and Sir Philip Sidney idealized it into a land of pure pastoral happiness unaffected by the vices of civilization; and in the Elizabethan dramatists it has this connotation. Thus, in Ret. Pernass. v. 2, Studioso proclaims, "Not any life to me can sweeter be Than happy swaines in plaine of Ay." In Day's Gulls, Basilus has "unclothed us of our princely government in A." in order to retire to the desert island which is the scene of the play (i. 1). In Marmion's Antiquary iii. 2, the D. describes a circle of literary ladies "where every waiting-woman speaks perfect A.," i.e. talks in the style of Sidney's novel. The scene of Jonson's Pan is laid in A., and the masque consists of a contest between "the best and bravest spirits of A." and a company of Bœotians, representing respectively the poets and the Philistines, at the conclusion of which the latter are bidden to "carry their stupidity into Bœotia whence they brought it. . . . This is too pure an air for so gross brains." Daniel's Queen's Arcadia is supposed to take place in that romantic country. Shirley also wrote a dramatized version of Sidney's novel, called The Arcadia. The scenes of Milton's Arcades, Lyly's Love's Meta., Glapthorne's Argalus, and Rutter's Shepherd Hol. are laid in A.

An. is used also in the sense of rustic, boorish. In the old play of Timon i. 2, Eutrapelus calls Abyssus "Thou log, thou stock, thou An. beast." And in ii. 5, Laches says of Gelasimus: "There's not an ass in all A. so very an ass as thou." In v. 3, Pædio says to Gelasimus, "I took you for an Athenian; I see now thou art become an An."

In Davenant's Italian iv. 4, Altamont says, "The An. wrestler Told young Theseus so; but he did yield As if his sinews had been made of silk." The reference is to Cercyon of Eleusis, who compelled all passers-by to wrestle with him, and was overcome and slain by Theseus. In Lyly's Maid's Meta. i., Atalanta is called "the An. dame [who] came to hunt the boar of Calydon." There were 2 versions of the Atalanta story. One calls her an An., and connects her with the hunting of the boar; the other calls her a Bœotian, and makes the centre of interest her race with Melanion, who won her hand by dropping the golden apples. One of the characters in Chapman's Blind Beggar is an imaginary Doricles, Prince of A. In Lyly's Midas iv. 1, Pan says, "My temple is in A." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iii., Jupiter says to Archas, "Let that clime henceforth Be called A. and usurp thy name." Archas was the son of Jupiter by Calisto, and was made K. of Pelasgia, the name being changed to A.

In T. Heywood's Mistress i., Admetus says, "Change your An. notes to Lidian sounds; Sad notes are sweetest"; where An. notes means cheerful, rustic music. In Hercules iv. 2, 2013, Amphitruo says, "'Tis even here I fear me as it was in Arcadie where men were changed into beasts and never returned to their former shape again." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 662, Orlando says, "Lend me your complaints, you sweet An. nymphs, That want to wail your new departed loves." Linche, in Diella (1596) iii. 4, speaks of "The pure soft wool An. sheep do bear." In Tiberius 3228, Macro says, "Diana's gift to Cephalus Yearned to outrun the beast of Archadie." The author is confusing the stories of Atalanta and Cephalus; the scene of the latter was Boeotia, not A. The refrain of a song in Milton's Arcades 95, runs: "Such a rural q. All A. hath not seen." Milton, P. L. xi. 132, describes the Cherubim as "more wakeful than to drowse Charmed with An. pipe." The reference is to the story of Hermes charming Argus to sleep with his music. In Arcades 28, the Genius says to the swains, "Of famous Ay. ye are." In Comus 341, the Elder Brother says, "Thou shalt be our Star of Ay. Or Tyrian Cynosure." The Star of Ay. is the Gt. Bear; the legend was that Calisto, the daughter of the An. K. Lycaon, was changed into this constellation. In Mason's Mulleasses 2315, Mulleasses speaks of "the sun, backed on the An. beast," singeing the gardens of Adonis. Probably he means the sun when in the constellation Leo; which was supposed to be the Nemean lion slain by Herakles. Nemea was not actually in A., but was not far from its N.E. boundary.

ARCEDAN (an obvious misprint for ARCEVAL, the old spelling for the ARSENAL, q.v., at Venice). Here was kept, until its destruction in 1824, the Bucentoro, the barge on which the Doges annually performed the ceremony of Wedding the Adriatic on Ascension Day. In K. K. Hon. Man D. 3, Sempronio says, "This is the festival of Holy Mark; This day our Lords of Venice wonted be To sacrifice in triumph to the sea, And march in pomp unto the A." St. Mark's Day is April 25, and could never coincide with Ascension Day.

ARCHADIE. See ARCADIA.

ARCHAIA. See ACHAIA.

ARCHANIANS. In Cyrus B. 1, Cyrus says to Gobrias, "Be thou lieut. of the A." I cannot identify these people. May it be a mistake for Achæmenians? Achæmenia was the name of a Persian tribe; and Achæmenas was the ancestor of the Persian kings.

ARCHELAIS. A city in Cappadocia, on the Halys, abt. 100 m. N.W. of Tarsus. In Bacchus the 9th guest was "a jolly gentleman, named Mrs. Merigodown. She came from A., a city in Cappadocia." I imagine the name was chosen because of its containing Lais, the name of the famous Corinthian courtesan.

ARCHES (more fully the COURT of A.). The Ecclesiastical Court of Appeal for the province of Canterbury. It was so called because it sat in the Ch. of St. Mary de Arcubus (St. Mary of the A.) in Cheapside, q.v. It took cognizance of all matters coming under Ecclesiastical Law, such as marriage and divorce, wills, abuses in the Ch., etc. The judge was called the Dean of A. In B. & F. Pestle iv. 1, the worthy citizen has a trick in his head shall lodge Jasper "in the A. for one year"; where evidently the prison of the Court is meant. In their Scornful iv. 2, when the Widow tries to persuade young Loveless to behave decently and cast off his riotous companions, the Capt. cries: "Let him be civil And eat i' th' A., and see what will come on 't!" "To eat in the A." may mean to "eat his terms in the Court of A."; i.e. to practise Canon Law. The Canon Law was built upon the Civil (Roman) Law; the professors of the one were often, perhaps commonly, professors also of the other; and for these and other historical reasons the 2 things came to be confounded in popular speech: as here, where (a few lines lower) "Civilian" is plainly used for "Canonist." Throughout the passage the changes are rung upon various meanings of Civil; i.e. Civilian, Canonist, and the ordinary meaning, decent. In Jonson's Barthol. Induction, we are informed that "Master Littlewit, the Proctor, plays one of the A., that dwells abt. the Hospital." Here, again, is a pun: Littlewit was a proctor of the Court of A., and he is going to Bartholomew Fair, near which was the Hospital of St. Bartholomew with its cloisters of a. In Oldcastle i. 2, the Bp. of Rochester urges the k. "to summon Sir John unto the A., where such offences have their punishment"; his offence being heresy. In Brome's Couple i. 1, Saleware, threatening to compel Careless to marry his kinswoman, says, "There is Law to be found for money, and friends to be found in the A." In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, 114, George says, "We have a most lamentable house at home; nothing to be heard in't but separation and divorces, and such a noise of the spiritual court, as if it were a tenement upon Lond. Bdge. and built upon the A."; i.e. the noisy arches of Lond. Bdge. and the Court of A., where divorces were tried. Latimer, in Serm. to Convocation ii. (1536), after commenting on the abuses in the Ch., asks indignantly, "What is done in the A. ? Nothing to be amended ?"

ARCHIPELAGO. A sea studded with islands; most often used of the Ægean Sea, but also applied to other seas with groups of islands. It is used of the Malay group by Parmentier (1529), and Hakluyt; and this seems to be the meaning in Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, where Orcanes says, "From Amazonia under Capricorn And thence as far as A. All Afric is in arms with Tamburlaine."

ARCTIC POLE (often spelt ARTIC). The N. P., both of the earth and of the sky. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Dr. Artless says, "The loadstone causes the needle of the ship-guiding compass to respect the cold pole Artick." In Davenant's Albovine i. 1, the Governor compares Albovine's breath to "a rough blast that posts From the cold A. P." In Brewer's Lingua iv. 8, Lingua says, "My enchanting tongue can in a moment fall From the P. A. to dark Acheron." In Brome's Lovesick Ct. iv. 3, Disanius says, "You may as soon believe The Artic and Antartic poles can meet In opposition amidst the firmament"; where the N. and S. Poles of the sky are meant. Milton, P. L. ii. 710, compares Satan to a comet "That fires the length of Ophiuchus huge In the a. sky." Ophiuchus is a constellation in the N. sky. Barnes, in Parthenophil (1593) xciii. 3, says of Love, "For alms he 'mongst cold A. folk doth wait." One of the questions propounded by Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, is "Whether the sea be open and navigable by the P. artick." Heylyn, Intro., says, "The Artick circle . . . passeth through Norway, Muscovy, Tartary," etc. See also under ANTARCTIC.

ARDE. See ANDREN.

ARDEA. An ancient town of Latium, 24 m. S. of Rome and 4 from the sea. It still retains its old name. It was at the siege of Ardea by Tarquinius Superbus that the events took place which led to the expulsion of the ks. from Rome. In Lucr., arg. 4, we are told, "Lucius Tarquinius went to besiege A." The poem opens: "From the besieged A. all in post . . . Lust-breathed Tarquin leaves the Roman host." In 1332 it is said of Lucrece, "Her letter now is sealed and on it writ At A. to my lord with more than haste." In T. Heywood's Lucrece, ii. 2 and 4, and iv. 6 are laid at A.

ARDEN (FOREST OF). The scene of the greater part of As, viz. ii. 1, 4-7; iii. 2-5; iv. and v. It is a forest in Belgium and France, between the Sambre and the Moselle, and covers abt. 1,000,000 acres, of which 383,000 are still uncultivated. Heylyn (s.v. FRANCE) says, "Here is the forest of Ardenia, once 500 m. compass; now scarce 90 m. round; of which so many fabulous stories are told." Shakespeare took the name from Lodge's Rosalind; and though his forest contains lions and palm-trees and serpents, the scenery is that of an English woodland. It is to be noted that there is a forest of A. N. of Stratford, in Warwickshire. Camden says, "Warwickshire is divided into 2 parts, the Feldon and Woodland (or A.); that is, into a plain champaign and a woody country; which parts the Avon, running crookedly from N.E. to S.W., doth, after a sort, sever one from the other." The name was doubly familiar to Shakespeare, because his mother was Mary A., and belonged to a family whose home was in the A. dist. In As i. 1, 121, Charles tells Oliver that the old D. "is already in the forest of A."; in i. 3, 109, Celia resolves "to seek my uncle in the forest of A."; in ii. 4, 14, Rosalind sighs, "Well, this is the Forest of A."; to which Touchstone punningly responds: "Ay, now am I in A. [quasi a den!] the more fool I." In the masque in Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, the nymphs are "part of the scattered train of friendless virtue living in the woods of shady A.," and Cupid advises those who can live "with little sufficed" to "leave the Court and live with them in A." The reference to As is unmistakable. In his Bussy i. 2, there is a comparison drawn from an oak which the speaker has seen in A.; and in his Rev. Bussy iii. 1, Charlotte says, "which of the desperate ruffians, Outlaws in A., durst have tempted thus One of our blood and name?" In a passage in Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 589, Orlando says of Angelica, "No name of hers, unless Zephyrus blow Her dignities amongst Ardenia woods." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 2, 102, Cinthia, leading in the Masquers, says, "The groves of Calidon and A. woods Of untamed monsters, wild and savage herds, We and our knights have freed." Spenser, in Astrophel 96, calls it "famous Ardeyn." In F. Q. iv. 3, 45, he refers to "that same water of Ardenne The which Rinaldo drunk in happy hour." The famous Spa was on the edge of the Forest of A., and gave rise to the legend of the magic fountain made by Merlin for Sir Tristram, by which Love was turned to Aversion. There was another fountain which had the opposite effect; both are mentioned in Ariosto, Orl. Fur. i. 78. Rinaldo drank of the 1st one only.

Drayton, in Polyolb. xiii. 13-234, sings the praises of the Warwickshire A., "Her one hand touching Trent, the other Severn's side." For this see under ANKOR.

ARDRES. A variant of Andren, q.v. In Webster's Weakest iii. 5, Lodowick says, "The sexton's place of A. I now profess." He has just told Ferdinand, "Part of the base country of France it is; the vill. name is A. in Picardy." In Nash's Wilton, Jack concludes his adventures "at the K. of England's camp 'twixt A. and Guines in France."

AREOPAGUS (Aæ. -- Areopagitæ). The famous court in Athens that took cognizance of matters of religion and morals. It sat upon the Hill of Ares, or Mars, W. of the Acropolis. Tradition carried back its origin into immemorial antiquity: in the Eumenides of Æschylus, Orestes appears before it to answer for the murder of his mother, Clytemnestra. The judges were called Aæ., and were credited with supreme gravity and wisdom. In Ford's Heart i. 1, Croton says to Orgilus, "Wilt thou become an Ae. And judge in cases touching the commonwealth?" Massinger, in Old Law i. 1, accepts the opinion often entertained in antiquity that Solon was the founder of "his honourable senate of Aæ.," though tradition points to its existence at a much earlier period. In the old Timon i. 3, Prædlo tells Gelasimus that he is "as grave as a severe Ae. with his contracted eyebrows." In v. 5, Demeeas reads "the decree that I have written concerning thee before the Aæes." In T. Heywood's Dialogues ii. 934, Mary says, "The Aæ. grammar-skilled In this cannot evince us."

ARETHUSA. A spring in the island of Ortygia, close to Syracuse, on the E. coast of Sicily. It took its name from the Nereid A., to whom it was dedicated. In Webster's Thracian i. 2, Palæmon says of Serena, "See where she comes, like to Diana going To sport by A.'s fount." The god of the r. Alpheus, in Arcadia, was said to have pursued the nymph A. under the sea and mingled his waters with her spring. In Milton's Arcades 31, the Genius sings of "Divine Alpheus who by secret sluice Stole under seas to meet his Arethuse." In T. Heywood's S. Age iii. A. says, "My streams issue forth From Tartary [i.e. Tartarus] by the Tenarian isles; My head's in Hell where Stygian Pluto reigns." The reference is to the source of the fountain in Peloponnesus, before its supposed disappearance under the sea to rise again in Syracuse. Milton, in Lycidas 85, apostrophizes, "O fountain Arethuse, and thou honoured flood, Smooth-sliding Mincius"; A. being regarded as the Muse of the Pastoral Poetry, which originated in Sicily.

AREZZO. A city of Tuscany, on the rd. between Florence and Rome, and abt. 120 m. N.W. of the latter. For a long time it held its own against the growing power of Florence, but had finally to submit to its brilliant neighbour. The birthplace of Guido the musician, Petrarch the poet, and many other distinguished men. It is one of 12 Italian cities which Trapdoor, in Middleton's R. G. v. 1, professes to have "ambled over."

ARGENTINE. The Latinized form of the name given by the Spaniards to the r. and dist. around its mouth, discovered by Juan de Solis in 1512. It was wrongly supposed to be rich in silver, and so was christened Río de la Plata; i.e. Silver R. The r. debouches into the Atlantic on the E. coast of S. America, S. of Uruguay. Buenos Aires was founded at the head of the estuary in 1534, when a fort was built there by De Mendoza; but the city itself dates from 1580. Nash, in Lenten, says that the herring "made Yarmouth for argent to put down the city of A."

ARGIAN (ARGIVE). Used for the whole body of the Greeks who besieged Troy. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Dolo-bella says, "Hector from the Grecian camp With spoils of slaughtered As. returned."

ARGIER (the old form of ALGIERS). Heylyn, Microcosmos. 708, gives the name of the country as "Algirs, Algeirs, or Tesesine"; but the name of the capital town as "As., a town not so large as strong, and not so strong as famous," its fame being due (1) to its being the headquarters of the Moor pirates; (2) for the shipwreck of the fleet of Charles V in the harbour. In Purchas his Pilgrimage (ed. 1614), it is called Algier; but in the later edition of 1625 the form A. occurs. It lies on the N. coast of Africa, between Tunis on the E. and Morocco on the W.

Sycorax was born in A., and "For mischiefs manifold and sorceries terrible . . . from A. . . was banished" (Temp. i. 2, 261, 265). This fact, and the circumstance that the k. was wrecked on the magic island on his way from Tunis to Naples, shows that Shakespeare conceived of the scene of the play as somewhere in the Mediterranean.

In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, is described the capture of A. from Bajazeth, and Tamburlaine declares it to be his intention to liberate the Christian captives—the "captive pioneers of A.," who are set by Bajazeth to cut off the water to Constantinople which he is besieging—"I will first subdue the Turk," he says (iii. 3), "and then enlarge Those Christian captives which you keep as slaves. . . . That naked row abt. the Terrene sea . . . And strive for life at every stroke they give. These are the cruel pirates of A., That damned train the scum of Africa." Massinger, in The Guardian v. 4, speaks of the "pirates of Tunis and As.," and in Unnat. Com. i. 1, of "the pirates of As. and Tunis." In Vox Borealis (1641), the Bishops are called "hellish pirates worse than Tunnes and Algeir." In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, Eumena has redeemed a number of slaves "from the galleys of Algiers." In Alimony iii. 3, there is an old sea-balled beginning, "To Tunis and to As., boys, Great is our want, small be our joys: Let's then some voyage take in hand To get us means by sea or land." In Peele's Alcazar i., the Moor's son says, "Rubin near to A. encountered Abdilmelec." Milton, P. L. xi. 404, enumerates, "The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez and Sus, Morocco and Algiers, and Tremisen," in N. Africa. Cowley, Cutter prol., says, "The Midland Sea is nowhere clear From dreadful fleets of Tunis and A.," and later he addresses the critics as "Gentlemen critics of A."

ARGOB. A dist. in Bashan, possibly the modern El-Leja, lying some 40 m. E. of the N. end of the Sea of Galilee. Milton, P. L. i. 398, says of Moloch: "Him the Ammonite Worshipped. . . . In A. and in Basan." It really belonged rather to the Amorites than the Ammonites.

ARGOLETS. Mentioned amongst "the brave resolved Turks and valiant Moors" in the army of Abdelmelec, in Stucley 2471—"Approved Alarkes, puissant A." Peele's Alcazar throws some light on this obscure word. In i. 2 the Moor orders Pisanio to "take a cornet of our horse, As many a. and armed pikes"; and in iv. 1, we read of "4000 a. and 10,000 horse." In Spon's Hist. of Geneva (1687), argoulets are defined as light horsemen; and they were probably in the first instance bowmen on horseback. It looks as if the author of Stucley had mistaken the word for a national name. The meaning is made clear by a passage in Orders meet to be observed in Foreign Invasion (1642): "Whereas you have great numbers of hackneys or hobblers, I could wish that upon them you mount as many of the highest and nimblest shot as you can; the which arguliteers shall stand you in as great stead as horse of better account."

ARGOS. One of the most ancient cities of Greece, situated abt. 3 m. from the sea in the plain of Argolis in the N.E. of the Peloponesus. Here Agamemnon reigned, who was recognized as the leading chief of the Greeks in the Trojan War. Its tutelary goddess was Hera (Juno), and 2 temples in her honour adorned the city. In Nero i. 3, "Junonian A." is mentioned as one of the places visited by the Emperor in his tour through Greece. In Marlowe, Tamb. A. iv. 3, the Soldan speaks of the "brave Argolian knights" who joined in the hunting of the Calydonian boar. Amphiarus was the chief representative of A. on that occasion. In Ford's Heart, Nearchus, "Prince of A.," becomes K. of Sparta by the dying bequest of the heroine Calantha. Of course, the story is imaginary, and impossible in any period of Greek history. Similarly, in Barclay's Lost Lady i. 1, we are told of a war between Thessaly and Sparta in which "The D. of A. did command the Spartan." In Andromana we have a war between the Iberians and the Argives, in which "the Argives, 50,000 strong, Have, like a whirlwind, borne down all before them" (ii. 1). This is all pure fiction. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5394, Juno says, "A. bred a golden Danae." Danae was the daughter of Acrisius, K. of A. The story of Jove's love for her is told in his Gold. Age, where Acrisius is called "the brave Arges K." In B. & F. Corinth, Agenor, Prince of A., has been at war with Corinth and is a suitor for the hand of Merione. The whole story is imaginary. In Wilson's Cobler 1269, the Argives and Thessalians are said to have made an attack on Boeotia; this is again unhistorical.

ARGYLE, OR ARGULE. A county on the S.W. coast of Scotland. For some 5 cents. it was under Norwegian control; but it was conquered by the K. of Scotland in the 14th cent. It was then held as an almost independent kingdom by the Macdonalds; but their constant rebellions caused it to be transferred to the Campbells abt. 1457; and the dukedom still continues in that clan. Archibald, 5th earl, appears in Sampson's Vow as one of the leading supporters of the Scots against the English in 1560. He is called Arguile.

ARIADAN. Probably Er-Riad, the capital of the province of Ared, in Central Arabia, is intended. It lies due E. of Mecca, abt. 420 m. away. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, Callapine invests Almeda, "K. of A., Bordering on Mare Roso near to Mecca."

ARIMASPIANS. A legendary race of Scythians, described by Herodotus as a one-eyed tribe in N. Europe who purloined gold from the griffins who guarded it. Pliny repeats the story and locates them near the Scythians, "toward the pole arcticke." They probably lived near the gold-mines of the Ural Mtns., whence the legend took its rise. Milton, P. L. ii. 945, speaks of Satan flying "As when a gryphon through the wilderness . . . pursues the Arimaspians, who by stealth Had from his wakeful custody purloined The guarded gold."

ARMAGNAC. A dist. in Gascony, in S. France, giving their title to the Counts of A. Under Count Bernard VII the name As. came to be used of the party of the house of Orleans in opposition to the Burgundians. John IV is the Earl of A. mentioned in H6 A. v. 1, 2, 17. Gloucester says, "The Earl of A. near knit to Charles, A man of great authority in France, Proffers his only daughter to your grace In marriage." In H6 A. v. 5, 44, Suffolk urges the marriage of the K. to Margaret, daughter of René of Anjou, on the ground that "His alliance will confirm our peace And keep the Frenchmen in allegiance"; to which Gloucester replies: "And so the Earl of A. may do, Because he is near kinsman unto Charles." Suffolk succeeded, and the k. married Margaret 1445.

ARMENIA (An. = Armenian). A country in Western Asia, extending from the Caucasus to the mountains of Kurdistan, and from the Caspian Sea to the E. boundary of Asia Minor. It was divided by the Euphrates into Greater A. to the E. of the r. and Lesser A. to the W. A. came under the dominion of Alexander the Gt. when he conquered the Persians, and after a short period of revolt submitted to the Seleucid ks. of Syria in 284 B.C. In 190 B.C. it became independent under Artaxias, and a succession of ks. followed, the most famous being Tigranes II. He submitted to Pompeius in 66 B.C., but his son Artavasdes rebelled against Rome and was taken prisoner by Antonius and beheaded in Alexandria 30 B.C. In A.D. 18 Germanicus was sent to settle the affairs of A. and the East, and crowned Zeno k. in place of the deposed Vonones, but died near Antioch the next year, poisoned, as was suspected, by Piso. The whole story is told in Tiberius. During the 2nd cent. the country was Christianized, and has remained Christian in spite of successive persecutions by the Persians and Turks up to the present day. Tamburlaine conquered the country at the end of the 14th cent., but it was subsequently recovered by the Persians. It is now divided between Russia, Turkey, and Persia. Heylyn, s.v., says of the modern Ans., "They are generally good archers, merry, careless of honour, desiring ease, great bodied, comely, and willing to be soothed. The women tall but homely, kind to their children, poor, and incontinent."

Historical allusions. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron refers to Pompey, who "Reduced into th' imperial power of Rome A., Pontus, and Arabia." In A. & C. iii. 6, 13, Octavius says of Antony, "Great Media, Parthia, and A. He gave to Alexander"; i.e. his son by Cleopatra. Later, in line 33, Octavius says, "For what I have conquered I grant him [Antony] part; but in his A. . . I demand the like." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 4, Cæsar says, "I'll fill An. plains and Medians hills With carcases of bastard Scythian brood." In Mariam v. 1, Herod, referring to his campaign against the K. of Arabia in 34 B.C., says, "No Arabian host nor no An. guide hath used me so." The scene of Act I of B. & F. King is laid in A. in the reign of Tigranes II, abt. the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. In Tiberius 859, Tiberius says, "Let A. feel the force of Rome." Germanicus is sent there, and his exploits and death are described in later scenes of the play. In May's Agrippina iv. 688, the ambassadors announce, "The princes of A., Vologeses And Tiridates, greet your majesty By us." Tacitus mentions this embassy to Nero. In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Amurack orders Bajazet to "post away apace To Asia, A., and all other lands Which owe their homage to high Amurack." This is Amurath I, who died A.D. 1389. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Cosroe (Chosroes) is described as "Great Lord of Media and A."; he at first enters into alliance with Tamburlaine, but subsequently revolts and is slain.

In Gen. viii. 4, it is said that after the Flood the ark rested on the mtns. of Ararat, the highest peak of the mtn. range in A. It became a place of pilgrimage in the Middle Ages. Maundeville says, "There is a hill that men clepen Ararathe where Noe's ship rested . . . and men may see it afar in clear weather; and that mtn. is well a 7 m. high." The Palmer, in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, had visited "the hills of Armeny where I saw Noe's ark." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, the Capt. speaks of "Signior Ricardo Digones, one of the ancient house of the An. ambassadors." I cannot find any record of these An. ambassadors; but suspect a pun is intended on Arminian, and the whole passage is a hit at the Dutch Arminians, whose opinions had been largely accepted in England. The same confusion occurs in Jonson's Magnetic i. 1. Mrs. Polish says that Placentia, the Puritan, can "find out the Ans." Rut corrects her, "The Arminians," but she stands to it, and says, "The Ans. are worse than Papists."

The fauna of A. was but vaguely known. In Selimus 1135, Belierbey says, "Like an An. tiger that hath lost Her loved whelps, so raveth Acomat." Montsurry, in Chapman's Bussy iv. 1, declares of Bussy d'Ambois, "Such another spirit Could not be 'stilled from all the An. dragons." Parrot suggests that Chapman was thinking of the gold-guarding griffins of Scythia mentioned in Herodotus iv. 27. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iii. 4, the Physician exhibits "a Magisterial made of the horn A. so much boasts of"; that is, the unicorn's horn, supposed to be a specific against poison.

ARMORICA. The Latin name for Brittany, on the W. coast of France. The name is derived from the Celtic Ar, upon, and Mor, the sea. Milton, P. L. i. 581, describes K. Arthur as "Uther's son Begirt with British and Armoric knights." Brittany, or Lyones, is closely connected with the Arthurian legend.

ARNAM. See ARNHEIM.

ARNHEIM. The old capital of Gelderland, on the Rhine, 50 m. S.E. of Amsterdam. It was one of the old Hanse towns. In Barnavelt ii. 2, Leidenberge announces, "Arnem and Roterdam have yielded him [Barnavelt] obedience."

ARNO. R. in Tuscany, rising in the Apennines, and flowing past Florence and Pisa to the Mediterranean, after a course of 155 m. In Barnes' Charter i. 1, Alexander allots to Cæsar Borgia the provinces "In Tuskany within the r. Narre And fruitful A." It was in the marshy lands about the A., near Lucca and Pisa, that Hannibal lost one of his eyes in his march through Italy in the spring of 217 B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 2, Hannibal says, "I waded with my army through the fens Of gloomy Arnus in whose fogs I lost One of my body's comfortable lights." In Day's Law Tricks i. 1, Polymetis relates how his sister was captured by Turkish pirates "In Sancta Monta, neighbour to Sardinia, Where silver A. in her crystal bosom Courts the fresh banks with many an amorous kiss."

ARNON. A r. formed by the junction of 2 streams rising in the desert of Midian, and flowing past Aroer into the Dead Sea, abt. midway down its E. coast. The natural boundary between the Ammonites to the N. and the Moabites to the S. Milton, P. L. i. 399, says of Moloch, "Him the Ammonite Worshipped. . . In Argob and in Basan to the stream Of utmost A."

AROER. A town on the Arnon, abt. 14 m. E. of the Dead Sea. It was an Amorite city, but was conquered by the Moabites in the 7th cent. B.C. Milton, P. L. i. 407, speaks of Moab as extending "From A. to Nebo"; but this was rather Amorite territory; Moab lay S. of the Arnon.

ARONDEL. See ARUNDEL.

ARPINUM. An ancient Volscian city in the valley of the Liris, some 60 m. S.W. of Rome. The birthplace of C. Marius and M. Tullius Cicero. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 2, Catiline refers contemptuously to Cicero as "a burges's son of A." In Kyd's Cornelia iii. chor., we have "Noble Marius, Arpin's friend."

ARQUES. A town of Normandy, near Dieppe, 90 m. N.E. of Paris. Scene of the great victory of Henri IV over the army of the League under Mayenne in 1589. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron boastfully says, "I will see That none but I and my renowned sire Be said to win the memorable fields Of A. and Dieppe."

ARRAGON, OR ARAGON. A province and formerly a kingdom in N. Spain, between the Pyrenees and Valencia. The Ebro divides it into 2 almost equal parts. It was part of the Roman province of Hispania Tarraconensis. In the 5th cent. it was subjugated by the Visigoths; and with the rest of Spain it fell into the hands of the Moors in 711. In the 11th cent. Sancho III recovered a large part of it; and in 1035 it became a Christian kingdom under his son Raymir. It so continued till 1516, when it was united to the crown of Spain by the marriage of its K. Ferdinand to Isabella of Castile. In B. & F. Thierry ii. 1, Thierry calls his contracted wife "Ordella, daughter of wise Datarick, The K. of A." The time is the latter part of the 6th cent.; Datarick probably means Theodoric. In Ado Don Pedro of A. is one of the personages; he comes to Messina after a successful campaign. Shakespeare took the name from Bandello's Timbreo di Cardona, in which the date of the story is given as 1283, and the Don Pedro is Pedro III, who claimed Sicily through his marriage with Constance, the daughter of the K. of Sicily, and, after a successful expedition to the island, was crowned at Palermo 1283. His visit to Messina in Much Ado is evidently just after this victory, as Scene I shows. A Prince of A. is one of Portia's suitors Merch ii. 9. He is not to be identified with any particular prince. Q. Katharine, the divorced wife of Henry VIII, is generally known as Katharine of A., though she is not so called in the play. She was the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, and aunt of the Emperor Charles V. In Middleton's Gipsy iii. 2, Alvarez, who has been banished from Spain, "lives a banished man . . . some say in A."; which was then a separate kingdom. In Mucedorus the heroine Amadine is "the kinges daughter of A," and most of the scenes are laid either in the court or forests of that country. Hycke, p. 88, has travelled in "Erragoyne" and a score other places. In Dekker's Fortunatus ii. chorus., we learn that between Acts I and II Fortunatus has been imprisoned in A. "by a covetous Earl." The scene of Shirley's Cardinal is laid in Navarre; and in i. 1, Alphonso brings word that "the Aians. are now in arms, violating their confederate oath and league." In Webster's White Devil, the election of Pope Paul IV is announced by the "Lord of A." (iv. 2). This looks like deliberate mystification; for Montalto, whose nephew married Vittoria, was not Paul IV, but Sixtus V. There can be no doubt that he is the man intended: Montecelso is an obvious synonym for Montalto. The election took place in 1585.

In Webster's Malfi we have a Ferdinand who is called the D. of Calabria, and a cardinal who is his brother. The Cardinal (ii. 5) claims "the royal blood of A. and Castile," and is styled, in iii. 4, the Cardinal of A. Ferdinand V of Spain is the only monarch who combines the blood of A., the kingship of Calabria, and the name of Ferdinand. The allusion to the battle of Pavia

(iii. 3), which took place in 1525, is inconsistent with this identification, as Ferdinand died in 1516. But the supposed date of the play is definitely stated in ii. 3 to be 1504, 12 years before Ferdinand's death. In B. & F. Double Mar. i. 1, there is "an Aian. tyrant, Farrand," who is described in the dramatis personæ as the libidinous Tyrant of Naples. The play is unhistorical, but the name Farrand seems to have been suggested by that of Ferdinand V. The hero of Greene's Alphonsus is apparently intended for Alfonso, 1st of Naples and 5th of A. (1385-1454); but there is little or nothing historical in the play. The scene of Habington's Arragon is laid in that country. Leonardo, Prince of A., is one of the characters in Shirley's Doubtful. Ford's Queen is laid in A., and the name of the k. is Alphonsus; but there is nothing historical in the story. In Dekker's Match me ii., the Lady says, "A woman's tongue is like the miraculous bell in A. which rings out without the help of man."

ARRAN. An island off the S.W. coast of Scotland, in Buteshire. The Countess of A. is one of the characters in Greene's James IV.

ARRAS. The capital of Artois Province, France, 134 m. from Paris. The great centre of tapestry weaving, it gave its name to cloth of A., which was used for the hanging of rooms and afforded a place of concealment. The executioners (K. J. iv. 1, 2), Borachio (Ado i. 3, 63), Falstaff (M. W. W. iii. 3, 97; H4 A. ii. 4, 549), and the unlucky Polonius (Ham. ii. 2, 163, and iii. 3, 28) hide themselves behind the a. lachimo notices "the a-figures why, such and such, and the contents o' the story" (Cym. ii. 2, 26) in Imogen's bed-chamber. Gremio has stored in cypress chests his a. counterpoints, or, as we should say, counterpanes (Shrew ii. 1, 353). In Marlowe's Faustus vi., Pride "will not speak another word except the ground were perfumed and covered with cloth of A." In Tamb. B. i. 2, Callapine promises his keeper, as the price of his liberty, that, amongst much else, "Cloth of A. shall be hung about the walls" when he rides in triumph through the streets. In Spenser's F. Q. iii. 1, 34, the walls of Castle Joyeous are "round about apparelled With costly cloths of A. and of Toure." Further examples of the use of a. hangings for concealment may be found in B. & F. Women Pleased ii. 6; Gentleman iii. 4; Friends iv. 4.

ARSENAL. At Venice in the E. of the city. Built between 1307 and 1320, and abt. 2 m. in circuit, it includes 4 basins surrounded by dry-docks, workshops, and armouries. In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick has a plan for forbidding the use of tinder boxes; for an ill-affected person might, with one in his pocket, "go into the A." and set it on fire. In Brome's Novello iii. 1, Piso speaks of "many good handy craftsmen in the A., bred from such mothers that ne'er could boast their fathers." See also ARCEDAN.

ARTAXATA. The ancient capital of Armenia, lying on the Araxes, abt. 250 m. W. of the Caspian Sea. Built under the superintendence of Hannibal, when he took refuge at the Court of Artaxias; destroyed by Corbulo A.D. 58; and rebuilt by Tiridates under the name of Neronia. Milton, P. R. iii. 292, mentions among the great cities of the world shown in vision to our Lord by Satan "A., Terephon, Ctesiphon."

ARTILLERY GARDEN. In Teasel Close, now A. Lane, Bishopsgate St. Without, Lond. The City Trainband, established in 1585 to resist the Spanish invasion, met here to practise; and here the Tower gunners came to do their exercises, firing their brass pieces of great artillery at earthen butts. When Stephen, in Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 3, hesitates to swear, "as I am a soldier," Wellbred reminds him that his name "is entered in the A. G.," which gives him that privilege. The dramatists are never tired of poking fun at the city soldiers, though, when the Civil War came, the Lond. Trainbands showed that they were not to be despised. Thus Fowler, in Shirley's Fair One v. 1, describes "a spruce capt. that never saw service beyond Finsbury or the A. G." In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flamíneo, mocking Vittoria and Zanche, who have shot at and failed to kill him, says, "How cunning you were to discharge! do you practise at the A.-yard?" Jonson, in Underwoods 62, pays the grounds a well-deserved compliment: "Well, I say, thrive, thrive, brave A.-yard! Thou seed-plot of the war; that hast not spared Powder or paper to bring up the youth Of Lond. in the military truth." In Shirley's Doubtful i. 1, a citizen says, "War is no A. G. where you come off with 'As you were.'" In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Water-Camlet says, "Being at the A. G., one of my neighbours with his musket set afire my breeches." In Lady Mother iii. 1, Suckett says, "Here are men that has seen service," and Bunch adds: "At a mustering or i' th' A. G." In Marmion's Leaguer iii. 4, Capritio disclaims the character of a soldier: "I'll hardly trust myself," he says, "in the a.-yard, for fear of mischief." In B. & F. Cure iii. 2, Priorato says, "I gave him then 3 sweats In the a.-yard, 3 drilling days." The scene is in Seville, but the authors are thinking of Lond.

ARTILLERY WALK. A row of houses in Lond. along a passage which led by the side of the A. Grounds, towards Bunhill Fields. Here Milton lived from 1664 to 1674, completed P. L., wrote P. R. and S. A., and died at the age of 66.

ARTOIS. A province in N. France. Its capital was Arras, q.v. It came into the possession of the House of Burgundy by the marriage of Matilda, daughter of Robert II, to Otho IV. Hence Talbot addresses the D. of Burgundy: "Redoubted Burgundy, By whose approach the regions of A., Wallon, and Picardy are friends to us" (H6 A. ii. 1. 9). In Ed. III i. 1, the K. opens the play, "Robert of Artoys, banisht though thou be From Fraunce, thy native country, yet with us Thou shalt retayne as great a Seigniorie; For we create thee Earle of Richmond heere." This Robert had been deprived of the County of A. by the sentence of Philip the Fair; and when he attempted to recover what he considered as his right he was banished and came to England, where Edward III gave him a warm welcome. He pressed upon Edward the claim that K. had to the Crown of France, on the ground of his descent from Isabel, the daughter of Philip the Fair. In Hector iii. 2, 776, the Bastard sends Mendoza and Vandome to England to consort "with the Earle of Artoys." In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron claims for himself the whole credit of the victories won for the K. in the Spanish War: "Only myself, married to Victory, Did people A. . . with her triumphant issue." He invaded and conquered A. in September 1596. In World Child, A. 6, Manhood claims to have conquered clean "Picardy and Pontoise, and gentle A." The reference is apparently to the victories of Edward III. In Trag. Richd. II 1, 1135, Lancaster tells of the victories won by the Black Prince "At Cressy field, Poyteeres, Artoyse, and Mayne." During nearly the whole of our period A. was not in France, but in the Spanish Netherlands.

ARUNDEL. A town in Sussex, 55 m. from Lond. Above the town stands the ancient castle which gives their title to the Earls of A. It dates from the time of Alfred the Gt., and belongs to the D. of Norfolk, whose eldest son now bears the title. Scene of the conspiracy of 1397 to dethrone Richd. II. The passage (R. ii. 1. 280) referring to this conspiracy is corrupt. It runs: "Harry, D. of Hereford, Rainold Lord Cobham, That late broke from the D. of Exeter, His brother, Archbp. late of Canterbury, etc." Lord Cobham never broke from the D. of Exeter, nor was he any relation to the late archbp.; but from Holinshed we learn that the man referred to is Thomas, the son of Richd., Earl of A.; Thomas, the brother of the said Richd., being the late Archbp. The insertion of the line after "Lord Cobham," "The son of Richd. Earl of A.," is absolutely necessary to the sense of the passage. Richd. was beheaded in 1397 for his complicity in the plot, the Archbp. fled to Cologne, and Thomas was placed in the custody of the D. of Exeter, from which he escaped and joined his uncle in Cologne. His titles were restored in 1400. Richd., Earl of A., is a prominent character in the Trag. Richd. II. The town house of the As. was in Botolph Lane, Billingsgate; but after the death of the Protector Somerset they bought his house in the Strand, and it became A. House. It was taken down at the end of the 17th cent., and the present A., Surrey, Howard, and Norfolk Sts. were built upon its site. The Earl of A. is one of the characters in Webster's Wyat.

ARVE. A river rising in the valley of Chamounix, close to Mt. Blanc, and flowing N.W. into the Rhone, just after it leaves Lake Geneva. Daniel, in Epist. Ded. to Cleopatra 75, claims that English poets should "To Iberus, Loyce, and A. teach That we part glory with them."

ARWENNEK. An ancient manor, coextensive with the parish of Falmouth, in S. Cornwall. It was from the time of Richd. II the seat of the Killigrew family. In Cornish M. P. i. 2592, Solomon gives to the Carpenter "An Enys hag A.," i.e. "Enys and A."

ARZIL. Seaport on W. coast of Morocco, 30 m. S. of Cape Spartel and 40 m. N. of Alcazar. In Peele's Alcazar iv. 1, 67, Abdimelec says, "Toward A. will we take our way."

ASANT (ZANTE). One of the Ionian Islands, the Zacynthus of the ancients, off the W. coast of the Peloponnese. The capital lies at the head of a good bay on the E. coast. Tamburlaine proposes that the pirate ships which he is going to capture shall "lie at anchor in the isle A.," and be joined there by a fleet from the E., to dominate the W. seas (Marlowe, Tamb. A. iii. 3). See also ZANTE.

ASCALON. A spt. town in Palestine, 40 m. S.W. of Jerusalem. Originally one of the 5 Philistine cities, it occupies a prominent place in the history of the Crusades. Now in ruins and deserted; though the name is perpetuated in the village of Scalona, N. of the old city. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Jerusalem brings troops "from Judæa, Gaza, and Scalonia's bounds" to fight against Tamburlaine. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, David says, "The plains of Gath and Askaron rejoice, And David's thoughts are spent in pensiveness." Cf. II Sam. i. 20; Askaron should be A. Later in the play (ii. 3), David says that the blood of Saul and Jonathan "Watered the dales and deeps of Askaron With bloody streams that from Gilboa ran In channels through the wilderness of Ziph." The geographical knowledge of Peele was very confused. Gilboa, the scene of Saul's death, is 80 m. from A. Milton, P. L. i. 465, describes Dagon as being "dreaded through the coast Of Palestine, in Gath and A." In S. A. 1187, Harapha charges Samson with the "Notorious murder of those 30 men at A." See Judges xiv. 19. In 138 the Chorus says that in the presence of Samson "The bold Ascalonite Fled from his lion ramp"; i.e. from his lion-like spring. The reference is to the same incident.

ASCOLI (the old ASCULUM). Town in Italy on the Tronto, 90 m. N.E. of Rome. It is surrounded by a wall. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio describes it as "round A."

ASCRA (now PYRGAKI). A town in Boeotia, on Mt. Helicon, where the poet Hesiod was born. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1511, Earth says, "Had I as many words As by the Ascræan poet we may guess The ancient gods lived days." One of Hesiod's poems was the Theogonia, or Generations of the Gods. Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 149, celebrates "that Ascræan bard, whose fame now rings Through the wide world."

ASDOD (more commonly ASHDOD). The most powerful city of the Philistine Pentapolis, in S.W. Palestine, 24 m. W. of Jerusalem and 3 from the coast. Now a small village called Es-Dud. In Milton's S. A. 981, Dalila says, "In my country, where I most desire, In Ecron, Gaza, A., and in Gath, I shall be named among the famous Of women."

ASHBRIDGE (ASHRIDGE). A park in the extreme E. of Bucks., 9 m. E. of Aylesbury. Here Elizabeth retired on the accession of Mary. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. 197, Mary commands, "Fetch our sister, young Elizabeth, from A., where she lies, to Lond."

ASHER-HOUSE (generally spelt ESHER H.). A country h. near Hampton Court, 15 m. from Lond., where Wolsey lived for 3 or 4 weeks after his fall. All that is left of it is the old gatehouse. It belonged at that time to the Bp. of Winchester. H3 iii. 2, 231, "Hear the K.'s pleasure, Cardinal, who commands you To render up the great seal presently Into our hands; and to confine yourself To A.-H., my Lord of Winchester's."

ASHFORD. A mkt. town in Kent, 53 m. S.E. of Lond. The birthplace of Jack Cade. H6 B. iii. 1, 357, York says, "I have seduced a headstrong Kentishman, John Cade of A., to make commotion." Dick, the butcher of A., was another of the rebels. H6 B. iv. 3, 1, "Where's Dick, the butcher of A.?" The scene of Lyly's Bombie is partly laid in a tavern "here in Kent, in A." (iii. 5).

ASHUR. See ASSYRIA.

ASIA. Originally the name used by the Greeks for the dists. on the W. coast of A. Minor, with which they became acquainted by their settlements there. The later Greek geographers extended it to cover the whole continent from the Tanais and the mouths of the Nile to the coast of China, and distinguished between A. Major, the whole continent, and A. Minor, the country W. of the Upper Euphrates. When Attalus in 133 B.C. bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans they formed it into the Province of A., which included Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, Lydia, and the coastal islands.

1. Asia in the sense of the whole continent. In Ado ii. 1, 275, Benedick "will fetch you now a tooth-picker from the furthest inch of A." to escape from Beatrice. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 4, 1, Tamburlaine, who has harnessed the Ks. of Soria (Syria) and Trebizond to his chariot, calls to them: "Holla, ye pampered jades of A."

What, can ye draw but 20 m. a day?" The scene struck the imagination of the Elizabethans, and the phrase is quoted more than once. Thus Pistol, in H4 B. ii. 4, 187, speaks of the "hollow pampered jades of A."; in B. & F. Coxcomb ii. 2, Dorothy says to Viola, "Wee-hee, M., pampered jade of A."; in Ford's Sun iii. 2, Folly says, "I sweat like a pampered jade of A."; in Fleire ii. 98, Felecia sings, "Holla, holla, ye pampered jades of A. And can ye draw but 20 m. a day?" In A. & C. i. 2, 105, the messenger brings word that "Labienus hath with his Parthian force Extended A. from Euphrates"; where "extended" means "seized." Note that A. is a trisyllable, and Euphrates is accented on the 1st syllable. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Tamburlaine is said to have hoped "mislead by dreaming prophecies To reign in A."; he so far succeeded that before his death he was master of all the continent except China and further India. In Respublica (Lost Plays 199), after a good deal has been said of Reformation and Deformation, Avarice says, "Was ever the like ass born, in all nations?" and Adultery adds: "A pestle [i' pest] on him, he comes of the Asians"; a sufficiently poor pun. Milton, P. L. x. 310, tells how Xerxes "Over Hellespont Bridging his way, Europe with A. joined." In P. R. iii. 33, he says, "The son of Macedonian Philip had ere these Won A." In iv. 73, he speaks of "the Anks. From India and the Golden Chersonese And . . . Taprobane."

2. Asia Minor. In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Amurack bids Bajazet "Post away apace to A., Armenia . . . and all other lands Which owe their homage to high Amurack." In Err. i. 1, 134, Egeon says, "Five summers have I spent in furthest Greece, Running clean through the bounds of A. And coasting homeward came to Ephesus." In W. W.'s translation of the Menæchmi, which was one of the sources of Shakespeare's Err., Messenio says, "six years now have we roamed about thus, Istria, Hispania, Massilia, Illyria, all the Upper Sea, all High Greece, all haven towns in Italy." It looks as if Shakespeare interpreted High Greece in this passage (Lat. Græciam exoticam) as meaning the Greek cities of A. Minor and the Levant. In Sackville's Ferrex iii. 1, 5, Gorboduc, speaking of the Trojan War, describes the "Phrygian fields made rank with corpses dead Of Anks. and lords." In Locrine iii. 1, 44, Locrine calls Priam "Grand Emperor of barbarous A." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 22, speaks of the "An. rivers," stained with the blood of the Trojans.

3. The Roman province of Asia. In May's Agrippina iv. 280, Silanus is described as "Proconsul of A." In York M. P. xlv. 297, John says, "To Assia will I go." John was the president of the ch. at Ephesus towards the end of the 1st cent., and died there.

4. Asia Major and Minor distinguished. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 4, Tamburlaine says, "Now crouch, ye ks. of greatest A." In iii. 5, the K. of Trebizond speaks of "Trebizond in A. the Less." In i. 1, Orcanes says, "All A. Minor, Africa, and Greece Follow my standard." In Massinger's Believe ii. 2, Antiochus suggests as his epitaph, "This is the body of Antiochus, K. of the Lower A."

The inhabitants are called Ans. or Asiatics; Massinger (ibid.) using both forms.

A. is regarded as very wealthy in gold and gems—G. Fletcher, in Licia (1593) xii. 12, says, "I do esteem . . . A.'s wealth too mean to buy a kiss."

ASKARON. See ASCALON.

ASKE. A small vill. in the parish of Easby, Yorks., 2 m. N. of Richmond. A. Hall is the seat of the Marquis of Zetland. In George v., Prince Edward affirms, "When I have supped, I'll go to Ask And see if Jane a Barley be so fair."

ASOPUS. A river of Boeotia, rising in Mt. Cithæron, and flowing E. into the Euripus. Homer, Il. iv. 383, describes it as deep-grown with rushes. Hall, in Satires iv. 3, 76, says, "Asopus breeds big bulrushes alone."

ASPARAGUS GARDEN. A pleasure resort in Upper Ground St., Southwark. In Massinger's Madam iii. 1, Shav'em complains that she is starved in her pleasures; "the heat-house for musk-melons and the gs. where we traffic for a. are to me in the other world." In Shirley's Hyde Park, Mrs. Carol stipulates with her lover, "I'll not be bound from Spring-Garden and the 'Sparagus'" (ii. 4). Brome has a play entitled Sparagus Garden, where, in i. 3, Striker says to Moneylocks, "I heard you had put in for a share at the A. G.; or that at least you have a pension thence to be their gather-guest and bring 'em custom." Pepys confides to his diary of April 1668 that he went "over to the Sparagus G." In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), we read of ladies "who had wont to be hurried in coaches to the taverns and a. gs., where 10 or 20 pounds suppers were but trifles with them." In Alimony iv. 2, Madam Caveare says, "Let us imagine ourselves now to be planted in the Sparagus G., where, if we want anything, it is our own fault."

ASPHALTIC POOL. The Dead Sea, so called from the bitumen which is found in it. A lake in S. Palestine, abt. 50 m. from the coast. It receives the R. Jordan, but has no outlet. It lies 1300 ft. below sea-level, and is 47 m. long from N. to S. Its waters are extremely salt. Milton, P. L. i. 411, says that the worship of Chemosh extended beyond "Eleale to the A. P." See also DEAD SEA.

ASPHALTIS (also LIMNASPHALTIS). The huge artificial lake constructed by Nitocris, according to the story of Herodotus, N. of Babylon. It was 420 stades, or abt. 50 m., in circumference, and was filled from the Euphrates. The name is derived from the bitumen which abounds in Babylonia, and is found in flakes in the waters of the river. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. v. 1, Tamburlaine tells how "The stately buildings of fair Babylon Being carried thither by the cannons' force Now fill the mouth of Limnasphaltis' lake." He will not ransom the Governor of Babylon, "though A. lake were liquid gold And offered me as ransom for thy life." Thousands of men during the siege have been "drowned in A.' lake." All this is pure fiction; for Babylon was a deserted ruin in the 14th cent.

ASPRAMONT. A castle in the extreme S.E. of France, 6 m. N. of Nice. It is still to be seen, and figured in the old romances as one of the places where Orlando distinguished himself. Milton, P. L. i. 583, speaks of all the knights who "Jousted in A. or Montalban."

ASPURGE (or ASBERG). A town in Wurtemberg. Near it is the castle of Hohen-Asberg, the only strong place in the kingdom. In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Valentine suggests to Lance that he should get a living by writing news; to which Lance responds, "Dragons in Sussex; or fiery battles seen in the air at A." A "strange monstrous serpent" was seen in Sussex in 1614; and the 30 Years' War began in 1618, during which the kingdom of Wurtemberg was frequently ravaged. Weber conjectures Augsburg or Hapsburg as the correct reading; but there is no need to make any change.

In B. & F. Prize i. 4, Rowland says, "This is news, Stranger than armies in the air."

ASSIA. See ASIA.

ASSYRIA (An. Assyrian). The Latinized form of Assur, or Ashur, the old capital of the country, which lay W. of the Tigris, abt. 60 m. due S. of Nineveh. A. proper lay E. of the Tigris to the W. of the Zagros Mtns., and extended from 35 to 37 N. lat. Abt. 1100 B.C. Ashurbel-kala made Nineveh the capital, and under a succession of warlike ks. A. became the mistress of the E. world, and subjugated its mother-city, Babylon, to its sway. Its supremacy lasted about 400 years, until 606 B.C., when Nineveh was destroyed and A. became part of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. Milton locates the Garden of Eden in A.; in P. L. iv. 126, he relates how Uriel's eye pursued Satan down to Eden, "and on the An. mt. Saw him disfigured." In iv. 285, he says that Mt. Amara, in Abyssinia, was "wide remote From this An. garden." In P. R. iii. 270, Satan says to our Lord, "Here thou behold'st A. and her empire's ancient bounds, Araxes and the Caspian Lake." In Greene's James IV i. 3, Oberon speaks of "Simeramis the proud An. queen," who was conquered by Strabobates. The reference is to the story in Diodorus Siculus ii. 16. The name Semiramis seems to be the An. Sammuramat, the mother, or possibly the wife, of the great Adad-Nirari III (811-783 B.C.). In Bale's Promises vi., God says of Israel, "Either the Egyptians have them in bondage or else the Ans." The Ans. destroyed Samaria and carried the 10 N. tribes of Israel into captivity 722 B.C. Milton, Trans. Psalm lxxxiii. 29, says of the enemies of Israel, "With them great Ashur also bands." In his P. R. iii. 426, our Lord says of Israel, "He . . . may bring them back . . . And at their passing cleave the An. flood"; i.e. the Euphrates. See Isaiah xi. 15, 16. In P. L. i. 721, he recalls the days "when Egypt with A. strove In wealth and luxury." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass A. is used quite accurately for the country of which Nineveh was the capital; and the story of Jonah's mission to Nineveh is related, Nineveh being regarded as a type of Lond. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier ii. 2, Bellizarius says that the Ans. "had as many gods as they had days." This is sheer nonsense.

There is frequent confusion between A. and Babylon. In Cyrus, in which the taking of Babylon by Cyrus is related, the k. is called "Antiochus k. of A."; a double mistake, for his name was Nabo-nahid, and he was K. of Babylon. In H5 iv. 7, 65, Henry says of the French, "We will make them skirr away as swift as stones Enforced from the old An. slings." The reference may be to the book of Judith, where Nebuchadnezzar is called the K. of the Ans., though he was really the K. of Babylon; and in iii. 7, it is said, "The Ans. trust in shield and spear and bow and slings." In Davenant's Love Hon. i. 1, Alvaro says, "I would thy nimble motion could o'ertake The arrow from the An. bow." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. v. 1, Tamburlaine, describing his conquest of Babylon, says that his chariot wheels "have burst the Ans.' bones And in the streets, where brave An. dames Have rid in pomp . . . My horsemen brandish their unruly blades." Spenser, in Ruines of Time 496, calls Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, "th' An. tyrant." A. is also confused with Syria; though the words have no connection at all, Syria being derived from Sur, the old name of Tyre. In Comus 1002, Milton speaks of Venus as "th' An. queen." He was plainly thinking of the Syrian goddess Astarte. The Adonis legend belongs to Phœnicia (Syria), not A.; and one is disposed to suggest an emendation, "the Syrian queen," especially as in P. L. i. 448 it is "the Syrian damsels" who lament the fate of Adonis. Barnes, in Parthenophil, Elegy i. 3, says, "Th' An. hunter's blood, why hath it flourished The rose with red?" The allusion is to the legend that roses became red through the blood of Thammuz (Adonis) falling upon them. Again Syrian would be more accurate.

A. stands in a vague way for Eastern. In B. & F. False One i. 1, we read of "Pontick, Punick, and An. blood" making up one crimson lake at the battle of Pharsalia. In Davenant's Platonic iii. 5, Theander asks, "Where are those fumes of sweet An. nard?" Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 98, speaks of a fleece "twice steeped in An. dye." Davies, in Nosce (1599), says of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, "This rich An. drug grows everywhere."

An An. is used to mean an astrologer or fortune-teller; probably through confusion between the Ans. and the Chaldeans. In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, Maquerelle says, "Look ye, a Chaldean or an An., I am sure 'twas a most sweet Jew, told me, Court any woman in the right sign, you shall not miss." An., like Trojan, Lacedæmonian, and other similar words, is used for a jolly good fellow. In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre calls his apprentices "my fine dapper An. lads." In Bacchus, the 12th of the toppers is "One Gilbert Goodfellow, from Arbila, an An." When Falstaff, in H4 B. v. 3, 105, addresses Pistol, "O base An. knight, what is thy news?" he is simply playing up to Pistol's extravagant vein; possibly the line may be a quotation from some old ballad. In Cowley's Cutter ii. 3, Puny calls his rival Truman "that An. crocodile." In May's Agrippina iv. 468, Petronius, quoting from his Satire, says, "Pearls in the Assirian lakes the soldiers love." The original reading in the Latin is "æs Ephryeiacum." May must have seen some variant like "Assuriæ concham"; in which case An. must have been used vaguely for Eastern, or Orient; a stock epithet for pearls.

ASSYS, SAINT (i.e. St. ASAPH). A city in N. Wales, on the border of Flintsh. and Denbighsh., 24 m. W. of Chester. In Bale's Johan 1363, Private Wealth declares that the Interdict shall be published in Wales and Ireland by "The Bp. of Landaffe, Seynt A., and Seynt Davy." Drayton, in Polyolb. x. 120, celebrates "Sacred Asaph's see, his hallowed temple."

ASTRACAN. Province in S.E. Russia, on N.W. coast of Caspian Sea. The capital, also called A. or Astrakhan, lies at the mouth of the Volga. The use of the word for lamb's wool does not occur till the middle of the 18th cent. Milton, P. L. x. 432, describes the Tartar retreating from the Russian "By A., over the snowy plains."

ATHENS (An. = Athenian). The capital of Attica in ancient times, and now the capital of Greece. It lies in the central plain of Attica, between 4 and 5 m. from the sea, nestling round the Acropolis.

A. is the scene of M. N. D. and of Tim. The former belongs to the legendary days of Theseus; the latter to the 4th cent. B.C. In M. N. D. i. 1, 41, Egeus appeals to "the ancient privilege of A.," which entitles him to put his daughter to death if she refuses to obey him in the matter of her marriage; but from i. 1, 162, we learn that this "sharp An. law" did not extend beyond the limits of the city, and that the lovers could escape from it by going to a place 7 leagues remote. If Shakespeare was thinking of Solon's law, by which parents were given power of life and death over their children, he had forgotten that his play was long antecedent to the time of that legislator. In ii. 1, 265, Puck is to know Demetrius "By the An. garments he hath on"; at first sight one might suppose that the suggestion is that Lysander had fled in disguise; but when, in ii. 2, 71, Puck finds Lysander, he tells us, "Weeds of A. he doth wear." Evidently, therefore, by "An. garments" Oberon means the clothes of a city-man as contrasted with those of a rustic or forester. Both Lysander and Demetrius appeared, as a matter of fact, in trunk-hose, doublet, and cloak, like Lond. gentlemen of the 16th cent. Similarly, the artisans who take part in the burlesque play were sketched from Lond. tradesmen, and the An. stalls (iii. 2, 10), at which they worked for bread, were like those in Cheapside. The An. eunuch, who proposes to sing the Battle of the Centaurs to the harp (v. 1, 45) was suggested by the Italian castrati who sang in the Papal choir at Rome in the 16th cent. Similarly, there is no attempt to give a Greek setting for Timon. The names of the characters are almost all Roman, and we find even a Flamen mentioned; whilst the phrase, "You shall see him a palm in A. again" (v. 1, 13), recalls the Psalmist's "The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree." The siege of A. by Alcibiades is, of course, quite unhistorical, and his glove (v. 4, 54) an amusing anachronism. Shakespeare's history is still inaccurate when, in Troil. prol. 3, he makes the princes orgulous, who have vowed to ransack Troy, send their ships in the first instance to the port of A., and then put forth on the An. bay, presumably the Piræus. On the other hand, Antony's proposal to visit A. (A. & C. iii. 1. 35), his leaving A. for Egypt without letting his wife Octavia know (iii. 6, 64), and his request, after his defeat, to be allowed to live as a private citizen in A. (iii. 12, 15) are all based upon Plutarch's Life of Antony; and Scenes IV and V of Act III are laid at A. in Antony's house. It is significant that Shakespeare has next to no allusions to any of the great names that have made A. illustrious. Socrates is mentioned once as the husband of Xanthippe (Shrew i. 2, 71); Aristotle twice (Shrew i. 1, 32 and Troil. ii. 2, 166—a well-known anachronism), but these almost exhaust the list. Ben Jonson was evidently right as to the "less Greek."

Historical and mythological allusions. Milton, in Ode on Death of Fair Infant 9, says, "Aquila . . . By boisterous rape the An. damsel got." The damsel was Oreithyia, daughter of Erechtheus, K. of A. In Lochner iii. 1, 54, Camber calls Niobe "fair A. queen." This is a slip: Niobe was a Theban princess. In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iv., Neptune says, "Great A., The nurse and fortress of my infancy, I have instructed in the seaman's craft; Besides, the unruly jennet I have tamed." Neptune gave to the Ans. the art of navigation and seamanship. In Marlowe's Dido iii. Cloanthus identifies the picture of one of Dido's suitors as an old acquaintance: "I in A. with this gentleman Unless I be deceived, disputed once"—a singular anachronism. In Pickering's Horstes D 4, the hero goes "to Nestor's town that A. hight" to stand his trial. Orestes was tried before the Areopagus at A.; but Nestor had nothing to do with A. In Chapman's Bussy iv. 1, Tamyras refers to Hercules, "Who raised the chaste An. prince [Theseus] from hell." In Kyd's Cornelia iv. chor., we have, "So the 2 Ans. that from their fellow-citizens Did freely chase vile servitude, shall live For valiant prowess blest." The reference is to Harmodius and Aristogeiton, who slew the tyrant Hipparchus 514 B.C. In Edwards' Damon x. p. 82, Eubulus says, "Upon what fickle ground all tyrants do stand Athenes and Lacedemon can teach you." In Val. Welsh iii. 2, Gald advises Caradoc, "Use the An.'s breath, Grave Solon, 'No man's happy until death.'" So Solon is reported to have said to Croesus. Chapman, in Bussy i. 1, says, "If Themistocles Had lived obscured thus in th' An. state, Xerxes had made both him and it his slaves." In his Cæsar iii. 1, 125, Pompey speaks of the An.'s genius as being "great by sea alone." In Rev. Bussy iii. 1, he says, "Demetrius Phalerius . . . So great in A. grew that he erected 300 statues of him." Lyly's Campaspe is laid partly in A. in the time of Alexander the Gt. In i. 3, Alexander describes himself as "coming from Thebes to A., from a place of conquest to a palace of quiet."

Philosophy and Learning. Lear (iii. 4, 185), who has already referred to Edgar as a philosopher, addresses him: "Come, good An.!" In the old Timon v. 3, Pædio says to Gelasimus, "I took you for an An., I see now thou art become an Arcadian"; i.e. a rustic simpleton. In Massinger's Believe i. 1, the Stoic counsels Antiochus to put into practice "the golden principles read to you in the An. Academy." In Ford's Lover's Melan v. 1, Ercleia says, "If earthly treasures Are poured in plenty down from heaven on mortals, They rain amongst those oracles that flow In schools of sacred knowledge; such is A." Again, in Heart v. 1, Ford describes A. as "the nursery of Greece for learning and the fount of knowledge." In B. & F. Mad Lover iii. 2, Memnon, resenting the good advice of Polydore, says, "None of your A., good sweet Sir, no philosophy!" In Emperor i. 1, Massinger speaks of A. as "the nurse of learning." In this play Amasia, one of the candidates for the hand of Theodosius, is described as "sister to the D. of A." Of course there was no such person. In Pickering's Horestes, E. 3, it is stated, "In A. dwelled Socrates, the philosopher divine, who has a wife named Exantyp, both devilish and ill"; Exantyp is Xanthippe. Milton's fine eulogy of A., in P. R. iv. 240-284, which begins, "A., the eye of Greece, mother of arts," should be read; it is too long for quotation.

Athenian Poets and Orators. Milton, in Son iii. 14, tells how "the repeated air Of sad Electra's poet had the power To save the An. walls from ruin bare." It was said that Lysander, when he had taken A. in 404 B.C., was moved to save it from destruction by some verses from a chorus by Euripides, the author of Electra. In P. L. ix. 671, he compares Satan to "some orator renowned In A. or old Rome." He is thinking of Demosthenes, Isocrates, and the other Attic orators of the 4th cent. B.C. A. is used as a pseudonym for Cambridge in Club Law; and for Oxford in Lyly's Sappho and Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 127 (Croll's ed.). Massinger, in Bondman iv. 1, relates, "the Athenian mules, that from the quarry drew marble, hewed for the temples of the gods, the great work ended, were dismissed and fed at the public cost." The scenes of Kinsmen and of Shrew are laid at A.

ATHOL. A dist. in N. Perthsh., Scotland. The Earl of A. is mentioned as one of Hotspur's prisoners at Holmedon Hill (H4 A. i. 1, 72). David, D. of Rothesay, held the title from 1398 to 1403; as the battle was in 1402, he must be the person intended.

ATHOS (now HAGION OROS, or MONTE SANTO). Properly the most E. of the 3 prongs of the peninsula of Chalcidice, in Macedonia; but commonly applied to the whole peninsula. It is mountainous and well wooded. In Lyly's Endymion iii. 4, Eumenides says, "Mistresses are as common as hares in Atho." Hares are common in Greece. In Barclay's Lost Lady i. 1, in the course of an imaginary war between Thessaly and Sparta, Lysicles does marvels of valour; and "as the common voice reached him [the K. of Thessaly] in A., there's none he looks on with greater demonstration of his love." Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 46, tells how "Mt. A. through exceeding might Was digged down"; the reference is to the canal cut through the peninsula by Xerxes for the passage of his fleet. In Florio's Montaigne i. 4, it is said that "Xerxes writ a cartel of defiance to the hill A." Puttenham, Art of Poesie (1589) iii. 24, tells the story how Dinocrates wanted to carve "the mtn. A. in Macedonia" into a colossal statue of Alexander the Gt.

ATLANTIC SEA. The sea W. of the Atlas Mtns. in N. Africa. The name was gradually extended to cover the ocean between Europe and America; but it was not till the 18th cent. that this latter use prevailed. It is in the former sense that Mahamet speaks, in Stucley 2449, of "those lands That stretch themselves to the A. S. And look upon Canaries wealthy isles." Similarly, Byron, in Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, speaks of the Roman conquest of the part of Spain "Which stood from those parts where Sertorius ruled Even to the A. S." Jonson, in Pleasure Reconciled, speaks of "Hesperus, The brightest star, that from his burning crest Lights all on this side of the A. seas As far as to thy pillars, Hercules." In Milton's Comus 97, Comus says, "The gilded car of day His glowing axle doth allay In the steep A. stream." In Richards' Messallina ii. 977, Lepida laments "the noble minds of chastity Whose innocent blood, like the A. S., Looks red with murder." It is used for the Mediterranean Sea in Greene's Orlando i. 1, 25, where the Sultan of Egypt has "cut the ak. seas" in order to reach the court of Marsilius in Africa. Blount, in Glossographia (1656), defines the A. S. as "The Mediterranean, or a part thereof, lying westward." Milton, P. L. iii. 539, describes Satan as surveying the earth "from E. point Of Libia to the fleecy star that bears Andromeda far off A. seas Beyond the horizon." Libia (The Balance) is directly opposite to Aries (The Ram), which lies just below Andromeda.

ATLANTIS. An imaginary country in the W. Atlantic Ocean, supposed to have been sunk in the ocean in prehistoric times. Bacon, in Essay on Vicissitude of Things, says, "The Egyptian priest told Solon concerning the island of A., that it was swallowed by an earthquake." (See Plato, Timæus 24-25.) Bacon, in New A., describes it as being W. of Peru, on the way to China and Japan.

ATLAS. The mtn. ranges in N.W. Africa. The name was given to them from the ancient mythological hero A., who was fabled to hold the heavens on his shoulders. The Elizabethans mostly use the word in its mythological sense; and this is the only use in Shakespeare. "Thou art no A. for so great a weight," says Warwick to Edward IV when he claims to be K. of England (H6 C. v. 1, 36). The geographical use is found in Stucley 2449, where the dominions of Muly Hamet are described as extending "From mighty A. over all those lands That stretch themselves to the Atlantic sea"; and the scene of Jonson's Pleasure Reconciled is laid at the mtn. A., represented by an old man with white hair, who in the antimasque is transformed to the Welsh mountain of Craig-Eriri, which Evan declares is "of as good standing and as good descent as the proudest Atlas christened." The original Globe Theatre had for its sign A. bearing the world on his shoulders, which may help to account for the very frequent references to that mythological giant in the plays.

In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 1, Cæsar sends a dispatch to Cassibelanus which begins, "Since Romulus' race by will of Jove Have stretched their Empire wide from Danube's banks By Tigris swift, unto Mt. A. side." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 3, Ferdinand cries, "Heap yet more mtns., mtns. upon mtns., Pindus on Ossa, A. on Olympus." In T. Heywood's S. Age i., Perseus tells how the head of Medusa "Hath changed great A. to a mt. so high That with his shoulders he supports the sky." In Nabbes' Hannibal ii. 5, Sophonisba says, "Twere but as if they pared a molehill from the earth, to place an A. in its stead." In Milton P. L. iv. 987, Satan "dilated stood, Like Teneriff or A., unremoved." In P. L. xi. 402, Adam is shown the kingdoms of Africa "from Niger flood to A. mt." Milton, P. R. iv. 115, describes the feasts of the Romans, "On citron tables or Atlantic stone"; i.e. Numidian marble from Mount A.

ATROPATIA. The N.W. province of Media, lying between the Caspian Sea and Lake Urumiyeh. It is more commonly called Atropatene. Milton, P. R. iii. 319, describes amongst the kingdoms shown to our Lord by the Tempter armies "From A., and the neighbouring plains Of Adiabene."

ATTICA (Ac. = Attic). The peninsula in ancient Greece, on the E. coast, N. of the Saronic Gulf. Its chief town was Athens. In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline, describing the luxury of the Roman nobles, says, "They buy rare Ac. statues, Tyrian hangings." Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat, recalls "how the East with tyrannous despight Burnt th' Ack. towers"; the reference being to the invasion of A. by Xerxes. Milton, Il. Pens. 124, speaks of Morn appearing "Not tricked and frowned as she was wont With the Ac. boy to hunt." The Ac. boy is Cephalus, the lover of Eos, and grandson of Cecrops, K. of Athens. In P. R. iv. 245, Milton calls the nightingale "the Ac. bird," from the legend that Philomela, an Athenian princess, was turned into a nightingale. Ac. comes to be used for artistic, refined. Milton, in Sonn. to Lawrence 10, asks, "What neat repast shall feast us, light and choice, Of Ac. taste?"

AUBERGE. The name given to the palaces of the 8 "languages" of the Knights of St. John in Malta. They stand in the Strada Reale, Strada Ponente, Strada Mercanti, and Strada Mezzodi. In B. & F. Malta v. 1, Miranda announces, "The A. sits to-day"; i.e. the council of one of the "languages."

AUGSBURG. A city of Bavaria, 34 m. W. of Munich. It was founded by Augustus 14 B.C. under the name of Augusta Vindelicorum. After being in turn under the Frankish and Swabian governments, it became a free imperial city in 1276, and retained that status till 1806. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight speaks of a letter from "Heildrick, Bp. of A." to Pope Nicholas I (858-867). Heildrick is Udalricus. In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Hans says, "Min fader heb schonen husen in Ausburgh. Min fader bin de grotest fooker in all Ausburgh." When Doll mistakes the word, he explains, "Fooker is en groet min her, he's en elderman van city." The reference is to the Fuggers, a family of famous bankers at A. at the beginning of the 16th cent.; the great charitable institution called the Fuggerei, founded in 1519, still keeps their name alive. It contains over 100 small houses, let at low rents to the poor, and has a ch. of its own.

AULIS. A town on the coast of Bœotia, in ancient Greece, where the Greek fleet assembled for the attack upon Troy. In Marlowe's Dido v., the forsaken Queen, speaking of Æneas, says, "Tell him, I never vowed at A.' Gulf The desolation of his native Troy." In Peele's Alcazar iii. 3, 40, the Governor says, "He storms as great Achilles, erst Lying for want of wind in A. gulf." The Greeks were windbound at A. till Agamemnon had sacrificed Iphigenia to Artemis. In T. Heywood's Iron Age B. v., Helen, looking at her face in a mirror, says, "Is this the beauty That launched a thousand ships from A. gulf?" In Davenant's New Trick iv. 3, the Devil says, "To thee she shall seem No whit inferior to that Græcian queen That launched 1000 ships from A. gulf And brought them to the fatal siege of Troy."

AULON. A hill, now Monte Melone, in S. Italy, near the coast of the Gulf of Tarentum, abt. 8 m. S.E. of Tarentum. Horace, Od. ii. 6, 18, calls it "Amicus fertili Baccho" on account of the excellence of its wines.

In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball says of the Carthaginians at Capua, "We drink No wine but of Campania's Mascicus, Or grape-crowned A." In his Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises, "Shalt drink no wine but what Falernus or Calabrian A. yield from their grapes."

AUMALE. See AUMERLE.

AUMERLE (another form of AUMALE, from Lat. Alba Marla). French town on the Bresle, in the department of Seine-inférieure, some 70 m. N.W. of Paris. It gives his title to the D. of A., son of Edmund of Langley, D. of York. He was deprived of his title by Henry IV's 1st Parliament, but became D. of York on the death of his father in 1402 and led the vanguard at Agincourt in 1415, where he was slain. He was present at the meeting of Bolingbroke and Mowbray in the lists at Coventry (R2 i. 3, 1). He is on Mowbray's side (249), and escorts Bolingbroke towards the coast with great satisfaction (R2 i. 4). He is present at Ely House at the deathbed of Gaunt (ii. 1). He is with Richd. in Wales (iii. 2) and at Flint Castle (iii. 3). In iv. 1, Bagot charges him with complicity in Gloucester's murder. In v. 2, his father discovers his share in the plot against Bolingbroke and hastens to inform him of it; and in v. 3, with his mother's help, he wins his pardon from the new k. He, now D. of York, is granted the leading of the vaward at Agincourt (H5 iv. 3, 130), and his death is described by Exeter (H5 iv. 6). The title was conferred in 1696 on Arnold Joost van Keppel, and is still in the Keppel family. There is a Capt. A. in Chapman's Rev. Bussy; and a D. d'A. in Consp. Byron: this was Charles de Lorraine, who died 1631.

AURAN (usually spelt HAURAN). A dist. in Palestine, E. of the Sea of Galilee, abt. 50 m. S. of Damascus. Milton, P. L. iv. 211, says, "Eden stretched her line From A. eastward to the royal towers Of Seleucia."

AURELIAN WAY (or VIA AURELIA). The Roman rd. leading from Rome to Pisa, and thence along the coast of Liguria to the Maritime Alps. In Jonson's Catiline iv. 2, Cicero, urging Catiline to join his friends in Etruria, says, "[They] tarry for thee in arms, And do expect thee on the A. W."

AUSBURGH. See AUGSBURG.

AUSONIA. The Ans. were one of the ancient races of central Italy; but the Alexandrian poets used A. as equivalent to Italy, and the Latin poets followed their lead. In Kyd's Cornelia 180, "the An. fame" means the fame of Italy. Milton, P. L. i. 739, says of Hephæstus, "in An. land Men called him Mulciber."

AUSTIN FRIARS. In Old Broad St., Lond., close to the corner of Throgmorton St. The priory of the A. F. was founded by Humphrey Bohun in 1243. At the dissolution of the monasteries the house and grounds were granted to Sir William Paulet, who built his town house on the site, but spared the old ch. It was granted by Edward VI to the Dutchmen of Lond. for their services, and is still used by them. It survived the Gt. Fire, and the old nave is one of the few buildings in the city which were there in Shakespeare's lifetime. Here are buried the barons who fell in the Battle of Barnet, Hubert de Burgh, the beheaded Earls of Arundel and Oxford, and the equally unfortunate D. of Buckingham of Henry VIII's time.

AUSTIN'S GATE. On the S.E. of St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond., leading to the Ch. of St. Augustine at the corner of Watling St. and Old Change. Near here was the Fox bookshop at which several of the Shakespeare Qq. were published. See Fox. Chivalry was "Printed by Simon Stafford for Nathaniel Butter and are to be sold at his shop in Pauls Churchyard near St. Austens gate. 1605."

AUSTIN'S (SAINT) MONASTERY. A monastery in Seville. In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 3, 110, Antonio sends for "a friar in St. A. M."

AUSTRACIA. The N.E. division of the Frankish Empire, which on the death of Clovis in A.D. 511 fell to Theodoric. It lay between the Meuse and the Rhine, and Metz was its capital. B. & F. Thierry deals with the story of Brunhild, Q. of A. at the end of the 6th cent., and her 2 sons (or rather grandsons), Thierry (Theodoric II) and Theodoret (Theodobert II); and the scene is laid partly in A., partly in Paris.

AUSTRALIA. It is generally supposed that the 1st visit of Europeans to A. was that of Cornelius Wytfliet in 1598; unless, indeed, Mr. Petherick, the librarian of the An. Library at Parliament House, be correct in his view that Amerigo Vespucci reached A. nearly 100 years earlier, and that it ought to have been called America. (See his paper in Proc. Austral. Ass. Adv. Sc. 1913.) Certainly De Torres, the lieut. of Ferdinand de Quiros, was on the mainland near Cape York in 1606, and christened it Terra Australis. To him Burton refers (A. M. ii. 2, 3) in a passage of truly prophetic inspiration: "I shall soon perceive," he says, assuming that he can achieve the power of flight and survey the whole world in that way, "whether Guinea be an island or part of a continent, or that hungry Spaniard's [De Quiros] discovery of Terra Australis Incognita, or Magellanica, be as true as that of Mercurius Britannicus. . . . And yet in likelihood it may be so, for without all question it being extended from the tropic of Capricorn to the circle Antarctic, and lying as it doth in the temperate zone, cannot choose but yield in time some flourishing kingdoms to succeeding ages, as America did to the Spaniards." Burton (iii. 2, 5, 5) again says, "They do not consider . . . how many colonies into America, Terra Australis incognita, Africa, may be sent." In iii. 4, 1, 2, he says that Gentiles and idolators inhabit "all Terra Australis incognita." I have only found one reference to A. in the Elizabethan dramatists. In Nabbes' Bride v. 7, Horten boasts that he has in his museum "the talon of a Bird in terra australi incognita which the inhabitants call their great god Ruc, that preys on elephants."

AUSTRIA. Country in S. Central Europe. It was originally a Margravate under the Emperor, but in 1156 it was raised to be a Duchy. Shakespeare, in K. J., follows the Trouble. Reign in blending into one two distinct persons, under the name of Lymoges, D. of A. Lymoges was Vidomar, Viscount of Lymoges, in the siege of whose castle at Chaluz Richd. I met his death. He was killed by Falconbridge in 1220. The D. of A. who took Richd. prisoner at Vienna in 1192 was Leopold V. He died in 1194, 5 years before Richd., and his successor, Leopold VI, had nothing to do with Richd.'s death. This twofold personage comes with his army to Angiers to assist Philip of France, and is described as the Archd. of A.—another mistake, as A. was not made an Archduchy till 1453. He is dressed in the lion's skin which he is supposed to have taken from Richd., and is unmercifully chaffed by Falconbridge (K. J. ii. 1). He appears again in iii. 1, and is bidden to hang a calfskin on those recreant limbs; and in iii. 2, Falconbridge enters with A.'s head and the lion skin, and flings it down, exclaiming, "A.'s head, lie there." In Downfall Huntington iv. 1, Lancaster refers to the quarrel between Leopold of A. and Richd. I at the siege of Acre, when Richd. had the D.'s banner thrown into the common sewer: "Thus did Richd. take The coward A.'s colours in his hand And thus he cast them under Acon walls." In Jonson, Prince Henry's Barriers, Merlin says of Richd., "The An. colours he doth here deject With too much scorn." In All's i. 2, 5, the French King has received "a certainty, vouched from our cousin A.," that the Florentines and Siennese are at war: the date is the middle of the 13th century, but neither the K. nor the D. can be positively identified. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes, K. of Natolia, claims to have so shaken Vienna with his cannon that Sigismund, "The K. of Boheme and the Austrie D. . . . desired a truce." The reference is apparently to the conquest of Serbia by Bajazet I, and the defeat by him of the K. of Hungary and his allies at Nicopolis in 1396. The D. of A. at this time was Albert IV, but I find no evidence that he was at Nicopolis. Certainly Bajazet did not reach Vienna. Marlowe was perhaps thinking of the later siege of Vienna (1529).

In 1463 A. came into the hands of Frederick III and continued till 1918 in the Hapsburg family. In S. Rowley's When You, the Emperor Charles V is called "gt. Charles the An." In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, Crispino asks, "When do we name Don John of A., the Emperor's son, but with reverence?" This was the bastard son of Charles V by Barbara Blomberg. He was Admiral of the Christian fleet at the famous victory of Lepanto in 1577; and died suddenly at Namur the next year, not without suspicion of poisoning by Philip II. He is also referred to in iv. 2, where it is said that Jolenta's brother means to marry her expected child "if it be a daughter, to the D. of A.'s nephew." Albert, Archduke of A. (1559-1621), son of Maximilian II and son-in-law of Philip of Spain, is one of the characters in Chapman's Consp. Byron.

The members of the House of Hapsburg have always been characterized by their thick lips. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Mammon cries to Doll, "This lip! that chin! Methinks you do resemble one of the Austriac princes." In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 2, Mrs. Carol says to her lover, "Your lip is An. and you do well to bite it." In Strophe's Float. Isl. Prol., we have "The royal race Of A. thinks the swelling lip a grace." Burton, in A.M., uses the An. lip as an example of hereditary transmission. In Massinger's Renegado i. 1, Gazet is prepared to swear that one of the pictures his master has bought "is an An. princess by her Roman nose." The Waldgebirge (Forest Mtns.) extend for abt. 160 m., and wild boars abound there. In Ford's Trial ii. 1, Guzman claims to have rescued "the Infanta from the Boar near to the An. forest." In Deloney's Reading xiii., Robert says, "There is no country like A. for ambling horses." In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to . . . A. for oysters"; where the verbal jingle suggested the phrase.

AUTUN. The ancient Bibracte, a city of France on the Arroux, 179 m. S.E. of Paris. It was taken by the Marshal de Byron in 1504 in the war between Henri IV and Spain, as related in Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1., "He did take in . . . A. and Nuis in Burgundy."

AUVERGNE. A province of Central France, between Aquitaine and Burgundy. The Countess of A., who endeavours unsuccessfully to trap Talbot (H6 A. ii. 3), seems to be a fictitious personage, and the story has no historical foundation. The Prince d'A., mentioned in Chapman's Consp. Byron iv. 1 as one of the ambassadors to England, was Charles, Count of Valois, who was twice arrested for treasonous plots against Henri IV and twice pardoned by the K. He was involved in Byron's conspiracy. The Auvergnians take part in the defence of Rhodes against the Turk in Davenant's Rhodes A. One of the songs begins, "The Auvergnian colours high were raised."

AVENTINE. One of the 7 hills on which Rome was built. It lies at the S.W. corner of the city. After the murder of Virginia 449 B.C., the Plebeians seceded to the A. and forced the Decemvirs to resign; and it remained up to the time of the Gracchi the stronghold of the Plebeian party. Hence the reference in B. & F. Double Mar. v. 2, "Ferrand fled . . . into the castle's tower. The only A. that now is left him"; i.e. the only place of refuge. In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Paris says, "My strong A. is That great Domitian will once return." In Fisher's Fuinus v. 1, Hylacus says to Caesar, "Throw Palatine on Esquiline, on both heap A., to raise a pyramid for a chair of estate." The cave of the giant Cacus, who stole the oxen of Hercules and was slain by that hero, was shown on the N. side of the A., near the Porta Trigemina. In T. Heywood's B. Age v., Hercules says, "Find me a Cacus in a cave of fire, I'll drag him from the mtn. Aventino." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iv. 4, 51, Guise speaks of "Cacusses That cut their too large murderous thieveries to their dens' length still." Evidently Guise is confusing Cacus with Procrustes. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., pictures Rome as buried under her 7 hills, and says, "Both her feet Mt. Viminal and A. do meet."

AVERNUS (the modern LAGO D'AVERNO). A lake in Campania in Italy, near Naples. It fills the crater of an extinct volcano, and is abt. 1½ miles in circumference and very deep. The mephitic exhalations from the lake were said to kill the birds that attempted to fly over it, and it was regarded as the entrance to the infernal regions. The Elizabethans use it freely as a synonym for hell. Tamburlaine fixes his eyes on the earth "as if he meant to pierce A.' darksome vaults To pull the triple-headed dog from hell" (Marlowe, Tamb. A. i. 2). Bajazeth invokes the Furies to "Dive to the bottom of A.' pool And in your hands bring hellish poisons up And squeeze it in the cup of Tamburlaine" (iv. 4). Argalio can by his charms fetch forth "The slimy mists of dark A.' lake" (Kirke, Champions iv. 1). The ghost of Andrea tells how Charon passed him over to the slimy strand "That leads to fell A.' ugly waves"—a mistake in infernal geography, for A. is on the hither side of Styx (Span. Trag. i. 1). Ralph threatens to send the soul of the Barber of Waltham "to sad A." (B. & F. Pestle iii. 4). Humber calls on the "coleblack divels of A. pond" to rend his arms and rip his bowels up (Lochrine iv. 4). Aretus declares that "all the poets' tales of sad A. are to his pains less than fictions" (B. & F. Valentin v. 2). Jonson, in The Famous Voyage, transfers the name to the Fleet Ditch, on the bank of which lay Bridewell, q.v., "A dock there is, that called is A., of some Bridewell." In Greene's Alphonsus i. 1, 187, Albinus calls Pluto "k. of dark Avene." In Selimus 1314, Baiazet invokes "A. jaws and loathsome Tænarus to send out their damned ghosts" to punish his revolting son Acomat. In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagnoli speaks of "Charon, ferryman of black Avene." In Peele's Alcazar i., the Presenter says, "Nemesis calls the Furies from A. crags." In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 3, 90, Byron, referring to A., speaks of "the most mortal vapours That ever stifled and struck dead the fowls That flew at never such a slightly pitch." Content, in Sonnets after Astrophel i., says of Proserpina, "They that have not yet fed On delight amorous, She vows that they shall lead Apes in A." To lead apes in hell was the recognized doom of old maids. Bacon, in Sylva x. 918, says, "There are also certain lakes and pits, such as that of A., that poison birds, as is said, which fly over them."

AVEROS (AVEIRO). A spt. of Portugal on the estuary of the Vouga, 35 m. S. of Oporto. Ferdinand, D. of A., or Averro, is named in Stucley 2673 as one of the lords killed at the battle of Alcazar. In Peele's Alcazar iv. 4, 59, Sebastian says, "D. of Avero, it shall be your charge To take the muster of the Portugals." A. is the scene of part of Shirley's Maid's Trag.

AVON. (1) The Upper, or Warwicksh., A. is one of 5 rivers of the same name in England. It rises in Northants., flows past Warwick, Stratford, and Evesham, and falls into the Severn at Tewkesbury. It is crossed at Stratford by a fine stone bidge. of 14 arches, built at the beginning of the 16th cent. by Hugh Clopton, a native of Stratford who became Lord Mayor of Lond. in 1492. In Jonson's verses To the memory of my beloved master William Shakespeare, the poet is styled "Sweet Swan of A."

(2) The Bristol A., Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 31, says, "A. marched in more stately path, Proud of his Adamants with which he shines [the so-called Bristol diamonds] And glisters wide, as also of wondrous Bath, And Bristow fair, which on his waves he builded hath." Milton, Vac. Ex. 97, calls it "rocky A."

(3) The Wilts. A. Daniel, in Delia (1594) liii. 11, says, "A., poor in fame, and poor in waters, Shall have my song, where Delia hath her seat. A. shall be my Thames, and she my song." This was the Wilts. A., which rises near Devizes and flows S., through Wilts., into the Channel at Christchurch Bay. Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 4, says, "A.'s fame to Albion's cliffs is raised." As the other rivers mentioned in this sonnet are Thames, Trent, and Severn, the Bristol A. is clearly intended.

AWROER. In Wilson's Pedler, 1096, the Pedler says, "The Mariner hath promised the Traveller to carry him as far as the river A. in which he shall find the stones wherewith all thing that they touch shall be turned into gold." The Pedler's geography is largely imaginative; and I suspect that the A. is meant for the golden river, from the Latin aurum.

AXE INN. A tavern in Lond. Part I of Oldcastle ii. 2 is laid in a room in the A. I., without Bishop-gate. There was an A. I. in Aldermanbury, next to the ch., in 1700, which is still there in Nuns Court, but I have failed to find any trace of an A. I. in Bishopsgate.

AYTON. Town in Scotland, some 6 m. N. of Berwick. Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, is laid in the English camp near A., on the borders. "Can they look," says Surrey, "on this, The strongest of their forts, old A.-Castle, Yielded and demolished?" Bacon, in Henry VII, tells how Surrey took "the castle of Aton, one of the strongest places then esteemed, between Berwick and Edinburgh."

AZAMOR. Town on N.W. coast of Morocco. The K. of Morocco tells Tamburlaine, "From A. to Tunis near the sea Is Barbary unpeopled for thy sake" (Marlowe, Tamb. B. i. 3).

AZORES. A group of 9 islands in the N. Atlantic Ocean, abt. 800 m. due W. of the coast of Portugal. T. Heywood's Maid of West A. ii. 2 and 4 are laid at Fayal, one of the islands of this group, at the time of Essex's expedition thither in 1597. Milton, P. L. iv. 592, speaks of the setting sun as "now fallen Beneath the A." Milton pronounces it as 3 syllables (A-zor-es), as does Tennyson in the Ballad of the Revenge: "At Flores in the A., Sir Richd. Grenville lay."

AZOTUS. The Hellenistic Greek name for Asdod, or Ashdod, q.v. Milton, P. L. i. 464, says that Dagon "had his temple high Reared in A."

AZZA (a Hellenistic form of GAZA, q.v.). Milton, S. A. 147, tells how Samson "by main force pulled up, and on his shoulders bore, The gates of A." See Judges xvi. 1-3.

BABEL. See BABYLON.

BABRAM or BABRAHAM. A small parish in Cambridgesh. The vill. is abt. 6 m. S.E. of Cambridge. In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Abraham soliloquizes, "Now to thy father's country house at B., Ride post; there pine and die, poor, poor Sir Abraham."

BABYLON or BABILON (Bl. = Babel). Ancient city on the Euphrates, abt. 250 m. from its mouth. It is said in Gen. x. 10 to have been the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod; the scene of the confusion of tongues is placed there in Gen. xi., and the name Bl. is said to be derived therefrom; though this is a false etymology, the name meaning "The Gate of God." It was the dominant city in Mesopotamia for many cents., but it fell under the dominion of the Ks. of Assyria, whose capital was Nineveh, about 1000 B.C., and so remained until the destruction of Nineveh 606 B.C., when Nabopolassar founded the Neo-Bab. Empire. Nebuchadrezzar, his son, made it the greatest city in the world. It covered 100 square m., and was surrounded by 2 walls, 300 ft. high and 85 ft. thick. During his reign the Jews were carried away captive to B., and remained there till Cyrus of Anshan took the city and set up the Medo-Persian Empire 586 B.C. Hence, in Jewish literature B. stands for the oppressor of God's people; in later times, when Judæa became a Roman province, B. was used as a sort of cryptogram for Rome; and after the persecution of Nero the Christian writers concealed their references to Rome by the use of B. in its place. At the Reformation the Protestants used B. to mean Papal Rome, and applied to her all the epithets used of B. in the Apocalypse, especially delighting to brand Rome as "the whore of B." (Rev. xvii and xviii). The site of the city at Hillah is now a complete desolation, marked only by huge mounds of rubbish resulting from the disintegrated of the brick buildings.

1. References to the history of Babylon. In Conf. Cons. i. 1, Satan boasts, "Nembroth [i.e. Nimrod] that tyrant by me was persuaded to build up high Bl." In Greene's Friar ii., Bacon speaks of "The work that Ninus reared at B. The brazen walls framed by Semiramis." In Lochrine ii. 1, 73, Humber refers to an attack on the Scythians by "the mighty Babilonian queen Semiramis." Semiramis (Assyrian Shammuramat) was the legendary q. of Ninus, the equally legendary founder of Nineveh—not B. In Greene's Friar iv., Henry compares the surge of Oceanus to the "battlements That compassed high-built Bl. in with towers." In Tiberius 1822, Germanicus speaks of "proud B. Glued with asphaltes slime impenetrable" (See Gen. xi. 3). In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, his brother says to Torrenti, "How high soe'er thou rearest thy Bil-brows, To thy confusion I this language speak; I am thy father's son." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 134, the K. says that England "erst was held as fair as Babilon." In Middleton's Quinborough iv. 3, Horsus says, "Some men delight in building, A trick of Bl. which will ne'er be left." Marlowe, in Tamb. B. v., calls it "this eternized city B.," and represents it as being besieged by Tamburlaine; though it was at that time a heap of ruins. The taking of B. by Cyrus is the subject of Cyrus, but the author confuses B. with Assyria throughout, and calls the k. of B. Antiochus. The taking of B. was exhibited as a "motion." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 6, Phantastes says, "Visus, I wonder that you presented us not with the sight of Nineveh, B., Lond., or some Sturbridge fair monsters." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xvii., Fancy speaks of "Syrus, that solemn czar of B., that Israel released of their captivity." In Brome's Moor iii. 2, Buzzard describes his master as "that Bian. tyrant." An imaginary Faustus, k. of B., is one of the characters in Greene's Alphonsus.

Milton, P. L. i. 694, speaks of "those Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell Of Bl., and the works of Memphian ks." In iii. 466, he speaks of "the builders next of Bl. on the plain Of Sennaar, and still with vain design New Bls., had they wherewithal, would build." In Trans. Ps. lxxxvii. 13, he says, "I mention Bl. to my friends, Philista full of scorn." In P. L. i. 717, he says of Pandemonium, "Not B. Nor great Alcairo such magnificence equalled." In P. L. xii. 343, Michael tells Adam of the captivity of the Jews, "a scorn and prey To that proud city whose high walls thou saw'st Left in confusion, B. thence called," and of their return "from B." In P. R. iii. 280, he describes it as "B., the wonder of all tongues." In iv. 336, our Lord speaks of "our Hebrew songs and harps, in B. That pleased so well our victor's ear" (see Ps. cxxxvii. 3). In Fulke-Greville's Alaham, chorus iii., we have "Bl.-walls by greatness built, for littleness a wonder." The captivity of the Jews, and incidents connected therewith, are often referred to. In Bale's Promises vii. p. 317, John says, "three score years and ten thy people unto B. were captive." In Trouble. Reign, ad fin., the poisoned K. complains that the poison "Rageth as the furnace sevenfold hot To burn the holy three in B." The story of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego is told in Dan. iii. In M. W. W. iii. 1, 24, Sir Hugh sings, "When as I sat in B." mixed up with snatches from Marlowe's "Come live with me and be my love." This is the 1st line of the old metrical version of Psalms 137. Sir Toby's ballad, "There dwelt a man in B.," in Tw. N. ii. 3, 84, was published in 1562 under the title of "The goodly and constant Wife Susanna." The story of Susannah is told in the book of that name in the Apocrypha, and happened in B.

The story of the confusion of tongues at the building of the tower of Bl. is often referred to; and a Bl. comes to mean a confused and unintelligible noise. In Shirley's Courtier iii. 1, Giotto, complimenting Volterre on his linguistic attainments, says, "Your Lordship might with great ease be interpreter to the builders of Bl." In B. & F. Rule a Wife iv. 1, Perez says, "Amongst these confusions of lewd tongues there's no distinguishing beyond a Bl." In their Prize v. 2, Jaques credits his mistress with "many stranger tongues Than ever Bl. had to tell his ruins." In their Coxcomb ii. 3, Antonio, who has disguised himself as an Irishman, finds the language difficult, and says, "Sure it was ne'er known at Bl., for they sold no apples, and this was made for certain at the first planting of orchards, 'tis so crabbed." And in their Woman Hater iii. 2, one of the intelligencers says, "though a' speak Bl., I shall crush him." In Marston's Malcontent i. 1, the vilest out-of-tune music being heard, Prepasso enters exclaiming: "Are ye building B. there?" Skelton, in El. Rummyng 387, speaks of "a clattering and a bil. of folys folly." Earle, Microcos. (1628), says of Paul's Walk, "were the steeple not sanctified [there is] nothing liker Bl." Fulke-Greville, in Alaham, chorus iii., asks, "Were not men's many tongues and minds their Bl. destiny?" It became a place of pilgrimage in the Middle Ages. The Palmer, in Piers C. viii. 172, had been "in Beth-leem, in Babilonie." Hycke had been in Babylonde. In Jonson's Case i. 1, Valentine, in his travels, has seen "the tower of B." In Day's Travails, Bullen p. 50, the Sultan Ahmed I claims to be "soldan and emperor of Babilon."

2. Babylon as a synonym for Papal Rome. In H5 ii. 3, 41, Quickly tells how the dying Falstaff "talked of the whore of B." The first original of the Fat Knight was Sir J. Oldcastle, the Puritan; and Falstaff himself tells that he lost his voice singing of anthems. It was natural that on his deathbed he should revert to the Puritan phrase which had been familiar to him in his youth. In the Trouble. Reign, ad fin., the dying K. predicts that a kingly branch shall arise out of his loins, "Whose arms shall reach unto the gates of Rome And with his feet tread down the Strumpet's pride That sits upon the chair of B." In Mayne's Match v. 6, the Puritan schoolmistress, Mrs. Scruple, boasts that she has a picture: "the finest fall of B., there is a fat monk spewing churches." Dekker has a piece entitled The Whore of B., and this is the common Puritan phrase for the Ch. of Rome. In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, young Pallatine compares Lady Ample to "the old slut of B. thou hast read of." Everything connected with the old religion was B-ish. In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Rabbi Busy is "troubled, very much troubled, exceedingly troubled, with the opening of the merchandise of B. again, and the peeping of popery upon the stalls here." In B. & F. Women Pleased iv. 1, Bomby, who has been persuaded to appear in a Morris Dance as the hobby horse, vows, "This beast of B. I will never back again." In John Evangel. 149, we read of "the Lady of Confusion that B. is called." In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Bird, the Puritan, calls organs "Bian. bagpipes." In Marston's Courtesan v. 1, Cocledemoy speaks of foreign wines as "the juice of the Whore of B." In Bale's Johan, Farmer p. 190, John speaks of "bloody B., the ground and mother of whoredom—the Romish ch. I mean." In Killigrew's Parson ii. 7, the Capt. says that his nurse made him believe "wine was an evil spirit and fornication like the whore of B." In Goosecap i. 2, Fowlwether says, "The punk of B. was never so subtle" as the English ladies. In Barnes' Charter, prol., we find, "Behold the strumpet of proud B., Her cup with fornication foaming full." In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 2, 238, Alphonsus speaks of the Archbp. of Mentz as "this wicked whore of B." In Conf. Cons. iv. 1, Philologus says, "By the name of B., from whence Peter wrote, is understood Rome" (I Pet. v. 13). In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Ferdinand asks, "What do you think of Salisbury steeple for a fit hunting spear to encounter with the whore of Babilon?" In Dekker's Satiro, iv. 1, 188, Tucca says to Mrs. Miniver, "My old whore-a-Babilon, sit fast." Milton, in Sonn. on Massacre in Piedmont 14, prays that others, learning from the massacre, "Early may fly the Bian. woe." In Cowley's Cutter v. 6, Tabitha hopes that Abednego will not "open before Sion in the dressings of B."; i.e. a surplice. Then a Bian. came to mean an anti-Puritan, a jolly good fellow. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 4, Eyre addresses his apprentices as "you Bian. knaves."

BABYLON THE LESS. A N. extension of Memphis, in Egypt, the ruins of the castle of which now bear the name of Kasr-esh-Shema. Mandeville says, "You must understand that the B. of which I have spoken, where the Sultan dwells, is not that great B. where the diversity of languages was first made"; and later he speaks of it as being "at the entry of Egypt" and "situated on the r. Nile" (c.v.). In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 21, the Souldan says, "Egypt is mine and there I hold my state, Seated in Cairye and in B."

BACA (VALLEY OF). In Palestine; the site is quite uncertain. The name appears to mean the Valley of Weeping; though others take it to be the Valley of Balsam or Mulberry trees. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiv. 21, says, "They pass through B.'s thirsty vale, That dry and barren ground."

BACHARACH. Town in Rhenish Prussia on the Lower Rhine, 29 m. S. of Coblenz. It produces a limited quantity of a wine which has long been celebrated, and was known as Backrag, or Backrack. In B. & F. Beggars v. 2, Vandunke says, "I'll go afore and have the bonfire made; my fireworks and flap-dragons, and good backrack . . . to drink down in healths to this day." In Mayne's Match i. 3, Plotwell says, "I'm for no tongues but dried ones, such as will give a fine relish to my backrag." Blount, Glossographia (1656), s.v., says, "Wines that are made there are therefore called backrag or b.; vulgarly, Rhenish wines." In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands says, "He saw her at the Still-yard With such a gallant, sousing their dried tongues In Rhenish, Deal, and Backrag." In Shirley's Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell says, "Shall we whirl in coaches to the Still-yard, where deal and backrag shall flow into our room?"

BACTRA. The capital of Bactria, now Balkh. It lies in S. Turkestan, 25 m. S. of the Oxus, and 700 E. of the S. extremity of the Caspian Sea. It is one of the oldest cities in the world, and is still called "The Mother of Cities." Milton, in P. R. iii. 285, mentions "B." as one of the chief cities of the world shown to our Lord by the Tempter.

BACTRIA (or BACTRIANA). A dist. in Asia, N. of the Hindoo Koosh range, and S. of Sogdiana. It corresponds roughly to the modern Turkestan. After his defeat of Darius at Gaugamela, Alexander marched through B. to Sogdiana, and conquered them both. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar, speaking of Alexander, says, "Bactrians and Zogdians, known but by their names, Were by his arms' restless powers subdued." In Cyrus F. 3, Panthea says, "My husband from B., Where he lay lieger for the Assyrian k., Is come." The scene of Alabaster's Roxana, acted at Cambridge in 1592, is laid in B. Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1647), speaks of "men who have gathered thousands like the griffins of B." Milton, P. L. x. 433, speaks of the "Bactrian Sophi [i.e. the Shah of Persia] retreating from the horns Of Turkish crescent"; B. being at this time a province of Persia. In Deloney's Reading xiii., D. Robert says to his mistress, "Be now as nimble in thy footing as the camels of B., that run an 100 miles a day."

BAGDAD. The old capital of the Caliphs, on the Tigris, abt. 300 m. from its mouth. It was founded by Al Mansur A.D. 763, and taken by Timur in 1400. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Sigismund compares his royal host to the desert of Arabia as seen by "those that stand on Bagdet's lofty tower." The Italian form of the name, Baldaco, was the origin of the word Baldachin, meaning first a rich brocade of silk and gold thread made at B.; and then a canopy hung with it. Baudekin and Bodkin are forms of Baldachin. In Massinger's Madam ii. 1, Luke enumerates "cloth of bodkin" amongst a draper's goods. In Shirley's Doubtful iii., Antonio says, "I may deserve to wear your thankfulness in tissue of cloth of bodkin."

BAGSHOT. A town in Surrey, on the road to Salisbury, abt. 30 m. from Lond. It was celebrated for its good inns. Shift, in Jonson Ev. Man O. iii. 1, undertakes to teach Sogliardo "to take 3 whiffes of tobacco, and then to take his horses, drink 3 cups of Canary, and expose one at Hounslow, a 2nd at Staines, and a 3rd at B." Laneham, in Letter 36, says, "Capt. Cox can talk as much without book as any Innholder betwixt Brainford [i.e. Brentford] and B."

BAIÆ (now BAJA). A fashionable watering-place in the days of the later Roman Republic and early Empire. It lay on the W. side of the bay between Cape Misenum and Puteoli, on the W. coast of Italy, abt. 12 m. W. of Naples. Many nobles, like Lucullus, Marius, Pompeius, and Cæsar, had villas here. Nero often visited it, and it was here that he plotted to kill his mother Agrippina. In May's Agrippina v. 237, Nero says to his mother, "Minerva's feast is celebrated now 5 days at B., thither you shall go." In line 455 seq., Anicetus recounts the attempt on the life of Agrippina which was made there. Herrick, Ode to John Wicken, says, "We are not poor, although we have No rooof of cedar, nor our brave B."

BAKAM. In B. & F. Princess i. 1, the scene of which is laid in the Moluccas, one of the suitors for the hand of the sister of the K. of Tidore is "a haughty master, the K. of B." I suspect this to be a mistake for Bantam, q.v.

BALDOCKBURY (or BALDOCK). A town in Herts., near the intersection of the Gt. N. Rd. and Icknield St., 37 m. N. of Lond. It is famous for its barley and malt. In the nonsense verses recited as a charm for worms in Thersites i. 279, Mater invokes "the backster of B. with her baking peel." In J. Heywood's Weather, Farmer p. 99, Merry Report, in a long alliterative list of the places to which he has been, includes B.

BALIGNOZA. A dist. in E. Africa. See under ADEA.

BALLIOL COLLEGE. Oxford University, in Broad St. In Peele's Ed. J. p. 28, John B., on being chosen K. of Scotland by Edward I in 1292, says, "We will erect a college of my name; In Oxford will I build, for memory of Balliol's bounty and his gratitude." This is not strictly in accordance with the facts. The College was founded in 1282 by the Lady Dervorgilla, the widow of Sir John de B., who died in 1269. The first building occupied was the Old B. Hall in Horsemonger St.; but in 1284 a part of the present site was obtained, then known as Mary Hall, and a charter was drawn up which was confirmed by John de B., afterwards K. of Scotland.

BALL'S BUSH. In Misogonus iv. 1, Madge says, "I gathered pe-pe-pe-pescods at Ba-ha-ba-Ball's B. then, I'm sure." I cannot find it; but there is an old vill. in Islington, near the New River, called B. Pond. There is also a B. Park 1 m. S.E. of Hertford. One of these may have suggested the name.

BALMES. An ancient mansion in Hoxton, rebuilt with great magnificence in the early 17th cent. by Sir George Whitmore, Lord Mayor of Lond. It was subsequently bought by Richd. de Beauvoir. Later still it became a private lunatic asylum, and ultimately it was pulled down. Balmes Rd., Beauvoir Cres., and Whitmore St. preserve its memory. It lay E. of Kingsland Rd. In Ovatio Carolina (1641), it is recorded that on the entry of Charles I into Lond., Nov. 25, 1641, the Lord Mayor and his train "advanced through the fields till they came beyond B., a retiring house of Sir George Whitmore's, next adjoining to Kingsland."

BALSERA (= BALSORA, or BUSSORAH). The chief port at the head of the Persian Gulf, on the Euphrates. It used to be a great centre of trade. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 3, Theridamas says, "This is B., their chiefest hold Wherein is all the treasure of the land"; and he proceeds to invest and take it. In the vision of the kingdoms of this world shown to our Lord by the Tempter, in Milton P. R. iii. 321, are troops of many E. provinces, "From Atropatia . . . to B.'s haven."

BALTIC SEA. In N. Europe, E. of Sweden, terminating northward in the Gulf of Bothnia. In Davenant's Albiovine iii. 1, Hermegild says, "I vow to revenge or sink myself lower than a plummet in the B. S." In his Italian ii. 1, Altamont says, "'Tis Sciolto, A slave more salt than is the B. wave." Both the allusions are inappropriate; for the B. is comparatively shallow, and its waters are much less salt than those of the open ocean. In Chettle's Hoffman v. 1, Mathias says of Lucibella, "She has done violence to her bright fame And fallen upon the bosom of the Balt." In Scot. Presb. v. 1, Anarchy says the protestations of Directory are "as numerous as the sand hid in the B. S."

BANBURY. Mkt. town in Oxfordsh. The people appear to have been full of zeal for religion. In the old days they were devoted to the Catholic Faith; their town was adorned with 4 crosses, and there was a hospital of St. John in the neighbourhood. But after the Reformation they became energetically Puritan in their sympathies, and it is in this character that they appear in our plays. A thin, flat kind of cheese was known as a B. Cheese, and B. cakes were, as they still are, famous all over England. In Piers C. iii. 111, the charter given by Guile to Falseness is witnessed by "Bette the budele of Banbury-sokne." Latimer, in a Letter to Henry VIII written in 1530, ii. 299, refers to Romish interpretations of the Scriptures as "B. glosses."

In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Winwife, who is courting the widow Purecraft, tells Quarloss that he has been "put off by a brother of B."; Q. replies, "I knew divers of these Banburians when I was at Oxford." Later Winwife asks Littlewit, "What call you the reverend elder you told me of, your B. man?" and is answered, "Rabbi Busy, Sir; he is more than an elder, he is a prophet, Sir." His Christian name is Zeal-of-the-land; he was a baker, but has given up his trade because "those cakes [B. cakes, presumably] he made were served to brides, maypoles, morrices, and such profane feasts and meetings." In iii. 1, when Busy and the Littlewits come to Dame Ursula's booth, Knockem says, "These are B. bloods, o' the sincere stud, come a pig-hunting." In i. 1, Busy comments in true Puritanical style on the eating of pig, which was one of the customs of the Fair: "Now pig, it is a meat, and a meat that is nourishing and may be longed for, and so consequently eaten; it may be eaten, very exceeding well eaten; but in the Fair, and as a Bartholomew pig, it cannot be eaten; for the very calling it a Bartholomew pig, and to eat it so, is a spice of idolatry." However, he gets over his scruples on the ground that by the public eating of swine's flesh he professes his "hate and loathing of Judaism." "I will therefore eat," he says, "yea, I will eat exceedingly." In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Pallatine says that Lady Ample "is more devout than a weaver of B., that hopes to enter heaven by singing, to make him lord of 20 looms." In Cartwright's Ordinary ii. 3, Caster proposes, when he has made his fortune, to "build a Cathedral in B.; give organs to each parish in the kingdom, and so root out the unmusical elect." In the mock Litany in Jonson's Gipsies, the Patrico prays that the K. may be delivered "from the loud, pure wives of B." In K.K. Knave Dods.vi.533, Honesty says to Coneycatcher, "We are as near kin together as the cates of B. be to the bells of Lincoln"; i.e. we are as little akin as the Puritans and the high-Churchmen. In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 1, Knavesby, confessing his peccadillos to his wife, says, "There was at B. a she-chamberlain that had a spice of purity, but at last I prevailed over her." In Lupton's All for Money, C. 4, Sin says, "The last stocks I was in was even at Bambrurie"; which I suppose means B. In Nabbes' C. Garden iv. 1, when Jeffrey proposes a health "to the long standing of B. may-pole," Jerker says, "No Puritan will pledge that." An old Latin rhyme runs: "Veni Banbery, O profanum! Ubi vidi Puritanum Felem facientem furem Quia Sabbatho stravit murem" (anglice: "He hanged his cat o' Monday for killing a mouse on Sunday."). The B. Cross, to which we used to exhort one another to ride a cock-horse, was destroyed by the Puritans in 1601; a pageant was in progress when these fanatics attacked the performers and drove them out of the High St., and then "at once with axes and hammers" smashed to pieces the 4 crosses which adorned the town. The B. tinkers had a bad reputation; there is an old proverb, "Like B. tinkers, who in stopping 1 hole made 2." In Vox Borealis (1641), we read, "Next to these marched 4 footmen . . . like 4 B. tinkers, with their budgets at their backs." In Jack Drum iii. 178, Planet says, "Put off your clothes, and you are like a Banbery cheese, Nothing but paring." When, in M. W. W. i. 1, 139, Bardolph calls Slender, "You Banbery cheese!" he is hitting at once at his Puritanical complaints abt. himself and his comrades and at his slim figure. Markham, in English Housewife (1615) ii. 2, gives a recipe "To make B. cakes." There was an old Roman amphitheatre at B. which in the ante-Puritan days was occasionally used for dramatic performances.

BANGOR. Episcopal city in Cernarvonsh., N. Wales. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 35, tells how Ethelred passed the Dee and filled "B. with massacred martyrs." It was in a room in the house of the Archdeacon of B. that the conference between Hotspur, Mortimer, and Glendower was held, as related in H4 A. iii. 1. B. had already to its cost taken part in the wars between Owen Glendower and Henry IV, and in the course of them the cathedral had been burnt down in 1402, and was still lying in ruins. B. House, in Shoe Lane, was the Lond. residence of the Bps. of B.; it has now entirely disappeared.

BANKSIDE. The dist. in Southwark running along the Surrey side of the Thames from St. Saviour's Ch. and Winchester House to the point where Blackfriars Bdge. now stands. The row of houses on the river-side was a series of brothels, and was known as the Bordello, or Stews. Behind them lay the Globe, the Rose, the Hope, and the Swan theatres, the bull- and bear-baiting grounds, and the Paris Garden. Ferries plied across the river and gave employment to numbers of watermen. Both Shakespeare and Jonson are said to have lived for a time on B. The Bordello was suppressed in 1546, but the measure was as ineffectual as such ordinances usually are.

In Remed. Sedition (1536) 21, it is said that it is "As much shame for an honest man to come out of a tavern . . . as it is here to come from the banke." Crowley, in Strype Eccl. Mem. (1548) ii. 1, 17, 142, speaks of "Sisters of the Bank, the stumbling-blocks of all frail youth."

These poor creatures were called "Winchester geese," from the fact that the Bordello was within the liberties of the Bp. of Winchester, whose palace was at the E. end of the B. Jonson, in Vulcan, speaks of "the Winchesterian goose Bred on the Bank in time of Popery." See under WINCHESTER HOUSE. In Greene's Friar vii., Ralph undertakes to "make a ship that shall hold all your Colleges and so carry away the Niniversity with a fair wind to the B. in Southwark." In Randolph's Muses ii. 4, Asotus says, "I will send for a whole coach or two of B. ladies, and we will be jovial." In News from Hell (1641), B. is mentioned as a haunt of "whores and thieves." The heroine of Leatherhead's Motion in Jonson's Barthol. v. 3 is "Hero, a wench of B., who, going over one morning to Old Fish st. Leander spies her land at Trig-Stairs and falls in love with her." In Underwit v. 1, the lady speaks of the porters going "a-feasting with the Drums and footboys to the B." In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Nicholas greets Damaris, "Art thou travelled cross the seas from the B. hither, old Countess of Codpiece Row?" In Cobler of Canterbury (1608), we read, "When Southwarke Bankside hath no pretty wenches, Then the Cobler of Rummye shall a cuckold be." In Davenport's New Trick i. 2, Slightall, wanting a good, lusty lass, bids Roger "search all the Allyes, Spittle or Pitchatch, Turnball, the Banke side," and other unsavoury localities. In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 3, Agurtes asks for help that he may not have "to keep a tap-house o' th' B., and make a stench worse than a brewhouse 'mongst my neighbours." In Massinger's New Way iv. 2, a vintner accuses Wellborn of having ruined him "With trusting you with muskadeine and eggs And five-pound suppers, with your after-drinkings, When you lodged upon the B." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 302, Hobson says, "I crossed the water to see my rents and buildings of the B." When the tide was high the st. was often flooded. Jonson, in the Famous Voyage, says, "It was the day what time the powerful moon Makes the poor B. creature wet its shoon In its own hall."

In such a quarter fortune-tellers and quacks naturally flourished. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Macilente reports that Puntarvolo's dog is poisoned; "marry, how, or by whom, that's left for some cunning woman here o' the B. to resolve." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, that lady gives a free advertisement to "Mother Phillips of the B., for the weakness of the back"; and to "Mrs. Mary on the B., for 'recting of a figure'; i.e. making a horoscope. In Middleton's R. G. i. 1, Trapdoor, being asked to discover Moll Cutpurse, promises, "I will drink half-pots with all the watermen o' the B., but, if you will, Sir, I will find her out." Taylor speaks of the "B. Globe, that late was burned"; and Jonson, in Vulcan, laments the destruction of "the Globe, the glory of the Bank." The B. theatres came to be regarded as of a lower class than the more aristocratic Blackfriars and other houses on the Middlesex side of the river. In Doubtful, prol., Shirley says, "The Bancksaides . . . are far more skilful at the ebbs and flows of water than of wit"; and he sarcastically apologizes for the absence in his play of shows and dances and " (what you most delight in) target-fighting upon the stage." In Middleton's Hubbub, p. 77, the gallant is advised, "After dinner he must venture to the B. where he must sit out the breaking up of a comedy or the first act of a tragedy." In Jonson's Epicoene iii. 1, Mrs. Otter threatens her husband, who is mad on bull- and bear-baiting, "I'll send you over to the B.; I'll commit you to the Master of the Garden, if I hear but a syllable more." In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Trimtram, giving a history of the origin of "roaring," says, "It was heard to the B. and the bears they began to roar." See also under BORDELLO, BEAR GARDEN, PARIS GARDEN, and the various theatres.

BANNOCKBURN. Vill. 3 m. S.E. of Stirling, in Scotland, where Robert Bruce defeated Edward II on June 24, 1314. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Lancaster quotes a "fleering jig" which the Scots have made: "Maid of England, sore may you mourn, For your lemans you have lost at B." Drayton, in Heroical Epp. Mortimer to Isabel, speaks of "The English blood that stained B."

BANQUETING HOUSE. Designed by Inigo Jones in 1612 and erected by him at Whitehall, q.v. Here Jonson's Neptune was produced, and the Master Cook says, "This is my room and region, too, the B. h." It was from a window of this hall that Charles I came out to his execution. It is the only part of the Whitehall Palace still remaining.

BANSTEAD DOWNS. In Mid Surrey, near Epsom. The Downs command a magnificent view from Windsor to Lond. The Lond. County Lunatic Asylum is built here. In Shirley's Pleasure i. 1, Bornwell wants to know, "When shall we have more booths and bagpipes upon B. d.?"

BANTAM. The province at the W. extremity of the island of Java. It was governed during the 16th cent. by a Mohammedan Sultan. Face, in Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, promises Mammon that by the aid of the Philosopher's stone he shall make himself "K. of B." In Noble Soldier v. 2, Baltasar says, "You were better sail 500 times to Bantam in the W. Indies than once to Barathrum in the Low Countries"; i.e. Hell. B. is, however, in the E., not the W. Indies. In Cuckqueans i. 4, Claribel says, "From my wife by letter, on sudden news of my return from B., am cited home in haste to Maldon."

BAPAUME. A town in Artois, in N. France, abt. 90 m. N. of Paris. It is claimed by Byron, in Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, as one of the places he has "peopled with the issue of victory": the reference is to the campaign against the League in 1594-95.

BAR. The chief town of the Duchy of B., distinguished from other towns of the same name as B.-le-Duc or B.-sur-Ornain. It is 125 m. E. of Paris. The castle was built in the 10th cent. by Frederick I of Lorraine. "Edward, D. of B.," is amongst the lords summoned by Charles to fight at Agincourt (H5 iii. 5, 42), and is in the list of the slain (iv. 8, 103).

BAR. A barrier made with posts and a chain at the entrance of a city, especially at various points in the circuit of Lond. There were bs. at Smithfield, in Holborn, and at the W. end of Fleet St.: the latter was replaced by a gate, which was still called Temple B. All the gates of York are still called Bs. In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "The suburbs and those without the bs. have more privilege than those within the freedom."

BARATHRUM. A deep pit beyond the Acropolis at Athens, into which criminals were flung. Hence used of any deep or bottomless pit; and particularly of the pit of Hell. In Jonson's Postaster iii. 1, Tucca says of the Player, "His belly is like B." In Man in the Moon (1609), a merciless moneylender is called "a bottomless B." In Massinger's New Way iii. 2, Overreach calls the glutton Greedy, "You B. of the shambles." Dekker, in Knight's Conjuring (1607), says, "He flung away in a fury and leapt into B." In Richards' Messalina iv. 1771, Narcissus says, "I could curse His soul to th' depth of B." W. Rowley, in Search 40, says there was "a noise so confused as if hell had been a-fire, and the bells of B. had been rung backwards." Ch. bells were rung backwards when a fire broke out.

BARBARIAN. Is used both in the sense of an inhabitant of Barbary, q.v., and also in the Greek sense of one of a foreign nation who speaks a language not understood in civilized lands, or in the country of which the speaker is a native. In Oth. i. 3, 363, Iago speaks of Othello as "an erring b.," i.e. a wandering stranger; though, of course, Othello was a B., or Moor, in the more limited sense. In Cor. iii. 1, 238, Coriolanus says, "I would they were bs. . . not Romans." In Troil. ii. 1, 51, Thersites says to Ajax, "Thou art bought and sold like a b. slave": where the meaning may be "a Moorish slave." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome 416, speaks of Rome being spilled "by b. hands." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 220, says, "The barbarous Goths . . . thought the roots in Alexandria sweeter than the raisins in Barbary": where Croll interprets "the parts of Europe occupied by the bs."

BARBARY (Bn. = Barbarian). A general name for N. Africa along the Mediterranean, from Egypt to the Atlantic, and from the sea to the Sahara Desert. It thus includes Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco. The name is derived from that of the Berbers, one of the principal tribes that inhabited these countries. Clavancourt, K. of B., is one of the fictitious personages in Greene's Alphonsus. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 362, a French Capt. mentions amongst the French army at Agincourt "the Bns. with their bard horses, And launching spears"—an unhistorical detail.

In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, Bajazeth addresses the Ks. of Fez, Morocco, and Argier as "Great Ks. of B.," and in B. i. 3, after Tamburlaine has conquered N. Africa, Usumcasane, whom he has made K. of Morocco, tells him that he has brought so many men to help him that "B. is unpeopled for thy sake." During the 16th cent. N. Africa was under the control of Turkish chieftains, who inaugurated the system of piracy which made Algiers a by-word throughout Europe for the next 3 cents. The Battle of Alcazar between the Portuguese and the Moors in 1578 sent a thrill through the world. In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 2, Sir Ruinous says, "The first that flushed me a soldier was that great battle at Alcazar in B." In Stucley 1442, Botella informs K. Philip, "Many woful days Th' afflicted B. hath suffered spoil And been a prey unto her natural subjects." Soon after the battle of Alcazar in 1585, Elizabeth sent an ambassador to B., who was well received. Some of the scenes in T. Heywood's Maid of West take place at the court of Morocco, and in iv. 3, Mullisheg, K. of Fez and Morocco, is hailed as the "Pride of our age and glory of the Moors By whose victorious hand all B. Is conquered, awed and swayed." The title of the rulers of B., Muley, provoked a certain amount of mirth amongst our forefathers. In Middleton's Gipsy iv. 1, Sancho inquires of John, who has spoken of "the beast I rode on hither," "Is't a mule? send him to Muly-Crag-a-while in B."

Trade with B. was considerable, and in 1588 the Company of B. Merchants was formed in Lond. In Jack Drum iii. 391, Flawne brings news to Mammon, "Your ship the Hopewell hath hapt ill, returning from Barbarie." In Massinger's Madam iv. 1, Fortune relates, "I have 2 ships Above my hopes returned from B. And richly freighted." In Tomkins' Albumazar i. 5,

Antonio, "having great sums of gold in B. desires of you he might go thither for 3 months"; and on his return (iv. 3) he tells how he had been shipwrecked in the Straits of Gibraltar, and was fettered and sold as a slave by the barbarous Moors. The Spanish gallees were equally dangerous to our merchants, and in Haughton's Englishmen ii., Pisaro gets word that his ship, the Fortune, has been attacked by a Spanish galleon on a voyage to B.: whereon he cries, "A plague upon these Spanish-galley pirates" who have made so perilous "the Straits 'twixt Spain and B." One of Antonio's ventures (Merch. iii. 2, 272) was to B. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine says that the Lond. wives by their extravagance break their husbands "beyond redemption from the Indies, the streights, or B." In Brome's Moor iv. 4, Quicksands says, "I have borrowed other Moors of merchants that trade in B." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 550, Staines professes, "I was so far gone, that desperation knocked at my elbow, and whispered news to me out of B.": i.e. bad news; news of loss. Dekker, in Hornbook v., advises the young gallant, when at the Ordinary, to talk of having "interpreted between the French k. and a great lord of B." In J. Heywood's Weather, Farmer p. 99, Merry Report claims to have been "at Baldock, at Barford, and in B." One principal article of trade was sugar. In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pisaro's B. correspondent informs him, "we have sent unto your worship sack, Seville oils, pepper, B. sugar"; and in B. & F. Beggars iv. 3, Goswin says, "if he wants fine sugar, he can send to B." Breton, Fantasticks (1626), says, "B. sugar puts honey out of countenance." In Marston's What you will, the schoolboy says, "Ah, sweet honey, B. sugar, sweet master!" In H4 A. ii. 4, 84, when Prince Hal says to Francis, "In B., Sir, it cannot come to so much," he is probably referring to the pennyworth of sugar which Francis has given him, and for which he has promised him £1000. Sugar would, of course, be cheap in B. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 252, Gresham declares, "I am to have a patent for all the B. sugars." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Doll complains, "The wars in B. make sugar at such an excessive rate."

B. was famous for its breed of horses: "they are," says Heylyn, "of excellent beauty, strength, and service." In Ham. v. 2, 168, the K. wagers "6 B. horses" on Hamlet in his fencing-match with Laertes. In R2 v. 5, 78, the groom tells how Bolingbroke rode into Lond. on Richd.'s "roan B." In Oth. i. 1, 112, Iago warns Brabantio, "You'll have your daughter covered with a B. horse": i.e. the Moor Othello. In Sampson's Vow i. 1, 140, Ursula says, "We must be coupled in wedlock like your b. horse for breed sake." In Tomkins' Albumazar iii. 5, Trinculo wagers "my grey B. 'gainst your dun cow." In Middleton's Gypsy iii. 2, the Jester, trying to ride Fernando's "mettled B.," got run away with. In Stucley 2400, Abdelmelek boasts that he mounts and controls Fortune "As we do use to serve Bn. horse." In B. & F. Cupid's Rev. ii. 6, the D. has his rough French horse brought round, "And the grey B.: they're fiery both." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Callipine promises his keeper "A 100 bassoes, clothed in crimson silk, Shall ride before thee on Bn. steeds." In Webster's White Devil iv. 2, Lodovico tells of a "resty B. horse" which the D. wishes to have broken in. In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 2, Pinac describes the French women as "pin-buttocked, like your dainty Barbaries, and weak i' the pasterns; they'll endure no hardness." In B. & F. Cure ii. 2, Clara says, "You never saw my B. the Infanta bestowed upon me." In Selimus 556, Selim says, "Thinks he to stop my mouth With rusty [f resty] jades fet from Barbaria?" In Shirley's Courtier iii. 1, Giotto says to Contarini, "You have enriched my stable with a B. roan." In Kyd's Solyman, the Moor comes to the tournament in Act I "upon his hot Bn. horse." In Peele's Alcazar v. 1, 239, Muly Mahamet sought to save his life "on a hot Bn. horse."

In As iv. 1, 151, Rosalind promises Orlando, "I will be more jealous of thee than a B. cock-pigeon over his hen." There is a special black, or dun, variety of pigeon called a Barb. As to the jealousy of the cock-pigeon, Pliny, Nat. Hist. x. 34, says, "Conjugii fides non violant, communemque servant domum. Et imperiosos mares, subinde etiam iniquos ferunt; quippe suspicio est adulterii, quamvis natura non sit. Tunc plenum querela guttur, sævique rostro ictus." The men of B., says Heylyn (704), are "implacable in hatred, constant in affection": indeed, the jealousy of the Moors was proverbial. Othello was a Moor. So that a B. cock-pigeon is a doubly effective symbol of jealousy. In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Jaspero speaks of "a letter tied round the neck of a B. pigeon." The B. hen is the Guinea Fowl, a particularly harmless and inoffensive bird. Hence, in H4 B. ii. 4, 108, Falstaff says, "Pistol will not swagger with a B. hen, if her feathers turn back with any show of resistance." In Marston's Malcontent ii. 4, one of the ingredients of a restorative medicine is "7 and 30 yolks of B. hens' eggs." In Shirley's Courtier iv. 1, Depazzi boasts, "All the lions in B. shall not contrary me in this way." In Devonshire iv. 1, Henrico thinks that "England breeds more apes than B." In Dekker's Match me ii. 1, Bilbo offers for sale "Tuscan hatbands, Venetian ventoves, or Bn. shoestrings."

It is easy to see how the word came to be used in the sense of barbarous. In Webster's White Devil iv. 1, Flamineo exclaims, "Rome! it deserves to be called Barbarie for our villainous usage." In Tournour's Revenge iv. 2, Vendice says, "There are old men . . . so poisoned with the affectation of law-words that their common talk is nothing but B. Latin." Doubtless, the Greek use of Βαρβαροι for all peoples not Hellenic co-operated with the savagery of the Moors in the evolution of this meaning.

BARBER-SURGEONS' HALL. In Monkswell St., Lond., near Cripplegate, on the W. side. It was built in the reign of Edward IV. Dead bodies, especially those of executed criminals, were brought here to be dissected, and their skeletons, or "anatomies," were sometimes preserved. There is a curious provision, dated 1587, that if any such body come to life again, "as of late hath been seen," the persons who brought the body were to be held responsible. The Hall was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Inigo Jones. It is now displaced by warehouses. In Dekker's Edmonton i. 2, Carter says, "You might send me to B.-Sns.-H. . . to hang up for an anatomy." In Webster's Malfi v. 2, Ferdinand says, "I will flay off his skin to cover one of the anatomies this rogue [the Dr.] hath set i' the cold yonder in B.-Sns.-H." In Shirley's Fair One v. 3, Brains says, "I will desire him, that bids me go hang myself, which is the way to Sns.' H. I will beg to have my skull cut, I have a suspicion my brains are filched and my head has been late stuffed with woodcock's feathers." In Rowley's All's Lost ii. 6, 153, Lazarello asks Antonio, "Were you never at Barbar-Sns.' H. to see a dissection?" Membership in the Hall gave the qualification for practice; so in Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, the Surgeon, being asked whether the Colonel has recovered, says, "May I be excluded quite out of Sns.' H. else!"

In Chapman's Widow's Tears v. 1, the Governor says he will give "old and withered widows to Sns.' H. to be stamped to salve for the French measles." In Nash's Wilton, K3, Jack says, "I supposed it was the Beadle of Sns.' H. come for me." In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Constant says, "I thought he had married the company of Sns.' H.; for his directions to me for several things for his wife's use, were fitter for an apothecary's shop than a lady's closet." In Nabbes' Tottenham i. 5, Slip, asked how he has disposed of some deer he has killed, says, "I sent a soare to B.-Sns.' H. A little soare makes them a great feast." The pun on the double meaning of soare, viz. a buck in his 4th year, and a wound, is obvious. Cf. Shakespeare, L. L. L. iv. 2, 59.

BARBICAN. A st. in Lond., running E. from Aldersgate St. at the Charter House corner to the junction of Golden L. and Red Cross St. So called from the postern tower which stood a little N. of it, and was supposed to date from Roman times. Stow derives the name from the old English "Burh-kenning"; but the O.E.D. inclines to an Arabic or Persian origin for it. In Massinger's Madam ii. 1, Tradeswell, preparing, on his return from his travels, to have a good time in Lond., says, "A B. broker will furnish me with outside." Taylor, Works 122, says, "In B. there's as good beer and ale as ever twanged, And in that st. kind No-body is hanged." The reference is to the sign of John Trundle's bookshop. Nobody was "Printed for John Trundle, and are to be sold at his shop in B., at the signe of No-body." This is the man referred to by Jonson in Ev. Man i. i. 2, where young Knowell says, "If he read this with patience, I'll troll ballads for Master John Trundle yonder the rest of my mortality." T. Heywood's Woman Killed was "Printed by William Jaggard, dwelling in B. 1607." Milton lived in B. from 1645 to 1647. The house was on the S. side of the st.; it was recently destroyed to make way for a railway line.

BARCA. An inland city of Cyrenaica, 70 m. S.W. of Cyrene. It was founded by exiles from Cyrene 554 B.C., and besieged and destroyed by the Persians in 510 B.C. Its remaining inhabitants were later transported to Ptolemais on the adjoining coast. In Milton, P. L. ii. 904, the hosts of warring atoms in Chaos are said to be "unnumbered as the sands Of B. or Cyrene's torrid soil."

BARCELES (or BARCELLOS). A town in Portugal, on the Cavado, 27 m. N. of Oporto. Said to have been founded by Hamilcar in 250 B.C. In Peele's Alcazar ii. 4, 67, Sebastian says, "D. of B., thy ancestors Have always loyal been to Portugal."

BARCELONA. A spt. on W. coast of Spain, 312 m. N.E. of Madrid, and the capital of Catalonia. It was one of the chief commercial cities of the 16th cent., and the rival of Genoa and Venice. In B. & F. Pilgrimage the hero is the son of a Genoese merchant, and comes with his father to B. (i. 2), which Alphonso tells us (iii. 3) "is the quay for Italy, whence he first stole hither." In Act IV there is a characteristic st. row between the sailors and the townsfolk, in which the hero is wounded. "Oh," says a soldier (iv. 2), "the quiet hurley-burles I have seen in this town, where we have fought 4 hours together, and not a man amongst us so impertinent or modest to ask why!" In Rowley's All's Lost i. 3, 33, Jaques speaks of Antonio as "Lord of B." The university was founded in 1430, and had 4 faculties and 31 chairs. In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Romelio says, "Here's an old gentleman says he was chamber-fellow to your father, when they studied the law together at B."

BARFOLD. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report includes B. in his alliterative list of places. He "has been at B." I cannot find any B., but there are half a dozen Barfolds in Norfolk, Warwick, Oxford, Bedford (2), and Wilts.: one of them is probably intended.

BARGHEN. See BERGEN-OP-ZOOM.

BARHAM. A vill. in Kent, 6 m. S.E. of Canterbury, on the Dover Rd. The Canterbury races are held on B. Downs. In Oldcastle iv. 1, the rascally parson of Wrotham boasts that "There's ne'er a hill, heath, nor down in all Kent but 'tis in my parish; B. Down" and half a dozen other places "all pay me tithe."

BARKESHIRE. See BERKSHIRE.

BARKING. Town in Essex, 8 m. E. of Lond. It possessed one of the oldest and richest abbeys for nuns in England, and its abbess was a baroness by virtue of her office. Only the gatehouse now remains. The Ch. of Allhallows B., in Gt. Tower St., was connected with the Abbey, and the parish is often spoken of as B. The Rose Inn, q.v., was near to the ch., and in Haughton's Englishmen iii. 2, and Oldcastle iv. 4, is called the Rose at B. Taylor, Works 117, speaks of the Thames fishermen as "comrades of B." In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, George says of his meretricious mistress, "She is run away, 7 m. off, into Essex; she vowed never to leave B. while she lived." The pun is obvious. Tarlton, in News out of Purgatory (1590), tells of the broom-men who were there "for robbing of the broom closes between B. and Lond." See BROOMFIELDS.

BARKLEY. See BERKELEY.

BARKLOUGHLY. R2 iii. 2 opens: "B. Castle call you this at hand?" According to Holinshed, Richd. landed "neere the castell of Barclowlie in Wales." No such place exists; but a clue is given in the Life of Richard II by a monk of Evesham, the 2 MSS. of which call the place respectively Hertlowli and Hertlow. Hertlow seems to be the monk's way of transcribing Harddlech, the modern Harlech, the only considerable castle at that time between Carnarvon and Aberystwith. It is true that Fabian and Stow say that Richd. landed at Milford Haven, and the French chronicler at Pembroke; but he was aiming to get to Conway, and would therefore be more likely to land at a port in N. Wales. Harlech is in Merionethsh., near the shore of Cardigan Bay. The castle was built by Edward I abt. 1270, and the ruins are in a fair state of preservation.

BARMESEY STREET (= Bermondsey St.). In Southwark, running S. from Tooley St. to Long Lane, in Bermondsey. In Harman's Caveat (1567) cap. 2, the author relates how, having had a copper cawdron stolen, he "gave warning in Southwark, Kent st., and B. st. to all the tinkers there dwelling." There was an abbey at Bermondsey for monks of the Cluniac Order, built in 1082. It had a famous cross, to which many pilgrimages were made. John Paston begs Margaret Paston "to visit the rood of Northedor and St. Savoyour at Bermondsey while ye abide in Lond." (1465). In a map of Southwark (1542) the cross is shown at the junction of Tooley St. and Bermondsey St., and is marked "B. Cross."

BARMOTHO. See BERMOUTHES.

BARNARD'S INN

BARNARD'S INN. An Inn of Chancery, on the S. side of Holborn, Lond., between Fetter Lane and Furnival St. It was originally called Mackworth's I., after a Dean of Lincoln of that name. When it was converted into an I. of Chancery it was in the occupation of one Barnard, whence its name. In Elizabeth's time it had 112 students. It was rebuilt in 1892 by the Mercers' Company for their school.

The rascally lawyer Dampit lived in this neighbourhood. In Middleton's Trick to Catch iii. 4, he smells a foul smell on coming into his rooms, and says, "Foh! I think they burn horns in B. I. If ever I smelt such an abominable stink, usury forsake me!" In Peele's Jests (1627), we read of a certain gentleman who "thought to return to his I.; this not of the wisest, being of S. Bernard's."

BARNE. See BORNO.

BARN ELMS. Part of St. James's Park, Lond., in the S.W. corner, near Rosamond's Pond, at the W. end of Birdcage Walk. It was a favourite resort of lovers and duellists. In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 3, young Touchwood and Moll try to elope together, and, going down to the Thames, direct the watermen to take them to B. E.

BARNET. Mkt. town in Herts., 11 m. N.N.W. of Lond., on the Gt. North Rd. On Gladsmore Heath, close by, was fought the decisive battle of the Wars of the Roses, in which Edward IV defeated the Lancastrians under Warwick, and Warwick himself was slain. The exact place of the battle is marked by an obelisk, erected in 1740 by Sir Jeremy Sambrook. In H6 C. v. 1, 110, Warwick says, "I will away to B. presently"; and the next 2 scenes take place upon the battlefield. In T. Heywood's Traveller iii. 3, Delavil refers to B. as "a place of great resort." In Massinger's Madam ii. 1, Luke suggests to young Goldwire "the raptures of being hurried in a coach [with a lady] to Brentford, Staines, or B." Pinnacia, in Jonson's New Inn iv. 3, says, "A coach is hired and 4 horse; he runs in his velvet jacket thus, to Rumford, Croydon, Hounslow or B., the next bawdy rd." In Goosecap i. 3, Will says, "The ladies desire your worships would meet them at B. i' th' morning with the Capt." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 1, Shortyard says, "I knew the time he ware not half a shirt." Easy asks, "How did he for the rest?" and Shortyard replies: "He compounded with a couple of napkins at B. and so trussed up the lower parts." The scenes of Jonson's New Inn and of T. Heywood's Traveller (in part) are laid at B.

BARNSLEY. A town in W. Riding, Yorks., 172 m. N.W. of Lond. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin Hood says, "At B. dwells a potter tough and strong That never brooked we brethren should have wrong."

BARNWELL. The N. suburb of Cambridge, doubtless haunted by the less reputable members of the University. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 258, Hobson asks the Pedler, "What's the news at bawdy Barnswell and at Sturbridge Fair?"

BARSABE. See BEERSHEBA.

BARSON, BARCHESTON (locally pronounced BARSON). Vill. in Warwicksh., on the Stour, 10 m. S. of Stratford. In H4 B. v. 3, 94, when Pistol addresses Falstaff, "Sweet knight, thou art now one of the greatest men in this realm," Silence concurs, "By'r lady, I think he be, but Goodman Puff of B." He was no doubt some notorious fat man whom Shakespeare remembered from his Stratford days.

BARTHOLOMEW (Saint) THE GREAT

BARTHOLOMEW (SAINT) THE GREAT. A noble ch. in Lond., and the finest example there of the Norman style of architecture. It stands on the N. side of B. Close, W. Smithfield, S. of Long Lane. It was built by Rahere, said to have been Jester to Henry I, who renounced the world and became Prior of the monastery there. His fine canopy tomb can still be seen in the ch. The ch. fortunately escaped the Gt. Fire. Deloney, in Reading, says that "This Reior was the most skilfullest musician that lived at that time," and that "he builded at his own cost the Priory and Hospital of St. B. in Smithfield." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 132, "old Friar Anselm of St. B.'s" is quoted as the author of the prophecy that G. should kill Edward's children and succeed him; see R3 i. 1, 55.

The great Fair held in Smithfield on August 24, St. B.'s Day, was the most famous in England. Originally established as a cloth-fair, it became in course of time a popular carnival, and after flourishing for 7½ centuries was abolished in 1855. Its frequenters were called B. Birds; its slang B. terms. There was abundant eating and drinking, especially of roast pigs. Drums, gingerbread, and ugly dolls were to be bought for children. Puppet-plays were performed, and monsters of all kinds exhibited. Ballad singers plied their trade, and pick-pockets and rogues of all kinds made the Fair a happy hunting ground. Wrestling matches and the chasing of live rabbits by boys formed part of the fun. Jonson's Barthol. is a vivid picture of contemporary Lond. life, and should be read in full. In Davenant's Wits iv., Thwack makes a number of suggestions for the depletion of Lond., "which," says Pert, "will more impoverish the Town than a subversion of their fair of B." In Jonson, Barthol. Ind., the stagekeeper ridicules the idea of the play: the author, he says, "has not hit the humours, he does not know them; he has not conversed with the B. birds, as they say." In Chaunticleers xiv., Bristle says of Nancy, "She has got a face like a B. Fair baby." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii., the Clown says that Hellenia is "so fair that all B. Fair could not match her again." In Nabbes' Totenham iv. 4, Bellamie says of the supposed Mrs. Stitchwell, "I have packed her up in't, like a B. baby, in a box." In Brome's Academy iv. 1, Nehemiah says he has burnt as many ballads "as might have furnished 3 B. Fairs." In the Penn. Parl. it is predicted, "Such a drought shall come amongst cans at B. Fair in Smithfield that they shall never continue long filled." In Jonson's Barthol. iii. 1, Waspe exhorts Cokes to "keep your fine B. terms to yourself." Presents, even though not bought at the fair, were called B. fairings: in Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Tweedle instructs Violette, "Look you, lay out my gold at the Exchange in B. fairings." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, a usurer is described as one that would flay his father's skin off "and sell it to cover drums for children at B. Fair."

References to Dame Ursula's pigs are common. In Dekker's Edmonton v. 2, we learn that Gammer Wash-bowl's untimely farrow "were sent up to Lond. and sold for as good Westminster dog-pigs at B. Fair as ever great bellied ale-wife longed for." In Field's Amends iii. 4, Whorebang cries, "Let's have wine, or I will cut thy head off and have it roasted and eaten in Pie-Corner next B.-tide"; Pie-corner being at the Giltspur St. end of Smithfield. The discussion of the piety of eating B. pig by Rabbi Busy, in Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, is very diverting: "pig . . . may be eaten; but in the Fair, and as a B. pig, it cannot be eaten; for the very calling it a B. pig, and to eat it so, is a spice of idolatry."

Nevertheless, to profess his hate and loathing of Judaism, the worthy Rabbi relaxes his principles and "will eat, yea, will eat exceedingly." In H4 B. ii. 4, 250, Doll calls Falstaff, "Thou little tidy B. boar-pig." In Davenant's Playhouse i. 1, the housekeeper says, "All the dry old fools of B. Fair are come to hire our House." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo advises Puntarvolo to stuff his dead dog with straw, "as you see these dead monsters at B. Fair." In Nabbes' Tottenham ii. 2, Stichwell says, "I have a Cornish lad that wrestles well and hath brought home rabbits every B.-tide these 5 years." Hentzer relates that after the wrestling was over "a parcel of live rabbits are turned loose among the crowd, which are pursued by a number of boys." The flies which came up with the drovers and their cattle were a great nuisance at the time of the Fair. In H5 v. 2, 336, Burgundy says, "Maids, well summered and well kept, are like flies at B.-tide, blind, though they have their eyes." In Middleton's Mad World v. 1, Sir Bounteous complains, "Acquaintances swarm in every corner, like flies at B.-tide that come up with the drovers." In Devonshire iv. 1, Buzzano says, "What a buzzing you make, as if you were a fly at B.-tide at a butcher's stall." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Winwife says, "The flies cannot, this hot season, but engender us excellent creeping sport."

BARTHOLOMEW'S (SAINT) HOSPITAL. One of the 5 Royal Hospitals of Lond. It stands in the angle between Long Lane and Aldersgate St., E. of Smithfield, with an entrance from Little Britain. It was founded by Rahere, said to have been Jester to Henry I. It was seized as a conventual institution by Henry VIII, but, at the request of Gresham, handed over to the City in 1546. The buildings had been repaired by the executors of Richd. Whittington in 1423, but it had to be taken down and rebuilt in 1730. The entrance from Smithfield was erected in 1702. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 277, Dean Nowell relates that Sir Richd. Whittington "repaired S. Bartholomewes in Smithfield." Dekker, in Wonderful Year (1603), says that on account of the ravages of the Plague "every house looked like S. Bartholomewes hospitall."

BARTHOLOMEW (ST.) THE LESS. Ch. in Lond., on the E. side of Smithfield. It was built by Rahere, the Prior of St. B. the Gt., as a chapel for the hospital. It has been rather ruthlessly restored, but the old tower still remains. Edward Allde, the publisher of the Book of mery Riddles (1600), dwelt "in little St. Bs., neere Christ-Ch." Heywood's Londini Speculum was "Imprinted at Lond. by J. Okes, dwelling in little St. Bs. 1637."

BARTHOLOMEW (SAINT) EXCHANGE. See under BARTHOLOMEW LANE.

BARTHOLOMEW LANE. A lane in Lond., running on the E. side of the Bank of England from Threadneedle St. to Lothbury. In Rowley's Match Mid. iv., Moll and Randall being surprised by night in Gracechurch St., by the watch coming along up the st., Moll advises Randall, "Go you back through Cornhill; I'll run round about the Exchange, by the ch. corner, down Cateaton st., and meet you at B. L. end." It was so called from the Ch. of St. B. Exchange, or the Less, at its S.E. corner. The ch. was taken down to make room for the Royal Exchange, but some portions of it are preserved in the Sun Fire Office, 63 Threadneedle St. Cateaton St. is the present Gresham St. In Jonson's Magnetic iv. 6, Compass says, "Stay with us at his ch., Behind the Old Exchange."

BARWICK. See BERWICK.

BASAN (or BASHAN). The dist. in Palestine E. of the Jordan and N. of Gilead, now known as the Hauran. It was a mountainous country famous for its sheep and cattle. Deut. 32, 14, "Rams of the breed of B."; and its bulls became, in the O.T., the type of cruel and blatant oppressors. Ps. 22, 12: "Many bulls have compassed me; strong bulls of B. have beset me round." Hence Antony's exclamation (A. & C. iii. 13, 127), "O that I were Upon the hill of B., to outroar The horned herd! For I have savage cause." In Darius (Anon. Plays) iii. 78, Iniquity says, "She is such a pestilent woman as is not hence to our Lady of B." Spenser, in Shep. Cal. Sept. 124, says, "Big bulls of B. prance them about That with their horns butten the more stout." Milton, P. L. i. 398, says that Moloch was worshipped "In Argob and in B."

BASINGSTOKE. A mkt. town in Hants., 46 m. S.W. of Lond., on the Gt. Western Rd.

In H4 B. ii. 1, 182, the Chief Justice asks, "Where lay the K. last night," and Gower answers: "At B., my lord." The quarto reads "Billingsgate," but it is evident that "B." is right; as the K. was on his march from the W. of England to Lond.

BASSETS HEATH. In S.E. Staffsh., near Tamworth, 9 m. S.E. of Lichfield. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 43, the Tanner says to the K., "I fear thou art some out-ridder that lives by taking of purses here on B. H."

BASTILE. Properly a general name for any fortified building, but applied specifically to the fortress in Paris built by Charles V to defend the Gate of St. Antoine in 1369. It was used for the custody of State prisoners, and ultimately became the State prison of Paris. It was razed to the ground by the Parisians on July 14, 1789, at the outbreak of the French Revolution. Its site is marked by the bronze column in the Place de la B. at the E. end of the Rue de Rivoli. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iv. 1, Aumale brings word that Clermont "Admbois" "to B. is now led prisoner." The execution of the D. de Biron, described in Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, took place in the court of the B.

BATAVIA. Properly the dist. in the Netherlands between the Waal, the Rhine, and the Meuse: then used for the Netherlands generally. In Massinger's Believe iii. 1, "One urged Antiochus to fly for safety to the Parthian, a 2nd into Egypt, and a 3rd to the Batavian."

BATH (or THE BATH). The chief town of Somersetsh., on the Avon, 108 m. W. of Lond. It was in the earliest times famous for its hot springs, and there was a Roman town there called Aquæ Solis. In the 9th cent. it was called Civitas æt Bathun, i.e. the city at the baths. In the 17th and especially in the 18th cent. it became the most fashionable resort for the upper classes in England. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) i., says, "There is at Baath certain waters, the which be ever hot or warm and never cold." A full account of the baths by Thomas Venner (1628) may be found in Harl. Misc. iv. 110. In 1562 Turner, in his Baths i., says, "The B. of England is in a city called in Latin Bathonia, and Baeth in English, of the baths that are in it." Jonson, in Epicœne ii. 1, describing the affectations of a fashionable lady, says she must "be a stateswoman, know all the news, what was done at Salisbury, what at the B., what at Court, what in progress." Spenser, F. Q. i. 11, 30, says that the Well of Life did excell "The English B. and eke the German Spau." In iv. 11, 31, he mentions "wondrous B." as one of the towns on the Avon. In Massinger's Parl.

Love ii. 3, Clarindore says that one drop of the moisture on Bellissant's palm would purchase "The far-famed English B. or German Spa." In Brome's Crew ii. 1, Hillard asks Rachel, "What think you of a journey to the B. then?" and she replies: "Worse than t'other way; I love not to carry my health where others drop their diseases." Taylor, Works 83, says, "St. Winifred's well, the B., or the Spa are not to be compared to this ship [the Sleeper] for speedy ease and cure." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Careless says, "These are diseases which neither the Spaw or B. can cure." In Dekker's Westward i. 2, Monopoly says to Moll, "You shall feign some scurvy disease or other, and go to the B. next spring; I'll meet you there." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 1, Agurtes, commending a lady to Trimalchio, says, "Neither takes she her journey once a year to the B., nor is so learned as to judge betwixt your poets." Herrick, in Epig. on Broomsted (1647), says, "Broomsted a lameness got by cold and beer And to the B. went to be cured there." One of Chaucer's Pilgrims was "A good wif . . . of beside Bathe," who was expert in the cloth-making which was the staple industry of the W. country. Nash, in Pierce D. 3, says, "Chaucer's Wife of B. shall be talked of whilst the B. is used." B. was the seat of a bishopric; the town-house of the Bps. of B. was in the Strand, a little W. of Temple Bar.

BATTERSEA. In Surrey, on the Thames, opposite to Chelsea; now included in Greater Lond. In the 16th cent. it was a country vill. Here was York House, built in 1475 as a town residence for the Archbps. of York: it stood near the r. on the site now occupied by Price's Candle Factory. The name in Domesday Book is Patricesey. The 10th Merry Jest in the Wido Edyth (1525) relates how this lady walked from Eltham to "a thorp called Batersay," whence she took a wherry and rowed over to Chelsea to visit Sir Thomas More.

BATTLE BRIDGE. Now King's Cross, the site of the terminus of the London & North Eastern Railway in Lond. It was originally a bidge. over the Fleet, where the famous battle occurred between Suetonius Paulinus and Boadicea A.D. 62, by which the Roman supremacy in Britain was established. It is the scene of B. & F. Bonduca iv. 4. In the neighbourhood were the huge dust-heaps amongst which the immortal Boffin, the golden dustman, lived and listened to Silas Wegg's rendering of "The Decline and Fall of the Rooshan Empire." The name is still retained by the bidge. running just N. of King's Cross Station from York Rd. to Pancras Rd. There was another B. B. across a little stream running into the Thames on the Southwark side, a little E. of Lond. Bidge.: so called from B. Abbey, which was the town residence of the abbots of B. Abbey in Sussex, near Hastings, and stood in what is still called the Maze, a little back from the r., opposite the Custom House. In Fair Women ii. 228, John Beane, on his way to Lond., is met by old John, who says to him, "I would thou hadst my Aqua vitæ bottle, to fill at the Black Bull by B. B." The Black Bull was in Gray's Inn Lane, which shows that the former B. B. is the one intended.

BAVARIA. An ancient duchy in the centre of Europe, stretching from the Upper Danube to the Alps. The capital is Munich, and amongst the more noteworthy towns are Baireuth, Nurnburg, and Augsburg. Goitre was known in the 17th cent. as the Bn. poke. Burton, A.M. i. 2, 11, 1, says, "Aubanus Bohemus refers that Struma, or Poke, of the Bns. and Styrians to the nature of their waters." In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 2, Mrs. Carol, criticizing Fairfield's appearance, says, "For your chin, it does incline to the Bn. poke." Burton, A.M. iii. 2, 3, speaks of a woman "with a Bn. poke under her chin." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 4, Slicer, in his extravagant praise of the political knowledge of the son of Credulous, says, "B. [would] lie close in some little gut," if he were to be dissected. In Lælia ii. 1, 14, Petrus says, "Quando ego hic fui Cum legato de Ancona consors a duce datus, Bavarizæ memini nos hospicio acceptos Apud domum Guitziardinam." This was Guicciardini, the famous Italian diplomatist, who from 1515 onward was Governor of Modena. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, the clerk says of "the D. of Bavier": "He has taken a gray habit and is turned The Ch.'s miller, grinds the Catholic grist With every wind; and Tilly takes the toll." Maximilian I of B. took the Austrian side against the Bohemians, and made Tilly the commander-in-chief of his armies. After the defeat of the Bohemians he received a portion of the Palatinate as his reward.

BAWTRY. A mkt. town in W. Riding, Yorks., on the border of Notts., 153 m. N. of Lond., and on the main N. Rd. In Downfall Huntington v. 1, the Friar reports, "The Priest and the proud prior are stripped and wounded in the way to B."

BAYDON. A vill. in Wilts., near the border of Berks., some 32 m. N.E. of Salisbury. Near to it is Wolf's Hall, where Henry VIII was married to Jane Seymour. An avenue in the grounds is still called K. Henry's Walk. In S. Rowley's When you D. 3, the K., on the eve of his midnight excursion through the sts. of Lond. à la Haroun al-Raschid, says to Cumption, "The watchword is the great stag of B., so my name shall be."

BAYNARD'S CASTLE. An ancient castle on the N. bank of the Thames in Lond. It stood at what is now the W. end of Q. Victoria St., close to where Blackfriars Bidge. crosses the r. The r. came up to its walls, and it had a stairs at which boat could be taken. It was built by Ralph Barnard, who came over with the Conqueror. In 1111 it was forfeited to the Crown and bestowed on Robert Fitz-Walter, in whose family the office of Castellan and Standard-bearer to the City of Lond. became hereditary. The Robert Fitz-Walter of John's reign took part with the Barons against the K., and in revenge John ordered the Castle to be destroyed. Robert, however, became reconciled to the K. and was permitted to rebuild his Castle. One version of the story is told in Davenport's Matilda, according to which the K. made love to Fitz-Walter's daughter, Matilda; but the lady refusing to comply with his wishes, he destroyed B. C. and poisoned her at Dunmow. In i. 1, Fitzwater sends a message to the K.: "Tell John," quoth he, "That here at B. C. we intend A settled stay"; and the next scene takes place there. The same story is told in Chettle's Death Huntington. In ii. 1, the K. says, "If my hidden courtesy she [Matilda] grace, Old B. C., good Fitzwater's place, John will make rich." The Fitzwater who appears in R2 was the 5th Baron, and still held B. C. It was burnt down in 1248 and rebuilt by Humphrey of Gloucester. On his death it reverted to the Crown, and was granted by Henry VI to the D. of York. Here Edward IV assumed the royal title; and here he left his wife and children when he went to meet Warwick at Barnet. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 134, Clarence says, "I'll keep within my house at Baimard's C. Until I hear how my dread sovereign takes it." Richd. of Gloucester was living here at the time of his usurpation. In R3 iii. 5, 98, he orders Buckingham, when he sends him to sound the Lord Mayor and citizens, "If you thrive well, bring them to B. C. Where you shall find me well accompanied With reverend fathers and well-learned Bps." Then, in 105, he despatches Lovel to Dr. Shaw, and Catesby to Friar Penker, with the direction: "Bid them meet me here within this hour At B. C." The next scene, in which Richd., appearing between 2 clergymen, accepts the offer of the Crown from the citizens, is laid here. In True Trag., the Page relates, "In the afternoon came down my Lord Mayor and the aldermen to B. C., and offered my Lord the whole estate upon him, and offered to make him k." Henry VIII converted it from a fortress into a palace, and it was here that he entertained the K. of Castile, when he was driven to England by a storm. In S. Rowley's When you D. 2, the K. (Henry VIII) orders Brandon to attend him "at B.-C." The C. next passed into the hands of the Pembroke, and the Earl held great state in it during the reign of Edward VI; and here he proclaimed Mary Q. In Webster's Wyat, Haz., p. 23, Ambrose announces, "In B. C. was a council held And 'twas concluded to proclaim Q. Mary." Later, he entertained Elizabeth there with a banquet and fireworks. It was finally destroyed in the Gt. Fire of 1666. Shakespeare must have been very familiar with the old c., for the Blackfriars Theatre was just behind it in Printing House Sq.; and it is on record that he possessed a house "abutting upon a st. leading down to Pudle Wharffe on the E. part, right against the Kinges Majesties Wardrobe." St. Andrew's Hill, the inn at the corner of which still retains the name of the old c., was then called Puddledock Hill; and the Wardrobe was just behind the present offices of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In Yarrington's Two Trag. iv. 1, Merry proposes to leave the head and legs of the murdered Beech "in some dark place near to Baines C." In Middleton's Triumph Truth, in the directions for the pageant, we read, "The first that attends to receive his Lordship off the water at B. C. is Truth's Angel on horseback."

BAYONA. A town on the W. coast of Spain, 70 m. S. of Cape Finisterre. Milton, in Lyc. 162, describes the archangel Michael looking from St. Michael's Mt. "towards Namancos and B.'s hold." No land intervenes between the S. point of Cornwall and the N.W. coast of Spain.

BAYONNE. A city in S. France, at the confluence of the Nive and Adour, 3 m. from the sea. It is a Bp.'s see, and the cathedral of Notre Dame is a fine Gothic building of the 12th cent. In H8 ii. 4, 172, Henry declares that the first scruples which he felt abt. his marriage were inspired "On certain speeches uttered By th' Bp. of Bayon, then French ambassador, Who had been hither sent on the debating A marriage 'twixt the D. of Orleans and Our daughter Mary." This Bp. of B. was the famous Jean du Bellay, afterwards Archbp. of Paris and a cardinal. He was Ambassador to England in 1528, and in 1533 he came again to try to persuade Henry to withdraw his appeal from the Pope to a General Council. But the negotiations for Mary's marriage were not conducted by him, but by the Bp. of Tarbes in 1527. The mistake is due to Holinshed, whom Shakespeare follows almost verbally in this speech.

BEAME. See BOHEMIA.

BEAR, THE. A very well-known tavern at the Southward end of Lond. Bdge. It was pulled down in 1761. In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 3, Morose mockingly predicts that when Sir Dauphine has managed to borrow 10 shillings, "it knighthood shall go to the Cranes or to the B.

at the Bridgefoot, and be drunk in fear." In the Puritan i. 4, Corporal Oath swears by "yon B. at Bridgefoot." In Field's Weathercock iii. 3, Pouts sends his man to "bespeak supper at the B. and provide oars; I'll see Gravesend to-night." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Kickshaw invites Lady Bornwell to be his guest at "the B. at the Bdge. foot"; and in v. 1, Frederick enters in a very much excited condition and explains it by saying that he has been "at the B. at the Bridgefoot." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 1, the Capt. says, "We have not met these 3 years till to-day, and at the B. we meant to have dined." In v. 1, he says that one of the watermen is gone "to Cook's at the B. for some bottles of his best wine." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Alicia says, "At the B. at the Bridge-foot 6 a clock I find my lord's appointments." In his Moor iv. 2, Quicksands mentions, "Bridgefoot B., the Tunnes, the Cats, the Squirrels," as haunts of his faithless wife. In Middleton's No Wit v. 1, Weatherwise, the astrologer, speaks of "Ursa Major, that great hunks, the B. at the Bridgefoot in heaven." It is sometimes called simply the Bridgefoot. In Brome's Northern i. 5, Pate asks, "Where is the supper? At the Bridgefoot or the Cat?" Taylor, in Carriers Cosmography, mentions a B. Tavern in Bassishaw, i.e. Basinghall St.

BEAR. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Fisher's Fuimus was "Printed by I. L. for Robert Allott and are to be sold at the sign of the Beare in Pauls-church-yard. 1633." England's Helicon was "Printed by I. R. for John Flasket and are to be sold in Pauls churchyard at the sign of the Beare. 1600."

BEARBINDER LANE. A narrow passage in Lond., running along the E. side of the old Stocks Mkt, which stood on the site of the present Mansion House, from St. Swithin's Lane into Lombard St.: now called George St. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 2, Knavesby says to Mrs. Water-Camlet, "I'll bring you [to Lombard St.] through B. L."; to which the lady replies, "B. L. cannot hold me; I'll the nearest way over St. Mildred's ch."

BEAR GARDEN. An enclosed place on the Bankside, Southwark, where the amusement of bear-baiting was carried on. The site is on the right of Southwark Bdge. Rd. as one goes from the r., and is indicated by B. G. Alley and the inn called the White B. Shakespeare does not mention the Gardens, but has many references to the sport. "Why do your dogs bark so?" asks Slender, "be there bears i' the town?" To which Anne Page replies, "I think there are, Sir; I heard them talked of." "I love the sport well," says Slender, "but I shall as soon quarrel at it as any man in England. You are afraid if you see the bear loose, are you not?" "Ay, indeed, Sir," says Anne. "That's meat and drink to me now," says the valorous simpleton; "I have seen Sackerson loose 20 times and have taken him by the chain" (M. W. W. i. 1, 298). Malvolio, being as a Puritan opposed to the sport, brought Fabian out o' favour with his lady about a bear-baiting (Tw. IV. ii. 5, 11). Falstaff is as melancholy as "a lugged bear" (H4 A. i. 2, 83). Richd. of York "bore him in the thickest troop . . . as a bear, encompassed round with dogs, Who having pinched a few and made them cry, The rest stand all aloof and bark at him" (H6 C. ii. 1, 15). "We'll bait thy bears to death," says Clifford, referring to the cognizance of the Nevilles, "And manacle their bear-ward in their chains, If thou darest bring them to the baiting place"; to which Richd. replies, "Oft have I seen a hot o'erweening cur Run back and bite, because he was withheld; Who, being suffered with the bear's fell paw, Hath clapped his tail between his legs and cried" (H6 B. v. 1, 149). "I cannot fly," says Macbeth, "but, bearlike, I must fight the course" (Mac. v. 7, 2). "I would I had bestowed that time in the tongues," laments Sir Andrew "that I have in fencing, dancing, and bear-baiting" (Tw. N. i. 3, 96). Stow says, "As for the baiting of bulls and bears they are to this day much frequented, namely, in B. Gs., on the Bank's Side wherein be prepared scaffolds for beholders to stand upon." Camden says, "Among these buildings [on the Bank-side] there is a place in manner of a theatre for baiting of beares and Bulls with Dogges." The Puritan Mrs. Flowerdew, in Randolph's Muses' i. 1, in denouncing the theatres, prays that "the Bull [i.e. the Red Bull Theatre] might cross the Thames to the B.-G. and there be soundly baited." In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Tristram, giving an account of the origin of "roaring," says, "then it was heard to the Bankside and the bears they began to roar."

The sport was as popular as football is now. In Jonson's Epicoene we have a picture of a bear-baiting enthusiast in Tom Otter, "a great man at the b.-g. in his time," who named all his cups and flagons after bulls and bears (ii. 4), and proposes to have the story of Pasiphaë "painted in the B.-G. ex Ovidii Metamorphosi." People even reckoned dates by the bear-baitings, as they do now by the winners of the Derby. In Lyly's Bombie iv. 2, Silena, being asked her age, answers, "I shall be 18 next bear-baiting." The names of the bears were well known. In the Puritan iii. 6, we hear of "George Stone, the bear"; in Jonson's Epicoene iii. 1, of "Ned Whiting and George Stone"; Sackerson we have already met in M. W. W. Sir John Davy reproaches the law students for leaving their work to see "old Harry Hunks and Sackerson." In Goosecap iii. 1, Sir Gyles tells of a mastiff he had which "fought with great Sekerson 4 hours to 1." In Val. Welsh. i. 2, Morgan says, "I will fight for you with all the George Stones or the Ursa Majors under the sun." Peacham, in Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), speaks of "Hunks of the B.-g." In 1591 the Privy Council issued an order forbidding plays to be acted on Thursdays, because they interfered with the bear-baiting; and the Lord Mayor followed it up with an injunction, in which he blames the players for "reciting their plays to the great hurt and destruction of the game of bear-baiting." Elizabeth took great delight in it: Laneham describes a bear-baiting given at Kenilworth for her delectation. "It was a sport very pleasant of these beasts," he says, "to see the bear . . . when he was loose, to shake his ears twice or thrice with the blood and the slaver about his fizinamy, was a matter of a goodly relief." Metaphors from this source passed into the popular language. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. v. 2, Orlando says, "You're a couple of wild bears; I'll have ye both baited at one stake." In B. & F. Mad Lover iv. 1, the Fool proposes a game of bear-baiting: "Let's have a bear-baiting; you shall see me play the rarest for a single dog. At head all!" Anyone who has visited a menagerie will understand the figure in B. & F. Scornful iv. 1, "She stinks worse than a bear-baiting." In Brome's Antipodes iv. 1, the Old Woman says, "I can tell which dog does best without my spectacles; and though I could not, yet I love the noise; the noise revives me and the B.-g. scent refresheth much my smelling." In Cowley's Riddle i., Alupis says, "If you can patiently endure a stink Or have frequented e'r the City-B.g.," then kiss this old woman. Such phrases as "a bear with a sore head," "to go with as good will as a bear to the stake," "to do a thing as handsomely as a bear picks muscles," "to bait a person," "a regular b.-g." are all derived from this ancient sport. In Glaphorne's Hollander i. 1, Urinal says, "He may be led by the nose as quietly as the tamest bear in the garden." There was no love lost between the actors and the B. G., which interfered with their audiences. In the Actors' Remonstrance (1643), they complain that whilst the theatres were closed, "that nurse of barbarism and beastliness, the B.-g.," is permitted still to stand in statu quo prius. Jonson, in Masque of Gipsies, scoffs at "the diet and the knowledge Of the students in Bear-college"; and in the Famous Voyage he says, "The meat-boat of Bears-College, Paris Garden, Stunk not so ill." In the Epilogue to the Poetaster, he says of his rivals, "I can afford them leave to err so still; And like the barking students of Bears College, To swallow up the garbage of the time With greedy gullets." In Braithwaite's Barnaby's Journal the 7 sights of New-Troy (Lond.) are enumerated: "1. Tombes. 2. Guildhall Giants. 3. Stage Plays. 4. Bedlam-poor. 5. Ostrich. 6. B. G. 7. Lyons in the Tower." Dekker, in Armourers, gives a vivid description of the scene. "No sooner was I entered but the very noise of the place put me in mind of Hell; the bear dragged to the stake showed like a black rugged soul that was damned; the dogs like so many devils inflicting torments upon it. At length a blind Bear was tied to the stake, and instead of baiting him with dogs a company of creatures that had the shapes of men and faces of Christians (being either Colliers, Carters or Watermen) took the office of beadsles upon them and whipped monsieur Hunkes till the blood ran down his old shoulders." Sunday was a great day for bear-baiting. In Middleton's Hubburt, p. 98, the begging soldier laments that "all the fares went by water a-Sundays to the bear-baiting."

BEARS COLLEGE. See BEAR GARDEN.

BEARS, THREE. See THREE BEARS.

BEAUFORT. Formerly an important town in Anjou, on the right bank of the Loire. The castle of B. came into the possession of the house of Lancaster by the marriage of Blanche, daughter of Robert I of Artois, to Edmund of Lancaster in 1276. John of Gaunt gave the name to his children by his 3rd wife, Catherine Swynford, because they were born there. These were (1) John, Earl of Somerset, whose son John, afterwards D. of Somerset, is the Somerset of H6 A; he died in 1444 and was succeeded by his brother Edmund, who is the Somerset of H6 B., and was killed at the 1st battle of St. Albans 1455; his son Henry was beheaded by the Yorkists after the battle of Hexham 1464 (H6 C. v. 5, 3—"For Somerset, off with his guilty head"), and was succeeded by his brother Edmund, who appears (quite unhistorically) in H6 C. iv. 1.

(2) Henry, who entered the Ch., was Bp. of Lincoln 1397; Bp. of Winchester 1404; Cardinal and Papal Legate 1417; died 1447. He is the B. of H6 A. and H6 B. In H6 A. i. 3, he is called by Gloucester, "Arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate" (23); "Winchester goose" (53); "B. that regards nor God nor K." (60). The K. patches up the quarrel in iii. 1, "Pie, Uncle B." (127). He is the Uncle Winchester and Uncle B. of H6 B. i. 1. Margaret (i. 3, 72) counts "B., the imperious churchman," as amongst her enemies. York (ii. 2, 71) advises his friends to "wink at B.'s pride."

The Duchess of Gloucester warns her husband (ii. 4, 53) against "impious B., that false priest." At Gloucester's arrest (iii. 1, 154), "B.'s red sparkling eyes blab his heart's malice." Warwick declares (iii. 2, 124) that Gloucester has been murdered "by Suffolk and the Cardinal B.'s means." Suffolk protests (180), "Myself and B. had him in protection." "Is B. termed a kite?" exclaims the indignant Q. (196); "Where are his talons?" Then comes Vaux with the news "that Cardinal B. is at point of death" (369). In the next scene the Cardinal "dies and makes no sign."

(3) Thomas, D. of Exeter, Chancellor under Henry IV, was made D. of Exeter by Henry V in 1416. In H5 he appears in i. 2 and ii. 3 under the title of Exeter, though he was at that time only Earl of Dorset. He is also represented as being present at Agincourt, though, as a matter of fact, he had been left behind at Harfleur, as is implied in H5 iii. 3, 51: "Come, uncle Exeter, Go you and enter Harfleur; there remain And fortify it strongly 'gainst the French." He died in 1426, and therefore was not present at the coronation of Henry VI in 1431, as he is represented to be in H6 A. iv. 1. The present Dukedom of B. was created 1682, and is in the Somerset family. There is a Lord B. in Jonson's New Inn; and in v. 1, the Nurse tells him that Lætitia "hath more and better blood . . . Than all the race of Bs. have in mass, Though they distil their drops from the left rib Of John o' Gaunt."

BEAUMOND. The Lord of B. (Holinshed "Beaumont") is mentioned as one of the lords who had gone over to Bolingbroke (R2 ii. 2, 54). He was Henry, the 5th Baron Beaumont. The 1st Baron came to England in the time of Edward I, and was created a Baron of England in 1309. He derived his title from the Castle of Beaumont, on the Rille, in Normandy, 80 m. W. of Paris. There is a French Lord Beaumont amongst those who were killed at Agincourt (H5 iii. 5, 44, and iv. 8, 105).

BEAUNE. A city of France, in Burgundy, abt. 180 m. S.E. of Paris. The D. of Guise endeavoured to secure B. in 1594, and threw a garrison into it; but the people invited Biron to their assistance and he drove out the garrison of the League. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy recalls to the K. how Byron "did take in B. in view of that invincible army Led by the Lord Gt. Constable of Castile."

BEBES (= BEBEIS; now LAKE KARLA). A large lake in E. Thessaly, at the foot of the Pelion Range. It was sacred to Athene. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Medea goes to gather herbs "where rushy Bebes and Anthedon flow."

BEBRITIA (= BEBRYCIA, an ancient name for BITHYNIA). Bebritius, K. of Bebritia, is one of the characters in Chapman's Blind Beggar. He is entirely unhistorical.

BECCLES (or BECKLES). A town in Suffolk, on the Waveney, 109 m. N.E. of Lond. In Greene's Friar iii. 38, Lacy pretends to Margaret, "Faith, lovely girl, I am of Beckles by, Your neighbour."

BEDFORD. The county town of Beds., on the Gt. Ouse, 50 m. N.W. of Lond. It had a strong castle built by Paine de Beauchamp in the reign of William II. It was demolished in the reign of Henry III and hardly any traces of it are left. John, the 3rd son of Henry IV, was created D. of B. in 1414. He is the Prince John of Lancaster who appears in H4 A. iii. 2, 169: "My son, Lord John of Lancaster." In iii. 3, 218, the Prince says,

"Go bear this letter to Lord John of Lancaster, to my brother John." At the battle of Shrewsbury Prince Henry says, "By God, thou hast deceived me, Lancaster; I did not think thee lord of such a spirit" (v. 4, 17); and later, "Brother John of Lancaster, To you this honourable bounty shall belong. Go to the Douglas and deliver him Up to his pleasure ransomless and free" (v. 5, 25). In H4 B. i. 1, 134, we learn that a power has been sent against Northumberland "under the conduct of young Lancaster"; in i. 2, 228, that Falstaff is going with Lord John of Lancaster against the Archbp. and the Earl of Northumberland; in i. 3, 80 the news of his coming is conveyed to Hotspur; in iv. 1, 162, Westminster declares that Prince John has full commission to deal with the rebels; and in iv. 2, he arrests them in violation of the pledge he has just given. In iv. 5, 226, he comes to the bedside of his dying father; in v. 2 and 4 he is in attendance on the young K., his brother. He appears as B. in H5 i. 2, ii. 2, iii. 1, iv. 1 (where the K. greets him "Good morrow, brother B."), iv. 3 and v. 2. This is not historically accurate, as he was not in France at this time, but was left in England as Lieut. of the Realm during the K.'s absence. He was godfather to Henry VI, and was appointed by Henry V, on his deathbed, Regent of France, which office he held till his death in 1435. He died at Rouen, and is buried in the Cathedral there. In H6 A. he is present at the funeral of Henry V (i. 1); he reaches Orleans (ii. 2); and in iii. 2, he is brought in sick in a chair before the walls of Rouen and dies there. "A braver soldier," says Talbot, "never couched lance; A gentler heart did never sway in Court" (134). In H6 B. i. 1, 83, Gloucester, protesting against the cession of Anjou and Maine to France, exclaims, "Did my brother B. toil his wits To keep by policy what Henry got? . . . Shall Henry's conquest, B.'s vigilance, Your deeds of war and all our counsel die?" This B. appears in i. 1 of Day's B. Beggar. The present dukedom was created in 1694, and is in the Russell family.

The name of the county has naturally suggested its punning use for bed. Children are told "It's time to go to Bshire." In Middleton's Mad World ii., Sir Bounteous says to the supposed burglars, "You're no true Lincolnshire spirits; you come rather out of Bshire, we cannot be quiet in our beds for you." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 3, 67, Nimble says, "Here's a note of 700 whisperers, most of them sleepy knaves; we pulled them out of Bsheere."

The scene of Lawyer is laid in B. In i., Valentine, a travelling quack-doctor, says, "I had no sooner set up my bills in Bshire, but a gouty cure comes halting to me." In iv, Vaster says, "Now the water's up, that we cannot get over to the Abbey." Newnham Abbey is meant, which lies on the S. side of the Ouse, close to Elstow. There were terrible floods in B. on Oct. 5, 1570, which are celebrated in an old ballad printed by Collier in 1840, in which it is said, "The ch. was overflowed in B., named Poules."

BEDLAM (Bm. = Bethlem, Bem. = Bethlehem). A corruption of Bm., or Bem.; applied to the Priory of St. Mary of Bem., founded in 1247 by Simon Fitz-Mary, Sheriff of Lond. It was situated outside Bishopsgate, near St. Botolph's Ch., and had the duty of entertaining the Bp. and Canons of Bem. as often as they should come to Lond. It was soon used as a hospital, and in 1402 was specially appropriated to lunatics. In 1546 it was taken over by the City, and on the dissolution of the monasteries in 1547 was exempted, and granted by the

K. to the citizens of Lond. The unhappy patients were sent out begging with a metal badge on their arms, and were known as Bs. The word was then applied to any demented person. The building was replaced by one near Lond. Wall in 1676; and in 1812 the foundation-stone of a new hospital to take its place was laid in St. George's Fields, Lambeth. When York claims to be K., Clifford cries, "To B. with him! is the man grown mad?" To which K. Henry replies, "Ay, Clifford, a b. and ambitious humour makes him oppose himself against his K." (H6 B. v. 1, 131). In H6 B. iii. 1, 51, the Duchess of Gloucester is described as "the b. brainsick Duchess." "Ha! art thou b.?" says Pistol to Fluellen (H5 v. 1, 20). "B., have done," says John to Constance (K. J. ii. 1, 183). In Lear i. 2, 148, Edmund, disregarding the anachronism, says, "My cue is villainous melancholy, with a sigh like Tom o' B." In ii. 3, 14, Edgar, meditating on his disguise, says, "The country gives me proof and precedent Of B. beggars, who, with roaring voices, Strike in their numbred and mortified bare arms Pins, wooden pricks, nails, sprigs of rosemary; And with this horrible object, from low farms . . . Sometime with lunatic bans, sometime with prayers, Enforce their charity"; and in iii. 6, 103, the servant of Gloucester says, "Let's follow the old Earl and get the B. to lead him where he would."

B. was a favourite resort of people of fashion, who amused themselves by watching the antics of the unfortunate patients. "Go with us," says Lady Haughty, "to B., to the China Houses, and to the Exchange" (Jonson, Epicoene iv. 2). Contributions for its support were welcomed: Face suggests that Mammon may be forgiven his "vice and lust," and secure the philosopher's stone "for some good penance: a £100 to the box at Bethlam for the restoring such as—have their wits!" (Jonson, Alchemist iv. 3). Dekker transports it to Milan: "Bm. monastery! it is the school where those that lose their wits practise to find them" (Hon. Wh. A. iv. 4); and in v. 2, a vivid description is given of a visit to B., where the various types of madmen are exhibited for the benefit of the company. Legal warrant was necessary both to confine and to release the patients. "Take a mittimus," says Greedy, "and carry him [Overreach] to B." (Massinger, New Way v. 1). "They had warrant from your Grace," says Viola, "to carry him [Candido] to Bm. monastery, whence they will not free him without your Grace's hand that sent him in" (Dekker, Hon. Wh. A. v. 1). "Diccon, the Bi." is one of the characters in Gurton. In Jack Durm ii., 3, Flawne says of Mammon, "I'll even lay him up in B.; commit him to the mercy of the whip, the entertainment of bread and water"; and in v. 205, Drum says, "M. Mammon is in a city of Jurie called Bm., alias plain B. The price of whips is mightily risen, since his brain was pitifully overtumbled; they are so fast spent upon his shoulders." In Shirley's Fair One iii. 4, Aimwell exhorts Fowler, "Do not fool thyself beyond the cure of B." In Harman's Caveat ix., we read, "These Abraham men be those that feign themselves to have been mad, and have been kept either in Bern. or in some other prison a good time." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Justiniano speaks of pent houses that make "the shop of a mercer or a linen draper as dark as a room in B." The dark room was used to cure madmen. Cf. Malvolio's treatment in Tw. N. iv. 2.

Female lunatics had the generic name of "Bess of B.," corresponding to the male "Tom of B." There is an old chapbook entitled, "Bess of B.'s Garland." They were also called "Joans of B." In Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 299, Tucca addresses Miniver as "Joane-a-B." In Braithwaite's Barnaby's Journal, "B. poor" is mentioned as one of the 7 sights of Lond. In Brome's Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Strangelove, complaining of a disturbance, says, "The noise of B. is soft music to it." In Shirley's Bird ii., Rolliardo says, "All the world is but a B., a house of correction to whip us into our senses." In Dekker's Northward iv. 3, we have the following dialogue. Bellamont: "Yonder's the Dolphin without Bp.'s Gate. Come, cross over; and what place is this?" Mayberry: "B., is't not?" Bellamont: "Where the madmen are? I was never amongst them; as you love me, gentlemen, let's see what Greeks are within." In Brome's Academy i. 1, Strigood speaks of "your locks and lady-ware that dangle in them like straws in the bush natural of a B." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 2, Huntley scornfully says that the revellers at the Court of James are "Like to so many quirs of B. Trolling a catch." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker v. 1, 105, Maximinus says to the Nurse, "Speak, doting B., where's my daughter?" In Wit Woman 1463, Filenio calls Katharine in Shrew, "a B. quean who would never let her husband be at quiet." Dekker's Strange Horse Race was "Printed for Joseph Hunt and are to be sold at his shop in Bedlem near Moore-field Gate. 1613." See also BETHLEHEM.

BED-LANE. In Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Jarvis says, "This dinner would have showed better in B.-L." "I can find no B.-L. in Lond., and suspect we should read "Bedlam," q.v.

BEDNALL-GREEN. See BETHNALL GREEN.

BEECH LANE. The continuation of Barbican, between Redcross St. and Whitecross St., in Lond. At the corner of Redcross St. was a watch house for street brawlers: hence the lane became associated with them. In The Spiritual Courts Epitomised (1641), Scrape-all, the Proctor, says, "All Bloomsbury, Covent Garden, Long-acre, and B. L. were as fearful of me as of a constable." These were all places of bad repute.

BEERSHEBA (now BIR-ES-SABA). A well, said to have been originally dug by Abraham. It lies S. of Palestine, 27 m. S.W. of Hebron. From Dan to B. is used for the whole extent of the Holy Land. In Peele's Bethsabe iii. 2, Cusay advises Absalom to "gather men from Dan to Bersabe." In York M. P. x. 378, Abraham says, after the sacrifice of Isaac, "Go we home again even unto Barsabe." See Gen. xxii. 19. In Milton, P. L. iii. 536, Satan beholds the Promised Land "From Paneas, the fount of Jordan's flood, To Beersaba, where the Holy Land Borders on Egypt and the Arabian shore."

BEGGAR'S BUSH. A tavern in St. Giles', Lond., up a narrow lane nearly opposite to the ch. It was a notorious haunt of bad characters of all kinds. The name was changed to "The Hare and Hounds" in the reign of Charles II, owing to a hare having been caught there. It was destroyed in 1844, and its site is now in the middle of New Oxford St. It is mentioned in the list of taverns given by Valerius in T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, "the beggar to the Bush." Greene, in Quip, p. 218, speaks of "walking home by B. B. for a penance." It is stated by Brewer that there was a tree on the left hand of the Lond. Rd. from Huntingdon to Caxton called B. B., because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. One of B. & F. plays is entitled The Beggar's Bush.

BEGGAR'S MANOR. A cant name for the gallows. In Fulwell's Like, Dods. iii. 324, Newfangle says, "A piece of ground it is, that of B. M. doth hold, Called St. Thomas-a-Waterings or else Tyburn Hill": both places of execution.

BEHETHLEN. A place in the parish of St. Gluvias, at Penryn, in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2588, Solomon gives to the Carpenter, "Ol Gueel B," i.e. "All the field of B." In 2767 the bp. gives to the executioner who has killed Maximilla, "Behethlan ha Bosaneth," i.e. "B. and Bosaneth."

BELGIA (or more fully GALLIA BELGICA. Bm. = Belgium). The most N. division of Gaul, according to Cæsar. It lay between the Seine and Marne to the S., and the Rhine to the N. The Belgæ appear to have been Celtic in origin, but with a large infusion of Germanic blood. Cæsar subdued the Belgæ in 54 B.C., and henceforward B. became a province of the Roman Empire. In the Middle Ages B. commonly stands for the Netherlands generally, though it is more properly confined to the Spanish Netherlands, i.e. the S. Provinces which remained faithful to Spain, or were reconquered by Spain in the great revolt. The Spanish Netherlands were handed over to Austria by the Treaty of Utrecht (1713); were conquered by the French Republic (1792-94); were torn from France and unwillingly united to Holland on the fall of Napoleon; and in 1830 were constituted an independent kingdom, whose neutrality was a few years later guaranteed by France, England, and Prussia. In Fisher's Fuinus i. 1, Nennius, appealing to the Gauls to fight against Cæsar, cries: "Die, Belgics, die like men!" In Chapman's Cæsar i. 1, 28, Cato charges Cæsar with having recruited his army from the scum of "Britain, B., France, and Germany." In Lochrine ii. 1, 7, Humber boasts that "the ruler of brave B." could not prevent him and his Scythians from coming over to Albion. The whole story of Humber is pure legend. Bm. is used for the S. province of the Low Countries; and also as a general name for the whole of the Netherlands, including Limburg, Luxembourg, Gelderland, Brabant, Flanders, Artois, Hainault, Namurs, Zutphen, Holland, Zealand, W. Friesland, Utrecht, Over-Yssel, Maastricht, and Groyning. Heylyn says of the people (s.v. Bm.), "The men are for the most part well-proportioned, much given to our English beer, unmindful both of good turns and injuries. They did invent clocks, printing, and the compass. They restored music, and found out diverse musical instruments. To them also belong the invention of chariots, the laying of colours with oil, the working of pictures in glass; and the making of worsted, sayes, tapestry, etc. The women are of a good complexion, well-proportioned, especially in the leg and foot; honourers of virtue, active, and familiar. Both within doors and without they govern all"; (s.v. GERMANY) he says, "The Gauls fight for liberty, the Bns. for honours, the Germanes for gain." For illustration of the foregoing, see under NETHERLANDS, LOW COUNTRIES, DUTCH, and HOLLAND.

In H6 C. iv. 8, 1, Warwick relates that "Edward from B. . . . Hath passed in safety through the narrow seas." Edward had married his sister Margaret to Charles the Bold of Burgundy, to whom Flanders at this time belonged. In 1470, Edward, driven from England by Warwick and Montagu, took refuge with his sister; but in March 1471 he returned and, marching on Lond., defeated the Lancastrians at Barnet. In Err. iii. 2, 142, Antipholus, pursuing his inquiries into the topography of Dromio's cook-maid, asks, "Where stood B., the Netherlands?" To which Dromio modestly replies: "Oh, Sir, I did not look so low." In Marlowe's Ed. II iv. 4, the Q. says, "Our kindest friends in B. have we left, To cope with foes at home." In 1327 the Q. went to Hainault, and, having secured assistance there, sailed for England, where she captured the unhappy K. In Greene's Friar ix., Vandermaest comes over to try conclusions with Bacon; and Bungay assures him that there are scholars in Oxford who "may lecture it To all the Doctors of your Belgic schools." In Shirley's Pleasure ii. 1, Frederick finds Lady Bornwell being painted by "an outlandish man of art . . . a Belgic gentleman." The play was licensed in 1635; and one cannot mistake the reference to Rubens and Vandyke, who were both working in England abt. this time. Jonson, in his Epigram on Sir John Roe, speaks of "self-divided B.": referring to the union of the N. provinces as an independent State whilst the S. remained under Spanish rule. Hall, in Satires (1597) iv. 4, 45, describes Martius as "pointed on the shoulders. . . . As new come from the Bn. garrison." In Kyd's Solyman i. 3, Basilius tells of "a sore drought 'that happened' in some part of B.," i.e. the Low Countries. In Larum B. 2, d'Alva says, "I would not hear myself again so railed on, Not for half B.," and a few lines later, "I will fright these bouzing Begians" (misprint for Bns). Nash, in Pierce, C. 3, says of Philip of Spain, "He flies into the bosom of France and B., never withdrawing his forces till he hath devoured their welfare." Dekker, in News from Hell, says that Hell "lies lower than the 17 vallies of B." (Bm. was divided into 17 provinces at this time.) Donne, Elegy xi. 42 (1633), calls it "17-headed B." Peele, in Polyhymnia 197, says that Sir Thomas Knowles "wan his knightly spurs in B." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 49, speaks prophetically through the mouth of Merlin of Elizabeth's help given "to the Belgicke shore"; and in v. 10, he gives an allegorical account of the help given by the English to the Q. "Belgæ," the mother "of 17 goodly sons," i.e. the 17 provinces.

BELGIC SEA (the NORTH SEA). In Chettle's Hoffman B. 4, Otho, crowned with a red-hot crown, says, "All these Belgique seas That now surround us cannot quench this flame."

BELGRADE. The capital of Serbia, at the junction of the Save and Danube. It was held by the Hungarians from 1086 to 1522, when it was taken by the Turkish Sultan Solyman. In Selimus 507, Baiazet says to the messenger of Selim, "We give to him all great Samandria Bordering on B. of Hungaria." This was in 1512. Selim refused the offer. He says (543), "Here the Hungarian with his bloody cross Deals blows about to win B. again." This is a little premature, as B. was not in 1512 in the hands of the Turks, but was taken by Selim's successor in 1522.

In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have served "in Hungary against the Turk at the siege of B." As Moll Cutpurse, the heroine of the play, was born in 1584, Trapdoor must have been a centenarian to have been at the siege in 1522; but, of course, his talk is all empty rhodomontade.

BELL. A very common tavern sign: there were at least a dozen B. Taverns in Lond. The B. on the W. side of Gracechurch St., between Lombard St. and Cornhill, at the point now marked by B.-yard, was one of the inns in which plays were performed. In Tarlton's Jestes (1611), we are told that when Banks was exhibiting his horse Marocco at the Cross Keys in Gracious St., Tarlton, "playing at the Bel by," came in to see the show. Tarlton got a licence in Nov. 1583 to play "at the Sign of the B. in Gracious St." In Underwit iii. 3, Underwit asks, "What think you of the dromedary that was to be seen at the back side of the B. f. " There was another B. Inn in Aldersgate St., 2 doors from Barbican. Taylor started on his Penniless Pilgrimage from Lond. to Scotland " at the B. that's extra Aldersgate." In Long Meg xvii, there is a story of a dinner " at the B. in Aldersgate St." Taylor, in Carriers Cosmog. (1637), says that it was the house of call for the carriers from St. Albans and from Hatfield. Another stood on the N. side of Holborn, next to Furnival's Inn. In Fleetwood's Report to Lord Burghley (1584) on the disturbances in the neighbourhood of the Theatre and Curtain, mention is made of a certain Browne who started a row at the door of the theatre, and was subsequently arrested " at the B. in Holborn." According to Taylor it was the house of call for the carriers from Aylesbury. Dekker, in Rod for Runaways, tells of a man who in the plague-time " dropped down dead by All-gate [i.e. Aldgate] at the B.-tavern door." Richd. Quiney addressed a letter to Shakespeare " from the B. in Carter-Lane " in 1598. It was on the S. side of the lane. There was a B. on the N. side of the Strand, near the end of Little Drury Lane. Deloney, in Newberie xi, tells of a gentlewoman " who lodged at the B. in the Strand." Another was on the W. side of Friday St., about half way down the st. According to Taylor the carriers from Burford lodged there. It is mentioned in Cal. State Papers (1603-10) 455, as a place to which letters might be sent for Sir Thomas Estcourt.

There were other B. Taverns : on the E. side of Coleman St., in Fleet St. near Temple Bar, on the E. side of Warwick St., on the E. side of St. John's St., near Hicks's Hall, on the E. side of W. Smithfield, on the W. side of Old Fish St., on the W. side of Wood St., and on the W. side of Walbrook, near the Stocks Market. In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, the porter, one of Hobson's men, says, " I have come from the B. sweating." Here B. is a misprint or mistake for BULL, q.v.

BELL. A tavern at Stratford-at-Bow. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby says, " Go take my horse at the B. at Stratford and make haste."

BELL. A tavern at Waltham. The scene of B. & F. Pestle ii. 6, and iii. 2, is laid there. Tim says, " Why, we are at Waltham town's end, and that's the B. Inn !"

BELL. An inn at Henley-on-Thames, whose hostess was magically brought thence to Oxford by Friar Bacon in Greene's Friar ii. 128. Possibly the B. Inn at Hurley, 3 m. E. of Henley, is meant. The Henley Inn is the Red Lion, as most Londoners know.

BELLANNA. One of the fortresses in which, according to H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iii. 4, Huneric, K. of the Vandals, had Christian slaves confined. It might be Belanig, near Cyrene; or Belo, on the Straits of Gibraltar.

BELL SAVAGE INN. A famous Lond. tavern on the N. side of Ludgate Hill : pulled down in 1873 and replaced by Cassell, Petter, and Galpin's printing works. It was first called the B.-on-the-Hoop, but in the middle of the 15th cent. it was named after its owner Savages' Inn; and the 2 names were subsequently combined. It was one of the inns used for the performance of plays before the theatres were built. Lambard, writing in 1596, speaks of " such as go to Paris Garden, the B. S., or Theatre, to behold bear-baiting, interludes or fence-play." Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 40, commends " the 2 prose books played at the Belsavage, where you shall find never a word without wit." When Wyatt marched on Lond. in 1554 " he marched to Temple Bar and so through Fleet St. till he came to B.

S., an Inn nigh unto Ludgate." Here Banks used to exhibit his famous horse Marocco; and Marocco's Exstasticus, or Banks' Bay Horse in a Trance, was dedicated to " mine host of the Belsavage." It is to Banks's horse that Moth refers in L. L. L. i. 2, 57 : " The dancing horse will tell you." In Gascoigne's Government, prol., he says, " Who seeks to feed his eye with vain delight B. S. fair were fittest for his purse," i.e. the shows at the B. S. I. In Downfall Huntingdon i. 3, Little John says, " Your horses at the B. shall ready be; I mean Belsavage." Taylor, in Carriers Cosmog., says, " The carriers of Doncaster in Yorkshire and many other parts in that country do lodge at the B., or Belle Sauvage, without Ludgate."

BELMONT. The home of Portia in Merch. The name is taken from The Adventures of Gianetto. He sails with his companions from Venice for Alexandria; and having sailed " for several days together " they came to " the port of the Lady of B." It is " in a gulph of the sea," and is on the mainland of Italy, for Giannetto rides back to Venice. There is a Ch. of St. John in the city, which is represented as being of considerable size, and there is a fine castle in which the lady lives. It is probably an imaginary town. Shakespeare follows his author in making B. on the coast of Italy, for Bassanio goes thither by sea (ii. 6, 64) and Portia comes thence to Venice by coach (iii. 4, 82). The following scenes of Merch. are laid at B. : i. 2; ii. 1, 7, 9; iii. 2, 4, 5; and v.

BELSIZE. The old name for S. Hampstead, Lond. N.W. It originally belonged to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, and it was quite recently (1870) that they handed B. Avenue over to the parish of Hampstead. At the lower end of the Avenue stood B. House, which, after being occupied by Lord Wotton and by Lord Chesterfield, was opened as a sort of suburban Vauxhall by one Howall. It was pulled down in 1852. In Jonson's Tub i. 1, " Loud To-pan the tinker or metal-man of Belsize, the thirdborough," is one of " a knot of clowns, the council of Finsbury, so they are styled," who have met to find a husband for Mrs. Awdrey.

BELTICK. I conjecture this to be a misprint for Deltic. Ford is speaking throughout this passage of classical localities, and the Roman corn-supply was mainly procured from Egypt, and exported from the Delta of the Nile. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, " A 100 grains, Both from the B. and Sicilian fields, Shall be congested for thy sacrifice."

BELVOIR CASTLE (pronounced BEVER). The seat of the Ds. of Rutland, near Grantham, on the borders of Lincs. and Leicestersh. The second production of Jonson's Gipsies was at B. So in the Epilogue he says, " At Burleigh, Bever, and now last at Windsor, Which shows we are gipsies of no common kind, Sir." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, commends the delightful prospect to be seen from " Bever c."

BEMISH. See BOHEMIA.

BENACUS (now the LAGO DI GARDA). The largest of the Italian lakes, at the foot of the Alps. It runs almost N. and S., and is about 35 m. long; its S. extremity is abt. 15 m. W. of Verona. The Mincius issues from its S.E. corner. Pliny says that numberless eels were caught at the outlet of the Mincius in October. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality mentions " eels of B." amongst other dainties for the table. Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 177 (1595), says, " The lake B. is much commended for the store of good carps and other good fish." Coryat, in Crudities (1611) 333, says of Lake B., "It aboundeth with fish, especially carps, trouts, and eels."

BENE'T COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE. See CORPUS CHRISTI.

BENEVENTO. A city in Italy, abt. 95 m. S.E. of Rome, near the junction of the Calore and Sabbato. In Ford's Sacrifice i. 2, d'Avolos informs the D. of Pavia that Roseilli has "departed towards B., determining to pass to Seville."

BENGAL. One of the great provinces of India, including the lower valleys of the Ganges and Brahmapootra. The capital is Calcutta. Marco Polo (1298) has the form Bangala; other variants are Bengala (Vasco da Gama) and Bengala. In B. & F. Women Pleased i. 2, Lopez, counting up his wealth, says, "Here's rubies of Ba., rich, rich, glorious." Milton, P. L. ii. 638, describes a fleet "by equinoctial winds Close sailing from Ba."

BENJAMITES. The members of the tribe of Benjamin, who lived in the dist. of Palestine just N. of Judæa. From the incident recorded in Judges xix., the name came to be used for the perpetrators of unnatural offences. In Bale's Laws ii., Sodomy says, "I dwelt among the Sodomites, the B., and Midianites, and now the popish hypocrites embrace me everywhere." In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, David reproaches Hanon because he has "Suffered Rabbah with the Philistine To rail upon the tribe of Benjamin."

BEN JONSON'S HEAD. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Lond. Lust's Domin., attributed to Marlowe, was "Printed for F. K. and are to be sold by Robert Pollard at the sign of B. J. H. on the Backside of the Old Exchange. 1657." Day's B. Beggar was "Printed for R. Pollard and Tho. Dring and are to be sold at the B. J. H. behind the Exchange. 1659." T. Heywood's Fortune was published at the same place in 1655.

BENNET, CHURCH OF ST. There were 4 churches in Lond. dedicated to St. B., or Benedict, viz. St. B. Finke in Threadneedle St.; St. B. Graschurch in Gracechurch St. (so called from the Grass Market held there); St. B. Shorne, Shrog, or Shorehog, in St. Sithe's Lane, and St. B. Hythe, or Paul's Wharf, on the N. side of Thames St., on the corner of St. B.'s Hill. This last was near to the Blackfriars Theatre and Shakespeare's house, and is probably the one intended in Tw. N. v. 1, 42: "The bells of St. B., Sir, may put you in mind: one, two, three." It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt in 1683. Here Inigo Jones was buried 1652; and Henry Fielding, the novelist, married in 1747. It is now devoted to Welsh services.

BENTHUISEN. There are several Huissens in the Low Countries. Probably the one intended here is Huyssse, a vill. in Belgium, 12 m. S.W. of Ghent. It is an ancient place, dating back to Roman times. In B. & F. Beggar's, one of the characters is Arnold of B.

BERGAMO. The capital of the province of same name in N. Italy. It lies between the Brembo and the Serio 39 m. N.E. of Milan and 120 W. of Padua. "Thy father! O villain! he is a sail-maker in B.," says Vincentio to Tranio (Shrew, v. 1, 81). The Bergamask dance (M. N. D. v. 1, 360) was a rustic dance of the people of this province, from which came also the Harlequin of the popular Italian comedy. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. 1, 3, the D. says, "B. doth stand in a most wholesome air; sweet walks; there's deer. In, girl, and prepare this night to ride to B." Nash, in Almond for Parrat, ded., says, "Taking B. in my way homeward it was my hap to light in fellowship with that famous Francatipp's Harlicken." In Tarlton's News from Purgatory we have the story of the Vicar of B., who sits with a coal in his mouth for playing the same trick with his relics which is told in Boccaccio (Decam. vi. 10). In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "subtle B., most highly honoured for near relation to Torquato Tasso." Tasso's father was born at B., and a statue of the poet stands in the great square.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM. Town in Holland, 15 m. N. of Antwerp, on the Zoom. It has an old castle which broadens from the base upwards. It was besieged by the D. of Parma in 1588, and again by Spinola in 1622: both generals being unsuccessful in taking the town. Jonson, in Underwoods 62, says that the Lond. trainbands acted "the B. siege and taking in Bredau" in such a lifelike way that it would have made Spinola blush. In Shirley's Bird iv. 1, Bonamico, showing his birds, says, "This was the pigeon was so shrewdly handled for carrying letters at the siege of B." In Beguiled, Cricket speaks of "an honest Dutch cobbler that will sing 'I will not more to Burgaine go.'" Barnavelt's son says, "My government of Barghen is disposed of" (Barnavelt iii. 1). He was removed by Prince Maurice. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, "If ever you come to B., see you make it wisely." Here "B." is a pun on "bargain."

BERIA. Used for Tilbury in Dekker's Babylon. Titania (Elizabeth) says, "Over that camp at Beria we create you, Florimell, Lieut.-General."

BERKELEY (Ba. = Barkley). Mkt. town in Gloucestersh., 113 m. W. of Lond. The old castle is still in a fair state of preservation, and an underground dungeon is shown in which tradition reports that Edward II was murdered. The name is pronounced Ba., and it is so spelt in the old editions of Shakespeare. York arranges to meet the K.'s supporters there (R2 ii. 2, 119); "Gentlemen, go, muster up your men, And meet me presently at Ba. Castle." Bolingbroke marches thither from Ravenspur—"How far is it, my lord, to Barkly now?" asks he (R2 ii. 3, 1); and Northumberland repeats the question (ii. 3, 33). When we remember Edward II's murder there, Bolingbroke's words have a sinister significance. In H4 A. 1, 3, 249, he reminds Hotspur that it was at "Ba. Castle" that he first bowed his knee to Bolingbroke; though, in R2 ii. 3, the interview referred to takes place before Bolingbroke has reached Ba. "My lord of Ba." is with York at the castle, and comes as his envoy to Bolingbroke (R2 ii. 3, 55, 68). This was Thomas, 5th Baron Ba., who died 1417. The title was raised to an earldom in 1679, and still continues in the B. family. The B. who appears in R3 as one of the attendants on Q. Anne was probably one of the sons of James, 6th Baron B. For the death of Edward II at B. see Marlowe's Ed. II v. 5.

BERKHAMPSTEAD. Ancient Saxon town in Herts., 26 m. N.W. of Lond. It had an ancient castle, out of the ruins of which the present mansion house was partly erected. Chester says, "This Doncaster seized on a beauteous Nun at Berkhamstead" (Death Huntington i. 2).

BERKSHIRE. A county of England W. of Oxfordshire. In Abington i. 2, Coomes promises, "There shall not be a servingman in Barkshire fight better for ye than I will do"; where the spelling indicates the usual pronunciation. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough says he could have had a mistress "at Maidenhead in B.; and did I come in by Maidenhead to go out by Staines † "Maidenhead is in N.E. B. : Staines is just over the border of Middlesex. The point of the poor jest needs no explanation. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 207, the K. allots "Barke-shire" and other counties to his favourite Bagot.

BERMONDSEY. See BARMSEY.

BERMOOTHES (Bu. = Bermudas). A group of about 300 islands, large and small, in the N. Atlantic, 530 m. E. of Cape Hatteras. Heylyn says (p. 807), "The Bu. are called also Summer Islands, because Sir Thomas Summers gave us a more exact relation of them than before had beene. They received their first name from one John Barmudaz, who first gave us notice of them." They are still a possession of the English Crown. The spelling varies: Heywood, Traveller ii. 2, has B.; Fletcher, Women Pleased i. 2, Bermoothes; Stow, in his Annals, says, "Somers . . . judged it should be that dreadfull coast of the Bermodes, which Ilands were . . . supposed to bee enchanted and inhabited with witches and devills, which grew by reason of accustomed monstrous thunder, storme and tempest, neere unto those Ilands." The climate is very humid and the dew is heavy. In Temp. i. 2, 229, Ariel tells how he was sent by Prospero "to fetch dew From the still-vexed B." It seems certain that Shakespeare had read Silvester Jourdan's Discovery of the Bermudas, otherwise called the Ile of Divels (1610), in which there is an account of the wreck of Sir George Somers there. He got from it many of the details of the wreck of the K. of Naples; though the enchanted island of the Temp. is evidently in the Mediterranean, as far as it has any local habitation, for the K. is wrecked there on a voyage from Tunis to Naples; and Sycorax was brought thither from Argier. The reputation of the Bu. as witch- and devil-ridden islands died hard. In Field's Amends iii. 4, Fee-Simple, finding himself amongst a crowd of bullies and sharpers, says, "I had as lieve be at Bermuthoes"; and wishes that like other travellers he had insured his life. In Massinger's Dowry ii. 1, a creditor wishes that his defaulting debtors were at the Bu. In T. Heywood's Traveller ii. 2, Reingald, being asked "whence is your ship—from the B.?" replies: "Worse; I think from hell." In B. & F. Women Pleased i. 2, Penurio talks of buying an egg-shell "to victual out a witch for the Bermoothes." In Alimony iii. 5, the Watchman says, "Be these the spirits that allure your children with spice and so convey them to th' Bu.?" In Dekker's If it be 341, Lurchal calls the Bu. "the island of hogs and devils." In Middleton's Quiet Life v., Camlet says, "The place I speak of has been kept with thunder, With frightful lightnings, amazing noises; But now, the enchantment broke, 'tis the land of peace, Where hogs and tobacco yield fair increase . . . Gentlemen, fare you well; I am for the Bu." They were felt to be a very long way from England. "I would sooner swim to the B.," says Bosola in Webster's Malfi iii. 2, "on two politicians' rotten bladders, than depend on so changeable a prince's favour." A debtor of Meercraft's, in Jonson's Devil iii. 1, has "run away to the Bu." In Brome's Northern i. 1, Tridewell advises Luckless, who is proposing to get married, "You were better venture yourself and fortune to the Bu." Dekker, in Bankruptes Banquet (1613), speaks of "the Iland of the Bu. haunted as all men know with hogs and hobgoblins." In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, Romelio says that a stiletto is "an engine that's only fit to put in execution Barmotho pigs." Donne, in the Storm (1633), says, "Compared to these storms . . . the Bu. [are] calm." Still, the Bu.

were beginning to be looked upon as possible places for successful trading. In Trade's Increase (1615), the author says, "I cannot find any other worthy place of foreign anchorage; for the Bu., we know not yet what they will do." In Davenant's Platonic v. 2, Fredeline says, "You shall to the Bu., friend, and there plant cotton." In Wise Men i. 1, Proberio describes a traveller who gains credit by a tale "that a fisher-man sailing by the B. saw a fire at singeing of a hog." Tobacco was imported thence. In Clitus Whimz we have: "Being furnished with tinder, match, and a portion of decayed Bermoodas, they smoke it most terribly." In Underwit i. 1, the Sergeant requires "20 pipes of Bermudas a day." In iv. 2, Thomas says, "Will you take tobacco in the roll? here is a whole ship-loading of Bu." "In the roll" means in the shape of cigars.

The word was used as a slang term for the haunts of the Lond. bullies and loafers. These pirates here at land "have their Bu. and their Straights i' the Strand," says Jonson, in his Epistle to Sackville; and again, in Barthol. ii. 1, "Look into any angle of the town, the Straights or the Bu., where the quarrelling lesson is read, and how do they entertain the time but with bottle-ale and tobacco?" and in his Devil ii. 1, Meercraft asks, "When did you see my cousin Everhill? keeps he still your quarter in the Bu.?" The dist. meant is the lanes N. of the Strand, near Covent Garden.

BERNE. The most populous of the cantons of Switzerland. It only attained its independence after long wars with the Hapsburgs, which ended in the glorious victory of Laupen in 1339. In Bale's Johan 182, Sedition says, "The Pope's ambassador am I continually in Pole, Spruse and B., in Denmark and Lombardy."

BERNYSDALE. A valley in S. Yorks., 6 m. N. of Doncaster: the home of Robin Hood. In Wyntoun's Scottish Chronicle, "Lytel Jhon and Robyne Hude" are mentioned as residing in "Yngilwode and Barnysdale." In the 8th fyfte of the Lyttel Geste of Robyn Hode we are told that Robin, after being at court 15 months, journeyed home to "B." In the Ballad of Guy of Gisborne Robin says, "I am Robin Hood of Barnesdale." In Elements, Ignorance sings a ballad beginning: "Robin Hood in Barnesdale stood."

BERRY (i.e. BURY). An old town in Lancs., 9 m. N. of Manchester. The manor belonged to the De Lacies, and there was an old castle on what is still called Castle Croft. In B. & F. Pestle iv. 5, one of Merrythought's songs begins, "For Jillian of B., she dwells on a hill, And she hath good beer and ale to sell." The ballad has not been discovered: the reference may be to Bury St. Edmund's, or possibly the well-known Gilian of Brentford may be meant, though this is not likely.

BERRY. A province in the centre of France, S. of the Loire. The capital, Bourges, is 115 m. S. of Paris. The D. of B. is mentioned as present at Agincourt (H5 ii. 4, 4; iii. 5, 41). He was the brother of the late K. Charles V., and along with the Ds. of Anjou and Burgundy was appointed a guardian of Charles VI. In the subsequent struggle between the Orleanists and the Armagnacs he was one of the chief leaders of the latter party. It was he who persuaded the young K. not to risk his person by going to the battle of Agincourt.

BERSABE. See BEERSHEBA.

BERWICK. A town at the mouth of the Tweed, on the boundary between England and Scotland, 300 m. N. of Lond. It constitutes a "county in itself," and used to be separately mentioned as a part of Gt. Britain, which includes England, Scotland, Wales, and B.-on-Tweed. It is one of the few remaining walled towns in the British Isles. Simpson, the hero of the miracle at St. Albans (H6 B. ii. 1), was born "at B. in the N."; and he and his wife are ordered by Gloucester to be whipped through every market town till they come to B., whence they came (ii. 1, 160). After the battle of Towton, Margaret urges Henry, "Mount you, my lord; towards B. post amain" (H6 C. ii. 5, 128). As a reward for the protection afforded him on this occasion, Henry ceded B. to the Scots, but it was finally recovered by England in 1482. In Peele's Ed. I xiii., news is brought to Edward of Balliol's rebellion: "Balliol, my k., in B. makes his court"; to which Edward answers, "False Balliol! Barwick is no hold of proof To shroud thee from the strength of Edward's arm." This was in 1295, and Edward took B. in 3 days. In Ed. III i. 1, Mountague brings word that the treacherous K. [of Scotland] has "made invasion on the bordering towns; Barwicke is won, Newcastle spoiled and lost." This was in 1333, when David Bruce was K. of Scotland: Balliol had been driven from Scotland and the Regent Archibald Douglas had seized B. Balliol, with the assistance of the English, besieged and took the town after defeating the Regent at Halidon Hill. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, the story is told how, in the border war of 1497, James of Scotland proposed a single combat to the Earl of Surrey on condition that, if James were victorious, Surrey should "deliver for his ransom the town of B. to him with the fishgarths." Surrey's answer to the challenge is "B. is none of mine to part with." In Sampson's Vow v. 1, 141, Grey says, "Our soldiers instantly shall march to Barwicke." This was in 1560.

In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick mentions, amongst other prodigies, "the fires at B.!" In Underwit i. 1, Thomas says, "Considering the league of Barwick, we may find some of these things in the N.," i.e. swords, books on tactics, etc. The reference is to the Pacification of B. June 1639. In Jonson's Voyage, he speaks of "him that backward went to B.; or which did dance the famous morris unto Norwich." W. Rowley, in Search intro., mentions "the fellow's going backward to Barwick." In Respublica v. 6, Avarice tells Respublica if she would have trusted him, "Then would I have stretched the county of Warwick upon tenter hooks and made it reach to B." Peacham, in Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), mentions, in a list of objects of popular interest, "roaring Marget a Barwicke." She was evidently one of the notorious characters, like Moll Cutpurse ("The Roaring Girl") and Long Meg of Westminster, who attracted much attention in London at this time.

BESANÇON (the ancient VESONTIO). A city of France, 45 m. E. of Dijon, on the Doubs. It was the capital of Franche-Comté. It became a Free City of the German Empire in the 12th cent., and by the Treaty of Westphalia it was handed over to Spain. In 1660 it was taken by Louis XIV. and has since belonged to France. The Cathedral of St. Jean dates from the 11th cent. In Wilson's Inconstant ii. 3, we are told that Cloris dwells "at B." In v. 3, the D. of Burgundy tells how he had a child who died "Going from Chalon Castle to B."

BESSIA. A misprint for BRESCIA, q.v.

BETENY. See BETHANY.

BETHABARA. A vill. on the r. Jordan, in Palestine, 13 m. S. of its exit from the Sea of Galilee. It is stated in the received text of John i. 28 to have been the scene of the ministry of John the Baptist; but the correct reading is Bethany: not, of course, the well-known Bethany near Jerusalem, but an obscure village in Peraea. Milton, P.R. i. 184, says that the Son of God "yetsome days Lodged in B. where John baptized." In ii. 20, he describes the disciples as searching for Jesus in each place "nigh to B.," viz. Jericho, Ænon, Salem, and Machærus. He evidently accepted the tradition that B. was at the fords of the Jordan, near Jericho—which is impossible, as it is clear from John ii. 1 that it was only a day's journey from Cana of Galilee.

BETHEL. A town in Palestine, 10 m. due N. of Jerusalem, now Beitin. Its original name was Luz; but it was renamed B. (i.e. House of God) by Jacob after his vision there of the ladder reaching from earth to heaven. It became a great national sanctuary and the Ark was kept there for a long time. After the secession of the N. tribes Jeroboam made it the central sanctuary of his kingdom; and set up there a golden calf as a symbol of the God of Israel, a second one being placed at Dan, in the N. Milton, P. L. i. 485, says, "The rebel k. Doubled that sin in B. and in Dan, Likening his maker to the grazed ox." In P. R. iii. 431, our Lord speaks of the Israelites having recourse "to their gods perhaps Of B. and of Dan."

BETHESDA. An intermittent spring near the sheepgate, or sheep market, at Jerusalem, mentioned in John v. 2 as having healing qualities. It has been most probably identified with the Virgin's Pool at the foot of Ophel, S.E. of the Temple Hill. Herrick, in his verses To the King, to Cure the Evil, says, "To find B., and an angel there, Stirring the waters, I am come." The statement in St. John's Gospel about the descent of the angel is not part of the original text; but it doubtless represents the popular idea about the cause of the bubbling of the spring.

BETHLEHEM (BETHLEM or BEDLAM; originally B.-EPHRAÏM). A vill. in Palestine, where our Lord was born. It was also the family home of David. The Ch. of the Nativity, built over the cavern which is the traditional birthplace of our Lord, is the oldest Christian ch. still in use. In Calisto, Haz. i. 64, Calisto tells how God "guided the 3 Ks. into Bedlem from the E. by the star" (see Mat. ii.). B. is the scene of the mystery plays of the nativity of Christ. In Towneley M. P., Secunda Pastorum 654, the angel bids the shepherds, "At Bedlem go see, There lygys that fre In a crib fulle poorly Betwyx two bestys." In Candlemas, p. 14, the angel says, "K. Herod . . . Commanded hath through Bedlem city . . . To slay all the children that be in that country." In York M. P. xiii. 280, the Angel says to Joseph, "Wend forth to Marie thy wife always Bring her to Bedlem this ilke night, There shall a child born be." Milton, P. R. i. 243, says, "At thy nativity a glorious choir Of angels in the fields of B. sung." In ii. 78, he tells how Herod "filled With infant blood the streets of B." In iv. 505, Satan recalls "the angelic song in B. field." In Nativity Ode 223, it is said of Osiris, "The rays of B. blind his dusky eyn." See also BEDLAM.

BETHNALL GREEN (or BEDNALL GREEN). A dist. in the E. end of Lond., bounded roughly by Shoreditch, Hackney Rd., Victoria Park, and Whitechapel Rd. It was a poor dist. inhabited chiefly by silk-weavers. The G. itself was on the E. of Cambridge Rd., where the Museum now stands. The house of the Blind Beggar, famed in ballad, was called Kirby's Castle, and was actually built in the reign of Elizabeth by John Kirby, a rich Londoner. It ultimately became a lunatic asylum. Bp. Bonner had his house about $\frac{1}{2}$ m. E. of the G. In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, Compass's wife tells him that his boy "is nursed at Bednall G." In Chaunticleers iii., Ditty, the Ballad-man, says, "I have the Beggar of Bethnal G." Day's B. Beggar is a dramatic version of the story of the Ballad with considerable difference. In the ballad, which may be found in Percy's Reliques ii. 2, the beggar is Henry, son of Sir Simon de Montfort, who is rescued after the battle of Evesham by a maiden, whom he married; and he takes the disguise of a blind beggar to escape the k.'s vengeance. In the play the beggar is Momford, who is falsely charged with the surrender of Guynes in the French Wars of Henry VI's reign, and so assumes the disguise.

BETHUNE. A town in Artois, on the Brette, 120 m. N. of Paris, and a fortress of considerable strength. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron claims to have peopled B. with the issue of his victories in the war with the League.

BEVER. See BELVOIR.

BEVERLEY. A town in E. Riding, Yorks., 27 m. S.E. of York. The Minster is one of the finest in England. Corpus Christi Plays were performed at B. as early as 1377, and plays were produced by the boys of the Grammar School during the 16th cent. In Old Meg, p. 1, we read: "Never could B. Fair give money to a more sound taborer" than Hall, of Hereford.

BEWLEY (i.e. BEAULIEU). A small vill. in Hants., 7 m. S.W. of Southampton. It grew up round a Cistercian monastery, founded by K. John in 1204, of which the gateway still remains. Here Perkin Warbeck took sanctuary after his failure to take Exeter in 1499. In Ford's Warbeck v. 2, Dawbeney tells the K. that he has taken Warbeck "From sanctuary At B., near Southampton."

BIBLE. The sign of Robert Bird's bookshop in Cheap-side, where the 1631 edn. of the Bookes of Merrie Riddles was published. There was also a B. in Giltspur St. Alimony was "Printed by Tho. Vere and William Gilbertson and are to be sold at the B. in Giltspur-st. 1659." There was yet another in Chancery Lane. T. Heywood's Hogsdon was "Printed by M. P. for Henry Shephard and are to be sold at his shop in Chancery-lane at the sign of the B. 1638."

BILBAO (Bo. = Bilbo). A town in Spain, the capital of the province of Biscaya, 10 m. from the mouth of the Ansa. It was famous for the manufacture of swords of the finest temper. The swords themselves were called Bilbos, and the name was transferred to their wearers, and came to mean a swaggering soldier. In M. W. W. iii. 5, 112, Falstaff describes his position in the buck-basket: "to be compassed like a good bo., in the circumference of a peck, hilt to point, heel to head." This was the test of a good blade. In the same play (i. 1, 165), Pistol challenges Slender as "this latten bo.," i.e. a sword made of base metal. Jonson, in Vulcan, wishes that Vulcan "had maintained the trade at Bilboa or elsewhere," instead of setting cities on fire. In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca speaks of her suitor as "such a Bilboa blade that bends, with every pass he makes, to the hilts." In Ford's Trial ii. 1, Guzman says to Futelli, "Speaks thy weapon Toledo language, Bilboa, or dull Pisa?" In B. & F. Wild Goose iii. 1, Mirabel deplors that "this bilbolord" shall have his lady-love. In their King v. 3, Bacurius says to Bessus, "You are much bound to your Bo.-men," i.e. to the sword-men who have been teaching him the code of honour. Jonson, in his prol. to Brome's Northern, says, "An honest Bo.-smith would make good blades." In Look about, sc. 29, Gloster says, "Off, gown; hold, Buckler; slice it, Bo.-blade." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Seawit speaks of the dashing lady Carrack as "a brave amazon, one that loves bo. men," i.e. fighting fellows. In Lady Mother iii. 2, Suckett says, "My blade is of the Bo. mettle; at its splendour my foes do vanish." In Ford's Queen iii., Mopas, drawing his sword, cries: "Bo., come forth and show thy foxes tail"; (fox means a sword). In T. Heywood's Witches v., the Soldier says, "Yet have I kept my face whole, thanks to my scimitar, my trusty Bo." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 1, Jarvis says, "Lay me out of the way like a rusty bilboe." In Ham. v. 2, "Methought I lay Worse than the mutinies in the bilboes," it means fetters. But it is doubtful whether in this sense the word has any connection with Bilbao. See O.E.D. s.v. BILBO (2).

BILEDULL (= BILEDULGERID, the land of dates). A dist. of N. Africa, on the S. of the Atlas Range, between Fez and Cape Bon. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles tells Tamburlaine, "From strong Tesella unto B. All Barbary is unpeopled for thy sake." Heylyn (s.v. NUMIDIA) says, "The country aboundeth with dates, whence it is called Dactylorum Regio, and in the Arabicke Biledulgerid, which signifieth also a Date region."

BILLINGSGATE. The principal of the old water-gates of Lond., on the N. side of the Thames, E. of Lond. Bdge., between it and the Custom House. Geoffrey of Monmouth derives the name from Belin, an ancient British k.; but Stow more probably connects it with one Biling, who formerly owned the wharf. Stow describes it as "a large watergate, port, or harbour for ships and boats, commonly arriving there with fish, both fresh and salt, shell-fishes, salt, oranges, onions, and other fruits and roots, wheat, rye, and grain of divers sorts, for service of the city and the parts of this realm adjoining." It gave its name to the B. Ward. George Sanders and his wife, the principal characters in Fair Women, lived here: "in all B. Ward not a kinder couple" (i. 1). It was a usual landing-place for travellers from abroad or from the lower reaches of the Thames. Sanders, in the same play, coming back from Greenwich, is expected to land at B. (ii. 2). In Feverisham iii. 3, Arden, going back from Lond. to Feversham, directs his servant, "Sirra, get you back to Billingsgate and learn what time the tide will serve our turn." In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Meager, just come from Holland, has to "unship his trunks at B."

In H4 B. ii. 1, 182, Qq. read, "Where lay the K. last night?"—"At B., my Lord." The Ff. have "Basing-stoke," which is undoubtedly the right reading. In Fam. Vict., A3, Lawrence, the costermonger, says, "We will watch here at B. Ward," sc., for someone to rob. In Contention, Pt. I, Haz. p. 503, when Robin reports that Lond. Bdge. is on fire, Cade bids him run "to B. and fetch pitch and flax and squench it." In S. Rowley's When You B. 1, Summers says that certain news from Rome "was at B. by Saturday morning and it came up on a spring tide." In B. & F. Hon. Man v. 3, Montague, railing at Capt. la Poop, tells him, "I shall see you serve in a lousy lime-boat for mouldy cheese and butter B. would not endure." Dekker, in News from Hell, makes the devil's post ride down "to B., for he meant, when the tide served, to angle for souls": where there is a pun with "soles." Like all waterside places, it was well provided with taverns. In Penn. Parl. it is provided "that the salmon shall be better sold in Fish-St. than the beer shall be at B." In Jack Drum iv. 229, Old Brabant goes out with his boy to get some wine, and says, "Boy, go with me to B." Amongst the inns were the Salutation, mentioned in News Barthol. Fair, and the Blue Anchor, to which Sir Petronel Flash (Westward iii. 1) invites his friends; "Meet me at the Blue Anchor tavern by B. this evening." Sc. III is accordingly at this tavern, and Seagull exhorts the drawer, "Let's have cheer not fit for your B. tavern but for our Virginian Colonel." This last is represented still by the Blue Anchor Tavern, 26 St. Marys-at-Hill. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity promises Pug to bring him "to the bawds and the roysters at B. feasting with claret wine and oysters."

A barge plied daily between B. and Gravesend: the fare was twopence. In pref. to Cobler of Canterbury (1590), it is said to contain tales "told in the barge between B. and Gravesend." Deloney, in Craft (1597) i. 14, tells how John's wife, "being newly come from the Barge at B., and at that time going toward St. Katherine's," found her husband at the Abbey of Grace, E. of Tower Hill. In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Justiniano speaks of women "as stale as wenches that travel every second tide between Gravesend and B." B. was, and is, the great fish-market for Lond., though other things were also sold there. Nash, in Prognostication, says, "There shall be much stinking fish this year at B." In Deloney's Craft ii. 9, a servant is sent to fetch "a bushel of oysters from B." In Three Lords (Dods. vi. 501), Simplicity says of Fraud, "the very oystermen [will miss him] to mingle their oysters at B." In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Mendwell tells a fishing yarn: "an oyster-wife, a good old woman, heard it at B. and told my wife on't." In Penn. Parl., it is enacted that "St. Thomas's onions shall be sold by the rope at B." The noise of the market and the shrill scolding of the fishwives were proverbial. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 2, Morose, in order to get rid of his wife, will do penance "at Lond. Bidge., Paris Garden, B., when the noises are at their height and loudest." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 217, the Parisian says sarcastically, "I am loth to disturb the civil silence of B., which is so great as if the mariners were always landing to storm the harbour." In Alimony i. 1, Trillo says, "Divorces are now as common as scolding at B." In Leir, Haz. p. 503, the Messenger says, "I have as bad a tongue, if it be set on it, as any oysterwife at B. hath." In Brome's Academy iv. 2, when Gabriella abuses her son, Lady Nestecock cries: "She come over my heir apparent with such B. compliment!" In Cowley's Cutter iv. 6, Puny says, "She rails at me like a flounder-mouthed fish-woman with a face like B." The Boss of B. is the title of a play, based on an old ballad. The Boss, or drinking-fountain, was in BOSS ALLEY, q.v.

BINGHAM. Mkt. town in Notts., 11.8 m. N.W. of Lond. In Downfall Huntington v. 1, Warman says of his son-in-law, "His house at B. I bestowed on him."

BIRCHEN WOOD. In Oldcastle iv. 1, Sir John mentions B. W. as one of the "hills, heaths, and woods" in Kent which pay him tithe. Probably Bircholt, which lies in B. Kent near Ashford, is the place intended.

BIRCHIN LANE. St. in Lond., running N. from Lombard St. to Cornhill. According to Stow, it was originally Birchover L., so-called from its first builder and owner, but this is an error. It was occupied chiefly by drapers and second-hand clothes dealers. In Nobody 440, the Clown says, "Come into B. L., they'll give Nobody a suit." In Prodigal i. 1, young Flowerdale tells his disguised father, "Go into B.-L., put thyself into clothes." Dekker, in Hornbook i, says, "Did man come wrangling into the world about no better matters than all his lifetime to make privy searches in B. L. for whalebone doublets?" In Overbury's Characters 17, he says that a fine gentleman buys his behaviour at Court, "as countrymen their clothes in B. L." In T. Heywood's Royal King 1, Cock and Corporal enter ragged; and Cock says, "It had not been amiss if we had gone first to Burchen L. to have suited us." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 1, young Franklin confesses that he owes for "fourscore pair of provant breeches to Punch-buttock, a hosier in B. L." In Middleton's Black Book, p. 29, we read, "Passing through B. L. amidst a camp-royal of hose and doublets, away they ran like Irish lackeys." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 11, Chub says, "B. L. shall suit us, the costermongers fruit us." In his Royal King iii., the Clown says, "Though we have the law on our sides, we may walk through Burchin-l. and be non-suited." Dekker, in Wonderful Year, says that through fear of the Plague, "if one new suit of sack-cloth had been but known to have come out of Burchin-L. (being the common wardrobe for all their clownships) it had been enough to make a market-town give up the ghost." In Deloney's Newberie ix., Jack relieves a poor man and "provided him out of Burchin-l. a fair suit of apparel." To send a boy to B. L. meant, according to Ascham, Schoolmaster 69, to order him to be whipped.

BIRMINGHAM. City in N. Warwicksh., 102 m. N.W. of Lond. The original form of the name seems to have been Beormingsham. Metathesis of the "r" soon occurred, and such forms as Bromicham are constantly found, and are represented by the modern vulgar pronunciation Brummagem. No fewer than 140 variant spellings are enumerated. It was an inconsiderable town till the middle of the 17th cent., when it began the rapid growth which has brought its population up to over a million. In Mater's charm for worms in Thersites (A. P. i. 219), she invokes "the butterfly of Bromwicham that was born blind." No explanation is necessary, for the whole charm is a farrago of nonsense, mostly alliterative.

BIRNAM WOOD. A wood on a hill on the right bank of the Tay, opposite Dunkeld, in Perthsh., abt. 12 m. from Dunsinane. The 3rd apparition in Mac. iv. 1, 93 promises, "Macbeth shall never vanquished be until Great B. w. to high Dunsinane hill Shall come against him." In v. 2, Menteith and the rest march towards B. to meet Siward and Macduff; in v. 4, they meet in the country near B. W., and Malcolm orders every soldier to hew him down a bough and bear 't before him. In v. 5, the watchman brings word, "I looked toward B., and anon, methought, The wood began to move." But Macbeth will not yield, "Though B. w. be come to Dunsinane" (v. 8, 30). The story is taken from Holinshed.

BIRON. Town in the middle of Guienne, between the Lot and the Dordogne, some 300 m. S. of Paris. The name of Lord B., or Berowne, in L. L. L. was no doubt suggested by that of Armand de B. and his son, Charles de B., who were both closely connected with Henry of Navarre. The latter is the hero of Chapman's Consp. Byron and Trag. Byron.

BISCAY. The chief of the Basque provinces, in N. Spain, on the Bay of B. Hycke, p. 88, boasts to have travelled in "Brytayne, Byske, and also in Gascoyne." Antonio, in Massinger's Very Woman iv. 3, pretends to be a Biscan who has been captured by the Turkish pirates and reduced to slavery. Thwack, in Davenant's Wits iii., whilst dressing himself, exclaims, "O for the Bn. sleeve and Bulloign hose I wore when I was sheriff in '88." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Cable says there are no women in Plymouth, "but a few matrons of B. that the Spaniards left here in '88," i.e. 1588, the year of the Spanish Armada. In Nash's Saffron Walden i. 1, Biscanism (i.e. the Basque language) is spoken of as "the most barbarous Spanish." The people were regarded as rough and quarrelsome. In Davenant's Distresses v. 1, Androllo speaks of Basilonte, who is really a gentleman of Cordova, as "this choleric Biscayner." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 335, Ricaldus enumerates "14 great ships of Biscany, of Castile," in the Gt. Armada. In W. Rowley's All's Lost v. 4, after the defeat of Rodorigue by the Moors near Seville, Piamentelli advises him to flee "to Biscany; there you may find new friends." In Antonie iv. 1777, the Chorus speaks of "The Biscaines martial might" amongst the ancient enemies of Rome.

BISERTA. See BIZERTA.

BISHOPSGATE. One of the old gates in N.E. Lond., between Aldgate and Aldersgate. It was rebuilt in 1479. The Bp. of Lond. had one stick from every cartload of wood brought in through this gate; hence its name. B. St. Within runs N. from the junction of Cornhill and Leadenhall St. to the point where the old gate stood; beyond that it becomes B. St. Without. It partially escaped the Gt. Fire, and several old buildings survived, notably Crosby Hall and St. Helen's Ch. The scene of Rowley's Match Mid. is in this neighbourhood; Mary Bloodhound lived in Houndsditch, near Aldgate and B. (iv. 1); and a little later on Moll and Randall, meeting in the dark at the point where Cornhill, Leadenhall St., and B. meet, are disturbed by the watch coming up Gracechurch St., and dodge away down Cornhill and round the Exchange. Then the ancient who "escaped the watch at B. with ease" meets Moll turning down the Ch. corner towards the Exchange. In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 2, Frisco says of Vandal, "He looks like the sign of the Mouth without B., gaping; and a great face and a great head, and no body." In Dekker's Satiro iii. 1, 245, Tucca says, "I'll dam thee up, my wide mouth at B." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 270, John says, "Once in a year a man might find you quartered betwixt the Mouth at B. and the preaching-place in the Spittle" (see MOUTN).

In Dekker's Northward iv. 3, Bellamont says, "Stay, yonder's the Dolphin without Bishop's Gate, where our horses are at rack and manger." The Dolphin was just outside B., near the end of Houndsditch. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canoy says, "There's an odd fellow snuffles i' the nose, that shows a motion [i.e. a puppet-show] about B., we'll get to his lodging." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 14, the Messenger reports that the rebels are coming from Essexward: "therefore 'tis his mind You guard both Aldgate well and B." On p. 57 the Lord Mayor says, "In memory of me, John Crosbie, in B. St. a poor house I built and as my name have called it Crosbie House" (see CROSBY HOUSE). Gresham lived in B. in a mansion built by him in 1563. It stood on the W. side of the st., and the gardens extended to Broad St. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 297, a Lord says, "It is our way to B. to Master Gresham's house." Dekker, in Seven Sins, makes Sloth enter the city with "a most sleepy and still triumph at B." In Deloney's Craft ii. 9, the Dr. says, "He rode with me out of B. forth right as far as Ware."

BISHOP'S HALL. Apparently Bp. Bonner's house, abt. 1/4 m. E. of Bethnall Green, is intended. In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Compass says to his wife, "Then will we meet again in the pease-field by B. H."

BISHOP'S PALACE (LOND.). Stood at the N.W. corner of the precinct of St. Paul's. In True Tragedy the messenger informs the Q. that her son "remains at Lond. in the B. P." Milton, in Areopagitica (1644), p. 12 (Hales), pours scorn on "a lordly Imprimatur . . . from the W. end of Pauls."

BISKEY. See BISCAY.

BITHYNIA. Province in N.W. Asia Minor, on the Propontis and the Black Sea. After the defeat of Zama, Hannibal took refuge with Antiochus the Gt., and after his defeat at Magnesia went to the court of Prusias of B., where, suspecting treachery on the part of the K., he poisoned himself about 183 B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 5, Lelius says of Hannibal, "He is fled unto Antiochus, or else to Prusias of Bythinia." Act V takes place in "Bythinia," and Hannibal's death forms its climax. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine expresses his intention of meeting the Turkish forces in B.; and in B. i. 1, Orcanes reckons the Bns. amongst the tribes who are under his command. Scenes 2 and 3, Act III, of Massinger's Believe are laid in the Court of Prusias, K. of B., about 190 B.C. The play was really intended to tell the story of the pseudo-Sebastian who personated the Sebastian of Portugal killed at the battle of Alcazar.

BIZANCE. See BYZANTIUM.

BIZERTA. A spt. in Tunis, the most N. port in Africa. In Davenport's Nightcap ii. 3, Lorenzo refers to "the fight betwixt B. galleies and your Grace," i.e. the D. of Verona. The pirates of Tunis and Algiers infested the Mediterranean during the 16th cent., and there were many fights between them and the ships of the Italian states. Milton, P. L. i. 585, speaks of the troops "whom Biserta sent from Afric shore When Charlemain with all his peerage fell By Fontarabbia." The reference is to a passage in Orlando Innamorato ii., in which Agramant, K. of Africa, is said to have assembled his troops at B. for the invasion of Charlemaigne's empire.

BLACKAMoor. Used for any dark-skinned native of Africa, but mostly in the dramatists for a Moor of Barbary, i.e. N. Africa, though it is also employed for a negro. Boorde, in Intro. for Knowledge (1547) 212, makes a N. African say, "I am a black More born in Barbary." In Troil. i. 1, 80, Pandarus says, "I care not, an she were a black-a-moor; 'tis all one to me." Sidney, in Arcadia (1580) 36, speaks of "a black-a-More boy." T. Heywood, in Maid of West, speaks of the K. of Fez as "the black a Morrian k." In B. & F. Malta i. 1, Mountferrat calls the Moor Zanthia "the b. that waits upon her," i.e. Oriana. In i. 2, a gentlewoman calls her, "My little labour in vain," alluding to the proverb that it is labour in vain to try to wash a B. white. There is a public-house in Melbourne called the Labour in Vain, which in the early days of the Colony had for its sign a B. in a tub of water. In Cowley's Cutter iv. 6, Puny says that the Guinea merchant "is dead long since and gone to the blackamores below." See under MOOR.

BLACK BEAR. A Lond. booksellers' sign. Bacon's Essays were "Printed for Hunfry Hooper and are to be sold at the blacke Beare in Chauncery Lane. 1597."

Marlowe's Hero and Leander was "Printed by Felix Kingston for Paule Linley and are to be sold in Paules Churchyard at the sign of the Blacke-beare. 1598."

BLACK BOY. The sign of Henry Kirkham's bookshop at the little N. door of Paul's Ch. (Title page Bacchus Bountie, 1593). There was a B. B. tavern in Southwark, which left its name in B. B. Alley, off Blackman St.

BLACK BULL. A well-known old tavern in Gray's Inn Lane, Lond., with an old galleried yard (see BATTLE BRIDGE). Taylor, in Carriers Cosmog., mentions another B. B. in Smithfield; and another in Bishopsgate St.

BLACK BULL. An inn at Cambridge. Hall, in Satires ii. 7, 32, says, "The neck the B.-B.'s guest became." Milton, in Apol. for Smectymnuus, blames Hall for whipping "the sign posts of Cambridge ale-houses" in this passage.

BLACKEM-HALL. See BLACKWELL HALL.

BLACKFRIARS. The Order of the Dominicans was founded by St. Dominic in 1215, and confirmed by Honorius III in the following year. They wore a white robe with a black cloak and hood: hence their name "Black Friars." They came to England in 1221, and had their first home in Holborn, outside the City wall; but in 1276 they were granted "2 lanes or ways next the st. of Baynard's Castle, and the tower of Montfitchet to be destroyed" (Stow). They duly destroyed the tower, and with the stones of it they built a magnificent new monastery and ch. The site was the plot of land lying N. of the present Q. Victoria St. and E. of Water Lane. The ch. lay on the N. side near to Carter Lane: S. of it were the Gt. Cloister and the Inner Cloister; to the W. of the cloisters were the Buttery and the Frater: the latter occupying the site of the present Times printing office. The monastery was seized at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries in 1538, and the ch. was pulled down. The rest of the buildings were sold by Edward VI to Sir Francis Cawarden, and converted into residential tenements which were occupied by people of the highest rank. The right of sanctuary still remained to the precinct; and it was free from the jurisdiction of the City authorities. Richard Farrant, Master of the Windsor Chapel, wanting a place for his children to perform plays, leased the old Buttery in 1576 and converted the upper rooms into a playhouse, with an entrance from Water Lane. Here the Children of the Chapel performed from 1577 to 1584: during the latter part of the period under Lyly's direction, his Campaspe and Sapho being played by them with great applause. In 1584, however, the lease was terminated and the place converted into tenements. In 1596 James Burbage purchased what had been the Frater from the then owner, Sir William More, and converted it into a private theatre, 46 ft. wide and 66 ft. long. It was entirely roofed in, had 2 galleries, and was artificially lighted. Burbage died in 1597, and left the theatre to his son Richd., the great tragedian of Shakespeare's company. By him it was let to Henry Evans to be used by the Children of the Chapel for plays; and abt. 1600 their performances began. They were very successful, as Shakespeare, Ham. ii. 2, 352, testifies. Middleton, in Huoburd, p. 77, advises the Lond. gallant to "call in at the B. where he should see a nest of boys able to ravish a man." The D. of Stettin-Pomerania in 1602 waxes quite enthusiastic about their music. Evans got into trouble for kidnapping a boy, and the company was re-organized by Edward Kirkham and secured a Royal patent in 1604. But the management was most unfortunate in its choice of plays: Daniel's Philotas in 1604, Jonson, Chapman, and Marston's Eastward in 1605, Day's Gulls in 1606, and Chapman's Byron plays in 1608 got them into serious trouble with the Court, and in 1608 the theatre was leased to Richd. Burbage and a syndicate which included Shakespeare. Burbage now ran it as a winter house, retaining the Globe for the summer performances of his company. It became so popular that the crowd of coaches and horses was a great nuisance to the neighbourhood, but the efforts to get it closed were futile, and it continued to flourish until the closing of the theatres in 1642. It was ultimately pulled down on Aug. 6, 1655, and tenements built in its room. Shakespeare bought a house some 200 yards from the theatre on the W. side of St. Andrew's Hill in 1613, which he leased to one John Robinson. It was near what is now known as Ireland Yard.

In the preface to the 1st Folio of Shakespeare the author says, "Though you be a magistrate of wit and sit on the stage at Black-friers or the Cockpit, to arraign plays daily, know, these plays have had their trial already." In Dekker's Satiro. iv. 3, 248, Tuca says, "Thou hast arraigned two poets against all law and conscience and, not content with that, hast turned them amongst a company of horrible black fryers." The reference is to Jonson's Poetaster, with its attack on Marston and Dekker, which was played at the B. in 1602. In Shirley's address prefixed to the Folio of B. & F.'s Plays in 1647, he says that this volume contains "the authentic wit that made B. an academy where the 3 hours' spectacle, while Beaumont and Fletcher were presented, was usually of more advantage to the hopeful young heir than a costly dangerous foreign travel." In verses by R. C., prefixed to The Queen 16, we have a reference to B., "which in this age Fell when it was a ch., not when a stage, Or that the Puritans that once dwelt there Prayed and thrived though the play-house were so near." In Killigrew's Parson iv. 1, Jolly says, "I have got the B. music. I was fain to stay till the last act." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 2, Lorece says, "I at any time will carry you to a play, either to the Black Friar's or Cockpit." In the Actors' Remonstrance (1643), they say, "It is not unknown to all the audience that have frequented the private houses of Black-friars, the Cock-pit, and Salisbury Court without austerity we have purged our stages from all obscene and scurrilous jests." In Doubtful (prol.), which was produced on the Bankside, Shirley begs his audience to behave "as you were now in the Blackfryars pit." Sir Aston Cockayne, in poem prefixed to Brome's Plays (1653), prays for the time when "Black, and White Friars too, shall flourish again" (see also PORTER'S HALL). In the hall of the monastery was held the trial of the divorce case between Henry VIII and Katherine of Arragon. In H8 ii. 2, 139, the K. says, "The most convenient place that I can think of For such receipt of learning is Black-friars," and there accordingly is fixed the trial scene (ii. 4).

As has been already stated, the tenements into which the old monastery had been converted were occupied by fashionable folk. In Middleton's Michaelmas iv. 3, Thomasine says, "Inquire for one Master Easy at his old lodging i' the B." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Ancient Young says, "There was a handsome widow whose husband died at sea; let me see, I am near B., I'll have one start at her." In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Subtle mocks Face as an "Honest, plain, livery-three-pound-thrum, that kept Your master's worship's house here in the Friars": and it is in this house, in the absence of his master Lovewit, that Subtle carries on his business as a professed alchemist. Vandyke lived here for 10 years, and the miniature painter, Isaac Oliver, was another resident. In Jonson's Devil i. 3, FitzDottrel proposes to go "into Hyde Park and thence into B., visit the painters." In the poorer parts of the neighbourhood many Puritans lived, possibly because of the privilege of sanctuary still enjoyed by the precinct; and many of them were engaged in the business of feather-making. We read, in Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, of a Capt. "whom not a Puritan in B. will trust so much as for a feather." In Field's Amends iii. 3, the Widow inquires, "Precise and learned Princox, dost thou not go to B.?" "Most frequently, Madam," answers the disguised Bold, "unworthy vessel that I am to partake or retain any of the delicious dew that is there distilled." In Dekker's Westward v. 1, Moll says, "Let's be as fantastic and light-hearted to the eye as feather-makers, but as pure about the heart as if we dwelt amongst 'em in B." In Randolph's Muses' i. 1, Bird, the feather-man, and Mrs. Flowerdew, the wife of a haberdasher, come to the Playhouse, probably Salisbury Court, to sell their wares: they are described as "two of the sanctified fraternity of B." Bird says, "We live by B. College, and I wonder how that prophane nest of pernicious birds [sc. the actors] dare roost themselves there in the midst of us"; and Mrs. Flowerdew is surprised that the B. Theatre "scaped demolishing i' the time of reformation." In the dispute between the Rabbi Busy and the proprietor of the puppet-show in Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, the latter argues, "What say you to your feather-makers in the Friars that are of your faction of faith? Is a bugle-maker a lawful calling? or the confect-makers, such as you have there? or your French fashioner?" In Jonson's Love Rest., Robin Goodfellow tries to get in under the disguise of "a feather-maker of B.; but they wondered how I could be a Puritan, being of so vain a vocation." In Marston's Malcontent, Ind., Sly hides his feathers in his pocket because feathers had been so satirized on the stage of the theatre that "B. hath almost spoiled B. for feathers." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 1, we learn that the Widow Wagge "dwells in Blackfriars, next to the sign of the fool laughing at a feather," mentioned again in iv. as "the sign of the Feathers and the Fool." There seems to be a reference to this sign in H8 i. 3, 24, where Lovell says, "They must . . . leave those remnants Of fool and feather that they got in France." In B. & F. Thomas ii. 3, Hylas thinks "not all the feathers in the Fryars" will satisfy a fashionable wife. In their Wit Money iii. 4, Valentine boasts that his breeches "are Christian breeches, founded in B." In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Otter says that all his wife's teeth "were made in the B." In B. & F. Prize iv. 5, Petruchio mentions "a beggar-wench about B., Runs on her breech": doubtless some poor cripple who was a familiar figure there. There was a glass manufactory on the site in Temple St. where the Whitefriars Glass Works now stand. Dekker, in Knight's Conjuring, says of hell, "Like the glass-house furnace in B., the bone-fires that are kept there never go out." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 1, Mrs. Pleasant says, "I'll go to a play with my servant, and so shall you; and we'll go to the glass-house afterwards." The Greyhound Inn was at the Fleet St. corner, near B. In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano suggests, as a rendezvous for the party that is going to Brentford, "the Greyhound in B." See GREYHOUND.

BLACKFRIARS STAIRS. A landing-stage on the N. bank of the Thames, where B. Bdge. now stands. In Marmion's Leaguer v. 3, Ardelio, being turned out of service, says, "I may go set up bills now for my living, or fish at B. S." In Middleton's R. G. v. 2, Sir Alexander, hearing that his son and Moll have gone across to Lambeth, says, "Delay no time, sweet gentlemen! to B.! We'll take a pair of oars and after them." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 3, Touchwood tells how a gentleman escaped from a gang of bullies in B. by the help of an honest pair of oars.

BLACKHEATH. An extensive open common between Eltham and Greenwich, 5 m. from the centre of Lond. It is intersected by the Dover Rd., and the traffic from Kent to Lond. naturally comes across it. It was on B. that the Kentish men assembled in Wat Tyler's rebellion. In Jack Straw i., Jack says to his men, "Upon B., beside Greenwich, there we'll lie." Here Richd. II and his bride were met by the citizens; and here Henry V was greeted by the lord mayor and aldermen on his return from Agincourt. (H5 v., prol. 16) "So swift a pace hath thought that even now You may imagine him upon B." Jack Cade and his followers camped here (H6 B. iv. 2 and 3); and here Henry VI met York and Warwick before the 1st battle of St. Albans (H6 B. v. 1). It was on B. in 1497 that Henry VII defeated the 15,000 Cornish rebels who had marched on Lond. under Audley. In Ford's Warbeck iii. 1, this battle is described. "B.," says the K., "must be reserved the fatal tomb to swallow Such stiff-necked abjects." Latimer, in Sermon I before Edward VI (1549), says that he remembers buckling on his father's harness "when he went unto B. field." The Heath was a well-known haunt of footpads and highwaymen. In Oldcastle iv. 1, Sir John mentions B. as one of the places that pay him tithe; and later, in the same scene, Harpool complains that a thief "met me last day at Blacke heath near the park," and robbed him of £100. In Fair Women ii. 458, Browne, lying in wait to murder Saunders, bids his accomplice, "See if Black Heath be clear Lest by some passenger we be descried." In Brome's Moor v. 1, Meanwell says, "We did pretend a deadly quarrel at a great bowling-match upon B." B. is mentioned often in Look about as the abode of a hermit. John says, "I'll to B. and there with friends conspire" (xxiii.).

BLACK LION. The sign of a bookseller's shop on Lond. Bdge. Com. Cond. was "Imprinted by William Howe for John Hunter on Lond. Bdge. at the Blacke L." The date is about 1576.

BLACKMOOR SEA. The part of the Atlantic Ocean off the N.W. coast of Africa. Milton, P. R. iv. 72, makes the Tempter show to our Lord "The realm of Bocchus to the B. S.," i.e. Gætulia.

BLACK SEA. The sea between S. Russia and Asia Minor. The ancients called it the Euxine Sea, or Pontus. The modern name is due to the Turks, who found the navigation of this large expanse of water difficult after their experience in the Ægean with its numerous islands, and so called it Kara Deniz, or B. S. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, Bajazeth speaks of himself as "Great K. and conqueror of Græcia, The Ocean Terrene, and the Coal-b. S."

BLACK SWAN. The sign of Sir Simon Eyre's shop in Lond. Deloney, in Craft i. 13, says, "he set up the sign of the b. S. swimming upon the sea, in remembrance of that ship the first that did bring him wealth, and before that time the sign of the b. s. was never seen, or known, in any place in or about the city of Lond."

BLACKWALL. Suburb of Lond., in the parish of Poplar, on N. side of the r. at its junction with the Lea, 4 m. E. of St. Paul's. It is one of the busiest sps. in the world. In Eastward iii. 3, the ship in which Sir Petronel is going to Virginia lies at B. In Mayne's Match v. 9, Warehouse is informed that his 2 ships have come in and "lie at B." In Fair Women ii. 177, Beane says that "between B. and Woolwich is the worst" part of the journey by river from Greenwich to Lond. In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton says that his army of rebels are "some nearer Thames, Ratchliffe, B., and Bow." In Middleton's Five Gallants i. 1, Frisprey, the draper, says he has "ventured some small stock by water to B. among fishwives." In Launching, written in praise of the E. India Company 1632, the author says of the Company, "B. proclaims their bounty; Limehouse speaks of their liberality." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, when an excursion is proposed, Sir Gosling says, "What say you to B. or Limehouse?" To which Judith replies: "Every room there smells too much of tar." In Webster's Cuckold i. 3, Compass, returning home after a voyage, cries, "B., sweet B., do I see thy white cheeks again? O beautiful B.!" Some of the scenes of the play are laid there. In Deloney's Craft ii. 9, there is a story of "an Egyptian [i.e. gipsy] woman at B."

BLACKWELL HALL (or, as it should more properly be called, BAKEWELL HALL) was on the W. side and almost at the S. end of Basinghall St., Lond. It was a very ancient building, and was for a long time the mansion of the Basing family, one of whom, Solomon, was Lord Mayor in the 4th year of Henry III. It passed into the Bakewell family in the reign of Edward III, and in the next reign was sold to the City for £50 and made into a cloth exchange. It was rebuilt in 1558, destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and re-erected in 1672. In 1820 the Bankruptcy Court was built upon its site. It was the Cloth Exchange of Lond., and no foreigner could sell cloth elsewhere. In Prodigal ii. 1, Oliver, the Devonshire clothier, boasts, "Cha have 3 score pack of karsey at Blackem-H., and chief credit beside." In Deloney's Newberie vi., the clothiers meet "at B. H. in Lond.," to present their petition to the K. In his Reading vi., he says, "Then came they to B. H. where the country clothiers did use to meet." The time is the reign of Henry I; so that the statement is 2 or 3 cents. previous.

BLANCKBOURG. An amusing hybrid translation by North of Plutarch's Leuke Kome (white village). It was on the coast of Syria, between Beyrout and Sidon. Here Antony met Cleopatra after his Parthian campaign. In Brandon's Octavia 523, Byllius says that Antony thought good "for a time at B. to remain; B. a city near to Sydon placed."

BLITHE. A vill. of great antiquity on the borders of Notts. and Yorks. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, the Earl of Huntington, Robin Hood, says, "At B. and Tickhill were we welcome guests."

BLOCK-HOUSE. A fortification built to block access to a landing, bidge., or other strategical point. There was one such at Tilbury. The word was also used for a prison, as in Jonson's Staple v. 2, where Lickfinger tells how Pennyboy, the usurer, has committed 2 of his dogs to 2 closets as prisons; "the one of which he calls his Lollards Tower, t'other his B.-H."

BLOIS. An episcopal city on the Loire, 100 m. S. of Paris, which gave their title to the Counts of B. It has an immense old castle, dating in part from the 13th cent. In it were murdered the D. of Guise and his brother, the cardinal. York complains, "Maine, B., Poitiers, and Tours are won away 'Long all of Somerset and his delay'" (H6 A. iv. 3, 45). There seems no historical foundation for York's charge, except that in 1450 Somerset had weakly surrendered Caen to the French. In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 240, K. Henri declares, "I'll secretly convey me unto B., now that Paris takes the Guises' part"; and the next scene, in which the Guises are murdered, takes place in the Castle of B. For "Sir Charles of Bloys" (Ed. III iv. 1) see under BRETAGNE.

BLOOMSBURY. Dist. in Lond., between Holborn, Gray's Inn Rd., Euston Rd., and Tottenham Court Rd. It was almost open country in the 16th and 17th cents., and was a well-known resort of bad characters. The fields behind the site of the British Museum, known as Southampton Fields, were "the resort of depraved wretches whose amusements consisted chiefly in fighting pitched battles and other disorderly sports" (Dr. Rimbault). In The Spiritual Courts Epitomized (1641), Scrape-all, the Proctor, says, "All B., Covent-Garden, Long-Acre, and Beech Lane were as fearful of me as of a constable." In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress, the president of a society of thieves called the Twiball Knights, is described as "D. of Turnbull, B., and Rotten Row." In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Knight, showing various letters from women of bad character, says, "These from 2 tender sisters of compassion in the bowels of B." In Brome's Covent G. iii. 1, Clotpoll informs the company that his lodging is "At B.": at which Justice Cockbrin pricks up his ears, and says, "B. I note it." In Cowley's Cutter ii. 3, Puny says, "I'll beat him as a B. whore beats hemp"; sc. in the prison for such women at Bridewell. B. was a favourite haunt of Jesuits. Gee, in Foot out of Snare (1624), p. 50, says, "A Jesuit of the prouder sort of priests may usually be met about B. or Holborn." In Foley's Records i. 605, it is stated that there were more Romanists than Protestants in B. (in 1634).

BLUE ANCHOR. Tavern in Lond. which may still be found at the corner of St. Mary-at-hill and Lower Thames St., close by Billingsgate. In Eastward iii. 1, Sir Petronel invites Capt. Seagull to meet him "at the B. A. tavern by Billingsgate this evening" to drink to his happy voyage. In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Cutter reports that the Capt. met the Irish envoy "last night at the B.-A."

BLUE BIBLE. One of the printers of The Book of Riddels (edn. 1629) was "Michael Sparke dwelling in Greene Arbor at the signe of the b. B."

BLUE BOAR INN. An inn in Spitalfields; also a tavern outside Aldgate. In Houghton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco says to his bewildered companions, "We are now at the farthest end of Shoreditch. . . . You brought me this way, because you would find a charm [for your spirit] at the B. B. in the Spital." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 38, Spicing bids Chub "Redeem my paund Hose; they lie at the B. B. for 11d." Taylor, in Carriers Cosmog., mentions "the B. B. without Aldgate" as the lodging of the Essex carriers. The rebels, of whom Spicing was one, came from Essex, so that the Aldgate B. B. is doubtless the one at which he had pawned his breeches.

BLUE-CAP. A Scotchman, so called from the blue bonnet worn by the Scotch. H6 A. ii. 4, 392: "One Mor-dake, and 1000 bluecaps more."

BLUE LION. An inn in Cambridge. Hall, in Satires ii. 7, 34, says the heart lodges "in the way at the B. L. inn." Milton, in Apol. for Smectymnus, refers to this passage and scoffs at Hall for whipping "the sign-posts of Cambridge ale-houses."

BOAR'S HEAD TAVERN. This famous hostelry, the scene of the frolics of Prince Hal and Falstaff (H4 A. ii. 4; iii. 2; H4 B. ii. 4) and of the death of the fat knight (H5 ii. 1, and 3), was on the N. side of Gt. Eastcheap (not to be confused with Cheapside or W. Cheap), which ran W. from Fish St. Hill. The tavern abutted at the back on St. Michael's, in Crooked Lane, and was just where the statue of William IV now stands. Stow says, speaking of the year 1470, "There was then no tavern in Eastcheap"; but he says that there were cook shops "wher men called for meat what them liked"; and, it may be presumed, for what liquor they required to wash it down. In any case, there was a tenement in E. Cheap called the B. H. in the time of Richd. II; for it was given by William Warder to a college of priests for the benefit of the adjoining Ch. of St. Michael, and it is possible that it may have been the scene of Glutton's famous debauch, described in Piers B. v. 306 ss. Lydgate, writing in the reign of Henry V, says, "Then I hyed me into Estchepe; one cryes rybbs of befe and many a pye; Pewter pots they clattered on a heape, there was harpe, pype, and mynstrel-sye." Drinking therefore went on, as well as eating, in the cookshops. Shakespeare was not an archæologist, however; and it is enough that there was a B. H. T. in E. Cheap in his time, for it is so specifically named in 1537. It was burned down in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt on the same site, and its sign carved in stone with the initials I. T. and the date 1668 is preserved in the Guildhall. A B. H. in boxwood is said to have been discovered amongst some rubbish after the Gt. Fire with the inscription on the back: "William Brooke, Landlord of the Bore's Heade, Estchepe, 1566," and was bought by Mr. Halliwell at Christie's in 1855. The tavern and the Ch. of St. Michael were both demolished in 1831. There was also a B. H. T. in Knighttrider St., near the Blackfriars Theatre, but there is no need to go to it for the original of Shakespeare's inn. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Eyre despatches a boy to "bid the tapster of the B. H. fill me a dozen cans of beer for my journeyemen." This was no doubt the E. Cheap Tavern. In News Barthol. Fair, in the list of Lond. Taverns, we find "The Bores H., near Lond. Stone"; which is the E. Cheap one; and also "The Bores H. in Old Fish St." The B. H., 157 Cannon St., preserves the name of the historic hostelry.

It is a curious coincidence that there was a B. H. in the High St. of Southwark which once belonged to Sir John Fastolfe: he gave it to the Bp. of Winchester, who bestowed it on Magdalen College, Oxford. There was another B. H. T. in Whitefriars, the site of which is indicated by B. H. Alley in Fleet St.; now a private passage. There was a B. H. on the N. side of Whitechapel, E. of Aldgate, between Middlesex St. and Goulston St., where B. H. Yard still marks its site. It was one of the 5 inns mentioned by Howes in which plays were performed before the building of the theatres. There is record of "a lewd play called A Sackful of News" being played there on Sept. 5, 1557. In March 1602 the players of the Earls of Oxford and Worcester had the B. H. assigned to them by the Privy Council.

BOCARD. The prison in the N. Gate of Oxford, pulled down in 1771. The name was probably derived jocularly from the syllogism Bocardo, the 5th mood of the 3rd figure, which is incapable of being reduced to the 1st figure by the process of conversion, and is therefore difficult to get out of. Latimer and Cranmer were both confined here. In Greene's Friar vii. 112, Clement, annoyed by the ragging of the 3 disguised courtiers, says, "Call out the beadies and convey them hence straight to B." Miles replies: "Out with your blades . . . and teach these sacerdos that the Bs. are meet for themselves." In the Life of John Story (1571), we read: "Dr. Story was apprehended by the officers and laid in B." In Middleton's Family i. 3, Club says of a lady of fashion, "In the night-time she is filthier than the inside of B." The word is also used in a general sense for a prison, as when Latimer, in his Serm. before Ed. VI 232, says that Elias for his troublesome preaching was "worthy to be cast into B."; and in Serm. at Stamford (1550), that the Herodians were ready to lay hands upon our Lord "to have him to B."

BODLEY'S LIBRARY. The great library in the University of Oxford, founded by Sir Thomas Bodley, and formally opened in 1602, when it contained over 2000 volumes. The first catalogue was printed in 1605. The original library was in the quadrangle on the W. side of Catherine St., a little S. of Broad St., known as the schools. The books are now partly housed in the Camera Bodleiana, or Radcliffe Dome, a little S. of the Schools. The library contains upwards of 500,000 volumes and MSS. In Randolph's Muses' iii. 1, Banausus proposes to found a library of drapers' books for young men of fashion; and Colax exclaims, "Twill put down Bodly's and the Vatican." Brooke, in verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), says, "We ere long shall well perceive your wit, Grave learned B., by your placing it" in your library.

BODMIN. Town in Cornwall, 26 m. N.W. of Plymouth. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 5, Skelton, speaking of Warbeck, says, "The Cornish blades . . . have proclaimed through B. and the whole county my sweet prince Monarch of England."

BOEOTIA. The dist. in ancient Greece, N. of Attica, between the Eubæan Sea and Gulf of Corinth. Its chief town was Thebes. The Athenians regarded the inhabitants as dull and stupid, and thence a Bn. comes to mean a dull-witted Philistine. Marston, in Pygmalion ii. 142, speaks of a "dull-sprighted fat Bn. Boor." Jonson's Pan is a contest between "certain bold boys of B." and a company of Arcadians. The Bns. are beaten and are bidden to "return with their solid heads and carry their stupidity into B., whence they brought it." The scene of Wilson's Cobler is laid in B. soon after the time of the Persian Wars; but it is merely England under another name. The fountain Hippocrene (q.v.) was in B. In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 3, Phyginois asks, "Who will seek the river for to quench His thirst who at Bn. Hippocrene Hath pledged Mnemosyne in full-fraught cups?" In Tiberius 532, Germanicus, referring to the cessation of the Greek oracles, says, "Vocal Boeotia in deep miseries And Delphian glory in obscureness lies."

BOHEMIA (BOHEM or BŒMIA; German BÖHMEN). A kingdom in the centre of Europe, once part of the Austrian Empire. It lies S. of Saxony, with Silesia and Moravia (with the latter of which it is now united) on the E., Bavaria on the W., and the former Duchy of Austria on the S. It was originally inhabited by the Boii, from whom it took its name. In the middle of the 6th cent. A.D. it was conquered by the Czechs, a Slavonian race; and the daughter of Krok, Libussa, married Premysl, and founded a native dynasty which lasted till 1306. John of Luxembourg then received the crown, which was held by his descendants till the success of the Hussite reformers led to the monarchy being made elective. After the famous battle of Mohacz, Ferdinand of Austria took possession of B. in 1547. In 1627, after the overthrow of the Protestant Elector Palatine, son-in-law of James I and elective K. of B., it was declared a permanent part of the Austrian Empire, and continued so until 1919. The K. of B. was one of the 7 Electors of the Holy Roman Empire: he claimed the right as the Emperor's hereditary cup-bearer, and it was finally confirmed by the Golden Bull of 1356. The scene of Winter's Tale is partly in B., partly in Sicily: Shakespeare in this following the Historie of Dorastus and Fawnia, though he transposes the places. In iii. 3, 1, Antigonus, who has been sent to expose the infant daughter of the K. of Sicily, inquires of the mariner who has been cast ashore with him, "Thou art perfect, then, our ship hath touched upon the deserts of B.?" In the original the child is set adrift in a boat and is driven on the coast of Sicily. But B. throughout Dorastus and Fawnia is represented as on the sea. Egisthus and his men "without any suspicion got to the Sea shore; where with many a bitter curse taking their leave of B., they went aboard." "The Bn. Lords went to their ships and sailed toward B., whither in short time they safely arrived, and with great triumph issuing out of their ships went to the Kinges pallace." "Dorastus, hearing that they were arrived at some harbour . . . they tolde him that the port belonged unto the cheife Cittie of B." Shakespeare therefore had the authority of his author for giving B. a sea coast, and did not trouble to inquire further. The time of the play is quite indefinite: there is no K. of B. whose name even distantly resembles either Pandosto or Polixenes.

Barnardine (Meas. iv. 2, 134) is described as "a Bn. born"; and in Whetstone's Promos ii. 2, Corvinus is "K. of Hungaria and Boemia." The Host of the Garter (M. W. W. iv. 5, 21) describes poor inoffensive Simple as "a Bn.-Tartar." This is not an anticipation of the modern use of the word, in the sense of a man who leads a vagabond, irregular life, which is derived from the French use of Bohème as meaning a gipsy. It is a combination implying savagery: the Tartars had the reputation of being barbarous and cruel. Heylyn (p. 653) says, "they are barbarous everywhere in behaviour"; and the Bns. had a similar character: "a people given to drinke and gluttony," says the same author. Mine Host is, of course, ironical in using such an epithet of Simple. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune shows Fortunatus in a vision a series of examples of her power. Amongst them is "Primislaus, a Bn. K., last day a carter." This Primislaus, or Premysl, was the legendary founder of the Bn. royal line. He was a labourer, but married the daughter of Krok, the founder of Prague, and so became K. One of the characters in Jonson's Queens is "the bold Valasca of B." She was the wife of Premysl, and organized an insurrection of women to deliver B. from his tyranny. Each of them slew her husband, and Valasca became Q. In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 126, Lorenzo says, "That B. neither cares for one nor other" of the candidates for the Empire. In line 212, Alphonsus hopes to work "Upon the Bemish K.'s ambition," and so gain the election against Richd. of Cornwall. In i. 2, 11, this K. calls himself "Henry, K. of B.," but was actually Ottocar II, one of the most famous of his line. He appears as one of the electors in Hector.

In Ed. III 1, the K. of B. comes to help the K. of France; and in iii. 5, Prince Edward enters, preceded by the body of the K. of B., whom he "Has dropt and cut down even at the gate of death." This was the blind K., Charles of Luxembourg, son of Henry of Luxembourg, who founded a new Bn. dynasty in 1306. According to the well-known story, he ordered his knights to tie his horse's bridle to theirs at the battle of Crecy and to take him into the fight: where both he and they were slain. The Prince of Wales assumed his badge, which was "a plume of 3 ostrich feathers argent with the motto Ich Dien." Jonson, in Prince Henry's Barriers, says, "The Black Prince Edward . . . at Cressy field . . . tears From the Bn. crown the plume he wears, Which after for his crest he did preserve To his father's use, with this fit word, I serve." This story, however, seems to be without historical confirmation. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes of Natolia claims to have so battered Vienna with his cannon that "the K. of Boheme and the Austric D. Sent heralds out which . . . desired a truce." The reference appears to be to the defeat of the K. of Hungary and his allies at Nicopolis in 1396 by Bajazet I. The K. of B. then was John the Fearless; but there is no evidence that the Turks reached Vienna at this time. Massinger's Picture is stated by him to be "true Hungarian history." Its scene is laid partly in Hungary, partly in B., in the reign of Ladislas of Hungary, in the latter half of the 15th cent. Mathias, a knight of B., is the hero of the play; and is probably intended for the Matthias who became K. of Hungary on the death of Ladislas in 1457, and in 1469 was proclaimed K. of B. too. During the latter part of the 16th cent. there were many bitter religious conflicts in B. owing to the attempts of the emperors to enforce the Romish religion on the people. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 2, the disguised Brainworm claims to have served "in all the late wars of B., Hungaria, Dalmatia, Poland, where not?" The 1st wife of Richd. II was Anne of B., the sister of the Emperor Wenceslaus. In Trag. Richd. II she is frequently spoken of as "Ann of Beame," and her death at Sheen is announced in iv. 3. In Ford's Warbeck ii. 1, K. James says, "K. Charles of France And Maximilian of B. both Have ratified his [Warbeck's] credit by their letters." This is Maximilian I, the famous Emperor and founder of the greatness of the House of Hapsburg; but he was not K. of B. Probably Ford confounds him with Maximilian II of B., 1564-1576.

BOLINGBROKE. A town in Lincs., 29 m. E. of Lincoln. The castle was built by William de Romara, Earl of Lincoln, but came into the possession of John of Gaunt. His son Henry, afterwards K. Henry IV, was born here and took from it his surname, Henry of B. He is always spoken of as B. until his return to claim his father's title, and even after that by those who disputed his claim (R2, H4 B. i. 1 and 3; iii. 1; iv. 1. H6 A. ii. 5; H6 B. ii. 3). He himself declines to answer to any name but Lancaster. When Berkeley addresses him as "My Lord of Hereford," he replies, "My Lord, my answer is to Lancaster, And I am come to seek that name in England; And I must find that title in your tongue Before I make reply to aught you say" (R2 ii. 3, 70). Roger B., the conjurer, mentioned H6 B. i. 2, 76, was one of the D. of Gloucester's chaplains and a man of great learning in astronomy and the art of necromancy. He was accused of having made an image of the K. in wax in order to affect his health by gradually melting it away, and was drawn and quartered at Tyburn. The word is pronounced Bullingbrook.

BOLLEYN. See BOULOGNE.

BOLOGNA. A large city in Italy, N. of the Apennines, 150 m. N.W. of Rome. It is a thriving, industrious, and wealthy place. Its university, said to have been founded by Theodosius II, was the oldest and most famous in Italy, if not in the world. Its sausages, vulgarly known as polonies, have a world-wide reputation: it has also important manufactures of silk, paper, and pottery. The word is often spelt Bononia by the Elizabethans. The scene of B. & F. Chances is laid in B., and Don John (i. 3) says, "The civil order of this town B. Makes it beloved and honoured of all travellers As a most safe retirement in all troubles; Besides the wholesome seat and noble temper Of those minds that inhabit it, safely wise, And to all strangers virtuous." In ii. 1, he says, "I am . . . a gentleman That lies here for my study," i.e. to attend the university. In Greene's Friar ix. 111, Vandermaast boasts, "I have given non-plus to the Paduans, To them of Sien, Florence and B.," and half a dozen other universities. In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 1, the Friar exclaims, "Art thou, my son, that miracle of wit Who once, within these 3 months, wert esteemed A wonder of thine age throughout Bononia?" There were still banditti in the neighbourhood, for in B. & F. Wild Goose v. 2, we are told that Mirabel saved a gentleman "from being murdered a little from B."

Cromwell iii. 2, is laid at B.; and his servant Hodge writes home: "I am, at this present writing, among the Polonyan Sasiges." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says of the author, "Tom's a B. sausage lovely fat." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 1, the banished Trapolin laments, "Farewell, my draughts of Montefiascone, and B. sausages!" In ii. 3, Horatio speaks of it as "fat B.": a translation of the Italian la Grassa B. In Florio's Montaigne i. 4, a story is told of a gentleman who relieved his gout by "cursing against Bolonie-sausage." Rabelais in Gargantua i. 3, says that Grangousier would not eat "sausages of Bolonia, for he feared the Lombard bit," i.e., poison. In Jonson, Cynthia v. 2, Mercury tries to cheapen some ribbons by declaring, "These are Bn. ribands, I warrant you," but is assured by the milliner that they are right Granado silk; which was evidently considered to be of superior quality. It was to B. that the Marquis of Saluces, the husband of patient Griselda, sent her children privily in Chaucer's Clerk of Oxford's Tale (C. T. E. 686). In Lælia i. 1, 66, Virginius says, "Occasio mihi in Boloniam fuit Ibi ut socii conferremus tabulas."

BOLOIGN. See BOULOGNE.

BOLSOVER. A vill. in N. Derbysh., 5 m. from Welbeck. Here the Earl of Newcastle entertained K. James in 1634, when Jonson's Love's Welcome was produced.

BOLT-IN-TUN INN. An ancient tavern in Whitefriars, with an opening into Fleet St., opposite to Bolt Court, which preserves the name. It is now a railway receiving office, some small part only of the I.-yard being left. The sign was a rebus on the name of Prior Bolton, Abbot of St. Bartholomew the Gt. The property belonged to the Carmelite Friars. Jonson, in New Inn i. 1, justifies the name of the Light Heart I. by saying, "Old Abbot Islip could not invent better, or Prior Bolton with his bolt and ton."

BOLTON. In Feversham i. 174, Michael, proposing for Susan's hand, says, "I will rid mine elder brother away, and then the farm of Bolton is mine own." Probably we should read, with Jacob, Bocton. The place intended is Boughton-under-Blean, a vill. in Kent, a few miles W. of Canterbury on the Pilgrims Rd. It is mentioned in Chaucer, C. T. G. 556, as the place where the canon and his yeoman overtook the pilgrims. It was "ere we hadde riden fully 5 mile" from their last stopping place, which was no doubt Ospring. In a letter of Crammer's to Cromwell, written in 1558, he speaks of a farm at Bowghton under the Blayne which his servant Nevell "had of the Abbot and Convent of Feversham."

BONONIA. Alternative spelling of Bologna, q.v.

BONVILLE (BONDEVILLE). A small town in Normandy, near Rouen, which gave their title to the Barons of B. The 1st Baron was created in 1449; and his great-granddaughter Cicely, was married by Edward IV to Thomas Grey, Earl of Dorset, the son of his Queen, Elizabeth Woodville, by her former husband. To this marriage Clarence refers in H6 C. iv. 1, 56, "Or else you would not have bestowed the heir Of the Lord B. on your new wife's son." In George, one of the characters is Lord Charnel Bonfield, who speaks of himself as the Lord of Doncaster. In T. Heywood's Royal King i., Capt. Bonville says, "My Grandsir was the first that raised the name of Bonville to this height." If so, Edward IV is probably intended, if indeed any particular king, by the Royal King.

BORDEAUX (Bu. = Burdeaux). The capital of Guienne, on the left bank of the Garonne, some 60 m. from its mouth and 370 m. S.W. of Paris. It belonged to England for abt. 300 years, and an extensive trade was carried on between the 2 countries. Chaucer says of his shipman (C. T. prol. 397), "Ful many a draughte of wyn hadde he y-drawe Fro Burdeauxward whil that the Chapman sleepe." Here Edward the Black Prince kept up a magnificent court, and here his son Richd. II was born. "Herein," says Exton, "all breathless lies The mightiest of thy greatest enemies, Richd. of B." (R2 v. 6, 33). In Trag. Richd. II ii. 1, 106, Bushey reads, "Upon the 3d of April 1365 was Lord Richd. born at Burdex." H6 A. iv. 2-7 are at, or in the neighbourhood of, B., and describe the attack on the city by Talbot, and his death, in 1453. In H4 A. ii. 4, 69, Doll Tear-sheet says of Falstaff, "There's a whole merchant's venture of B. stuff in him"—wine being one of the chief exports of B. In H3 i. 1, 96, Norfolk announces that "France hath flawed the league and hath attached Our merchants' goods at B." The league is that made between Henry VIII and Francis of France at the Field of the Cloth of Gold in 1520; but in 1521 Henry concluded a treaty with the Emperor Charles at Bruges, by which he bound himself to invade France the next year with 40,000 men. As the result of this, Francis commanded on March 6, 1522, that all Englishmen's goods should be "attached and put under a reste" (Hall's Chronicle).

In Hycke, p. 102, Frewyll describes how he got drunk and in his imagination "dyde lepe out of Burdeaux into Canterbury, almost 10 m. between." In Jack Drum i. 20, Sir Edward calls, "Fetch me some Burdeaux wine." There is a curious parallel to the Hycke passage in Chaucer, C. T. C. 571, "The wyn of Spaigne crepeth subtilly . . . Of which ther ryseth swich fumosites That whan a man hath dronken draughtes thre And weneth that he be at hoom in Chepe, He is in Spaigne right at the tounne of Lepe,—Nat at the Rochele, near Bu.-toun": the point being that B. wine or claret is not so strong as the Spanish wines. In Marston's Antonio B. v. 4, Piero says, "I drink this Bu. wine Unto the health of dead Anbrugio." In Nash's Wilton K. 1, Jack says that the only profit of travel in France is that the traveller has "learnt to distinguish of the true B. grape." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 2, Reignald rinses his throat "with B. and Canary." In Chapman's May-Day iv. 1, Quintiliano sings, "Fill red-cheeked Bacchus, let the B. grape Skip like lavoltas in their swelling veins." In Trag. Richd. II v. 2, 147, Lancaster says of Burdax, "The soil is fat for wines, not fit for men": in allusion to the birth of Richd. there. In Ret. Pernass. pt. ii., the hero visits B. and falls in love there with the heroine Rosabella.

BORDELLO. A collection of some 20 houses on the Bankside, Southwark, belonging to the Bp. of Winchester and leased out as public brothels. Falstaff was probably thinking of them when he talked of getting him "a wife in the stews" (H4 B. i. 2, 60). When Old Knowell reads Wellbred's letter to his son dated "from the Windmill," he exclaims, "From the B. it might come as well, The Spittle, or Picthatch" (Jonson, Ev. Man I. i. 1). Chapman, in D'Olive ii., speaks of "Those changeable creatures that live in the Burdello, now in satin, tomorrow next in stammel." In Glapthorne's Privilege i. 1, Adorni says, "These gentlemen know better to board a punction in the Burdells than a pinace at sea." See also BANKSIDE, STEWS.

BORNO. A kingdom of Central Africa, lying S. and W. of Lake Tchad. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles gives an account of his conquests in Africa, and says, "Having sacked B., the kingly seat, I took the king and led him bound in chains Unto Damasco." In v. 3, Tamburlaine claims to have conquered all from India "to Nubia near B. Lake"; i.e. Lake Tchad. Heylyn says that in Bornum "the people have neither children, wives, nor names, but are distinguished by some external accident." He omits to state how race-suicide was avoided. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Carionil, disguised as a negro, professes to be ambassador of the emperor of a dozen kingdoms in Africa, including "Barne," which I suspect is meant for B.

BOROUGH (or, more fully, BOROUGH HIGH ST.). The main st. of Southwark, which was known to Londoners as The B. in contradistinction to Lond. itself, which was the City. It runs from the foot of Lond. Bdge. to the junction of Newington Causeway and Gt. Dover St. Dekker, in Bellman, mentions "Cheapside, East-cheap, the Shambles, both Fish sts., the Stockes, and the B. in Southwarke," as favourite haunts of foysts or pick-pockets.

BOSANETH. A farm in the parish of Mawnan, 4 m. from Penryn, in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2767, the bp. gives to the executioner for killing Maximilla "Behethlan, Behethlen ha B." ("ha" means "and").

BOSOM'S INN (a corruption of BLOSSOMS INN). A tavern on the W. side of Laurence Lane, off Cheapside, Lond., the sign of which was St. Laurence surrounded by a border of flowers or blossoms: the site is now occupied by the L. & N.E.R. Goods Office.

In Jonson's Christmas, "Now comes in Tom of B. I. and he presenteth misrule." 20 beds and stabling for 60 horses were provided at "the sign of St. Lawrence, otherwise called B. I.," for the train of the Emperor Charles V in 1522. The tract called Maroccus Extaticus, about Banks and his horse Marocco, was stated on the title to be "written by John Dando, the wire-drawer of Hadley, and Harrie Runt, head ostler of Bosomes I." In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Greenshield says of his fair companion, "I left her at B. I." In Deloney's Reading ii., the clothiers stay at B. I., which is said to be named after the host, "Old Bosome." This is not correct. The inn was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and not rebuilt. Blossom I. Yard, No. 23 Lawrence Lane, marks the site.

BOSPORUS (or BOSPHORUS). The channel connecting the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora. It is about 17 m. long, and varies in breadth from 600 to 1000 yards. Its name was connected by the Greeks with the passage across it of Io after she had been turned into a cow and was being driven through Europe and Asia by a gad-fly sent by Hera to torment her. The word may be literally translated "Ox-ford." In Marmion's Companion iii. 4, Capt. Whibble boasts, "I have ploughed up the sea, till B. has worshipped me." In Kyd's Solyman v., a witness testifies, "Will you consent, quoth he, to fire the fleet That lies hard by us here in B. 5" Milton, P. L. ii. 1018, says that Satan was "more endangered than when Argo passed Through B. betwixt the justling rocks." These rocks were the Symplegades at the E. entrance of the B.; they were said to clash together and crunch the ships that tried to pass them. The passage connecting the Sea of Azov and the Black Sea was also called the B., the 2 being distinguished as the Thracian and the Cimmerian respectively. From the latter the Crimea was called the Kingdom of B. It is this that is referred to in B. & F. Bonduca iv. 3, when Petillius, urging Penius to kill himself with his sword and not by poison, says, "Mithradates was an arrant ass To die by poison, if all B. Could lend him swords." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says, "I displayed the Eagle in the rough Cimmerian B." The reference is to his campaign against Pharnaces 47 B.C.

BOSS ALLEY. A lane on the S. side of Thames St., Lond., running down to the river, near Billingsgate: so called from a boss or projecting pipe of spring water, said to have been placed there by the executors of Sir Richd. Whittington. In Rowland's Good News and Bad News (1622), "The waterworks, huge Paul's, old Charing Cross, strong Lond. Bdge., at Billingsgate the Bosse," are enumerated amongst the glories of Lond. There is a play entitled The B. of Billingsgate.

BOSTON. Town in Lincs., 100 m. N. of Lond., on the Witham. Its parish ch. of St. Botolph with its noble tower, locally known as "B. Stump," is its chief title to fame. There was a Priory of St. Mary also, and the Palmer, in J. Heywood's Four PP., has not forgotten to visit "our Lady of B." In Bale's Laws iv., Infidelity declares, "I have a pardon here in my sleeve, of our Lady of B." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 13, mention is made of a petition from the men of Nottingham to have the Trent made "navigable to Gainsborough, So to B., Kingston, Humber, and Hull." But B. is not on the Trent; and I suspect a misprint for Burton, which lies just at the head of the estuary of the Trent where it enters the Humber. Hall, in Satires v. 2, speaks of Trebius slaking his thirst "With palish oat frothing in B. clay," i.e. small beer in a vessel of cheap crockery.

BOSVENE (i.e. BOSVANNAH). Farm in Cornwall, near Falmouth, in the parish of Gluvias. In Cornish M. P. i. 2399, Solomon says to the Messenger, "My a re thyugh [I will give you] B., Lostwithyel ha [and] Lanerchy."

BOSWORTH (or, more fully, MARKET-B.). A town in Leicestersh., 13 m. W. of Leicester, and 106 m. N.E.

of Lond. The battle between Richd. III and Henry of Richmond was fought on a plain 1 m. S. of the town, formerly called Redmore Plain, but subsequently B. Field. The spot where Stanley placed the crown on Richmond's head is still known as Crown Hill. A memorial tablet was erected by Dr. Parr in 1812. "Here pitch our tents," says Richd., "even here in B. Field" (R3 v. 3, 1); and this and the next 2 scenes are laid there. In Ford's Warbeck i. 3, Henry cries, "Sir William Stanley! he, 'twas only he Who, having rescued me in B.-field From Richd.'s bloody sword, snatched from his head The kingly crown and placed it first on mine." "B. Field," says Warbeck (v. 2), "Where at an instant to the world's amazement A morn to Richmond and a night to Richd. Appeared at once." In True Tragedy, p. 116, Stanley says, "The K. is now come to Lester and means tomorrow to bid thee battle in B."

BOTTISHAM. A vill. in Cambridgesh. In Mankind, Farmer, p. 28, Nought, proposing to go horse-stealing, says, "I shall spare Master Allington of B."

BOUILLON. A town in S.E. Belgium, on the Senoy, close to the French frontier, abt. 80 m. S.E. of Brussels. The ancient castle, on a steep hill overlooking the town, has been repaired and is used as a military prison. The town gave his title to the famous Crusader and 1st K. of Jerusalem, Godfrey of B. In Davenant's Plymouth ii. 1, Trifle is getting up a pageant of the 9 worthies, amongst whom he names "Alexander, Godfrey of Bulloigne, and good K. David."

BOULOGNE. A spt. of France on the English Channel, 157 m. from Paris. The town was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and when Louis II took it in 1477 he did homage to her as its sovereign. There was a famous image of the Virgin in the Ch. of Notre Dame, to which pilgrimages were made in the Middle Ages. Chaucer's Wife of Bath (A. 465) had been at B.; and in Gurton ii. 2, Diccon will not tell what he knows until he has made Dame Chat swear "by our dere lady of Bullaine" not to reveal his secret. The town was besieged and taken by Henry VIII in 1544. In Feversham ii. 1, Bradshaw says that he and Black Will "at Bulloine were fellow-soldiers." In True Trag., ad fin., it is related that Henry VIII in his decreasing age "conquered Bullen." In Jonson's Owls, we read, "This Capt. Cox, by St. Mary, Was at Bullen with King Ha-ry." Hentzer saw in the Tower of Lond. 2 cannon "made of wood, which the English had at the siege of B." In Vox Borealis (1641), a dispute is reported between the musqueteers and the archers, in which the archers maintained that "bows and arrows won Bulloine." In Penn. Parl. 31, we read, "Some shall maintain that a Turk can be hit at 12 score pricks in Finsbury Fields, ergo the bow and shafts won Bullen."

In Rowley's New Wonder iii. 1, Speedwell says, "My godfather was an old soldier, having served in the wars as far as B." In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 2, D'Olive says that everything in future will be dated from the year of his ambassage: "The siege of B. shall be no more a landmark for times." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 1, Autolicus says that Holland is beleaguered "and will hold out as long as Busse or Boloigne." Lodge, in Wits Miserie (1596), says of Lying, "At Bullaine he thrust 3 Switzers through the belly at one time." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 93, Q. Elizabeth says that Grey "fought for our father . . . at Bullen." Gascoigne, in Steel Glass, p. 65 (Arber), speaks of one who assumes to be a soldier, "Because he hath perchance at Bolleyn-been." The town was restored to France by Edward VI. In Davenant's Wits iii., Thwack, dressing himself, cries, "O for the Bulloign hose I wore when I was sheriff in '88." In Webster's Weakest, prol., "The D. of Anjou, fatally inclined against the family of Bullen, leads a mighty army into Burgandy." This was in the early part of the reign of Louis IX, before he went to the Holy Land. Lodowick, D. of Bullen, takes an important part in the play. In the Elements, Haz. i. 28, Experience, in his lecture on geography, points out "the narrow sea to Calais and B. the next way." Act III, Sc. 3 of Hector is laid at "Bulleigne."

BOURBON-L'ARCHAMBAULT. The capital of the ancient Barony of Bourbonnais, on the Bourges, abt. 150 m. S. of Paris. The founder of the line of B. was Adhemar, who lived during the 10th cent. Of the old castle 3 towers are still left. Antoine de B. married Jeanne d'Albret, Princess of Navarre, and became K. of Navarre in 1554. Their son was Henri of Navarre, afterwards Henri IV of France, and ancestor of the French B. kings. The Spanish Bs. date from 1700, when Philip V, grandson of Louis XIV, came to the throne. (See Macaulay's Essay on The War of Succession in Spain.) A branch of the Spanish Bs. held the throne of Naples from 1735 to 1861; and the duchies of Lucca and Parma were in the hands of another from 1748 to 1860. The D. of B., appealed to by Charles to fight against Henry V (H5 iii. 5, 41), who endeavoured to rally the French at Agincourt, crying: "Let us die in honour; once more back again; And he that will not follow B. now, Let him go hence" (H5 iv. 5, 12)—and named in the list of the prisoners (H5 iv. 8, 82), was John, who was carried to England, and, after 18 years' confinement, died in 1433 and was buried in the Grey Friars Ch., Newgate, afterwards rebuilt by Henry VIII as Christ Ch. The Lord B., "our high admiral" (H6 C. iii. 3, 252), was the son of Charles D. of B., and grandson of the John of the last paragraph. In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, Lucretia Borgia recalls how "the D. of B. on his knees did beg one lock" of her hair. This was Pierre, who was D. of B. 1488-1503. There is a D. of B. in Chivalry, which appears to be meant to take place in the reign of St. Louis of France abt. 1260. Sir Burbon, in Spenser's F. Q. v. 11 and 12, is Henri of Navarre, afterwards Henri IV of France. A fashionable way for men of wearing the hair was called the B. lock. In Jack Drum i. 340, Brabant says of Puffe, "When his period comes not roundly off, he takes toll of the 10th hair of his B. lock."

BOURG. The capital of the department of Ain, in France, 239 m. S.E. of Paris. It is distinguished from other towns of the same name as Bourg-en-Bresse. It was taken by the D. of Biron in 1600. It was considered one of the strongest places in Europe. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron asks the K. for "the keeping of the citadel of B."; which Henri refuses because it is "the chief key of my kingdom that opens towards Italy." In Trag. Byron v. 1, the 3rd charge laid against Byron is, "You held intelligence with the D., At taking in Of B. and other forts."

BOURGES. An ancient city in France and the seat of an archbp., at the junction of the Auzon and Vevre, 124 m. S. of Paris. The cathedral dates from the 13th cent., and is one of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in France. In Fam. Vict., the Lord Archbp. of B. is one of the French ambassadors who brought the King a ton of tennis balls as a gift from the K. of France.

BOUTTERSHEIM (possibly BAUTERSHEIM is intended). A town in Belgium, in S. Brabant, abt. 6 m. S.E. of Louvain. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Cymbal says, "See but Maximilian His letters to the Baron of B. or Scheiter-Huissen." In Epigram cvii. To Capt. Hungry, he says, "Keep your names Of Hannow, Sheiter-huissen, Popenheim, Hansspiegle, Rottenburg, and Boutersheim For your next meal."

BOW (more fully STRATFORD-AT-B., q.v.). A suburb of Lond., on the Lea, $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. N.E. of St. Paul's. It was called B. from the arched bidge. over the Lea. In Old-castle iii. 2, Acton says that his army is dispersed in sundry villages, amongst which are "some nearer Thames, Ratcliff, Blackwall, and B." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, the Fiddler offers to sing a number of ballads, including "The landing of the Spaniards at B. with the bloody battle of Mile-End." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 16, the Mayor says to the rebels, "the poorest citizen Shall walk to B., a small wand in his hand, Although thou lie encamped at Mile-End-Green, And not the proudest rebel of you all Shall dare to touch him." An annual goose-fair was held there; in Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, the Porter says to Yellowhammer, "If I see your Worship at Goose-fair, I have a dish of birds for you."—"Why," says Yellowhammer, "dost dwell at B.?"—"All my lifetime, sir," answers the Porter, "I could ever say so to a goose." Taylor, Works, says, "At B. the Thursday after Pentecost There is a fair of green geese, ready roast; And as herbs, flowers, and weeds together grow, So people are that day at Stratford B." (p. 110). In Glaphorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine says, "You can have your meetings at Islington and Green Goose Fair and sip a zealous glass of wine." In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Tucca says, "Get a base violin at your back and march in a tawny coat with one sleeve to Goose-fair." In Beguiled 1426, the Nurse complains, "He made me believe he would go to Green-goose Fair." It was a convenient distance for an afternoon's outing for the Londoners. Jonson, in his Epigram 129 To Mime, says, "There's no journey set or thought upon To Brentford, Hackney, B., but thou mak'st one."

The Ch. of St. Mary in the middle of Mile End Rd. was the chapel of the Benedictine Nunnery founded by William the Conqueror. It was here that the Prioress of C. T. prol. 126 learned her French: "Frenssh she spak ful faire and fetisly After the schole of Stratford-atte-Bowe, For Frenssh of Parys was to hire unknowe." Jonson parodies the passage in New Inn ii. 2, where the Host says of Fly, "he speaks a little tainted, flyblown Latin After the school"—to which Beaufort adds: "of Stratford o' the B.; For Lillie's Latin is to him unknowe." There were many bakers in B. who helped to furnish Lond. with bread. They brought it in carts and sold it in Cheapside, Cornhill, and Gracechurch St.; and the loaves being 2 oz. heavier than those made in Lond. they doubtless had a good market. Piers B. xiii. 267, tells how, as the result of the drought of 1370, "no carte come to tounne with bake bred fro Stretforth." According to Stow this service of bread ceased about 1570.

BOW CHURCH. The Ch. of St. Mary-le-B., or St. Mary de Arcubus, in Lond.: so called from the vaulted arches on which it was built, or from the arches in the lantern on the top of the tower. It is on the S. side of Cheapside, E. of Bread St., at the corner of B. Lane, and was built in the reign of William I. The steeple was repaired in 1512 and the lantern and stone arches, which may still be seen on the seal of the ch., were added. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire of 1666, and the present ch. was erected by Sir Christopher Wren. To be born within the sound of B. Bell is the mark of the genuine Cockney. In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 1, Truewit wonders that Morose does not commit suicide when there is "such a delicate steeple in the town as B. to vault from." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 275, Tim admits: "Sometimes, as soon as I have come from B. Ch., I have gone to a bawdy house." In Eastward i. 3, Girtred begs, "Take me out of this miserable city! carry me out of the scent of Newcastle coal and the hearing of B.-bell." In v. 3, she confesses, "I would make a mouth at the city as I rid through it; and stop mine ears at B.-bell." In Randolph's Muses' iii. 1, Banauus proposes "To get a high-crowned hat with 5 low-bells To make a peal shall serve as well as B." In Penn. Parl. 23, it is provided that "B.-bell in Cheapside, if it break not, shall be warranted by letters patent to ring well." In the nursery rhyme used in the game of Oranges and Lemons one distich runs, "I'm sure I don't know, Says the Gt. Bell of B." In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings swears, "By Cheapside-Cross and loud B.-bell." In Treasure, Haz. iii. 267, Inclination says, "The same year the weather-cock of Paul's caught the pip so that B.-bell was like much woe to sustain." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Water-Camlet says of his talkative wife, "B. Bell is a still organ to her." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iv. 1, 205, the shoemaker says to his chattering wife, "Sfoot, will B.-bell never leave ringing?" Greene, in Perimedes Blacksmith (1588), satirizes Marlowe's big words as "filling the mouth like the fa-burden of Bo-bell." The fa-burden, or Faux-bourdon, means the bass, or lowest bell, of a chime. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 19, Smoke bids his fellow-rebels, "Pluck out the clapper of B. Bell and hang up all the sextons in the city."

The curfew was rung on B. Bell every night at 9: this was the signal for the cessation of work. Hence the old rhyme in which the prentices complain, "Clarke of the B.-bell with the yellow locks, For thy late ringing thy head shall have knocks." To which the Clerk replies: "Children of Chepe, hold you all still; For you shall have B.-bell rung at your will." In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 3, Pisaro exclaims, "God's me! 'tis 9 o'clock; hark! B.-bell rings." B. Bell is used in the sense of a Cockney. In Eastward i. 2, Girtred contemptuously calls her sister "B.-bell." In Prodigal ii. 1, Oliver says sarcastically to Sir Arthur, "Ay, and well said, cocknell and Bowbell too." The Ecclesiastical Court of Arches was so called because it sat in this ch. In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Greenwit, in the disguise of a Sumner, cites Gallipot "to appear in B. Ch. in answer to a libel of pre-contract."

BOW LANE. St. in Lond., running S. along the E. side of B. Ch. in Cheapside to the corner of Cannon St. and Q. Victoria St. It was formerly called Cordwayners St., from the shoemakers who had their shops there. Amongst the guests invited to the banquet in Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 2, are "Master Body et Uxor of B. L." In Brome's City Wit i. 1, Josina sends to "Mrs. Piccadell in B.-L. to provide me an honest, handsome, secret young man." In his Moor iii. 1, Quicksands asks, "How knew'st thou I wanted a servant?" And Phillis replies: "At an old wives house in B. L. that places servants": doubtless the aforesaid Mrs. Piccadell's. Armin, in Ninnies, tells of "a poor blind woman in B.-l. called blind Alice who had this fool of a child (one John) to lead her."

BOWLING ALLEY. Bowling was a favourite game in Elizabethan England. Shakespeare has many references to it. Cor. v. 3, 20: "Sometimes, Like to a bowl upon a subtle ground I have tumbled past the throw." Cym. ii. 1, 8, Cloten tells of his bad luck: "When I kissed the jack, upon an up-cast to be hit away"; and being taken up for swearing he broke his reprover's head with his bowl—not altogether inexcusably. In Shrew iv. 5, 24, "Thus," says Petruchio, "the bowl should run, And not unluckily against the bias." In R2 iii. 4, 3, her attendant suggests to the Q. a game at bowls, but the Q. refuses; "Twill make me think the world is full of rubs, And that my fortune runs against the bias." In L. L. L. v. 2, 587, Costard bears witness that Sir Nathanael, the village parson, "is a marvellous good neighbour, faith, and a very good bowler." And in iv. 1, 140, he suggests to Boyet to challenge Margaret to bowl; where, by the way, the word rhymes to "owl." By Act II, H7, ii. 5, apprentices are forbidden to play at "tenys, closshe [a kind of skittles], dise, cardes, and bowles"; and the moralists coupled together dice, tables, cards, and bowls, as evil diversions. Earle, for example, Micro. 101, says, "A Bowl-A. is the place where there are three things thrown away beside Bowls, to wit, time, money, and curses, and the last ten for one."

Gosson, in School of Abuse, p. 45 (Arber), says, "Common B. Allyes are privy moths that eat up the credit of many idle citizens." James I, however, authorized licenses to issue for 24 b. alleys in Lond. and Westminster, four in Southwark, one in St. Katharine's, one in Shoreditch, and two in Lambeth. B. Green Lane, in Clerkenwell, still preserves the memory of one of them. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Gossip Mirth says, "My gossip Tattle knew what matches were made in the B. A., and what bets were won and lost." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Gregory says to Cunningham, "I have been seeking for you i' the b. green."

BOWL YARD. An alley in St. Giles's, Lond., on the S. side of High St. over against Dyott St., marking the site of the "B." Tavern, where the prisoners on their way to execution at Tyburn had a drink offered to them. The Angel (q.v.) was the rival of the B. in this melancholy office. The whole of the rookery has now been swept away. Chamberlain, writing to Carleton an account of the execution of Raleigh, says, "There was a cup of excellent sack brought him, and being asked how he liked it, 'As the fellow,' said he, 'that, drinking of St. Giles's B. as he went to Tyburn, said, 'That were good drink if a man might tarry by it.'"

BOWRCE. See BURSE.

BOYS. The father of Orlando is called Sir Rowland de B. (As i. 1, 60). In Lodge's Rosalind he is Sir John of Bordeaux. But Bordeaux is a long way from the forest of Arden; and in giving him a different title Shakespeare may have been thinking of Bois-le-Duc, a town in Brabant, near the mouth of the Meuse, which was at the time of the writing of the play much in men's mouths, for in 1579 it had separated itself from the States, and was besieged in 1601 and again in 1603 by the Prince of Nassau. It was a hunting seat of the Ds. of Brabant, and much nearer to Arden than was Bordeaux.

BRABANT. Ancient Duchy in the Netherlands, lying W. of the Meuse in the great bend it makes before falling into the sea; and to the E. of Flanders. Joan, the eldest daughter of John III, the last D., bequeathed the Duchy to Anthony, and son of Philip the Bold, D.

of Burgundy. In 1440, by the marriage of Mary of Burgundy to the Emperor Maximilian, it passed to the House of Austria, and through Charles V became part of the Spanish dominions. N. Brabant later became part of the United Provinces, whilst S. Brabant remained under the Spanish Crown until the Peace of Utrecht (1713). Now N. Brabant is in the kingdom of Holland, and S. in the kingdom of Belgium. In L. L. L. ii. 1, 114, Biron recalls how he danced with Rosalind in B. once. In H5 iv. 8, 101, "Anthony, D. of B., brother to the D. of Burgundy," is in the list of the slain at Agincourt. This was the Anthony mentioned above. In Fam. Vict., Haz. p. 358, the K. of France, before the battle of Agincourt, urges, "Let the Normans, Bs., Pickardies, And Danes be sent for with all speed." Webster, in Weakest prol., says, "The little Frederick left upon the shore The tardy D. of B. . . espies." This was Henri II, known as The Magnanimous. In S. Rowley's When you A. 2, Wolsey says, "The Emperor's forces are stayed in B. by the K.'s command." The reference is to the cessation of the operations of Charles V and Henry VIII against Burgundy in 1525. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, Monsieur is introduced taking his leave for B. in order to enter upon his new-upstarted state there: this was in 1582, when the D. of Anjou, brother of Henri III, went to B. and was crowned D. by the Prince of Orange at Antwerp. In Barnavelt iv. 5, Sir John is charged with having planned to deliver certain Dutch towns to "Spain or B." In Ford's Sacrifice iii. 2, Ferentes tells how he lately saw a masque in Brussels, in which women acted when "the d. of B. welcomed the archbp. of Mentz with rare conceit." The D. intended must be the Archduke Albert, the husband of Isabella, daughter of Philip of Spain, who held that dignity from 1598 to 1621. The plot of B. & F. Beggars, as related in i. 1, concerns a 7 years' war between Flanders and the D. of B. Flanders is being governed by a usurper, Wolfort, during the minority of the young Florez. There is nothing historical in the story.

In Larum E. 2, one of the Spanish soldiers addresses a woman of Antwerp as "You B. bitch!" and another (G. 1) speaks of 2 of the soldiers of Antwerp as "Those two fierce Brabanters." In Gascoigne's Government iv. 3, Echo says, "Extol him straight with praise And say that B. hath too few such blades As he." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Seawit speaks of the "Maid of B. that lived by her smell, dined on a rose, and supped on a tulip." This was a certain Eve Fleigen of Meurs, who was said to have lived without food for 14 years, from 1597 to 1611. Her life was published in English in 1611. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto includes, in the fashionable attire of a soldier, "a cloke of Genoa, set with B. buttons." Buttons first appear as ornaments to dresses in the 14th cent., but the introduction of button-holes caused a great increase in their use in the 16th. There is still a considerable industry in the making of buttons in Belgium. Nash, in Lenten, tells of "Cornelius the Brabantine who was feloniously suspected for penning a discourse of tuft-mockados," i.e. imitation velvets. Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 29, says, "They that never went out of the champions in B. will hardly conceive what rocks are in Germany." B. is a flat country without hills.

BRADFORD. A town in W. Riding, Yorks., 196 m. from Lond. It is an ancient borough, and is mentioned in "Domesday Book." A considerable part of the action of George takes place in B.: "We are now in B.," says

K. Edward, "where all the merry shoemakers dwell"; and one of them enters on the word and explains, "Here hath been a custom kept of old That none may bear his staff upon his neck, But trail it all along through-out the town, Unless they mean to have a bout with me." Braithwaite, in his Strappado for the Devil (1615), mentions this same custom of the "jolly shoemaker of B. Town." In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin of Huntington says, "Good George-a-Greene at B. was our friend." This is a slip, as George-a-Green was the well-known Pinner of Wakefield.

BRADLEY. Very common village-name all over England. Which of the many Bs. is meant in the quotation I have not yet been able to discover. In Jonson's Barthol. ii. 1, Mooncalf says, "Do you not know him, Mistress? 'tis mad Arthur of B. that makes the orations," sc., in the Fair.

BRAINFORDE. The old spelling of Brentford, a town in Middlesex, at the junction of the Brent and the Thames, 8 m. W. of Lond. and 14 E. of Windsor. It was the scene of a battle between Edmund Ironside and the Danes in 1016; and of the defeat of Col. Hollis by Prince Rupert in 1642. It possessed a famous hostelry, the Three Pigeons, kept at one time by John Lowin, one of the first actors in Shakespeare's plays, which was a favourite resort of Londoners out for a day's excursion into the country. In the D. of Buckingham's Rehearsal, Bayes explains how he has supposed "two kings to be of the same place, as, for example, at Brentford"; whence the well-known phrase, "the two kings of Brentford." In M. W. W. iv. 2, 78, the Q. reads: "That's well remembered; my maid's aunt, Gillian of B., hath a gown above," and disguised in this Falstaff escapes. This Gillian, or Julian, or Joan, was a well-known person and had the reputation of being a witch. An old ballad by Robert Copeland (1562) is entitled Jyl of Breyntford's Testament. In Nash's Summers, the details of her bequests are given. A play was produced in 1598 called Fryer Fox and Gyllen of Branforde. In Dekker's Westward v. 1, Clare says, "I doubt that old hag, Gillian of Braineford, has bewitched me."

In Jonson's Alchemist v. 2, Subtle proposes to run away with Doll: "We will turn our course to B., westward . . . we'll tickle it at the Pigeons." In Massinger's Madam ii. 1, Luke pictures to Goldwire "the raptures of being hurried in a coach to Brentford, Staines, or Barnet," with a lady as his companion. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton proposes to Moll Cutpurse "to go out of town together . . . to B., Staines, or Ware": they agree to meet in Gray's Inn Fields at 3; "that," says Laxton, "will be time enough to sup at B." Moll keeps the appointment dressed like a man (iii. 1), and Laxton exclaims, "Thou'rt admirably suited for the Three Pigeons at B." In iv. 2, Mrs. Openwork tells her gossip how Goshawk has persuaded her that her husband "this very morning went in a boat with a tilt over it to the Three Pigeons at B. and his punk with him," in order to get her to go with him in pursuit of her delinquent spouse. Jonson, in his Epigram 129 To Mime, says, "There's no journey set or thought upon To Brentford, Hackney, Bow, but thou mak'st one." Entertainments for the visitors were provided in the shape of horse-races, puppet shows, etc. In Middleton's Chaste Maid v. 4, Tim says, "I bought a jade at Cambridge; I'll let her out to . . . B. horse-races." In Mayne's Match iii. 1, we are told of a lady "who follows strange sights out of town, and went to B. to a motion," i.e. a puppet-show. In Greene's Quip, p. 239, he addresses a waterman, "If a young gentleman and a pretty wench come to you and say, my friend and I mean to go by water and to be merry a night or two . . . then off goes your cap and away they go to B. or some other place." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, when a jaunt is proposed, Linstock suggests, "Let's to mine host Dogbolt's at B. then: there you are out of eyes, out of ears; private rooms, sweet linen, winking attendance, and what cheer you will." The suggestion is accepted by the ladies, and Act V takes place at B. In Laneham's Letter 36, the author says that "Capt. Cox can talk as much without a book as any innholder betwixt B. and Bagshot." In Deloney's Craft ii. 11, the green K. of St. Martin's says, "If you will walk with me to B., I will bestow your dinner upon you." In Killigrew's Parson i. 1, the Parson says, "He a Capt.! An apocryphal modern one that went convoy once to B. with those troops that conducted the contribution-puddings in the late holy war." The reference is to 1642, when the Lond. trainbands lay at B. before the attack by Prince Rupert. In Underwit i. 1, Thomas says he can hire his master "an old limping decayed Sergeant at B." to teach him his drill.

BRAINTREE. Town in Essex, 40 m. N.E. of Lond. Nicholas Udall was vicar of B. from 1533 to 1537, and probably wrote a play, Placidus or St. Estace, which was performed there in 1534.

BRANDENBURG. The central and metropolitan province of Prussia. The town of B. lies on the Havel, 38 m. W. of Berlin. The Margraves of B. were the ancestors of the late K. of Prussia and German Emperor. They held the hereditary office of Chamberlain to the Emperor, and were electors of the Empire. Their ancestor was Conrad of Hohenzollern, 25th in line of ascent from the late German Emperor Wilhelm. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Wallenstein sends "advices to the Marquess B." to meet him at Dresden. The Marquis was an ally of Gustavus Adolphus in the campaigns of 1631-32. In Barnavelt iv. 3, Barnavelt, going through his correspondence before his trial, speaks of a letter "from the Elector Palatine of B. to do him fair offices." This was John Sigismund (1608-1619). His claim to the Duchy of Cleves brought him into conflict with Spain, in which he had the help of the United Provinces. In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 130, Lorenzo, calculating the chances of the election of Alphonsus as Emperor, says, "For Trier and B., I think of them As simple men that wish the common good." In i. 2, 38, B. introduces himself as "Joachim Carolus, Marquess of B., overborn with age, Whose office is to be the Treasurer." This is an error: he was Archicamerarius, or High Chamberlain. The Margrave was at this time held jointly by the brothers Johan I and Otto III. The Elector of B. is one of the characters in Hector.

BRANDON FERRY. One of the 2 divisions of the town of Brandon in Suffolk, 33 m. N.W. of Ipswich, on the Little Ouse, or Brandon, where there is a ferry for communication with the Isle of Ely. The 3rd Merry Jest in the Wido Edyth (1525) shows "how this wydow Edyth deceived her host at Brandonferry."

BRANDUSIUM. See BRUNDISIUM.

BRASENOSE COLLEGE. University of Oxford, founded by the union of 4 Halls in 1509. One of these Halls was called B., which may possibly mean brew-house; but the popular derivation is supported by the Latin name of the C., Collegium Ænei Nasi, and the big brass nose on the knocker of the gate. Roger Bacon was traditionally said to have been at B., but the tradition probably arose from the story of the brazen head with magical properties which he constructed. Greene, in Friar ii., upholds the tradition: "The C. called Brazen-nose is under him and he the Master there." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 1, Sir Boniface affirms, "I was student in B." To which Herringfield rejoins, "A man might guess so much by your pimples." In B. & F. Philaster v. 4, one of the citizens, with an obvious allusion to B., vows that he will have Pharamond's nose, "and at my own charge build a c. and clap it upon the gate." John Marston was a gentleman commoner at B. in 1594. Henry Porter, author of Abington, matriculated at B. in 1589.

BRAUNSCHWEIG. See BRUNSWICK.

BRAZEN-HEAD. Spoken of as a house-sign, with reference to the story of Friar Bacon and the head of brass which he made and caused to speak. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 3, Cob says, "O an my house were the Brazen-Head now! Faith, it would e'en speak 'Moe fools yet!'"

BRAZIL. A large country on the E. coast of S. America, extending from Guiana to Uruguay. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1501, and about the middle of the 16th cent. they formally annexed it to their empire. It continued a Portuguese colony until 1822, when it declared its independence. It was at first called Terra de Brasil, from a tree discovered there (Cæsalpina Echinata) akin to the Sappan tree of the E. Indies, from which a hard wood called Brasil-wood, and a red dye called Brasil, were obtained. Heylyn tells of the Sloth and the Sensitive plant being found there: "Here also," he says, "flying fishes are said to be; but I bind you not to believe it." He adds: "The men and women go stark naked." Stubbs, in Anat. of Abuses 44 B., says, "The Brazilian women esteem so little of apparel also, as they rather chose to go naked than they would be thought to be proud." Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 2, 3, quotes from John Lerijs, "At our coming to B., we found both men and women naked as they were born, without any covering." Taylor, Works 86, says, "The barbarous Brasilians . . . do adore the devil." In Devonshire i. 1, Bustamante brings word, "The Brasile fleet is putting into harbour; she is great with gold and longs to be delivered." The scene is at Cadiz. In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Carrack says, "My husband took a prize from the Hamburgers and Be. men," i.e. the sailors in the Plate Fleet from B. to Cadiz. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says that he has travelled in "Guinie, Florida, and Brasilea." References are frequent to the wood and the red dye; but it is the Sampan-tree, not the country, from which they get their name. Chaucer C. T. B. 4649, says that the priest "nedeth nat his colour for to dyen with brasile." In Rabelais, Pantagruel ii. 19, Panurge has a piece of wood "of incarnation B."; incarnation meaning red. In Greene's Quip, p. 231, we are introduced to "a long, lean, old, slaving slangrill with a Brasill staff." In his Thieves, "The Belman hath sworn in despite of the Brasil-staff to tell such a foul tale of him that it will cost him his dangerous joint." The author of Discourse on Leather (1627), says, "We can live without . . . the trees of B."

BREAD ST. In Lond., running S. from Cheapside to Q. Victoria St. On the E. side was the Ch. of All-hallows at the corner of Watling St., where Milton was baptized; and St. Mildred's at the corner of Cannon St. On the W. side was a Counter, which was, however, transferred in 1555 to Wood St. Milton's father was a scrivener in B. St. at the sign of the Spread Eagle, the name of which was preserved in Black Spread Eagle Court, the 1st turning on the right from Cheapside. Here the poet was born in 1608. The street got its name from the selling of bread there. The Mermaid Tavern was at the corner of Bread St. and Cheapside, with side entrances from Bread St. and Friday St. Jonson, in Famous Voyage, speaks of having dined "at B.-st.'s Mermaid." There was also a Mitre Tavern there. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage ii., Ilford says, "I, Frank Ilford, was inforced from the Mitre in B. st. to the Compter in the Poultry." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., Capt. Carvegut says, "Come . . . to the Mitre in B. St.; we'll make a mad night on't."

The site of the Star Tavern is marked by Star Court on the E. side, between Watling St. and Cheapside. In More ii. 1, Robin says to his fellow-apprentice, "When wast at Garrets school, Harry?" To which Harry replies: "Not this great while, never since I brake his usher's head, when he plaid his scholar's prize at the Starre in B.-st." In Deloney's Craft ii. 6, Harry "smeared Tom-Drum's face with his blood that he made him look like the image of Bred-ste. corner; or rather like the Sarazines Head without Newgate." Some tavern sign is intended: there was a Saracen's Head in Friday St., near Cheapside, which may be the one Deloney means. The note in Mann's edition of Deloney is quite misleading, as a reference to the passage in Stow will at once show. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Clare talks scornfully of "Nan, a grocer's daughter, born in B.-S." Dekker, in Jests, speaks of "Milk st., B. St., Lime St., and S. Mary Axe" as places where city merchants had their residences. Gascoigne, in Steel Glas, p. 71 (Arber), refers to the Counters in "Wood-st., Bredstreat, and in Pultery."

BRECKNOCK (or BREAKNOCK). The county-town of Brecknocksh., Wales, 171 m. N.W. of Lond. The castle was built in 1094 by Barnard Newmarch, and was at the time of Richd. III in the possession of the Ds. of Buckingham. Morton, Bp. of Ely, was confined in B. by Richd., and the Ely Tower, which is still in a good state of preservation, got its name from his residence there. On resolving to break with Richd., Buckingham went to B., and after conferring with the Bp. raised the standard of revolt (see under BUCKINGHAM). In R3 iv. 2, 125, Buckingham says at the close of his interview with the K. "O let me think on Hastings, and be gone To B., while my fearful head is on." In True Tragedy, p. 92, Morton reports, "The D. of Buckingham is rid down to B.-Castle in Wales." In Peele's Ed. I i. 1, the K., on his return to England, proposes to build a hospital for his wounded soldiers, afterwards known as St. Thomas of Acres, and appeals to Sir David of B. for a contribution: he responds with a promise of £400. This Sir David was the brother of the Welsh King Llewellyn, and in the wars which followed was taken prisoner and beheaded. The Welshwoman in Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, "lost her maidenhead in Bshire." In B. & F. Nightwalker iii. 6, Maria, disguised as a Welshwoman, says she was born in Abehundis, which the Nurse explains is the Welsh name for B. It is more exactly Aber Honddhu, i.e. the mouth of the Honddhu, the river on which B. stands.

BREDA. A strongly fortified town in N. Brabant, 26 m. N. of Antwerp. At the beginning of the 17th cent. it was in the hands of Maurice of Nassau, but was besieged and taken by the Spanish under Spinola in 1625, after an obstinate resistance of a year. Jonson, poking fun at the Lond. trainbands, says, in Underwoods 62, that those who saw their manœuvres "saw the Berghen siege, and taking in Bredau. So acted to the life, as Maurice might, And Spinola, have blushed at the sight." In Massinger's New Way i. 2, the cook, Furnace, boasts that he can "raise fortifications in the pastry such as might serve for models in the Low Countries; which, if they had been practised at B., Spinola might have thrown his cap at it, and ne'er took it." B. beer was famous. In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Inland says to the Dutch Capt. Bumble, "I will kiss thy drivelled beard, though drowned in B. beer."

BRENTFORD. See BRAINFORD.

BRESCIA. City in N. Italy, 40 m. N.W. of Verona. It is the ancient Brixia, and has many remarkable Roman remains. It suffered much in the wars between the Guelfs and Ghibellines. In 1512 it was stormed by Gaston de Foix, and 46,000 of the inhabitants were slain. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of it as "warlike Bessia": an obvious misprint.

BRESSE. A dist. in Burgundy, the capital of which was Bourg. Speaking of the intrigues of the Count Fuentes in 1602, Henri IV, in Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, says, "He hath caused these cunning forces to advance . . . to countenance his false partisans in B. and friends in Burgundy."

BREST. A spt. and naval station in the extreme W. of France on the N. side of one of the finest and best-fortified roadsteads in the world. It lies on the river Penfeld, 370 m. W. of Paris. It was the Cardinal de Richelieu who saw its advantages as a naval station, and fortified it on the sea-side. The old castle suffered several sieges, one in particular in the Wars of the League in 1594; to which probably La-Poop, in B. & F. Hon. Man ii. 2, refers when he tells, "I served once at the siege of B.—'tis memorable to this day": and how he was saved from starvation by the enemy "striking him full in the paunch with a penny loaf!" In Scoloker's Daiphantus (1604), the hero "Vows he will travel to the siege of B." in the excitement of his passion. In Middleton's Blurt iii. 1, Hippolito says, in reference to the conquest of a woman's virtue, "She yields, and the town of B. [quasi breast] is taken."

BRETAGNE (Be. = Britaine), BRITAINNE, BRITAINE, BRITTANY, or LITTLE BRITAIN. The province occupying the N.W. peninsula of France. It was known in Roman times as Armorica, but is said to have gained its name of Brittany from the bringing over there of a number of settlers from Britain by Conan about A.D. 419. Drayton, Polyolb. ix. 203, says that Armorica was peopled by colonists from Wales, "which of our colony was Little Britain called." He often calls it by this name. The marriage of Geoffrey, son of Henry II of England, to Constance, daughter of one of the claimants to the duchy, brought it into the Plantagenet family, and on the death of Geoffrey in 1185 the title of D. of B. passed to his posthumous son Arthur, who was also, in virtue of his father, next heir to the throne of England on the death of Richd. I, Geoffrey being the 4th and John the 5th son of Henry II. K. Philip Augustus of France supported his claim, but in 1200 became reconciled to John and deserted Arthur. Arthur fell into John's hands at Mirabeau, and was imprisoned by him, first at Falaise and then at Rouen, where he died in 1203, not without strong suspicion that his uncle was the cause of his death. At all events, it has been shown that

John was at Rouen at the time. In K. J. ii. 1, Arthur is present with his mother Constance at Angiers, and is spoken of as "Arthur of Be."; in iv. 1, his artless pleading makes Hubert spare his eyes; and in iv. 3, he is represented as killing himself by leaping from the castle walls in an attempt to escape. The castle is evidently intended to be in England, as the conversation of the lords when they find the body shows; and the date of Arthur's death is placed in the same year as the offer by the English lords to Lewis of the Crown of England, viz. 1215. In these departures from fact Shakespeare follows Trouble. Reign. In that play, Haz. p. 350, John says, "Arthur . . . here I give thee Brittain for thine own." In Davenport's Matilda i. 2, Fitzwater reproaches John with having delivered up to Philip of France "Anjou, Brittain, Main, etc." In Ed. III i. 1, the K., hearing the name of the Countess of Salisbury, says, "That is thy daughter, Warwick, is it not, Whose husband hath in Brittain served so long About the planting of Lord Mouneford there?" John III of Brittany had 3 brothers, Guy, Peter, and John, Earl of Mountfort: Guy and Peter pre-deceased their elder brother, but Guy's daughter Jane, who had married Charles of Blois, resisted the claim of John of Mountfort to the dukedom. She was supported by the French K., and John enlisted Edward III on his side by doing homage to him for the dukedom. The result was the war which led up to Cressy and Poitiers. In iv. 1, the scene is the camp of the English in B., and Mountfort enters with a coronet in his hand, saying, "Mine enemy, Sir Charles of Blois, is slain And I again am quietly possessed In Brittaines Dukedom." As a matter of fact, Charles was killed in the battle of Auray, some time after the battle of Poitiers, which in the play comes at the end of this act. In iv. 4, the French Herald before Poitiers threatens Edward, "This day shall drink more English blood Than ere was buried in our Bryttish earth": where "Bryttish" means "of Brittany."

In R2 ii. 1, 285, Northumberland announces that Harry, D. of Hereford, is on his way to England "well furnished by the D. of Be. With 8 tall ships, 3000 men of war." This D., Jean V, was descended from Pierre de Dreux, who became D. of Brittany by his marriage with Arthur's sister Alice. Henry had already made a private treaty with him for the marriage of his son Henry to the D.'s sister: he now went to Brittany, ostensibly to visit him, and then sailed to England—Holinshed says from Port le Blanc, but Marshall has shown in N. & Q. 223, p. 267, that he probably started from Vannes, on the Bay of Morbihan. In H5 ii. 4, 4, the D. of Brittany, Jean VI, is one of those ordered by the French K. to take the field against Henry V; and in H6 B. i. 1, 7, he is mentioned as being present at Tours at the betrothal of Margaret of Anjou to Henry VI. Henry Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII, took refuge on the death of Henry VI, along with his uncle Jasper Tudor, at the Court of Francis II, D. of Brittany, where he lived for 14 years; and from Brittany he set out to wrest the crown from Richd. III. Whilst there he had made an attempt to secure his claim to the throne by a marriage with Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward IV. In R3 iv. 3, 40, Richd. says, "I know the Be. Richmond aims At young Elizabeth, my brother's daughter." At his first attempt his fleet was dispersed by a storm. In iv. 4, 523, we are told, "The Breton navy is dispersed by tempest," and Richmond "Hoised sail and made away for Brittany." His second essay was more successful, and he met and defeated Richd. at Bosworth. Richd., in his address to his soldiers, says that Richmond's troops are a "scum of Bretons"; he that leads them "a paltry fellow Long kept in Be. at our mother's cost." This was a puzzling statement until it was discovered that in making it Shakespeare was following a misprint in the 2nd edition of Holinshed—in the 1st the passage runs, "He was brought up by my brother's means and mine like a captive in a close cage in the court of Fraunces D. of Be"; the 2nd edition has "mother's" for "brother's." In Ford's Warbeck v. 2, Warbeck refers to the time when "Richmond retired, and gladly, For comfort to the D. of Bretaine's court." In Chapman's Trag. Byron i. 1, Byron says, "B. is reduced and breathless war Hath sheathed his sword." This was after the victories he had won there in the Wars of the League. Hycke had visited Brytayne in the course of his travels.

BREY. In Sampson's Vow iv. 1, 19, Clifton says, "Argulle with shot marches for the hill B." I suppose the Red Breyes is meant (q.v.).

BRICKHILL. A name given to some old brickfields in Spitalfields, near the ch. In 1576 some Roman remains were discovered there, as Stow relates. Possibly the name is a corruption of brick-kilns. They afforded a warm sleeping-place for beggars. In Armin's Moreclacke D. 1, Tutch says, "The winter nights be short And b. beds does hide our heads As Spittell fields report." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "These wild rogues (like wild geese) keep in flocks, and all the day loiter in the fields, if the weather be warm, and at Bricke-kilns." In Nabbes' Totenham i. 4, Cicely, meeting Bellamie early in the morning, says, "She looks not like one that hath kept herself warm all night at the Brick-kilns."

In Oldcastle v. 3, the scene of which is at St. Albans, the carrier asks the ostler after Dick Dun; and is informed, "Old Dun has been moyr'd in a slough in Brick-hill-lane": apparently a lane in, or near, St. Albans. If not that, it may mean a lane near B., which was a vill. on the North-West Road, close to Fenny Stratford, and abt. 25 m. N.W. of St. Albans.

BRIDE'S (SAINT) CHURCH (more properly St. BRIDGET'S). Ch. on S. side of Fleet St., Lond., next door to the publishing office of Punch. In the old ch. were buried Wynkyn de Worde the printer, Lord Sackville and Lovelace, the poets, and the notorious Moll Cutpurse, the heroine of Middleton's R. G. Destroyed in the Gt. Fire and replaced by Wren. The present St. B. Avenue was opened up in 1824, the ch. having been previously shut in on all sides by houses. In Middleton's Five Gallants iv. 3, Goldstone says, "Do you ask what's o'clock? Why, the chimes are spent at St. B." In i. 1, we learn that Frippery, the broker, has customers "in the parishes of St. Clement's, St. B., St. Dunstan's, and St. Mary Maudlin's." Nash, Prognostication, speaks of "the worshipful College of Physicians in the parish of St. B." John Milton lodged for a time in 1639 "in St. B. churchyard, Fleet St., at the house of one Russel a tailor." B. Lane and B. Court take their name from the ch.

BRIDE'S (SAINT) NUNNERY (used humorously for BRIDEWELL, q.v.). In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, Crack says of Jeff, the Bluecoat boy, "He never sung to the wheel in St. B.'s N. yonder." Bridewell was used as a hospital for decayed tradesmen, who were allowed to take apprentices to the number of 140. These boys wore a blue dress and white hat; but naturally the Christ's Hospital boys, the real Bluecoats, looked down upon them.

BRIDEWELL (originally St. BRIDGET'S WELL). A palace in Lond., on W. side of the Fleet Ditch abutting on the Thames, at the point now occupied by the City of Lond. School, the Sion College Library, and the School of Music. It was built on the site of the ancient Tower of Montfitchet, but was allowed to fall into disrepair, until Wolsey occupied it in 1512 and spent some £20,000 on the building and furnishing of it. Henry VIII refitted and enlarged it in 1522 for the reception of the Emperor Charles V; and subsequently he often held his Court there. It was to B. that he summoned the members of his Council and other dignitaries to declare to them his scruples as to his marriage with Katharine of Aragon; and he and the Q. were lodged there during the trial of the case in the adjacent Hall of Blackfriars. Edward VI gave the palace to the City of Lond. "to be a workhouse for the poor and idle persons of the City," and endowed it with the revenues of the Savoy. It gradually degenerated into a prison for women of bad character, and it was also used as a place of detention for men who were pressed for the army and navy. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire of 1666, and rebuilt in the form of 2 quadrangles. It was used as a prison until 1863, when the greater part of it was pulled down. Many of the scenes in H8 are vaguely described in modern editions as "an antechamber in the palace" (i. 1); "The Council Chamber" (i. 2); "an antechamber in the Q.'s apartments" (ii. 3), etc. Some of these at least took place in the B. Palace.

Dekker gives a vivid picture of B. in Hon. Wh. B. v. 2, though he transfers it to Milan. In v. 1, Lodovico asks, "Do you know the brick-house of castigation by the river-side that runs by Milan—the school where they pronounce no letter well but O?" and in the next scene the D. inquires, "Your B.?" That the name is For beauty, strength, Capacity and form of ancient building, Besides the river's neighbourhood, few houses Wherein we keep our court can better it." One of the masters informs him, "Hither from foreign courts have princes come And with our D. did acts of state commence. Here that great Cardinal had first audience, The grave Campayne; that D. dead, his son, That famous prince, gave free possession Of this his palace to the citizens To be the poor man's warehouse; and endowed it With lands to the value of 700 marks With all the bedding and the furniture, once proper, As the lands then were, to an hospital Belonging to a D. of Savoy. Thus Fortune can toss the world: a prince's court Is thus a prison now." The rest of the scene describes the "rogues, bawds, and whores" who are confined there; the beating of hemp, which was the work of the unhappy women; the blue gowns worn by them, their floggings, and so on; and they are called by their usual slang name, B.-birds. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 3, Cob says, "I am a vagabond and fitter for B. than your Worship's company." In his Barthol. iv. 3, Ursula reminds Alice, "You know where you were tawed lately; both lashed and slashed you were in B." Amongst the offenders brought before the Justices in Randolph's Muses iv. 3, is "one that has suffered B. often." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Bloodhound threatens Tim with "the College of extravagants, eclipt B." In Locrine iii. 3, Strumbo thinks Margerie was "brought up in the University of B." In Middleton's Five Gallants iii. 5, Bungler says, "As for B., that will but make him worse; he will learn more knavery there in one week than will provide him and his heirs for 100 years." In Marston's Courtesan i. 2, Cocledemoy says of bawds, "They must needs both live well and die well, since most commonly they live in Clerkenwell and die in B." In Brome's City Wit ii. 1, Crack says of Mrs. Tryman, "She was born in Clearkewell; and was never half a day's journey from B. in her life." In his Northern iii. 3, Luckless says, "If she be not mistress of her Art, let there be no bankrupt out of Ludgate nor whore out of B." In his Antipodes iii. 2, the poet produces in that land of topsey-turveydom "3 religious madrigals to be sung by the holy Vestals in B. for the conversion of our City wives and daughters." In T. Heywood's Royal King ii. 2, one of the gentlemen says of the Capt., "Send him to B. ordinary; whipping cheer is best for him." In Tarlton's News, he tells us that when you come to Purgatory "you have 40 lashes with a whip, as ill as ever were given in B." In Sharp-ham's Fleire iii. 321, Sparke says, "You ladies live like the beadies of B. . . . by the sins of the people." In Wilson's Inconstant iii. 4, Pantarbo says, "'Tis strange One that looks like the Master of B. Should love the game [i.e. profligacy] so." In Chaunticleers xii., Curds says, "I'll beat thee worse than the B. crew does hemp." In Killigrew's Parson iv. 1, Wanton says, "The fear of telling keeps more women honest than B. hemp." In Eastward iv. 4, when the constable brings in "2 masterless men I pressed for the Low Countries," Golding asks, "Why don't you carry them to B., according to your order, that they may be shipped away?" In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress says, "Our orders are such as the most envious justice, nor their goose-quill clerks that smell at new B. and Finsbury shall not exclaim on." B. was enlarged in 1608, and again in 1620. In Deloney's Craft ii. 9, his mistress says to Will, "It were a good deed to make you a bird of B. for your sauciness."

The prison had many nicknames. In Penn. Parl. 28, we have, "Those that depend on destiny and not on God may chance look through a narrow lattice at Footmen's Inn." In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, the Capt. says to Doll, "I will sell my coach for a cart to have you to Punks Hall, Pridewell." The children of prostitutes were called B. orphans. In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Jolly speaks of "found children, sons of bachelors, B. orphans."

BRIDEWELL DOCK. A stairs on the Thames, close by the mouth of the Fleet Ditch, just at what is now the N. end of Blackfriars Bdge. Jonson's Voyage describes the voyage of Shelton and Heyden from the dock "that called is Avernus; of some, B.," up the Fleet Ditch to Holborn. In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano proposes a meeting at the Greyhound in Blackfriars, "and then you may whip forth . . . and take boat at B.-d. most privately."

BRIDGEFOOT. The Bear at the B., a famous Lond. tavern. See under LOND. BEDGE and BEAR. In Brome's Northern i. 5, Pate says, "Where's the supper? At the B. or the Cat?"

BRIDGE HOUSE. In Tooley St., just E. of the foot of Lond. Bdge.: originally used as a storehouse for stone and timber required for repairing the Bdge.; afterwards as a depository for wheat and other grains. A brew-house was added to it by Sir John Munday. In B. & F. Night-walker v. 2, Heartlove having disappeared, Maria's mother suspects that he may be imprisoned for treason, perhaps executed: to which the Nurse replies, "Nay, they did look among the quarters too, And mustered all the B.-h. for his nightcap." I suppose this means if he had been executed for treason his quarters would be exposed on the Bdge., and his nightcap would be put in the stores at the B.-h.

BRIDGENORTH. A mkt.-town in Shrops., on the Severn, 20 m. from Shrewsbury and 138 m. N.W. of Lond. In H4 A. iii. 2, 178, Henry says, before the battle of Shrewsbury, "Our general forces at B. shall meet."

BRIDGES. See BRUGES.

BRIDGE ST. In Cambridge, running from the corner of Jesus Lane to Magdalen Bdge. Hall, in Satires (1597) ii. 7, 36, transfers the signs of the Zodiac to Cambridge, and says that Aquarius "is the B.-st. of the heaven." Milton, in Apol. for Smectymnus, ridicules this passage, and says of Hall, "He falls down to that wretched poorness and frigidity as to talk of B. st. in heaven."

BRIE. A dist., also a town, in France. The town is some 10 m. S. of Paris. B. was famous for the manufacture of a kind of cheese called "Angelots of B.," from its being stamped with the impression of the coin known as an Angelot, from the figure of the archangel Michael on its reverse. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, "Angelots of B." are mentioned as luxuries for the table. In Rabelais, Gargantua i. 17, when the hero gets to Paris, he sends back his mare to his father "loaded with B. cheese and fresh herring."

BRIGANTES. A tribe of ancient Britons, living between the Humber and the Tyne. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 5, Belinus, in a list of the British forces, says, "The Brigants come Decked with blue-painted shields, 12,000 strong." Spenser, F.Q. vi. 10, 39, describes Calidore's attack on "A lawless people, Brigants hight of yore"; but he is evidently confusing the name with that of the Brigands, or Brigants, of Italy.

BRILL (= BRIELLE). A town near the mouth of the Meuse, in Holland. The first place captured by the Confederates in the War of Independence in 1572. In 1585 Leicester sailed to Flushing with 50 ships and was made Governor of the United Provinces, to the great annoyance of Q. Elizabeth; but she was compelled to let him retain his office till his return in 1587. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift professes, "I have seen Flushing, B., and the Hague, with this rapier, Sir, in my Lord of Leicester's time." Jonson, in Underwoods 62, says, speaking of the Lond. trainbands, "He that but saw thy Capt.'s curious drill Would think no more of Flushing or the B." The dramatist, Cyril Tourneur, was the son, or close relative, of Capt. Richd. Turner, water-bailiff of B., and spent some part of his life in the Low Countries.

BRISTLES. See BRUSSELS.

BRISTOL (Bw. = Bristow, Bwe. = Bristowe), more usually spelt BRISTOW. The cathedral city at the junction of the Avon and the Frome, 108 m. W. of Lond. It is abt. 8 m. from the mouth of the Avon, and was at this time the second most important seaport in the British Isles, Lond. only taking precedence of it. The castle was rebuilt by Robert, Earl of Gloucester, the natural son of Henry I, and was made one of the strongest fortresses in England. It was demolished by Parliament in 1656, and nothing is now left of it. It became an appanage of the Crown in the reign of John. In Peele's Ed.I. sc. ii. p. 26, Guenther informs Lluellen that his lady, Elinor, has been "taken in a pinnace on the narrow seas By 4 tall ships of Bw." This was in 1276: the lady, who was a daughter of De Montfort, was restored to her lover, and they were married in England in great state. In Marlowe's Ed.II iv. 5, "The Mayor and citizens of Bw."

hand over the elder Spencer to Q. Isabel: the Queen having taken the city without a siege and compelled the K. to flee to Ireland in 1327. In R2 ii. 2, 135, Greene, on the return of Bolingbroke, says, "I will for refuge straight to Bw. castle; the Earl of Wiltshire is already there." In ii. 3, 164, Bolingbroke compels York to go with him "To Bw. castle, which they say is held By Bushy, Bagot, and their complices." In Trag. Richd II v. 3, 52, Cheney reports that Bagot has fled "to Bwe., to make strong the castle." R2 iii. 1 is laid before the castle, and describes the death of Bushy and Greene, who, along with the Earl of Wiltshire, were beheaded in the centre of the city at the High Cross. In iii. 2, 142, Aumerle asks, "Is Bushy, Greene, and the Earl of Wiltshire dead?" And is answered by Scroop, "Ay, all of them at Bw. lost their heads." The Earl of Wiltshire was Lord Scroop of Masham, brother of the Archbp. of York; and in H4 A. i. 3, 271, Worcester says that the Archbp. "bears hard His brother's death at Bw. the Lord Scroop." In H6 B. iii. 1, 328, York, about to set out for Ireland to quell the rebellion in 1449, says, "At Bw. I expect my soldiers; From there I'll ship them all for Ireland."

Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 31, mentions "Bw. fair" as the glory of the Avon. In Three Ladies ii., Lucre speaks of B. as one of several places where the influx of foreign traders makes men "great rents upon little room bestow." Hycke tells how he met in his travels a great navy full of people that would into Ireland; and amongst the ships were "the Nycolas and the Mary Bellouse of B." In Mayne's Match v. 4, Cypher, disguised as a sailor, pretends to have been shipwrecked, and to have saved his life by swimming "till a ship of B. took me up and brought me home." Fairs were held at B. in March and September; and also on St. James' Day, July 25. B. Fair became famous very early. In Chrétien de Troyes' Guillaume d'Angleterre, written in the latter half of the 12th cent., we find "Car a B. l'autre semaine Devoit estre la foire plainne." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 283, we are told that Hobson has ordered goods from Dieppe, "for he must use them at Bw. Fair." In Tarlton's Jest 29, we are told that the Q.'s Players "travelled down to St. James his Fair at Bwe." In Deloney's Craft ii. 11, the Green K. of St. Martin's "told them flat he meant to go to St. James his Fair at Bw." Richard the Redeless (1399) opens with a description of the author going to prayer "In a blessed borough that Bw. is named, In a temple of the Trinite the toune even amides That Cristis churche is cleped." This is the Ch. of the Holy Trinity in the centre of the City, at the junction of High, Broad, Corn, and Wine Sts.

B. stones were rock-crystals found in the Clifton limestone and used as gems, and often passed off on the unwary as diamonds. In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meer-craft charges Gilthead with trying to sell him "some Bw. stone or Cornish counterfeit." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 31, says that the Avon is "Proud of his adamants with which he shines And glisters wide." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iii. 2, Chartley apologizes for giving Luce "this jewel, a plain Bwe. stone, a counterfeit." In Field's Amends i. 1, Sir John says, "To the unskilful owner's eye, alike The Bw. sparkles as the diamond; But by a lapidary the truth is found." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 3, when Bloodhound is announced, the Capt. exclaims, "The expected thing, that bought the B. stone." Lodge, in Wit's Miserie (1596) 33 A., speaks of "A counterfeit chain . . . Bw. diamonds." Hall, in Satires (1597) iii. 4, 26, satirizes Myson for cutting his glove to show "A signet-ring of B. diamond." Bw. Red was a dye of that colour. Skelton tells us that Elynour Rummung had "her kirtle Bwe. red." In a Will of 1551, quoted by Peacock in N. W. Linc. Glossary, a bequest includes "One kirtle of Bwe. red which were her mother's." B. milk was a slang name for Sack. Prynne and Walker, in Fiennes Trial (1644) 78, mention "Good store of B. milk."

The scene of Bristowe is laid in that city during the reign of Richd. I. Joseph Swetnam, the hero of Swetnam, "took the habit of a fencer, and set up school at Bw." Day and Rowley produced in 1602 a play (now lost) entitled The Bristol Tragedy: probably a dramatization of some local murder. There is also a lost play by Ford and Dekker, licensed in 1624, and entitled The Bristol Merchant. George Salterne, the author of the University play Tombebeus, was a native of B.; and the father of the dramatist John Fletcher was at one time Bp. of B., afterwards of Lond.

BRITAIN (B. = Britain, Bh. = British, Bn. = Briton, Bia. = Britannia). The island in N.W. Europe containing England, Scotland, and Wales. The popular derivation from Brut, the legendary leader of the Trojans who came to B. after the siege of Troy, is quite without foundation. The chief variants are Breтайne, Briteigne, Brytayne, and Britanny: each of them with half a dozen different spellings. The people are called British, Britons, Britains, and Brits: again with many variations. The same names are used for the French province of Bretagne, q.v. Throughout the Middle English period the name is always used of the island before the coming of the Angles and Saxons, and this is Shakespeare's uniform usage; the only apparent exception being in H8 i. 1, 21, where Norfolk, describing the field of the Cloth of Gold, says that the Englishmen there "made B. India; every man that stood Showed like a mine"; but this scene is generally ascribed to Fletcher. In L. L. L. iv. 1, 126, Boyet quotes a saying, "that was a woman when Q. Guinover of B. was a little wench." All the other examples occur in Lear and Cym., in which plays the scene is laid in B. in the times before the coming of the English. But in many passages it is clear that Shakespeare intended an appeal to the patriotic feelings of his audience, and identified them with their predecessors in the island. Thus, in Cym. ii. 4, 19, Posthumus speaks of "our not-fearing B.," and adds: "Our countrymen Are men more ordered than when Julius Cæsar Smiled at their lack of skill, but found their courage Worthy his frowning at. Their discipline, Now wing-led with their courages, will make known To their approvers, they are people, such That mend upon the world." Even Cloten is inspired by such a theme: in iii. 1, 12, he says, "B.'s a world By itself, and we will nothing pay For wearing our own noses." In v. 3, 24, Belarius rallies the Bh. with the cry, "Our B's. harts die flying, not our men." In i. 4, 77, Iachimo says that Posthumus' praises are "too good for any lady in Britanie." In Lear the "Bh. powers," though fighting against Lear and Cordelia, are made to beat the French. It is curious that in the snatch of the old ballad quoted by Edgar in Lear iii. 4, 189, Shakespeare preserves the local colour by changing "I smell the blood of a Christian [or English] man" into "I smell the blood of a Brittish man."

In B. & F. Bonduca i. 1, Caratach says, "Shut up your temples, Bns.," and throughout the play the word is correctly used. In Fisher's Futimus i. 2, Cominius says, "It is the B. shore which, 10 leagues hence, Displays her shining cliffs unto your sight." In Massinger's Virgin iv. 1, Sapritius says, "Of all nations Our Roman swords e'er conquered none comes near The Bn." In his Actor ii. 1, Aretinus refers to the service done by Agricola "In the reducing B. to obedience." In Nero ii. 3, Scævola boasts that the "painted Bn." could not subdue the Romans. In Nobody i. 1, 13, Cornwell says, "I gave release to B's. miseries." The scene of Val. Welsh is laid in B. "In the reign of Claudian when the Bryttish Ile Was tributary to that conquering see" ("Claudian" should be "Claudius"). In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar boasts, "The Bs., locked within a watery realm And walled by Neptune, stooped to me at last." In Chapman's Cæsar i. 1, 29, Cato charges Cæsar with having recruited his army from the scum of "B., Belgie, France, and Germany." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 718, Orlando exclaims in his madness, "Arthur with a crew of Bns. comes To seek for Medor." In May's Agrippina i. 1, 597, Cæsar speaks of the "B. prisoners" amongst whom is "that bold Caractacus." In B. & F. Prophetess i. 1, Charinus says that Aper "has under him The flower of all the Empire, and the strength, The B. and the German cohorts." In ii. 2, Diocles (afterwards Diocletian) speaks of his exploits "in the late B. wars." The date is A.D. 284. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker ii. 2, 201, the Nuntius, coming from Gaul from Dioclesian to B., says, "He craves thy aid from Brittainy." Milton, P. L. i. 581, describes K. Arthur, "Begirt with Bh. and Armoric knights." In P. R. iv. 77, he speaks of ambassadors coming to Rome "From Gallia, Gades, and the Bh. West."

Towards the end of the 16th cent. B. began to be used for the whole island, owing to the prospect of the Union of the Crowns of England and Scotland, and the need of a common name for the two kingdoms. In Fair Em. i. 1, William I is addressed as "B's. mighty conqueror." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 3, Tamburlaine proposes to get together a fleet to keep in awe "all the ocean by the Bh. shore." In Greene's Friar xiii. 78, Lambert and Sersby are referred to as "These brave lusty Brutes." In Middleton's Mad World i., we find "the Bh. men" in contrast with the Italians and the French. In the Puritan v. 1, "fine Bns." is used in the sense of "fine Englishmen"; and in Field's Weathercock i. 2, "bold Bns." is similarly employed. In Webster's Wyat i. 3, Northumberland joys in the ancient victories against the French and Spaniards, "whose high pride We levelled with the waves of Bh. shore, Dyeing the haven of Brit with guilty blood." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, By. is used for England: "Æque tandem shall that canker cry Unto the proudest peer of By." So, in Marston's Antonio A. i., Antonio says, "I shipped my hopeful thoughts for Brittainy, Longing to view great Nature's miracle The glory of her sex": Elizabeth to wit. In Mason's Mulleasses, prol., the poet proposes to "transfer Pernassus into Brittainy." The Latin form Bia occurs occasionally. In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, Andrew speaks of "The name Bia., which includes within it Fair England, Wales, and Scotland." Jonson, in Blackness, says, "With that great name Bia. this blest isle Hath won her ancient dignity and style." After the accession of James I the united kingdoms were called B., and often, by way of distinction, Great B. James was officially proclaimed in 1604 as "King of Great B., France, and Ireland"; but it was not till the Act of Union in 1707 that Parliament declared, "That the 2 kingdoms of England and Scotland shall be . . . united into 1 kingdom by the name of Great B." The phrase had already been used, but in cases anterior to 1604 the adjective "great" has its ordinary sense of "famous." Thus, in Sackville's Ferrex v. Dumb Show, we are told, "Herein was signified tumults . . . as fell in the realm of gt. Brittainy"; and in v. 1, Ferrex says, "Ours is the sceptre then of gt. Brittainy." In Massinger's Virgin v. 1, Theophilus reads a dispatch headed "Gt. B.": a curious proleptic use of the phrase. Shakespeare never uses it; but it is found in Jonson's Alchemist iv. 3, "The people of Gt. B."; in Randolph's Muses iii. 3, in the form "Gt. Brittainy"; and in Jonson's Magnetic v. 5, "The safety of Gt. B." Drayton, in Polyolb. (1622) x. 220, apostrophizes, "Thou, the Q. of Isles, Gt. B." In Barnavelt iv. 3, Elizabeth is called Elizabeth of England, and James I the K. of B. In T. Heywood's Captives v. 1, Raphael says, "English, sayest thou?" and the Clown adds: "or Brittithe, which you please." The date is 1624. In Sharpham's Fleire 259, Ruffel says, "I did pray oftener when I was an Englishman, but I have not prayed often, I must confess, since I was a Brittainne. . . . Canst tell, if an Englishman were in debt, whether a Brittainne must pay it or no?" To which Fleire answers: "No, questionless no." Milton, in Sonn. xi. 2, speaks of "the royal bench Of Bh. Themis." In Spenser, F. Q. iii. 2, 7, Britomart calls England "the greater Brytainy," as distinguished from the lesser B., i.e. Brittany or Armorica.

Bh. oysters were much esteemed at Rome. In May's Agrippina iii. 334, Montanus asks, "Will it be lawful [after Nero's accession] to eat . . . Bh. oysters without being cited before the censor?"

Bn. is often used in the sense of a Welshman, the Welsh being descended from the ancient Bns. Sometimes the more specific form Camber-Bn. is used in this sense. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 3, Valerius sings, "The Bn., he metheglin quaffs." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, the list includes "George for brave England . . . And David will the B's. name defend." In B. & F. Nightwalker iii. 6, Maria, disguised as a Welshwoman, "can sing very fine Prittish tunes." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 1, Tim is assured that his Welsh wife can sing "the sweetest Bh. songs." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "Welshmen love to be called Bns." In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, a Welsh doctor strains his potions "through a piece of Bh. frieze." In King and Queen's Entertainment at Richmond (1636) 451, the Post makes a speech in Welsh, and says, "Here's nobody understands me, never a true Bn. amongst you." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii. 1, Randall, the Welshman, when told that the widow "will have her nest feathered with no Bh. breed," answers: "Zounds, was not Bh. so good as English?" In B. & F.'s Chances v. 3, a song speaks of "B. metheglin and Peeter." In Peele's Ed. I, p. 15, Edward says to David, "Thou couldst not be a Camber-Bn. If thou didst not love a soldier"; and later in the play Llewellyn appeals to his countrymen, "Why, Camber-Bns., are ye so incensed?"

North Bn. is used for a Scot. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Oldcraft exclaims, "Out! a North B. constable! That tongue will publish all, it speaks so broad."

BRITAIN'S BURSE. The name given by James I to the New Exchange built on the S. side of the Strand by Earl Salisbury in 1609. For details, see under EXCHANGE and BURSE. In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Formal says that Clare "has been at B. b. a buying pins and needles." In iii. 1, Alderman Covet avers, "I never liked a song unless the Ballad of the famous Lond. prentice, or the Building of B. B." Donne, in Elegy xv. (1609), discusses, "Whether the B. B. did fill apace And likely were to give the Exchange disgrace." Webster's White Devil was published by "Hugh Perry at his shop at the sign of the Harrow in B. B. 1631." Marston's Tragedies was "Printed by A. M. for William Sheares at the Harrow in B. B. 1633."

BRITAIN, BRITTANY. See BRETAGNE and BRITAIN.

BROADGATES HALL. A college in Oxford for students of Law, dating back to the 12th cent. It was originally called Segrim, or Segreve, H.; but received the name of B. from its wide entrance, in the beginning of the reign of Henry VI. It was included in the foundation of Pembroke College in 1624. The H. on the right of the gateway of Pembroke is part of the old B. H. In Greene's Friar xiii. 50, Serlsby says, "I have a son that lives in Oxford in the B. H." In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Floradin accosts Claribel as "my quondam chamber-fellow in Brodegates," and goes on to ask him, "How hast thou done since our departures from Oxford?" John Heywood, the famous epigrammatist, and author of many Interludes written between 1520 and 1540, is supposed on good grounds to have been a member of this college.

BROAD ST. Lond., now Old B. St., running from Threadneedle St. to Liverpool St. It was one of the most fashionable sts. in the City. In it was a famous glass-house, run by Venetian workmen. In Mayne's Match ii. 4, we are introduced to an ancient widow who "hath no eyes but such as she first bought in B.-st.": to wit, her spectacles. In Killigrew's Parson ii. 5, Jolly tells of an old lady "dwelling at the sign of the Buck in B.-st."

BROKEN WHARF. Lond., on S. side of Upper Thames St., opposite to Old Fish St. Hill. So called because of its ruinous condition. Close by was the town-house of the Ds. of Norfolk. Here, too, was a water-house, constructed by Bulmer in 1594 to pump up water from the Thames for the supply of the City.

BROMWICHAM. See BIRMINGHAM.

BROOKE'S WHARF. On the Thames on the S. side of Thames St., about halfway between Southwark Bdge. and St. Paul's Pier. In Westward for Smelts we have, "At this time of the year the pudding-house at B. W. is watched by the Hollanders' eel-ships, lest the inhabitants, contrary to the law, should spill the blood of innocents."

BROOMFIELDS. A common S.E. of Bethnal Green, where the brooms grew which were used for sweeping purposes in Lond. B. Rd., which runs just S. of the Limehouse Canal, between North St. and Crisp St., retains the name; and Bromley is evidently Broom-Lea. In Day's B. Beggar iv., Strowd says, "I'll but cross o'er the Summer lay by the Broom field, and be with you presently." Tarlton, in News from Purgatory, tells of the broom-men who were there "for robbing of the broom closes between Barking and Lond."

BRUGES. The capital of W. Flanders in Belgium, 75 m. N.W. of Brussels. It was one of the chief commercial cities of the Middle Ages. The Halles, built in 1364, has a magnificent bell-tower, the famous Belfry of B., the carillons of which are the finest in the world. Langland, in Piers C. 7, 279, makes Covetysse send his servant "to B. my profit to awaite." In Chaucer's C. T. B. 1245, the merchant fares "toward the toun of Brugges

To byen there a porcioun of ware." The scene of B. & F. Beggars, with the exception of i. 1, and 2, is laid at B. and in the neighbourhood. In iii. 1, Hempshirke lays a plot to kidnap Goswin, and "make him pay ransom ere he see B. towers again." In Larum G. 1, Danila says, "I'll meet his Grace [D'Alva] at Bridges." The author's spelling of the names of Dutch towns is amusingly eccentric. In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Jolly says, "Ye shall no more make monstrous tales from B. to revive your sinking credits in loyal ale-houses." The supposed date of the play is 1658, at which time Charles II was living at B. In the Pleadings in Rastell v. Walton (1530), one of the theatrical dresses claimed for is "of blue satin of B."

BRUNDUSIUM (now BRINDISI). A Roman colonia and the chief port and naval station on the Adriatic. It had a spacious double harbour, and was the ordinary port of embarkation from Italy for Greece and the East. Here the poet Virgil died. At the outbreak of the Civil War in 49 B.C. Pompey went over to Epirus, and Cæsar followed him, leaving a part of his forces behind at B. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 3, 85, Cæsar says that his hopes are now "resting at B., in that part of my army with Sabinus." Antony, in Ant. iii. 7, 22, commenting on the activity of Octavian just before the battle of Actium, says, "Is it not strange, Canidius, That from Tarentum and B. He could so quickly cut the Ionian Sea And take in Toryne?" This is taken from Plutarch: "Cæsar had all in readiness in the havens of Tarentum and B. . . . Now whilst Antonius rode at anchor . . . at Actium, Cæsar had quickly passed the sea Ionium, and taken a place called Toryne, before Antonius understood that he had taken ship." In Tiberius 2150, Maximus says of Germanicus, on his way to Armenia, "My Lord first sailed to Brandusium." Evidently the author did not know either the name or the position of the place, or he would not have made Germanicus "sail" thither from Rome. In Bacchus, one of the company of toppers is "One Peers Spendall from B., an Italian friar."

BRUNSWICK (= BRAUNSCHWEIG). A duchy in N.W. Germany. The capital, B., lies abt. 130 m. W. of Berlin. The Royal line of England is descended from the younger branch of the family of B. In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 137, Alphonsus says, "When Churfurst Mentz was taken prisoner By young victorious Otho, D. of Braunschweig, That Richd., Earl of Cornwall, did disburse The ransom of a king, a million, To save his life." This story seems to be pure invention. In Dodypol i. 2, Alberdure says that his father, the D. of Saxony, "Hath to the B. duchess vowed himself"; but the whole story is imaginary. In Barnavel iv. 3, Sir John mentions amongst his correspondence a letter from "the D. of B." B. was famous for a kind of beer, made from malted wheat, and called Mum, first brewed, it is said, by Christian Mumme about the end of the 15th cent. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein iii. 3, Newman says, "I think you're drunk with Lubecke beer or B. Mum." Clocks were also made there. Dekker, in News from Hell, says that the drunkard's wits, "like wheels in B. clocks, were all going, but not one going truly."

BRUSIA. A variant in Chettle's Hoffman B. 3 for PRUSSIA, q.v. The Latin form is Borussia.

BRUSSELS. The capital of Belgium and of the old province of S. Brabant, on the Senne, 36 m. S. of Antwerp. It was founded by St. Gery of Cambrai in the 7th cent., and was walled in the 11th. In 1507 it was made the seat of government in the Low Countries, and after the separation of the United Provinces it remained the capital of Brabant and of the Spanish Netherlands. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, certain portents are enumerated which have befallen the hero; in particular, "your goodly horse which the Arch-duke gave you at B. . . . fell mad and killed himself." Byron went as French plenipotentiary to B. in 1598 to witness the signature of the Archduke to the treaty between the Spanish and the French; no doubt the present of the horse was made on this occasion. In Ford's Sacrifice iii. 2, Fernando relates, "I saw in B. the D. of Brabant Welcome the Archbp. of Mentz with rare conceit . . . Performed by knights and ladies of his court, In nature of an antic; which methought—For that I ne'er before saw women-antics—Was for the newness strange and much commended." This play was published in 1633, and there is probably an allusion to the appearance of the Q. of England and her ladies in a Masque at Whitehall in 1632; for his supposed attack upon which innovation Prynne lost his ears. In Cartwright's Ordinary iv. 1, Credulous inquires, "What news from Bruxels, or the Hague? D'ye hear aught of the Turk's designs?" In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Thomas reports that Gundomar "lives condemned to his share at Bruxels, And there sits filing certain politic hinges To hang the States on." Gundomar, the Spanish ambassador to England, had retired to B. in 1624 after his failure to secure the marriage of Prince Charles to the Spanish Infanta. B. was a strong centre of Roman Catholicism. In Middleton's Chess v. 2, the Black Queen's Pawn, who stands for a secular Jesuit, speaks of the time "when I was a probationer at B." And in iii. 1, the Fat Bp. (Antonio di Dominis of Spalato) says, "Expect my books against you, printed at Douay, B., or Spalato." Hall, in Epp. i, 5, says: "At Bruxelles I saw some Englishwomen profess themselves vestals. Poor souls! they could not be fools enough at home!"

B. had the reputation of being a gay city. In Gascoigne's Government v. 9, Fidus tells us that "Ambidexter had gotten a fair minion, forsooth, and stayed with her at Bruxelles." In Tuke's Five Hours ii., Ernesto says that Porcia is "handsomer far than all those B. beauties which you call the finished pieces." The name is the subject of an atrocious pun in T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, where the Clown says to Bonavide, "At Bristles, if you remember, you were used but roughly." In Davenant's Favourite iv. 1, a lady says, "For essences to Rome, for twees to B., and for fans to Paris." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Carionil, who is disguised as a negro, says, "I learned your language [i.e. English] at Bruxels."

BRYKYLSE (i.e. BRIGHTLINGSEA). A fishing vill. on the estuary of the Colne, in Essex. One of the ships seen by Hycke, p. 88, going to Ireland was the "Myghell of B."

BUCKINGHAM. The county town of Bucks., on the Gt. Ouse, 58 m. N.W. of Lond. It is described in "Domesday Book" as an ancient borough, and it possessed an old castle, the site of which is now occupied by the Ch. of SS. Peter and Paul. It is a territorial title in the English peerage. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 2, 174, Thomas of Gloucester is addressed as "Earl of Cambridge and of B." His grandson, Humphrey Stafford, was created D. of B. in 1444, in honour of the betrothal of Henry VI to Margaret of Anjou. In H6 B. i. 1, Stafford is present at the welcome to the new Q., but leaves the presence along with Somerset, muttering:

"Thou or I, Somerset, will be protector, Despite D. Humphrey or the Cardinal." Salisbury, Warwick, and York resolve to join together "to bridle and suppress . . . Somerset's and B.'s ambition" (i. 1, 202). In i. 3, 72, Margaret complains that Beaufort, Somerset, and B., and grumbling York "can do more in England than the K." In the latter part of this scene he joins Somerset in an attack on Gloucester. In i. 4, he is associated with York and Stafford in the arrest of the Duchess of Gloucester, and is deputed to take the news to her husband, which he does in ii. 1. In ii. 2, 72, York, being hailed as K. by Salisbury and Warwick, enjoins them to "wink . . . At B. and all the crew of them . . . Till they have snared the good D. Humphrey." He is present at the arrest of Gloucester at Bury St. Edmund's (iii. 1). He is with the K. in iv. 4, when the news comes of Cade's rebellion, and advises the K. to retire to Killingworth, whilst along with old Clifford he goes to meet and disperse the rebels in Southwark. He brings word of this to the K. to Killingworth (iv. 9), and is sent to make terms with York, who is in arms to second Cade. He meets him between Deptford and Blackheath, and by the false story of Somerset's imprisonment induces him to lay down his arms (v. 1); but the cheat is discovered and the war begins, B. taking the side of the Lancastrians. In H6 C. i. 1, 10, when the Yorkists meet after their victory at St. Albans, Edward declares, "Lord Stafford's father, D. of B., Is either slain or wounded dangerous; I cleft his beaver with a downright blow." This is a mistake: Lord Stafford was killed at St. Albans as is stated just before: "Lord Clifford and Lord Stafford . . . Were by the swords of common soldiers slain"; but B. was killed at the battle of Northampton 5 years later, in 1460.

Lord Stafford had married the daughter of Somerset, and their son Henry succeeded to the title on his grandfather's death in 1460, and is the B. of R3. In R3 i. 3, he is present and has come from the bedside of K. Edward to make peace between the D. of Gloucester and the Q.'s brothers. In the course of the scene Q. Margaret offers him her hand: "O princely B., I'll kiss thy hand . . . Thy garments are not spotted with our blood"; and warns him against Gloucester: "O B., beware of yonder dog! Look! when he fawns, he bites." In Act II, in the presence of the K., he pledges his faith to the Q., and prays, "God punish me With hate in those where I expect most love . . . When I am cold in zeal to you or yours." In ii. 2, he advises that the young Prince should be brought to Lond. to be crowned; and is greeted by Gloucester as "my other self, my counsel's consistory, My oracle, my prophet." He is associated with Gloucester in the arrest of Rivers, Grey, and Vaughan (ii. 3, 44). In iii. 1, he brings the young princes to the Tower, and then plans with Catesby to secure the adhesion of Hastings and Stanley to the usurpation of Richd. In iii. 2, he meets Hastings on his way to the Tower, and by his sinister aside (123) indicates his complicity in the plan for the execution of that nobleman. He is with Gloucester in the next scene, where Hastings is sent to the block. It is he who persuades the citizens to accept Gloucester as K. (iii. 5 and 7), and at his coronation (iv. 2, 1) Richd. declares, "Cousin of B. . . . thus high, by thy advice And thy assistance is K. Richd. seated." But finding him not quick to accept his hints as to the murder of the princes, he says, "High-reaching B. grows circumspect . . . The deep-revolving B. No more shall be the neighbour to my counsel." In the latter part of the scene he puts off with studied inattention B.'s claim to the Earldom of Hereford; and B., alarmed, hurries off to his castle at Brecknock. In iv. 4, we find that, as the result of his conference with the Bp. of Ely, B. has invited Henry of Richmond to come over, and has raised an army in Wales to help him; but by a later messenger comes word that the army has been dispersed by flood and storm, and, later still, that B. has been captured. In v. 1, we see him led to the block at Salisbury without being allowed to see Richd. The often-quoted, "Off with his head! So much for B.!" is not Shakespeare's, but is in Colley Cibber's adaptation of the play for Garrick. The ghost of B. appears to Richd. on the eve of the battle of Bosworth (v. 3, 167): "O in the battle think on B., And die in terror of thy guiltiness."

B.'s wife was Catharine Woodville, sister of Edward's Queen, Elizabeth, and their son Edward is the B. of H8. In Ford's Warbeck v. 2, the King says of him, "Young B. is a fair-natured prince, Lovely in hopes and worthy of his father." His name was Stafford, but as heir of the Hereford family he preferred their name, Bohun. In H8 ii. 1, 103, he says, "When I came hither I was Lord High Constable And D. of B.; now, poor Edward Bohun." He gives a brief account of his father's career: "My noble father, Henry of B., Who first raised head against usurping Richd., Flying for succour to his servant Banister, Being distressed, was by that wretch betrayed, And without trial fell." "Henry VII succeeding," he continues, "Restored me to my honours"; which happened in 1486. He appears in H8 i. 1, and informs the lords that "an untimely ague Stayed me a prisoner in my chamber" at the time of the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Holinshed, however, says that he was there. He shows at once his hatred for Wolsey: "The Devil speed him!" and, when he enters, fixes his eyes on him full of disdain. To which Wolsey responds, "B. shall lessen this big look"; and whilst B. is planning to go to the King and "Cry down this Ipswich fellow's insolence" he is arrested and sent to the Tower. In i. 2, his surveyor is examined and, in spite of Q. Katharine's pleading, he is sent for trial by the King. In ii. 1, his trial and condemnation are described by a citizen who was present; and he himself passes over the stage to execution: "Now . . . Henry the eighth life, honour, name, and all That made me happy, at one stroke has taken For ever from the world (116). In iii. 2, 256, Surrey upbraids the fallen Wolsey: "Thy ambition . . . robbed this bewailing land Of noble B., my father-in-law." In iv. 1, 5, the two gentlemen, waiting to see the coronation procession of Anne Boleyn, remember that the last time they were there "The D. of B. came from his trial." It is probable that he was a sacrifice rather to Henry's jealousy of him as a possible claimant to the throne than to the spite of Wolsey. In the non-sensical verses against worms in Thersites (Anon. Plays i. 219), Mater invokes "the buttock of the bitter [i.e. bitter] bought at B."—where the name is introduced purely for the sake of the alliteration. In Darius, p. 45, Iniquity says to Charity, "Truly thou art a holy man As is between this and B."

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE. An inland county of England. It had a bad reputation as a haunt of thieves, and in the great tavern scene in Langland's Piers B. 2, 108, one of the company is "Bette the bedel of Bokynghamshire": altered in the C. text to "Bette the bedele of Banneburies sokne." In H6 C. iv. 8, 14, Warwick commissions his brother Montague to raise forces against Edward IV in B.

BUCKLESBURY. A narrow st. in Lond., running S. from the corner of Cheapside and the Poultry to Walbrook. It was called after one Buckle, who had a manor and tenements there. Stow says, "It is possessed of grocers and apothecaries towards the W. end thereof." They sold not only herbs and drugs, but also tobacco and sweetmeats of various kinds. In M. W. W. iii. 3, 79, Falstaff says to Mrs. Ford, "I cannot cog and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lipping hawthorn-buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like B. in simple time." Mouffet says that the smell of the spices in B. saved the inhabitants from the Plague. In Westward i. 2, Mrs. Tenterhook says, "Go into B. and fetch me 2 ounces of preserved melons; I look there be no tobacco taken [i.e. smoked] in the shop when he weighs it." Dekker, in Seven Sins, says that candlelight is more deadly to rats "than all the ratsbane in B." In his Wonderful Year (1603), he says that on account of the Plague "every st. looked like B. for poor Methridatum and Dragon Water were bought in every corner." In his Westward iii. 3, Mrs. Wafer bids her boy "Run into B. for 2 ounces of Dragon Water, some spermaceti, and treacle": her child having been taken ill. Jonson, in Barthol. i. 1, speaks of "the black boy in B. that takes the scurvy, roguish tobacco there." In Middleton's Chaste Maid iii. 2, Allwit, complaining of the extravagant love of women for sweetmeats, says that all his estate "is buried in B." Jonson, in Epigrams iii., advises his publisher, if his book will not sell without puffing, to "send it to B., there 'twill well," i.e. it will serve to wrap tobacco and sweetmeats in. In Alexander Gill's Lines upon Ben Jonson's Magnetic Lady, he says of the play, "From B. let it not be barred, But think not of Duck Lane or Paul's Churchyard," i.e. it is good enough to wrap drugs in, but not worthy of a respectable publisher. In Haughton's Englishmen iii. 2, Vandal the Dutchman has his lodging in B. In Cowley's Cutter ii. 8, Widow Barebottle relates that her late husband sought for incomes "in B., and 3 days after a friend of his, that he owed £500 to, was hanged for a malignant." Sir Thomas More lived for a time in this street.

BUCKSTARS. A very curious equivalent for Bructeri, a tribe of Gauls living between the Ems and the Lippe, who were defeated by Germanicus A.D. 16. In Tiberius 1154, Germanicus says, "Twice did we meet the B. in the field."

BUDA. A city in Hungary, on the right bank of the Danube, 130 m. S.E. of Vienna. On the left bank of the river is Pesth, and the two are united by a chain bidge. Buda-Pesth is the capital of Hungary and the seat of Government. The town dates from A.D. 1240, when the fortress on the Schloss-berg was built. It was taken in 1526 by Solymán the Magnificent, retaken by Ferdinand of Bohemia in 1527, and again by Solymán in 1529. From that time till 1686 it remained in the hands of the Turks. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Ferdinand, the Lord of B., is one of the counsellors of Sigismund of Hungary, and it is he who advises the breach of the treaty made between Bajazeth and Sigismund after the battle of Nicopolis. In Florio's Montaigne i. 2, mention is made of the wars "which K. Ferdinando made against the widow of John, K. of Hungaria, about B." In B. & F.'s Captain ii. 1, the father of Lælia says, "At B. siege Full many a cold night have I watched in armour." This was doubtless the siege of 1529.

BUDGE ROW. A st. in Lond., running N. from Cannon St. to Watling St. It was so called from the furriers who occupied it : b. meaning lambskin dressed with the fur outwards, as in some university hoods. An Act of 1365 directs that all pelters (i.e. furriers) "shall dwell in Walebrooke, Cornehulle, and Bogerow." In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit compliments his wife on her cap, which is not, as the good Puritan lady would have had it but for her husband, "a rough country beaver with a copper band, like the coney-skin woman of B.-r."

BULGARIA. The dist. S. of the Danube between Servia and the Black Sea. The Bulgarians were a Tartar people from the banks of the Volga, and subdued the original Slav population about the middle of the 7th cent. A.D. They had constant wars with Hungary, and were finally conquered by Stephen IV towards the end of the 13th cent. In 1392 they were defeated by the Turks and became a part of the Ottoman Empire. They were regarded as a barbarous and savage people, and the word "Bugar" is a corruption of Bulgar. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederic reminds Sigismund of the recent slaughter of the Christians by the Turks: "Now, through the midst of Varna and B., And almost to the very walls of Rome They have not long since massacred our camps." The reference is to the invasion of Europe by the Turks under Bajazeth in 1396, and the great defeat of the Christians at Nicopolis.

BULL. See RED BULL.

BULL. The sign of a tavern in Lond., on the W. side of Bishopsgate St. Within, a little N. of Threadneedle St. It was one of 5 inns in which plays were performed before the building of theatres; and both Burbage and Tarlton were players there. In Tarlton's Jests (1611), it is said: "At the B. in Bishopsgate-st., where the Queen's players oftentimes played, Tarlton coming on the stage, one from the gallery threw a pipkin at him." Tarlton got a licence in Nov. 1583 to play "at the sign of the B. in Bishopsgate St." Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 40, speaks of "The Jew and Ptolome shown at the B."; the former of which he describes as "representing the greediness of worldly chusers and bloody minds of usurers." It was probably an earlier treatment of the subject of Merch. The inn has another literary interest from its connection with Hobson, the Cambridge carrier, whose epitaph Milton wrote, and whose name lives in the phrase "Hobson's choice," and in Hobson St. and Hobson's Conduit in Cambridge. The B. was his Lond. house of call; as Milton says in the Epitaph, "He had any time this 10 years full Dodged with him [i.e. Death] betwixt Cambridge and the B." According to the Spectator, No. 509, "This memorable man stands drawn in fresco at an inn which he used in Bishopsgate St., with an hundred pound bag under his arm, with this inscription upon the said bag: The fruitful mother of a hundred more." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, a message is brought from Cambridge by "one of Hobson's porters," who says, as he enters, "I have took a great deal of pains and come from the B. sweating." The Mermaid Edn. reads "Bell"—an obvious misprint or mistake. In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 3, Beech, the chandler of Thames St., says to his boy, as he goes out, "If any ask, come for me to the B." Taylor, in Carriers Cosmographie (1637), mentions "the B. in Bishopsgate St." as the lodging of the carrier of Hadham, in Herts.

BULL. Sign of a tavern at St. Albans, which Baskerville, towards the end of the 17th cent., mentions as the largest inn in England. In Porter's Abington i. 2, the boy says to Coomes, "Thou stand'st like the B. at St. Albans."

BULL AND MOUTH. See MOUTH.

BULLAINE, BULLEN. See BOULOGNE.

BULL HEAD. An inn in Cheapside, Lond., now the Bull's Head, 3 Bread St., off Cheapside. General Monk stayed here when he came to Lond. in 1660; and it was the first meeting-place of the Royal Society. In the list of Lond. Taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we have "The Miter in Cheape, and then the B. H., And many like places that make noses red." There was another B. H. in Smithfield, near the Bars; which is mentioned in Long Meg xvii.

BULL'S HEAD. The sign of John Haviland's bookshop in Paul's churchyard (1625).

BULLIN LAGRAS. Another name for BOLOGNA (la grassa), q.v. In Phillip's Grissill 1026, Gautier commands his servant to convey Grissill's daughter "to B. L., to the Countess of Pango."

BUNGAY. A town of Suffolk, on the right bank of the Waveney, 109 m. N.E. of Lond. B. Castle, of which some remains are still to be seen, was built by the Bigods, Earls of Norfolk, in the time of Stephen. There is an old story that when Henry II tried to bring Hugh Bigod to justice he exclaimed, "Were I in my castle of B. Upon the river Waveney, I would not care for the King of Cockney." This is paraphrased, and put into the mouth of Gloster in Look about iv.: "O that I were within my fort of B. Whose walls are washed with the clear stream of Waveney, Then would not Gloster pass a halfpenny For all those rebels and their poor king too." There was a Benedictine nunnery there, of which some ruins are still visible. In Trouble. Reign i., Philip the Bastard is represented plundering the monastery of B., wrongly described as Franciscan, and jeering at the monks in ribald rhymes: "Now, bald and barefoot Bungie birds, When up the gallows climbing." In Bale's Laws iv., Pseudo-doctrine claims "Wharton of B." as one of the supporters of the claims of Rome against the Protestants. This gentleman is mentioned in Bale's Image of Both Churches xiii., "Certain Popish priests of Master Wharton's retinue, not far from B. in Suffolk, did calk for Cromwell and for other else, if the world had not changed to their minds." Friar B., one of the rival heroes of Greene's Friar, took his name from this place.

BUNHILL (or BUNHILL Row). A st. in Lond., on the W. side of the Artillery Ground, near Moorfields. It had houses on the W. side only, the E. being occupied by B. Fields, now a cemetery, and the Artillery Ground. The name, originally Bone-hill, was derived from the depositing there of more than 1000 cartloads of bones brought from the charnel house of St. Paul's in 1549. The fields were used for archery practice, and were a common resort of the young Londoners. The neighbourhood had a somewhat unsavoury reputation. In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Mrs. Openwork asks, "Didst never see an archer as thou'st walked by B. look asquint when he drew his bow?" In More ii. 1, Harry says to his fellow-prentice, "Hoh, Robin, you met us well at B., to have you with us a Maying this morning." In Underwit iv. 3, Courtwell, scornfully speaking of a lady's breasts, says, "B. is worth a hundred on 'em, and but Higate, compared with 'em, is Paradiſe." Dekker, in preface to Satiro., says, "All Mt. Helicon to B., it would be found on the Poetaster's side, Se defendendo." In B. & F. Friends i. 2, Blacksnout says he got a wound in his groin "at the siege of Bunnill, passing the straights between Mayor's Lane and Terra del Fuego, the fiery isle." He doubtless refers to some adventure in one of the houses of ill-fame in, or near, B. See also under MAYOR'S LANE.

BURBON. See BOURBON-L'ARCHAMBAULT.

BURBONS (i.e. BOURBONNE-LES-BAINS). In the department of Upper Marne, in France, 150 m. S.E. of Paris. It is celebrated for its medicinal springs and is a resort of invalids. In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Sad speaks of women going to "the Epsoms, B., and the Spaws" to get rid of their diseases.

BURCHIN LANE. See BIRCHIN LANE.

BURDELLS. See BORDELLO.

BURDEX. See BORDEAUX.

BURGAINE. See BERGEN-OP-ZOOM.

BURGONIAN (i.e. BURGUNDIAN, BOURGIGNON). In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, Byron asks, "What countryman's the common Headsman here?" To which Sossons answers: "He's a B." "The great devil, he is!" says Byron; "the bitter wizard told me a B. should be my headsman." The scene in which Byron consults the astrologer La Brosse is iii. 1 of Chapman's Consp. Byron; but this detail is not there given. Dekker, in preface to Satiro., says, "Horace questionless made himself believe that his B. wit might desperately challenge all comers, and that none durst take up the foils against him." The reference is probably to John Barrose, "a B. by nation and a fencer by profession," who in 1598 issued in Lond. a challenge to all and sundry to fence with him. He was executed in July of that year for killing an officer of the City. A B. is used for a ship of war, built in the Netherlands, which at one time was under the dominion of Burgundy. In Drayton's Agincourt 110, he speaks of "4 Bs. excellently manned."

BURGULLIAN (a BURGUNDIAN). In the following passages it doubtless refers to the Burgundian fencer mentioned in the last article. The suggestion in O.E.D. that the reference is to the overthrow of the Bastard of Burgundy by Anthony Woodville in Smithfield in 1467 is quite improbable. In Jack Drum ii. 181, Mons. John says, "You see Me kill a man, you see me hang like de B." Bobadill, in Jonson Ev. Man I. iv. 4, is called "that rogue, that foist, that fencing B."

BURGUNDY (Bn. = Burgundian), or BURGONDIE; Fr. BOURGOGNE. The 1st Bn. kingdom was founded in the 5th cent. between the Aar and the Rhône by Gundicari the leader of a German tribe, the Bns. It ultimately included all the dist. on the E. of the Rhône from Lotharingia to the Gulf of Lyons. It was united to the German Empire in 1033 by Conrad II; but the part of it around Dijon (the modern B.) remained faithful to Charles of France, who made his brother Richd. D. of B. After many vicissitudes K. John made his son Philip the Bold D. in 1363, and he founded the famous line of Dukes which continued till the death of Charles the Bold in 1477, when B. reverted to the Crown. Philip, by his marriage with Margaret of Flanders, added to his duchy the rich districts of Flanders and Artois. His successors were John the Fearless (1404), Philip the Good (1419), and Charles the Bold (1467-1477). The duchy lay S. of Champagne, between the Upper Loire and the Saône. Its capital was Dijon, and it was renowned for its fertility, and especially for its wines. A D. of B. is one of the suitors for the hand of Cordelia in Lear. Holinshed fixes the date of Lear as anno mundi 3105 (i.e. 841 B.C.), and as the first mention of the Kingdom of B. is in the 5th cent. A.D. the anachronism is more than usually startling. The contrast, in i. 1, 85, between the "vines of France and milk of B." is not specially happy, for B. was a great wine-growing country; but the reference in i. 1, 261 to "waterish B." is better justified, for the province is full of rivers and streams. Heylyn says, "That which Q. Katharine was wont to say, that France had more rivers than all Europe beside, may in like manner be said of this province in respect of France, having in it the rivers of (1) Armacan, (2) Serum, (3) Cure, (4) Torney, (5) Valence, (6) Daue, (7) Soane, (8) Brune, (9) Senie, (10) Louche." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 295, Dioclesian says, "The Goths and Vandals have out-past the bounds And o'er the Rhine past into B." In ii. 2, 96, it is said: "Alleric K. of Goaths hath entered France"; but the date of the action is A.D. 297, a century before Alaric's invasion of France, and 2 cents. before there was any B. In Webster's Weakest, the prologue tells how Philip, D. of B., has been slain in battle against the D. of Anjou, leaving as his heir his nephew Frederick. The whole play is fictitious: if it belongs to any historical period the reign of Lewis IX of France seems to be indicated; but all the characters are imaginary.

The D. of B. summoned by the French K. to fight against the English in H5 iii. 5, 42, and whose eldest brother Anthony, D. of Brabant, was killed at Agincourt (iv. 8. 102), was John the Fearless, who was assassinated at the bidge. of Montereau in 1419. This murder threw his son and the whole powerful party of which he was the head upon the side of the English; and in the conference in the Ch. of S. Peter at Troyes, held in 1420, and described in H5 v. 2, the new D., Philip the Good, urges the necessity of making peace with England, and is one of the signatories to the Treaty. In Fam. Vict., Haz. p. 362, "the lance-knights of Burgondie" are mentioned as part of the French army at Agincourt. In H6 A. ii. 1 and 2, Philip is represented as fighting on the English side at Orleans. He is still with Bedford and Talbot at Rouen (iii. 2); but the appeal of La Pucelle, in iii. 3, 41, to "Brave B., undoubted hope of France," makes him "suddenly relent," and he goes over to the French. This was in 1425. A letter from him announcing his defection is brought to K. Henry at Paris (iv. 1, 12), in which he says, "I have forsaken your pernicious faction And joined with Charles, the rightful k. of France." In iv. 4 and 6, we find him fighting against Talbot. He died in 1467, after having acquired large possessions in the Low Countries, as well as in France. In H6 C. ii. 1, 143, Warwick tells Edward that George of Clarence "was lately sent From your kind Aunt, Duchess of B., With aid of soldiers to this needful war." This was in 1461, but the statement is not altogether accurate. Isabella, the wife of Philip the Good, was the grand-daughter of John of Gaunt, and therefore not aunt, but 3rd cousin to Edward; and George of Clarence was only 12 years old at this time. He and his brother Richd. had been sent the previous year to the care of Philip of B., and remained there till Edward was established upon the throne. In his dream in the Tower, in R3 i. 4, 10, Clarence remembered his old experiences: "Me-thought that I was broken from the Tower And was embarked to cross to B." On the death of Philip he was succeeded by Charles the Bold, who shortly after his accession married Margaret, the sister of Edward IV. In 1470 the return of Warwick forced Edward to flee from England, and he took refuge in Flanders with his brother-in-law. "Edward is escaped from your brother

And fled . . . to B." (H6 C. iv. 6, 79). Charles was not too glad to see him, but in the next year gave him some assistance, and he returned to England and won the battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury, which finally secured him the Crown. "Well have we passed and now repassed the seas And brought desired help from B." (H6 C. iv. 7, 6). Later Margaret gave her support to Perkin Warbeck, and acknowledged him as her nephew Richd., D. of York. In Ford's Warbeck she is referred to (i. 1) as "the dam that nursed This eager whelp, Margaret of B."; and in i. 3, she is called "sorceress of B." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B., Charles of B. betrays Edward in his French war in 1475. He carried on a life-long warfare against Louis XI, but he was defeated at Granson (1476), Morat (1476), and Nancy (1477), and fell in this last battle. In Massinger's Dowry i. 2, the scene of which is laid at Dijon in B., the hero tells the Court how his father "did as much as man In those 3 memorable overthrows At Granson, Morat, Nancy, where his master, The warlike Charalois (with whose misfortunes I bear his name), lost treasure, men, and life." In B. & F. French Law i. 3, Cleremont and Dinant are to have a duel "where the D. of B. met Lewis 11th." In the next scene this is defined as "a field before the E. port of the city" (i.e. Paris), but it is not clear what meeting is intended.

In S. Rowley's When you A. 2, Wolsey says, "The Emperor's forces that were levied To invade the frontiers of Low B. Are stayed in Brabant by the King." The reference is to the break-down of the arrangement in 1525 by which the Emperor was to attack the Bn. provinces in the Low Countries. In Chapman's Chabot ii. 3, 71, the K. (Francis I) says to Chabot, "Have I not made you . . . Lord and Lieutenant of all My country and command of B.?" In his Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy relates how Byron took "Autun and Nuis in B." This was in 1594 in the war between Henri IV and the League. In v. 1, the King reminds Byron, "You are my governor in B." In B. & F. Gentleman iii. 3, Longueville informs the company, "The K. . . Hath pleased to style him [Marine] d. of B." This was the climax of the plot to befool the ambitious and credulous old gentleman; and is, of course, entirely imaginary. In Gascoigne's Government i. 5, Eccho swears, "By the faith of a true Burgondyan you had wrong." Herrick, in Ode to Wickes (1647), says, "Then the next health to friends of mine Loving the brave Bn. wine." The scene of Wilson's Inconstant is laid in "Burgundie."

BURLEIGH HOUSE. A mansion in Lond., on the N. side of the Strand, between Wellington St. and Southampton St., built by Lord B. in the reign of Elizabeth. His son, the Earl of Exeter, changed the name to Exeter House. After the Gt. Fire it was occupied by various courts; and then it was turned into shops, the upper part being used as a menagerie. Later still Exeter Hall was built on the site. One of *Tarlton's Jest*s was this: "Tarlton called Burley-H. Gate in the Strand towards the Savoy the Lord-Treasurer's Almes-Gate, because it was seldom or never opened."

BURLEY. A village in Rutlandsh. B. House, originally the seat of the Harrington family, was purchased by the D. of Buckingham in the reign of James I. On one of the K.'s visits there he was entertained by a performance of Jonson's Gipsies, in the course of which the actors sing, "For though we be here at B., We'd be loth to make a hurley"; and again, "I can, for I will, Here at B. o' the Hill Give you all your fill." It is now the seat of the elder branch of the Cecil family, the Marquis of Exeter, descended from the elder son of Elizabeth's great minister.

BURPORTE. In Hycke, p. 85, Imaginacion, being asked what life the prisoners in Newgate have, replies: "By God, sir, once a year some tow halts of B.," i.e. ropes of tow to be hanged with. Halts may be a shortened form of halters, or possibly a misprint for hards: tow hards being a common phrase for coarse hemp. See O.E.D. (s.v. HARDS). I can find no place called B.: Bur, or Burr, means a coarse cloth, and B. may be humorously formed from it; but I rather incline to think it is short for Tyburn-port: Tyburn being the place of execution.

BURSE. The original name given to the Royal Exchange, Lond., built by Sir T. Gresham in 1567. The name was borrowed from the continental Burses, the one at Antwerp being Sir Thomas's model. When Q. Elizabeth visited it in 1570 she caused a Herald to proclaim it "The Royal Exchange," so to be called from henceforth and not otherwise. The old name continued, however, in popular use. In Fair Women i. 519, Sanders says, "I'll be upon the B.," and in ii. 280, Roger deposes that Sanders went first to Cornhill, and "Thence he went directly to the B." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 1, Pisaro invites the merchants home with him, "our business done here at the B." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Moll sings, "She says she went to the B. for patterns." In his Microcynicon iii., the maid "flies to the B. for a match or two," i.e. for a pattern to match another. In his Black Book (1604), p. 28, the Devil says, "Being upon Exchange time, I crowded myself among merchants, poisoned all the B. in a minute." In Brome's Northern iv. 1, Squelch says to Humphrey, "Now wait your lady to the B.; she has some trifles to buy there." Dekker, in Jests, says that the citizens' wives are accustomed "to eat their breakfasts in their beds, and not to be ready till half an hour after noon, about which time their husbands are to return from the B." Hall, in Satires vi. 1, 53, speaks of "the new-come traveller . . . Trampling the bourse's marble twice a day" in order to tell his traveller's tales. After the building of the New Exchange in the Strand by the Earl of Salisbury in 1609 the Old Exchange was distinguished as "Gresham's B.," the New being called by the K.'s order, "Britain's B." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 2, Allwit complains that his wife lies in "as if she lay in with all the gaudy-shops in Gresham's B. about her." In Glapthorne's Wit i., we read, "She has been in Britain's B. a buying pins and needles." The story of the building of Gresham's B. is told in T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. See also EXCHANGE.

BURSE. The B. at Antwerp, built in 1531, is one of the finest buildings of its kind in Europe. It stands E. of the cathedral, between the Longue Rue Neuve and the Place de Meir. In Larum D. 2, Alva says, "The B., the State-house, and the Market-place Belongs to me." In E. 1, the Capt. says of 2 slain citizens, "They were my neighbours, near unto the B." The scene is at Antwerp during the siege of 1578. In Gascoigne's Government i. 2, in which the scene is laid at Antwerp, Fidus says, "Master Gnomaticus was going towards the Bowrce to hearken of entertainment." In Dekker's If it be i. 1, Pluto bids Lurchal, "Be thou a city-devil and on the B. see thou thy flag display of politick bankruptcy." The scene is at Naples, where also there is a B.

BIRTHOLME. I suspect a misprint for Bornholm, an island in the Baltic Sea, 90 m. E. of Zealand. In Chettle's Hoffman C. 2, Lorrique says that he has thrown Hoffman's body into the sea "and sent it a swimming toward B., his old habitation."

BURTON. A town on the Trent, in Staffs., 126 m. from Lond. The brewing trade for which it is now famous did not begin till about 1708. At B. the Trent, which has been flowing E., suddenly turns N., and falls ultimately into the Humber, and not into the Wash, so that Lincolnshire lies S. of the river. In the division of England suggested in H4 A. iii. 1, Hotspur is to have "The remnant N., lying off from Trent": and he objects, "Methinks my moiety, N. from B. here, In quantity equals not one of yours; See how this river comes me cranking in And cuts me from the best of all my land A huge half-moon." At B. was the shrine of Saynt Modwin, mentioned by the Palmer in J. Heywood's Four P P 1. In Jonson's Devil v. 3, Meercraft asks, "Did you never read, Sir, little Darrel's tricks with the boy of B.?" This was a boy (Thomas Darling) who was supposed to have been bewitched by one Alice Goodridge, and dispossessed of the devil by a Puritan parson, John Darrel, in 1598.

BURTON-HEATH. In Shrew Ind., ii. 19, Sly says, "Am not I Christopher Sly, old Sly's son of B.-H.?" And he refers to "the fat ale-wife of Wincot" in confirmation of his statement. There is a Barton-on-H. some 6 m. from Stratford-on-Avon; and Wincot, or Wilnecot, the home of Shakespeare's mother, lies abt. 5 m. N.E. of Barton. This is probably the place intended, though it has possible rivals in B.-Dorset and B.-Hastings, both in Warwicksh.

BURY (more fully B.-ST.-EDMONDS or ST. EDMONDS-BURY). Town on the Lark in Suffolk, 71 m. from Lond. It derives its name from St. Edmund, the martyr-king, who was put to death there by the Danes in 870. A great monastery was founded in his honour by Canute in 1020. The tower and W. gate still remain. The shrine was a favourite place for pilgrimages. In Bale's Laws iii., Infidelity says, "It was a good day when we went to B. and to our Lady of Grace." In J. Heywood's Four P P i. 1, the Palmer mentions St. Edmunds B. as one of the sacred places he had visited. In Mankind, p. 13, Nought says, "My name is Nought; I love to make merry: I have be sithen with the common tapster of B." In Bale's Johan 272, Verity says of the King, "Great monuments are in Ipswich, Dunwich, and B., Which noteth him to be a man of notable mercy." The reference seems to be to the Hospital of St. Saviour, which was founded by Abbot Sampson in the reign of K. John. In K. J. iv. 3, 11, Salisbury says, "Lords, I will meet him [the Dauphin] at St. Edmundsbury"; and later, "Away toward B., to the Dauphin there!" In v. 4, 18, Melun reveals to the English Lords: "He means to recompense the pains you take By cutting off your heads; this hath he sworn Upon the altar at St. Edmundsbury." The scene of v. 2 is laid in the Dauphin's camp at St. Edmundsbury. There is no evidence that the Dauphin ever had a camp there: the error was probably due to a confusion between the Dauphin's oath and the oath sworn by the Barons at B. in 1214 to enforce the Charter on John. Melun confessed the treachery of the Dauphin on his deathbed in London, and not at B. In fact, both the chronology and the localities in Acts IV and V are in the greatest disorder. See also the account of these transactions in Trouble. Reign.

In H6 B. ii. 4, 71, a herald summons Gloucester "to His Majesty's parliament, holden at B. the first of this next month"; and iii. 1, 2 and 3 are laid at the Abbey at B. In iii. 2, 240, Suffolk comes to the Parliament with drawn sword, declaring, "The traitorous Warwick with the men of B. Set all upon us." This Parliament was summoned in 1447 through the influence of Cardinal Beaufort, in order to secure the destruction of the D. of Gloucester; and it was summoned at B. because Lond. was supposed to be favourable to the D. Jonson refers to this in Devil ii. 1: "Thomas of Woodstock was made away at Calice, as D. Humphrey was at B."

BUSH. A generic name for a tavern, because of the b. which was hung out over the door. I cannot find any particular tavern in Lond. called the B.; but there was a B.-Lane close by the Stillyard, which may be the place intended. In B. & F. Prize iii. 4, Jacques says of the parson, "20 to 1 you find him at the B."

BUSH-LANE. Lond., running from Upper Thames St. to Cannon St., near the Stillyard. Lenton in Characterismi (1631) 9, says, "Now they may go look this B.-l. needle in a bottle of hay."

BUSHY. A vill. in Herts., on the high road from Edgware to Watford, 15 m. N.W. of Lond. The Causy may be the raised stretch of road crossing the valley of the Colne, just S.W. of Watford. In Dekker's Westward iii. 4, Mrs. Wafer says, "Your two husbands and he have made a match to go find a hare about B. Causy."

BUSSE (i.e. HERTOGENBOSCH). Town in S.E. Brabant, 139 m. S.E. of Amsterdam. Taken in 1629 by Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange. In Lady Mother i. 1, Crackby says, "Twas my Capt.'s advice took in the B." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 1, Autolycus says that Holland is beleaguered, "and will hold out as long as B. or Boloign."

BUTSBURY. Vill. in Essex. In a very obscure passage in J. Heywood's Weather 100, at the end of a long list of places visited by Merry Report, we have the line: "Ynge Gyngiang Jayberd the parish of B." It is obviously either corrupt or intentionally nonsensical.

BUTTER-BOX. A slang epithet for a Dutchman: butter-bag and butter-mouth are used in the same way. In Massinger's Renegado ii. 5, he speaks of "a Low-Country b.-b." In Westward for Smelts it is said, "The pudding-house at Brooke's Wharf is watched by the Hollander's eel-ships, lest the inhabitants should spill the blood of innocents, which would be greatly to the hinderance of these b.-bes." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Judith calls the Dutch drawer at the Steel-yard "an honest b.-b." In Webster's Weakest i. 3, Bunch addresses Jacob van Smelt as "Ye base b.-b." In Larum F. 3, the soldier says, "I have bethought me of a pretty trick To sift this b.-b. a better way." In Boorde's Intro. Knowledge (1547) 147, the Fleming says, "B.-mouth Flemmyng men doth me call."

BUTTOLPH'S (SAINT). St. Botolf's or Botolph's. He was the 7th cent. saint of Boston, and its parish ch. is dedicated to him. 4 churches in Lond. bore his name, namely, St. B.'s Aldgate, on N. side of Aldgate High St.; St. B.'s Without, in Aldersgate St., at the corner of Little Britain (it escaped the Gt. Fire and was rebuilt in 1790); St. B.'s Billingsgate, in B. Lane, off Lower Thames St.; and St. B.'s Without, at the corner of Bishopsgate St. Without and Alderman's Walk, on the banks of the City Ditch. Here are buried Sir Peter Pindar and Stephen Gosson; and here Edward Alleyn, the actor, was baptized. This is the ch. referred to in

T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 19, where Spicing bids Smoke, "Get thee up on the top of S. B.'s steeple, and make a proclamation." The rebels were encamped close by Bishopsgate.

BUXTON (or BUCKSTON). Town in Derbysh., 160 m. N.W. of Lond. Celebrated since the time of the Romans for its mineral springs. In the Middle Ages their virtue was ascribed to St. Anne, who had a chapel there: the spring is still called St. Anne's Well. Lambarde, Dictionarium 48, says, "Within the parish of Bakewell in Derbysh. is a chapel (sometime dedicated to St. Ann) in a place called Bucston, where is a hot bath. Hither they are wont to run on pilgrimages." The Palmer, in J. Heywood's Four PP. i., had been "at Saynt Anne of B." Jonson, in Love's Welcome, speaks of St. Anne of B.'s boiling well as one of the wonders of the Peak district. In the Optick Glass of Humours (1639), a man suffering from tympany bathes "in St. B.'s well." Drayton, in Polyvb. xxvi. 455, speaks of "B., that most delicious fount, Which men the second bath of England do account." In his Odes (No. 7, On the Peak), he commends "B.'s delicious baths, Strong ale, and noble cheer."

BYATHER. Probably Biafra is meant, the bight on the W. coast of Africa, just S. of the mouth of the Niger, in which is the island of Fernando Po. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles gives an account of his conquests in Africa. He goes from Manico, in Mozambique, "by the coast of B. to Cubar, where the negroes dwell [i.e. the Gold Coast], and then to Borno [near Lake Tschad], and so back to Damascus." So that, according to his veracious account, he went down the E. coast of Africa to Mozambique, then across to Biafra, and then right across the centre to Egypt: a pretty tall traveller's tale!

BYBROCS. The Bibroci, tribe of ancient Britons living in the basin of the Thames, possibly in Berks. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Mandubratius says to Cæsar, "By me the Trinobants submit and the Ancalites, B., and Cassians." See Cæsar D.B.G. v. 21.

BYRON. Gazellus, viceroy of B., is one of the officers of Orcanes of Natolia in Marlowe's Tamb. B., and in iv. 4 Tamburlaine says to the Kings who are drawing his chariot, "Can ye draw but 20 m. a day? . . . But from Asphaltis, where I conquered you, To B. here?" The victory was won, according to iii. 5, 3, at Aleppo; certainly not at Asphaltis, which is the great artificial lake near Babylon. Possibly Beyrout is the place intended.

BYSKE. See BISCAY.

BYTHINIA. See BITHYNIA.

BYZANGES (or BUZANCOIS). Town in France, on the right bank of the Indre, 130 m. S.W. of Paris. In Chapman's Chabot ii. 3, 69, the King says to Chabot, "Have I not made you . . . Count B.?"

BYZANTIUM. An ancient Greek city on the Bosphorus, on the most E. of the hills on which Constantinople now stands. In 440 B.C. it revolted from Athens and joined the Lacedæmonians; but Alcibiades besieged it in 408, and after a difficult blockade took it through the treachery of the Athenian party within the walls. It is apparently to this siege that Alcibiades refers in Tim. iii. 5, 60, when he says, pleading for a friend before the Senate, "His service done At Lacedæmon and B. Were a sufficient briber for his life." Taken by the Turks in 1453, it was the capital of the Ottoman Empire under the name of Constantinople until 1919. In Selimus 519, Mustapha urges Baiazet, when his son Selim rebels against him, "Let us fly To fair Bizantium." Milton, P. L. xi. 395, names, among the great rulers of the world, "the Sultan in Bizance, Turcheston-born." The scene of Cartwright's Siege is laid at B.

CADER ARTHUR (better known as C. IDRIS, i.e. ARTHUR'S SEAT). Mtn. in Wales 2900 ft. high, in the S. of Merioneth. In Jonson's Wales "Caider A." is mentioned amongst the mtns. of Wales; and Jenkins pays an ingenious compliment to K. James by pointing out that "Charles James Stuart" makes anagrammatically "Claimes Arthur's Seat": "which is as much as to say, your Majesty s'ud be the first king of Gread Prittan, and sit in Cadier A., which is A.'s Chair." It was locally known as MANNOCK-DENNY, q.v.

CADES (i.e. KADESH, or more fully, KEDESH-NAPHTHALI). Town in N. Palestine, a little N.W. of the Lake of Huleh, now Kedes. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, Rasni, K. of Nineveh, boasts that he has "Beat proud Jeroboam from his holds, Winning from C. to Samaria." This is quite unhistorical, for Jeroboam II "restored the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath unto the Sea of the Arabah," and was never attacked by the Assyrians.

CADIZ. See CALES.

CADUSIA. The country of the Cadusi, on the S.W. shores of the Caspian Sea. They were a warlike race, and often in revolt against the Persians. In Suckling's Aglaura ii. 1, Thersames, the Prince of Persia, says, "Nothing but my marriage with C. Can secure the adjoining country to it."

CÆCUBUS AGER. A dist. of Latium on the Gulf of Amyclæ, between Tarracina and Speluncæ. It produced a wine which is most highly praised by Horace, Pliny, and Martial, though it afterwards lost its reputation. Herrick, in A Frolic (1647), says, "I'll drink the aged Cecubum Until the roof turn round."

CÆLIAN. One of the 7 hills of Rome, lying in the S. part of the city, to the E. of the Aventine. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., pictures Rome buried under her 7 hills, and says that "the C." is on her right hand.

CAEN. Town in Normandy, 123 m. N.W. of Paris, at the confluence of the Orne and the Odon. William the Conqueror and his wife Matilda adorned it with many edifices, including a palace, some parts of which are incorporated in the Palais de Justice; and William is buried there in the Abbaye aux Hommes. The scene of B. & F. Brother is laid at C. in the time of D. Rollo of Normandy, circa A.D. 900. Dekker, in Dead Term (1608), makes St. Paul's Steeple say, "Mauritius mounted me upon arches and gave me ribs of stone which was fetched from Cane in Normandy." This was after the destruction of the cathedral by fire in 1087. The gift of the C. stone was one of the last acts of William the Conqueror.

CAERBRANCK. In Greene's Never too Late the hero, Francesco, lives at C. Probably Greene was thinking of the vill. of Brancaster in his native county of Norfolk.

CAERLEON. An ancient town in Monmouthsh. on the Usk. Formerly the chief town of Wales and 3rd city in Britain, but now reduced to something over 1000 inhabitants. Jonson, in Wales, pays a very forced compliment to Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, by making Rheese say, "Then Car is plain Welse, C., Caermardin, Cardiffe." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 25, says that king Leill "built Cairleill and built C. strong."

CAERMARTHEN. In S. Wales, the largest of the Welsh counties, and its capital. In Merlin iv. 1, 8, the Clown says to Merlin, "If the devil were thy father, was not thy mother born at Carmarden?" Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 10, says, "A little while Before that Merlin died he did intend A brasen wall in compass to compile About Cairmardin." Drayton, Polyolb. iv., tells the same story. See also CAERLEON.

CÆSAREA. A spt. town of Palestine, 30 m. N. of Jaffa and abt. the same distance from Jerusalem. Built by Herod the Great 22 B.C. on the site of Strato's Tower, it was the capital of Judea under the Roman procurators, but fell into decay after the Crusades and is now a heap of ruins. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. 2, 1, Frederick reports that the K. of Natolia has withdrawn his forces from Europe and "sent them marching up to Belgasar, Acanthe, Antioch, and C. To aid the kings of Soria and Jerusalem." The scene of Massinger's Virgin is laid at C. during the reigns of Diocletian and Maximin about A.D. 300.

CÆSAR'S GARDENS. At Rome on the Janiculum, on the further side of the Tiber. Cæsar bequeathed these gardens to the people of Rome. In J. C. iii. 2, 353, Antony says, "He hath left you all his walks, His private arbours and new-planted orchards, On this side Tiber." Shakespeare's mistake is due to North's mistranslation of Plutarch: "the gardens . . . which he had on this side of the river Tiber." Plutarch correctly places them on the other side of the river. In Jonson's Postaster iii. 1, Horace speaks of someone as lodging "on the far side of all Tyber yonder, by C. g." This is a translation of Horace, Sat. i. 9, 18: "Trans Tiberim longe cubat is, prope Cæsaris hortos."

CAFFARES. Used for the whole of S.W. Africa, extending, according to Heylyn, from the mtns. of the Moon to the Cape of Good Hope. It is now limited, in the form Kaffraria, to a small district on the E. of Cape Colony. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, the Emperor of Æthiopia is described as also Emperor of C. See under ADEA.

CAGE. A lock-up for malefactors. There was one such in Cornhill, by the Conduit, made of strong timbers with a pair of stocks and a pillory on the top of it. There was another in High St., St. Giles'. In H6 B. iv. 2, 56, Dick says of Cade, "his father had never a house but the C." In B. & F.'s Wit Money iv. 4, Luce says, "Say, he had been in the c., was there no mercy To look abroad but yours?"

CAGLIARI. The capital and chief spt. of Sardinia on the Bay of C. in the S. of the island. In Ford's Trial iii. 4, Benatzki says, "I was born at sea as my mother was in passage from Cape Ludugory to Cape C., toward Afric, in Sardinia." Probably he means Cape Carbonara on the E. of the Bay of C.

CAIRFAX. See CARFAX.

CAIRO (often called GRAND C.; Arabic, EL-KAHIRAH). A city of Egypt founded by the Arabs about A.D. 970, on the Nile. It was the 2nd largest city in the Turkish Empire, and from 1517 onward was the capital of the Egyptian sultans. Marlowe, in Tamb. B. i. 1, represents Tamburlaine as "Marching from C. Northward with his camp To Alexandria"; and in i. 2 Callapine is a prisoner in C. This is not historically accurate. Tamburlaine defeated Farag, the Egyptian Sultan, near Damascus in 1499, but he never actually entered Egypt. In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas says to a merchant, "Thou could'st not come from Egypt or by Caire, But . . . Thou needs must sail by Alexandria." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 21, the Souldan says, "Egypt is mine and there I hold my state, Seated in Cairye and in Babylon." Peele, in Anglorum Feriæ 28, says that Clio celebrates the praises of Elizabeth "Beyond Grand Cair by Nilus' slimy bank." Milton, P. L. i. 518, says of Pandemonium, "Not Babylon Nor great Alcairo such magnificence Equalled in all their glories." Hall, in Satires iv. 6, says, "What monstrous cities there erected by, Cayro, or the city of the Trinity."

CAITHNESS. The county in the extreme N.E. of Scotland. Strumbo, the clown in Locrine, is a cobbler of C.: the author's geographical knowledge is somewhat vague, for he apparently regards C. as a town. Strumbo, in ii. 2, is cited to appear "in the town-house of Cathnes"; and the county as a whole he calls Cathnesia (ii. 3).

CAIUS COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE (pronounced KEYS, more fully GONVILLE and CAIUS). It was originally founded as Gonville Hall in 1348 by Edward Gonville, and refounded in 1558 by John Caius, M.D. It has been greatly altered during the last cent., but the 3 famous gates—of Humility, of Virtue, and of Honour—are still retained. It is on the W. side of Trinity St., next to Trinity. The author of Richardus Tertius was Thomas Legge, master of C. In John Day's Peregrinatio Scholastica, he speaks of himself as the "sometimes student of Gunvill and C. Colledge in Cambridge." Nathanael Richards, the author of Messallina, was a scholar of C., which he entered in 1628–9.

CAJETA (the old CAIETA, now GAETA). Town on W. coast of Italy, at the N. extremity of the Gulf of Gaeta, 70 m. S.E. of Rome. It is one of the most strongly fortified ports in Italy, and was the summer residence of the Kings of Naples. It is an archbp.'s See. In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, Saladine brings to Eumena a petition from the "Abbot of C."

CALABRIA. The province which forms the "toe" of Italy, between the Gulf of Taranto and the Mediterranean. It was a part of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. In H6 B. i. 1, 7, "The Dukes of Orleans, Calaber, Bretagne, Alençon" are reported as being present at the betrothal of Margaret of Anjou to Henry VI. The list is taken verbatim from Hall. The D. of Calaber is apparently René, the father of Margaret, who was titular K. of Sicily by the nomination of Joan II of Naples, though he never succeeded in getting his inheritance. In Hycke we have the similar form Calabre, mentioned as one of the countries that had been visited by that very extensive traveller. In B. & F.'s Philaster i. 1, Cleremont states that it is thought that the Spanish prince who has come to woo Arethusa "shall enjoy both these kingdoms of Sicily and C." The kingdom of the Two Sicilies passed to the Spanish house of Arragon in 1282. Ferdinand, "the great Cn. Duke," is one of the principal characters in Webster's Malfi; as the supposed date of the play is stated in ii. 3, to be Anno Dom. 1504, he must be Ferdinand v., who died in 1516. The allusion to Galileo's telescope, invented about 1609, in ii. 4, is a mere anachronism. In Barnes' Charter i. 4, Pope Alexander allots to Cæsar Borgia the provinces from Tuscany "to Petrosalia in C." In Dekker's If it be 278, Jovinelli announces to the K., "Your long-expected happiness is arrived, The princess of C." In Marlowe's Jew v. 4, Calymath points out the strong situation of Malta: "Strong countermined with other petty isles, And, towards C., backed by Sicily." In Kyd's

Cornelia v., the Messenger talks of wolves attacking the flocks "in the fair Cn. fields." Milton, P. L. ii. 661, speaks of Scylla bathing "in the sea that parts C. from the hoarse Trinacrian shore."

The wines of C. had some reputation in ancient times. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Tamburlaine promises, "Lachryma Christi and Cn. wines Shall common soldiers drink in quaffing bowls." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality specially praises the wine of "Cn. Aulon."

There was a kind of fur called Calabre, apparently from the name of this province, though the reason for the name does not appear. In Greene's Quip, p. 239, Cloth-breeches expostulates with the skinner, "If you have some fantastic skin not worth two-pence, you will swear 'tis a most precious skin, and came from Musco, or the furthest part of C." In Langland's Piers C. ix. 293, Physic is represented as having to sell "hus cloke of Calabre" in the good time coming when people give up gluttony and so do not suffer from illness. In Coventry M.P. 242, we have "Here colere splayed and furred with ermyn, calabere, or satan." In Rabelais, Gargantua i. 56, the ladies in Thelème wear "martlet skins of C."

CALAIS (Ce. = Callice). A town and fortress in N. France on the Straits of Dover, 26 m. from Dover and 185 from Paris. The word was pronounced, as it is usually spelt in the 16th cent., Callice. It was taken by Edward III in 1346, and was held by England until 1558, when it was captured by the D. of Guise. It was the last of the English possessions in France. After the capture of Arthur near Angiers, John leaves Q. Eleanor behind in France, and returns to England by way of C.: "On toward Callice, ho!" (K.J. iii. 3, 73). In the reign of Richd. II, Thomas, D. of Gloucester (q.v.), was arrested and confined at C. in the custody of Mowbray, the Earl Marshal; he died there, and one of the charges made by Bolingbroke against Mowbray was that he was guilty of the murder of Gloucester; and another was that he had detained the public money for his own uses. He replies (R2 i. 1, 126): "Three parts of that receipt I had for Ce. Disbursed I duly . . . For Gloucester's death, I slew him not." In iv. 1, 13, Bagot charges Aumerle with complicity in Gloucester's murder: "I heard you say 'Is not my arm of length That reacheth . . . As far as Ce., to mine uncle's head?'" and in line 82 Fitzwater adds, "Thou, Aumerle, didst send 2 of thy men To execute the noble D. at Ce." The murder of Gloucester at C. is the subject of Trag. Richd. II v. 1, where the Governor is wrongly called Lapoole. He says (53), "This town of Callys shall for ever tell Within her castle walls plain Thomas fell"; in iv. 1, 40, Richd. says he will send to the K. of France for aid: "And in requital we'll surrender up our forts of Guynes and Callys to the French." H5 iii. 2, 48 bears witness that Nym and Bardolph "in Ce. stole a fire-shovel." After the capture of Harfleur Henry resolves, "The winter is coming on and sickness growing Upon our soldiers, we will retire to Ce." (iii. 3, 56). Henry was "willing to march on to Ce. Without impeachment" (iii. 6, 150), but the French K. would not let him, and Agincourt was the result. After the battle the K. proclaims, "Do we all holy rites . . . And then to Ce., and to England then" (iv. 8, 130); and in v. prol. 7, the Chorus bids the audience, "Bear the K. toward Ce." In H6 A. iv. 1, 9, Fastolfe rides "from Ce. In haste unto your coronation": and after the coronation Henry announces (iv. 1, 170), "Ourself After some respite will return to Ce., From thence to England." After the 1st battle of St. Alban's and the subsequent revival of the Q.'s power, Warwick retired to C., of which he was Governor. "Warwick," says the Q., "is Chancellor and the lord of Ce." (H6 C.i. 1, 238). Thence he came to win the battle of Northampton in 1460.

The story of the capture of C. by Edward III in 1347, and the successful intercession of the Queen for the citizens, is related in Ed. III iv. 2, and v. Langland's Piers B. iii. 105, has a curious allusion to alleged proposals which were made to Edward to sell C. to the French. Mede, reproaching Conscience, says, "Pore men thou robbedst and here here bras at thi bakke to Caleys to selle." The Treaty of Bretigny, which seemed to give England no reward for her victories, provoked much dissatisfaction; and Mede blames Conscience for this. In World Child, Haz. i. 251, Manhood says, "C., Kent and Cornwall have I conquered clean." The reference is to the taking of C. by Edward III. In Day's B. Beggar i., Momford is accused of intending to "yield up Callis to the enemy." The date is the early part of the reign of Henry VI. In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Fitz-Dottrell says, "Thomas of Woodstock was made away at Calice as D. Humphrey was at Bury": an allusion to the murder of Gloucester mentioned overleaf. In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 2, D'Olive says that in future all events will be dated from his ambassage: "the loss of C. and the winning of Cales [i.e. Cadiz] shall grow out of use." This is the capture of C. in 1558. In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, the Waiting-Woman, to prove her age, says, "I can remember the loss of C." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 94, Q. Elizabeth says that Grey and Clifton "fought for our Sister [i.e. Mary] at Ce." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 2, the Bawd says, "They may talk of Dunkirk or of Callis, enriched with foreign booties." This is after C. had ceased to belong to England. In Hycke, p. 101, written before the loss of the town, Frewyll, in answer to Contemplacyon, who has been exhorting him to amend his life that "God may bring thee to Heaven, the joyful city," says, "Will ye have me a fool? Nay, yet I had liefer be Captain of Calays." "Hance, the hangman of C. town," is mentioned in Fulwell's Like, Haz. iii. 316. In John Evangel p. 359, Eugenio says to Actio, "By my faith, ye shall be hangman of C." It will be remembered that the executioner of Q. Anne Boleyn was the hangman of C. "By the arms of C." seems to have been a common oath in the reign of Henry VIII. The heraldic blazon of them runs: "Per Pale; dexter, sable on a cross between 4 keys wards upward and to the dexter, a fleur-de-lis gules; impaling sinister barry wavy argent and sable a lion rampant or." Roister twice in the course of the play swears "by the arms of Calays." In Respublica iii. 5, Adultery swears, "by th' arms of C." In Skelton's Magnificence fo. ix., Counterfeit Countenance says, "By the arms of Calys, well conceived." I can suggest no reason for this oath, unless it was really taken by the Cross in the arms: is it possible that the arms of C. means the Jousts at the Field of the Cloth of Gold? During the wars in the Netherlands in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, the soldiers returning by way of C. and Dover were a set of sturdy beggars and annoyed the folk along the road by their insolent demands. In Histrion iii. 100, we read, "Callis cormorants from Dover road Are not so chargeable as you to feed." In Thersites (Anon. Plays i. 209), Miles says, "I am a poor soldier come of late from Ce.: I trust ere I go to debate some of his malice": where the rhyme with "malice" shows the current pronunciation.

The shortest way to the Continent was by way of Dover and C. Nash, in Pierce G. i. 1, says, "A man standing upon Callis sands may see men walking upon Dover cliffs." In B. & F. Scornful i. 2, Savil speaks of sham sailors as "Captains of galley-foists; such as in a clear day have seen C.," i.e. they have only sailed on the Thames and have never been to sea at all. In Jonson's Every Man O. v. 4, Macilente suggests that Brisk would pay the insurance he has promised to Puntarvolo on his safe return from Constantinople, "upon his bare return from C.": the shortest possible sea-journey. In Massinger's Madam iii. 2, Lacy says of Sir John Frugal, "I saw him take post for Dover, and, the wind sitting so fair, by this he's safe at C." In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, the lady speaks of the "dangers of the merciless Channel, 'twixt Dover and C., 5 long hours' sail." In Elements, Haz. i. 28, Experience, giving a lecture on the map of the world, points out the narrow sea "to C. and Boulogne the next way." Taylor, in Works ii. 41, tells of one Bernard Calvard who rode and sailed "from Southwark near to Ce. to and fro" in 15 hours. It was customary to go over to C. to fight duels so as to be out of the range of the English law. In Rowland's Good News and Bad News (1622), we read, "Gilbert, this glove I send thee from my hand, And challenge thee to meet in Callis sand." "C. sand," says Mr. Strangeways to Mr. Fussell (Harl. Misc. iv. 8), "were a fitter place for our dispute than Westminster Hall." In Tomkins' Albumazar iv. 7, Trincalo, proposing to fight a duel, humorously suggests, "Meanwhile I make provision Of C. sand, to fight upon securely." One is reminded of Naaman and his mule's burden of earth from the land of Israel. In Webster's Cuckold i. 2, Lessingham says, "Soon after sunrise upon C. sands To-morrow we should meet"; and later in the play a duel is fought there. In Swetnam i. 2, Misogonus says, "I was going this morning to practice a young duellist that shortly goes to fight at Callis sands." C. sand was imported for scouring purposes. In B. & F. Hon. Man v. 3, one of the servants, discussing the suitors for his mistress's hand, says of the merchant, "When he brings in a prize, unless it be cockles, or C. sand to scour with, I'll renounce my 5 mark a year." In Ital. Gent. iv. 4, Medusa has among her wares, "Calles gorgets"—the gorget being a kind of necklace.

CALATRAVA. An ancient Spanish city on the S. bank of the Guadiana, some 80 m. S.E. of Madrid. Its strong fortifications have disappeared with the exception of one tower. Three leagues away is the convent erected for the knights of C. in 1214. This "gallant order" was founded in 1158, and did notable service against the Moors. They wore a white robe with a red cross on the breast. In Shirley's Ct. Secret ii. 2, Mendoza promises Pedro, "The K. shall knight thee too of C."

CALDEY. See CHALDÆA.

CALECO. See CALICUT.

CALEDON. Caledonia, the Roman name for the N. part of Britannia: practically equivalent to Scotland. In Fuimus iii. 2, Nennius says, "Before he [Cæsar] climb the craggy rocks of C., a life is spent." In Locrine, C. is throughout used for Scotland. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein v. 2, Newman, when a song is about to be sung, says to Leslie, a Scotchman, "Let not your voice be exalted into a Cia. tune, 'twill spoil our ditty."

CALES. Ancient town in N. Campania, 100 m. S.E. of Rome. It was on the borders of the Falernian territory, and was almost equally famous for the quality of its wines. Milton, P. R. iv. 117, speaks of the Roman banquets, and of "Their wines of Setia, C. and Falerne."

CALES (now CADIZ; in Latin, GADES). An ancient city on the S.W. coast of Spain, abt. 50 m. N. of Gibraltar. It stands on a long narrow isthmus to the S. of a fine bay, at the head of which was La Carraca, one of the chief arsenals of Spain. The city was founded by the Phœnicians under the name of Gadir, which in Roman times became Gades. Legend reported that Hercules, having reached this point, erected 2 brazen pillars there, with the motto "Ne plus ultra." Strabo mentions (Geogr. iii. 5) that these 2 pillars were still standing in the temple of Hercules at Gades; but what was inscribed on them was the cost of the building. The city was taken by the Goths and later by the Moors, but was recovered for Spain in 1262. It was a port and arsenal of the first importance in the 16th cent., and received the bulk of the Spanish trade from the W. Indies and S. America. It was sacked by Howard and Essex in 1596, and all the ships in the harbour were destroyed. This expedition was famous as the C. voyage. A later attempt in 1625 was a dismal failure.

In Greene's Orlando i. 1, Marsilius speaks of "Gadis Ilands, where stout Hercules Imblased his trophies on 2 posts of brass." In T. Heywood's Challenge iii. 1, Petrocella says, "Hercules, coming to this country into the island called Calis, reared his pillar [and] writ that motto No further." In Look about xv., Richd. says that Gloster "hath driven out the Saracens from Gad's and Sicily." The reference is to Robert, 1st Earl of Gloucester, and to the Crusaders who in 1147 took Lisbon from the Moors; but Gloucester was not there. In Stucley, 1271, the hero is represented as landing at C., where the Governor threatens him, "I'll make him know a governor of C.": but this is a mistake, as Stucley landed at Vivero. This was just before the battle of Alcazar in 1587. In Peele's Alcazar iii. 1, Sebastian says that he expects reinforcements "At Cardis, as we sail alongst the coast." The same spelling is used in iii. 3. In Lust's Domin. ii. 3, the Q. orders, "Spread abroad in Cadiz, Madrid, Granada, and Medina, The ambitious hope of Philip." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 1, Carrol says, speaking of the C. voyage of 1596, "'Tis like The great success at C., under the conduct of such a noble general, hath put heart into the English." Dekker, in Hornbook v., advises the young gallant to "talk how often you have been in action: as the Portingale voyage, C. voyage, the Iland voyage." In Jonson's Epicoene i. 4, La Foole boasts, "I had as fair a gold jerkin on that day as any worn in the island voyage or at Cadiz." In Beguiled Dods. ix. 228, Churms says, "I have been at Cambridge a scholar, at C. a soldier." In Chapman's D'Olive iv. 2, D'Olive boasts that in future all events will be dated, not from "the loss of Calais and the winning of C.," but from his ambassadorship. In Davenant's Plymouth v. 1, Cable is reminded in a letter of his promise to pay his creditor "last C. voyage." Hall, in Characters, describes the Vainglorious Man telling "what exploits he did at C. or Nieuport." In his Satires iii. 7, 2, he says, "The muns of new-won C. his bonnet lent": where it is pronounced as a monosyllable. Devonshire tells the story of the 1625 expedition.

There was a particular cut of beard, known as the C. beard. Nash, in Lenten, p. 289, speaks of "lusty blood Bravemente Signiors, with C. beards as broad as scullers' maples that they make clean their boats with." In Laneham's Letter, p. 47, he tells of an ancient minstrel

"seemly begirt in a red caddiz girdle." Furnivall, in his note on this passage, says, "A red Caddiz girdle was one of those of Spanish manufactures of which Stafford so much complains; they derived their name from being made at the city of Cadiz in Spain, out of the fells of untanned hides, which were sent to England to be formed into skins of Spanish leather." But there is a confusion here with another word, "caddis," which means a kind of worsted, and has no connection with Cadiz. In the first place Cadiz is generally called C. in the 16th and 17th cents., and never Caddiz with two "d's." In the second Cadiz had no leather manufactures. On the other hand, caddis, or caddice, in the sense of worsted, is very common, as a reference to O.E.D. s.v. will show.

CALEYS. See CALAIS.

CALICUT. A town on W. coast of Malabar, abt. 250 m. N. of Cape Comorin. It was the first port in India visited by Vasco di Gama in 1498. Heylyn speaks of it as a famous mart town and a staple of all the Indian traffic. In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, Crates advises Onos to challenge Neanthes: "If he accept, you may crave both to choose the weapon, time and place, which may be 10 years hence, and C." The play abounds with similar anachronisms. In Juggler (A.P. iii. 36), Dame Coy says, "A more ungracious knave is not even now between this place and Calicow": where it simply stands for any remote place. In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Frescobaldi says, "My name is Rubosangal, the grim ghost of Bombocamber, king of C."—which is mere mouthing and nonsense. In Apus 1006, Haphazard the Vice comes skipping in with, "I came from Caleco even the same hour." Burton, A. M. ii. 4, 1, 4, says that "Granatus, an imperfect kind of ruby, comes from Calcut." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) vi., calls it "the new found land named Calyco." In B. & F. Gentleman iv. 3, Jaques, afraid of losing his life, says, "Would I were safe under hatches once, for Callicut."

CALIDON. See CALYDON.

CALIFORNIA. Originally included the whole of the W. coast of N. America from Mexico to Oregon. It was discovered by Cabrillo in 1542 and visited by Drake in 1578, when he gave it the name of New Albion. It was colonized by the Spaniards in 1768; in 1848 it was ceded to the United States at the conclusion of the war with Mexico. In Middleton's No Wit ii. 3, Weatherwise predicts an eclipse "not visible in our horizon, but about the Western inhabitants of Mexicana and C."

CALLIDON. See CALYDON.

CALLIS, CALLICE. See CALAIS.

CALPE. The ancient name of the Rock of Gibraltar. It was supposed to be the N. Pillar of Hercules, the S. being Abyla on the African coast. These pillars were the boundary of the world as known to the ancient Greeks. So C. is used to mean the furthest limit of the world. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 2005, Nero boasts that his gluttonies and lusts were well known to "C., to the farthest parts of Spain."

CALVARY (or CALVERY). Latin Calvaria, a translation of the Hebrew Gulgoleth, transliterated into Greek as Golgotha. It means the place of a skull. It was the place for the public execution of criminals in Roman Jerusalem, and was outside the walls of the city. The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, had seen "the Mt. of C." in the course of his pilgrimages. In Candlemas, p. 25, Symeon prophesies that Jesu shall be "Slain by Jews at the Mt. of C." In York M. P. xxxiii. 451, Pilate sentences Jesus: "Crucify him on a cross and on Calverye him kill." In Ibid. xxxii. 350, the plot of land bought for a burying-place for strangers with the betrayal money returned by Judas, and afterwards called Aeldama, the Field of Blood, is (quite wrongly) identified with C. The owner of it says to Pilate, "C. locus men calls it." Donne, Divine Poems (1633) Hymn to God, says, "We think that Paradise and C., Christ's cross and Adam's tree stood in one place." See also GOLGOTHA.

CALVERLEY. A vill. in Yorks, some 4 m. E. of Bradford. It was the scene of the murder by Walter C. of his wife and children, which took place in 1605, and was dramatized in All's One, or A Yorkshire Tragedy, falsely attributed to Shakespeare. The same story forms the basis of Wilkins' Enforced Marriage, which takes place in Yorks.; the name of the unfortunate husband is taken from another Yorks. town, Scarborough.

CALYDON. Ancient city of Ætolia, between the Evenus and the Achelous, some 10 m. from the N. shore of the Corinthian Gulf, near its entrance. It is chiefly remembered from the famous hunting of the Cían. boar by Meleager and the heroes associated with him. This boar, sent by Artemis to ravage the country on account of the neglect of her sacrifices by K. Oeneus, was slain by Meleager. He gave its hide to Atalanta and killed his own mother's brothers who were seeking to wrest it from her. Hereupon his mother, Althæa, who had been informed at his birth that his life would last until a brand then on the hearth should be consumed, and who had therefore snatched it from the flames and preserved it in a chest, set fire to the brand and so caused his death. In H6 B. i. 1, 235, York says, "The realm of England, France, and Ireland Bear that proportion to my flesh and blood As did the fatal brand Althæa burned Unto the Prince's heart of C.," i.e. "my life depends upon their preservation." In H4 B. ii. 2, 93, the Page calls Bardolph, "you rascally Althæa's dream," because "Althæa dreamed she was delivered of a fire-brand." The Page is, however, a little to seek in his mythology: it was Hecuba who dreamed she was delivered of a fire-brand.

In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 3, the Soldan says, "Me-thinks we march as Meleager did . . . To chase the savage Cían. boar." In Lyly's Maid's Meta. i., Silvio says, "So Atalanta came to hunt the Boar of C." In T. Heywood's B. Age i. 1, Hercules asks, "Have we The Calidonian boar crushed with our club?"—and the scene describes his contest with the river-god Achelous for the hand of Deianira, the daughter of Oeneus." K. of C. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 2, 103, Cinthia, leading in a masque of huntsmen, says, "The groves of Calidon and Arden woods Of untamed monsters, wild and savage herds We and our knights have freed." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron, eulogizing the late K. of Spain, Philip II, says that he did not spend his wealth on "Banquets and women and Calidonian wine." This may mean Aetolian wines, as Holland (Plutarch, Morals 1283) speaks of "the good and pleasant wines of Cia." But in the passage in Plutarch De Alexandro, from which this is taken, the better reading is Chalybonium. See under CHALYBON.

CAMBAL (or CAMBALUC). An old name for Pekin, the capital of China. In N.E. China, between the rivers Petang Ho and When Ho, abt. 100 m. W. from the Gulf of Pechili and 40 m. S. of the Great Wall. It was made their capital by the Mongol Khans in 1282. Marco

Polo says that the palace of Kublai Khan was "in the capital city of Cathay, called Cambaluc." The Chinese name was doubtless Kaan-baligh, i.e. the city of the Khan. In B. & F. Beggars' i. 3, the merchants describe their freight as "Indigo, cochineal, choice China stuffs, and cloth of gold, brought from C." Milton, P. L. xi. 388, mentions "the destined walls Of Cu., seat of Cathaian Can" amongst the cities shown in vision to Adam. In Il Penseroso 111, he calls Chaucer, "him that left half-told the story of Cambuscan bold, Of C., and of Algarsife." The reference is to the Squier's Tale, in which the 2 sons of Cambuscan are called Algarsyf and Cambalo; but the latter name is obviously derived from the name of the capital. Burton, A. M. i. 2, 2, 3, speaks of "Pekin, which Riccius contends to be the same with Cambulu in Cataia." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Hoskins says, "Fame is but wind, thence wind may blow it . . . From Mexico and from Peru To China and to Cu."

CAMBER-BRITON. A Welshman. See under CAMBRIA.

CAMBRA. See COIMBRA.

CAMBRAI. The Roman Camaracum, a town in France on the Scheldt, 100 m. N.E. of Paris. It gave its name to cambric, for the manufacture of which it was celebrated. "Inkles, caddises, cambrics, lawns" were part of the stock-in-trade of Autolycus (W. T. iv. 4, 208). In Cor. i. 3, 95, Valeria wishes that Virginia's cambric were as sensible as her finger, that she might leave pricking it for pity. In Per. iv. prol. 24, Marina "would with sharp needle wound the cambric." The scene of Chapman's Rev. Bussy iv. 1 is in a field near C.; and in line 116, Clermont asks leave to send a message "to my most noble mistress, Countess of C." She appears to be an imaginary person.

CAMBRIA. A variant of Cumbria, from the Celtic Cymru, now the Welsh name for Wales. The words were gradually differentiated, Cumbria being used for Cumberland and C. for Wales. In Cym. iii. 2, 44, Leonatus writes to Imogen, "Take notice that I am in C., at Milford Haven." In Cym. v. 5, 17, Belarius says, "In C. are we born, and gentlemen." In Peele's Ed. I p. 15, the K. says to Prince David, "Thou could'st not be a Camber-Briton, if thou didst not love a soldier"; and later in the play (p. 36) the soldiers claim England's promise, "That none be C.'s prince to govern us But he that is a Welshman, born in Wales."

Taylor, Works ii. 181, speaks of "The Cn. game of whip-her-ginny or English one and thirty." This was a card game, possibly something like vingt-et-un. In the old play of Leir there is a K. of C., by name Morgan, who marries Ragan. He is replaced by Cornwall in Shakespeare's play. Caradoc, the hero of Val. Welsh., is styled "K. of C." (i. 1). In Locrine iii. 1, 71, Camber says, "In the fields of martial C., Close by the boisterous Iscan's silver streams . . . Full 20,000 brave courageous knights . . . Young Camber hath." The Iscan is the Usk. W. Rowley, in Search, p. 33, says, "We had . . . a piece of cheese for the Cambro-Brittane." In his Shoemaker ii. 2, 83, Maximinus calls the Welsh prince Amphiabell "That Cn. sectarist."

CAMBRIDGE. The county town of Cambridgesh., on the Cam, formerly the Granta, 50 m. N.E. of Lond. There was a Roman settlement here called Camboritum, with a castle of which some remains have been discovered. The authentic annals of its great University begin during the 12th cent. The following is a list of the colleges which were in existence during our period, with the dates of their foundation: Peter-house (vulgo Pot-house) 1257; Clare Hall 1326; Pembroke 1347; Gonville and Caius (vulgo Keys) 1348, refounded 1558; Trinity Hall 1350; Corpus Christi 1351; King's 1441; Queen's 1446; St. Catherine's Hall (vulgo Cats) 1473; Jesus 1496; Christ's 1505; St. John's 1511; Magdalene (pronounced Maudlin) 1519; Trinity 1546; Emmanuel 1584; Sidney-Sussex 1598. Chaucer, in Reeves Tale A. 3920, tells of a miller at "Trumpyngtoun not fer fro Cantebrygge," who ground their corn for "a greet college Men clepen the Soler Halle at Cantebregge." This Soler Hall has been shown by Mr. Riley to be the King's Hall founded by Edward III in 1337, afterwards absorbed into Trinity. Spenser entered as a Sizar at Pembroke in 1569. In F. Q. iv. 11, 34, he speaks of "My mother C. . . adorned . . . With many a gentle Muse and learned wit." In Beguiled (Dods. ix. 228), Churms says, "I have been at C. a scholar." In Greene's Friar ix., Vander-mast says, "Oxford and C. must go seek their cells To find a man to match him [Vander-mast] in his art." In Ret. Pernass. i. 1, Philomusus abuses "the hidebound brethren of C. and Oxford that abused us in time past." In ii. 6, Amoretto speaks of his tutor as "a scurvy mere C. scholar"; and goes on, "Because when I was in C. and lay in a trundle-bed under my tutor, I invited the hungry slave sometimes to my chamber, he thought himself eternally possessed of my love." Again, in v. 4, Philomusus talks of the time when he "turned a C. apple by the fire." In Merry Devil i., Fabel tells how he read the liberal arts at C., and "so many nights Watched on the top of Peter-house highest tower." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 562, Joice remonstrates with her brother, "Did I not send money to you at C. when you were a freshman?" In Middleton's Chaste Maid iii. 2, Maudlin threatens her son Tim to make his tutor whip him. To which Tim replies: "Ne'er was the like in C. since my time: 'Life! Whip a bachelor! You'd be laughed at soundly.'" There appears to be evidence, however, that undergraduates, if not Bachelors, were birched on occasion, whether the story of Milton's being birched by Chappell be true or not. In Misogonus iii. 3, Cacusgus comes in in a cap and gown, and Madge says, "Warrant him has been at C." In Webster's Wyat i. 4, which is located at C., the Clown asks, "Who's that goes in rank like beans, with cheese-cakes on their heads instead of caps?" And Brett answers: "Sirrah, this is a famous University and those, scholars; these, lofty buildings and goodly houses, founded by noble patrons." The recently discovered play called Club Law, acted in 1599, gives an amusing picture of the relations of Town and Gown in C., under the transparent pseudonym of Athens, in the latter part of the 16th cent. The members of the University are styled "the gentle Athenians." In Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Treedwell boasts, "I have had my head in most of the butteries of C. and it has been sconced to purpose": and when Violetta tells him of the poets in town, he replies, "In the town? What makes so many scholars then come from C. and Oxford with dossiers full of lamentable tragedies and ridiculous comedies which they might vent here to the players, but they will take no money for them?" In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Gilthead, the goldsmith, professes a poor opinion of the Universities: he tells his son, whom he has placed with a local Justice, "You shall learn that in a year shall be worth 20 of having staid you at Oxford or at C." In B. & F. Wit S.W. iv. 1, Oldcraft reproaches his supposed nephew: "A C. man for this? these your degrees, Sir? 9 years at university for this fellowship?" In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Holdfast has just "come up from C." In Middleton's Michaelmas ii. 3, Quomodo tells us that his son "was a C. man, but now he's a Templar." Milton, in Sonn. xi. 14, speaks of Sir John Cheek having taught "C. and K. Edward Greek." Sir John was the first Professor of Greek at C., 1514-1557.

A famous personage in C. in the early 17th cent. was the carrier Hobson, whose name survives in Hobson St., Hobson's Conduit, and the phrase "Hobson's choice." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, a letter is brought to Yellowhammer "from a gentleman in C." by "one of Hobson's porters," who has "took a great deal of pains and come from the Bull sweating." See BULL INN. In his Hubburd, p. 101, the student says, "You see me set forth to the University . . . in Hobson's wagon." In Kirke's Champions iii. 1, the Clown asks the Devil, "Have you no carriers in your kingdom? . . . Is Hobson there, or Dawson, or Tom Long?" He died one of the richest men in C. in 1631, and Milton wrote 2 epitaphs for him: the first beginning, "Here lies old Hobson; Death has broke his girt," and relating how "he had any time this 10 years full Dodged with him [Death] betwixt C. and the Bull"; and the 2nd, "Here lieth one who did most truly prove That he could never die while he could move." Another celebrity was a certain Mannington, whose exploit and execution are described in a ballad published in 1576. In Eastward v., Quicksilver, the idle apprentice, has, like Greene, written a Repentance, which he says "is in imitation of Mannington's: he that was hanged at C., that cut off the horse's head at a blow." It contained the lines, "O Mannington, as stories show, That cut'st a horse-head off at a blow." One of the most remarkable buildings in C. is the Ch. of St. Sepulchre, or the Round Ch. It was built in 1101 in imitation of the Ch. of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, and has been carefully maintained. It stands on the E. side of Bridge St., a little N. of Jesus Lane. Nash, in Pierce, E. 2, speaks of a glutton as having "a belly as big as the round ch. in C."

C., like Oxford, took an important part in the revival of the Drama in England in the 16th cent. Kirchmayer's Pammachius, an anti-papal satire in Latin, was acted at Christ's in 1545. Before this Thomas Artour wrote Mundus Plumbeus and Microcosmus between 1520 and 1532; and the Plutus of Aristophanes was acted in Greek at St. John's in 1536. In 1546 the Pax of Aristophanes and the Tragedy of Jephthe, by John Christopherson, were performed at Trinity. Roger Ascham mentions having seen at C. "M. Watson's Absalon and Georgius Buckananus Jephthe." Gammer Gurton's Needle, the first university play in English, was "played not long ago in Christ's College in C. Made by Mr. S. Master of Art." The date was about 1553, and the author probably William Stevenson. On the occasion of Elizabeth's visit in 1564 the Aulularia of Plautus was played in King's College Chapel on Sunday afternoon; on Monday Edward Halliwell's Dido; and on Tuesday Udall's Ezechias. Thomas Legge's Richardus Tertius was produced at St. John's in 1580, and occupied three successive evenings. Other C. plays were Gager's Meleager (Christ's 1581); Fraunce's Victoria (St. John's 1575), Hymenæus (St. John's 1578), Pedantius (Trinity 1580), Tarrarantantara (Clare Hall), Dicky Harvey (Peter-house), Terminus et Non Terminus (St. John's 1586); Hawkesworth's Leander and Labyrinthus (Trinity 1598 and 1602 respectively), Lælia (Queen's 1590), Club Law (Clare Hall 1597), the Pernassus Trilogy (St. John's 1598-1602), Lingua (post 1602); Ruggle's Ignoramus and Tomkis' Albumazar (1615); Hackett's Loyola (Trinity 1623); and Ward's Fucus (Queen's 1623). Nash, in Saffron Walden iii. 117, speaks of "Pedantius, that exquisite comedy in Trinitie Colledge." The performance of Ignoramus stimulated the passage in Milton's Apol. for Smectymnus, wks. (1851) iii. 267, where he speaks of having seen young divines "upon the stage, writhing and unbending their clergy limbs to all the antic and dishonest gestures of Trinculoes, buffoons, and bawds." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 3, Kempe says, "I was once at a comedy in C. and there I saw a parasite make faces and mouths of all sorts." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 3, Pandolpho sees in the magic glass "An honourable throng of noble persons; Seems by their gracious brows and courteous looks Something they see which, if it be indifferent, They'll favourably accept; if otherwise, they'll pardon." Ronca explains the vision: "Why, that's the Court at C."—an obvious bid for the applause of the C. audience before which the play was first presented.

Shakespeare never mentions the University of C. His only use of the word is in the title of Richd., Earl of C., who was executed at Southampton for his share in a plot to set Edmund Mortimer on the throne. He was the younger son of Edmund of Langley, 5th son of Edward III and Isabel, the daughter of Pedro the Cruel. He married Anne Mortimer, daughter of Roger, Earl of March, and great-great-granddaughter of Edward III through Lionel of Clarence, his 2nd son. The son of this union was Richd. Plantagenet, afterwards D. of York, and father of K. Edward IV. Edward IV thus represented the claim of the 2nd son of Edward III, whilst Henry VI was descended from his 3rd son, John of Gaunt. The discovery of the plot and the execution of C. are the theme of H5 ii. 2. In H6 A ii. 5, 54 and 84, and H6 B ii. 2, 45, the claim of Richd. of York through his father, the Earl of C., is set forth. In Oldcastle iii. 1, this same Earl of C. is introduced and states his claim to the throne to Scroop and Gray. He calls Lionel of Clarence the 3rd son of Edward III; otherwise his account agrees with that given above. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 2, 174, Thomas of Woodstock is addressed as "Earl of C. and of Buckingham."

CAMBRIDGESHIRE. One of the inland counties of England, lying W. of Norfolk and Suffolk. These counties suffered much in the invasions of the Danes. In Brewer's Lovesick King v. 1, Alured speaks of the Danes having planted themselves in "Norfolk, Suffolk, and in C."

CAMEL. A river in N.W. Cornwall, rising near Camelford and flowing past Wadebridge into the Bristol Channel. Arthur's last battle was fought in its neighbourhood. In Fulbeck's prol. to Hughes' Misfort Arth., he says, "And on the banks of Ca. shall lie The bones of Arthur and of Arthur's knights." In alternative speech for Gorlois in v. 2, he says, "Tamar's flood with drooping pace doth flow For fear of touching C.'s bloody stream." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 181, says that C. was frantic "ever since her British Arthur's blood By Mordred's murderous hand was mingled with her flood."

CAMELOT (or CAMILO). The legendary capital of K. Arthur. It has been variously identified with Camel in Somersetsh. and Camelford in Cornwall, on account of the similarity of the name; with Cadbury in Somerssetsh., near which are extensive remains of an old fortification, supposed to be Arthur's castle; and with Winchester. In the Morte d'Arthur we find "the city of C. that is in English Winchester." In Lear ii. 2, 90, Kent says to Oswald, "Goose, if I had you upon Sarum Plain, I'd drive ye cackling home to C." I think it most likely that Shakespeare had Winchester in his mind, with a further allusion to the Winchester Goose he so often refers to (see s.v. BANKSIDE). There were no doubt plenty of geese on Salisbury Plain, as there are on every common in England. In Merlin iii. 6, 134, Aurelius says, "We'll hence to Winchester and raise more powers To man with strength the castle Camilot."

CAMERINO. The old Camerinum, a town in Italy, 86 m. N.E. of Rome. In Barnes' Charter iv. 5, Guicchiardine, as chorus, says of Cæsar Borgia, "Through treacheries He did surprise the State of Camerine." This was in 1499. One of the characters in Ford's Fancies is Julio de Varana, Lord of C.

CAMPANIA. A dist. on W. coast of Italy, S. of Latium, between the Gulfs of Gaeta and Policastro. In Marlowe's Faustus vii., Faust describes his travels "up to Naples, rich C." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Cæsar says of Vergil, "Now he is come out of C. I doubt not he hath finished all his Æneids." In Marcus Germinus, a Latin comedy performed at Christ Ch., Oxford, in 1566, the hero Germinus is a native of C. in the reign of Alexander Severus. In Tiberius 1693, Sejanus says, "Cæsar, 3 days since, Removed his court unto C." Tiberius retired to Caprea about A.D. 30. In May's Agrippina iv. 72, Narcissus says, "Into C. I will go." Milton, P. R. iv. 93, calls Caprea "an island small but strong On the Cn. shore." C. was famous for its wines. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Autumn says, "Thou shalt command The Lydian Tmolus and Cn. mts. To nod their grape-crowned heads into thy bowls." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball says, "We drink no wine but of C.'s Masicus or grape-crowned Aulon." The Massic Hills were in N. C. In May's Agrippina iv. 353, Otho speaks of a rich Roman whose cellars are "full of rich Cn. wine." In Cockayne's Trapolin iii. 2, Mattemores talks of "Thunderbolts worked by the Cyclops of Campagnia's stithy." But he is confusing Vesuvius in C. with Ætna in Sicily, under which was the forge of the Cyclopes.

CAMPUS MARTIUS. An open plain in Rome to the N.W. of the city, between the Capitol and the Tiber. It was the training-ground for the Roman youth during the earlier days of the Republic; but became later covered with noble buildings and porticos. It is now entirely occupied by the houses of the modern city. Jonson's Catiline iii. 1 is laid in "The field of Mars." In Alimony i. 3, Timon, when Haxter brings him notice to stop the production of his play, says, "Let wit perish if I leave not the precious rills of Hippocrene and wing my course for C. M.," i.e. prepare to fight. In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 2, Nennius, after putting Cæsar to flight, cries: "Stay, stay! Thou art at home: here's C. M."

CAMUS. The river Cam, on which Cambridge stands. It rises in Herts. and flows into the Gt. Ouse after a sluggish course of abt. 40 m. Its slow current allows the growth of large quantities of river-sponge and sedge. It was originally called the Granta. Milton, in Lyc. 103, says, "Next C., reverend sire, went footing slow, His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge, Inwrought with figures dim." The sedges of the Cam have still faint dark marks on the leaves.

CANAAN. The old name for W. Palestine. It means the Lowlands, and was properly applied to the coastal dists., but was afterwards extended to cover the whole country W. of the Jordan. In Bale's Promises, v., David says of Israel, "They did wickedly consent to the Philistines and Cites, ungodly idolaters." Milton, P. L. xii, 135 seq., tells the story of the visit of Abraham to C. and the subsequent settlement of Israel there. Spenser, Shep. Cal. July 132, calls the patriarchs the brethren 12 "that came from C." In T. Heywood's S. Age ii., Jupiter, telling of the long night, 3 nights in 1, which he has brought about to lengthen his pleasure with Alcmena, says, "Now at this hour is fought By Josua, Duke unto the Hebrew nation, Who are indeed the Antipodes to us, His famous battle 'gainst the Cananites And at his orison the sun stands still" (see Joshua x. 12). In Milton's S. A. 380, Samson calls Dalila "A Canaanite, my faithless enemy," but this is an error: she was a Philistine, and the Philistines were an Aryan race, and not in any way connected in blood with the Cites. In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas calls Lodowick, "This offspring of Cain, this Jebusite, That never tasted of the Passover, Nor e'er shall see the land of C." The allusion is to the hope that the Jews will return to C. when the Messiah comes. The Puritans used the phrase "the grapes of C." to mean the highest spiritual blessings: with a reference probably to the story of the spies who brought back from Eshcol a huge bunch of grapes. (See Numbers xiii. 23). In Cowley's Cutter iv. 5, Cutter predicts the rise of "a great confounder of Gogmagog, who shall be called the Pestle of Anti-Christ, and his Children shall inherit the grapes of C." In the Puritan slang of the time a Cite. meant one who did not belong to the true people of God, i.e. their own sect. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 1, Ananias, the Puritan, says of Face, "In pure zeal I do not like the man, he is a heathen, and speaks the language of C. truly." Similarly, the Jews use it of a Christian. In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 59), Zariph the Jew says, "Who owns it? A Christian, C.'s brood." Hence the word is used as a term of abuse. In Chivalry (Bullen iii. 285), Bowyer says of the watch, "What foolish Cits. were they to run in debt to their eyes for an hour's sleep."

CANARIES (Cy. = Canary, Ce. = Canarie). A group of islands off the N.W. coast of Africa, the chief of which are Tenerife and Grand Canary. Pliny knew of them, and gave the largest island the name of Canaria Insula from the large dogs (Canes) which were found there. They became known in more modern times through the wreck of a French ship there in 1330; and after various attempts at private occupation they were taken possession of by Spain in 1461, and have since remained in her hands. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Usumcasane reports, "We made Canaria call us kings and lords": a quite unfounded claim. In Stucley 2450, Mahamet speaks of his kingdom in N.W. Africa as "looking upon Canaræz wealthy isles." In Pickering's Horestes D. 3, the Vice asks Fame whether she is going "to Pourtagaull or to the Isles Canarey?" In Mayne's Match iv. 3, Timothy reports that his father "was drowned This morning, as he went to take possession Of a summer-house and land in the C." Thomas Lodge took part in an expedition to the C. in 1584, and on the voyage wrote his Rosalynde.

The islands produce a wine which is often mentioned. Heylyn says, "Ce. wines fume into the head less, please the palate more, and better help the natural weakness of a cold stomach, than any other wines whatsoever." In Venner's Via Recta ad Vitam Longam (1622), he says, "Ce. wine is of some termed a sack, with this adjunct, sweet; but yet very improperly, for it differeth not only from sack in sweetness and pleasantness of taste, but also in colour and consistence; for it is not so white in colour as sack, nor so thin in substance." In M. W. W. iii. 2, 89, the Host says, "I will to my honest knight Falstaff and drink Cy. with him." In Tw. N. i. 3, 85, Sir Toby says, "Thou lackest a cup of Cy.; when did I see thee so put down?" To which Sir Andrew replies: "Never in your life, I think; unless you see Cy. put me down." In H4 B. ii. 4, 29, the Hostess says to Doll, "You have drunk too much C.; and that's a marvellous searching wine, and it perfumes [i.e. sends its fumes through] the blood ere one can say What's this?" In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Face promises Dapper "the best drink, sometimes Two glasses of Cy., and pay nothing." In his Staple v. 2, Pennyboy smells the porter's breath and exclaims: "Wine, o' my worship! Sack, Cy. sack!" In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Busie invites the company to the St. John's Head: "there is a cup of pure Cy." In his Wallenstein v. 2, Newman says, "He'll make us all as drunk as rats in the C." In Chaunticleers xiii., Welcome complains that men would rather "be drunk like the Spaniard with cy. than with their own native beer." In Massinger's Madam iv. 1, Hoist predicts that he shall see Luke Lord Mayor, "All the conduits Spouting cy. sack." In May's Old Couple ii. 1, Theodore speaks of "Rich C. or sweet Candian wines." In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Bagnoli speaks of "Bacchus which Cy. land inherits." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 2, Reignald says to Robin, "Drink whig and sour milk, whilst I rinse my throat With Bordeaux and Cy." In Brome's Moor iii. 2, the boy orders, "Draw a quart of the best cy. into the Apollo."

The C. was a kind of lively dance, said to have been borrowed by the Spaniards from the natives of these islands: it was something like our Sir Roger. In All's ii. 1, 77, Lafeu tells the K. he has found a medicine "That's able to breathe life into a stone, Quicken a rock, and make you dance cy. With spritely fire and motion." In M., W. W. iii. 2, 89, when the Host proposes to drink Cy with Falstaff, Ford punningly remarks aside: "I think I shall drink in pipe-wine first with him; I'll make him dance." In L. L. L. iii. 1, 12, Moth, describing a French brawl, says it is "to jig off a tune at the tongue's end, cy. to it with your feet." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. ii. 1, Castruccio tells Bellafront that he supped last night where her health "danced the C.," i.e. went round again and again. In Shirley's Hyde Park ii. 2, Lacy tries to force Bonavent to dance: "Fill a bowl of sack, and then to the Ce." In Ev. Woman i. 1, it is said, "Another as she goes treads a Ce.pace." Nash, in Pierce 18b, speaks of a woman jetting it "as gingerly as if she were dancing the C." In Devonshire i. 1, Bustamente brings news "such as will make all Spain Dance the C."

"The islands," says Heylyn, "abound in Ce.-birds." This bird is Fringella Canaria, and is green in its native state, though the usual colour of the cage-bird is yellow. Gascoigne, in Compl. Philomene (1576) 33, says, "Canara birds come in to bear the bell." Laneham, in Letter 70, tells of an aviary at Kenilworth "replenished with lively birds, English, French, Spanish, Canarian, and African." In Lyly's Midas iii. 3, Amerula says, "In her fair looks were his thoughts entangled, like the birds of Ce. that fall into a silken net." In thieves' slang, a Cy.

Bird means one who ought to be in the Cage or prison : hence a young rascal. In B. & F. Beggars iii. 1, after the boy has sung a song, one of the Boors says, with double appropriateness, "My fine Cy.-bird, there's a cake for your worship." C. is used in the sense of a pleasure-resort, especially a brothel. In Marston's Leaguer i. 2, Ardelio says, "Once a week, when I am ballasted with wine and lust, I'll sail to my C." When in M. W. W. ii. 2, 89 Quickly tells Falstaff that he has brought Mrs. Ford "into such a c. as is wonderful," she is using a more familiar word for one that she doesn't understand, viz. quandary ; just as, a little further on, she uses aligant, the name of another wine, for elegant.

CANBURY (more fully, CANONBURY). One of the N. suburbs of Lond., between Highbury and Hoxton. It was so called from the mansion of the Prior of the Canons of St. Bartholomew, which was given to the priory soon after the Conquest. It reverted to the Crown at the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and having passed through various hands became the property of the rich Sir John Spenser, Lord Mayor of Lond. in 1594. The mansion occupied what is now Canonbury Place. In Jonson's Tub iii. 5, the scene is laid at Kentish Town. Lady Tub, who lives at Totten Court, says, "We will cross o'er to C. in the interim and so make home." She would go E. to C. and then strike the Kingsland Rd., which goes right up to Tottenham. In the folio of 1692 it is printed by mistake "Canterbury."

CANDAOR (i.e. KANDAHAR). The former capital of Afghanistan or Arachosia. It lies in the centre of the country, abt. 200 m. S.W. of Cabul. The present city was built in 1754, but it occupies the site of an older one. Milton, P. R. iii. 316, mentions troops "From Arachosia, from C. east."

CANDIA (Cy. = Candy). Properly the capital of Crete, the island S. of the Ægean Archipelago, but commonly applied to the whole island by outsiders, though the natives themselves always call it Kriti, or Crete. The name is said to be from the Saracen "Khandax," which means "great fort." It came into the hands of the Venetians in 1204, and was retained by them till 1648, when the Turks attacked it and took it after a siege of 20 years. It became part of the kingdom of Greece in 1898. Shakespeare uses Cy. but once, and then correctly for the town, not the island. In Tw. IV. v. 1, 64, the officer says, "This is that Antonio That took the Phoenix and her freight from Cy." Heylyn preserves the same distinction ; but for the most part the Elizabethans mean by Cy. the whole island. In T. Heywood's B. Age v., Hercules calls the Minotaur "the bull of Cy." In Marlowe's Jew i. 1, Barabas tells how "Mine argosy from Alexandria . . . Are smoothly gliding down by Cy. shore to Malta." In i. 2, the Basso says, "We came from Rhodes, From Cyprus, Cy., and those other isles That lie between the Mediterranean seas." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 1, the Italian Alvaro, in his broken English, says, "De ship go drible on de isla de Cy." In Webster's White Devil v. 1, Flameneo affirms that the Moor "hath served the Venetian in Cy. these twice 7 years." In B. & F. Candy the scene is laid in the island, but the laws are purely imaginary, though perhaps a reference is intended to the Laws of Crete, so dear to Plato (see his Laws, especially Book I) and other ancient writers. They are (1) that anyone who can convict another of ingratitude may demand his life ; and (2) that the best warrior in any fight may demand his own reward on his return. The background of the play is a war between Crete and Venice, on the historical ground that the Emperor Baldwin made the Marquis of Montferrato Governor of Crete and that he sold it to Venice. Hence the Cretans are contesting the right of Venice.

In Nash's Wilton, I. 4, Jack says, "He is not fit to travel that cannot with the Cns. live on serpents, make nourishing food even of poison." Heylyn, on the other hand, says that the island "breedeth no venomous worms." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "Precious Cy. wives will meet their gamesters At a convenient tavern, rob their husbands Without a scruple." To send a man to Cy. seems to have been used much as we say "to send one to Jericho," or "to the devil." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Flameneo says, "They are sending him to Naples, but I'll send him to Cy." In B. & F. Double Mar. ii. 3, a sailor says of a ship that has been taken and set on fire, "Her men are gone to Cy. ; they are peppered."

Heylyn quotes from Du Bartas, "From C. [come] currants, muscadells, and oils." Blount, Glossograph, s.v., says, "Muscadel comes for the most part from the isle Crete or Cy." In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Mosca speaks of "Rich Cn. wines." In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Dinant upbraids Champernel for the wrong he has done in getting his wealth ; "for this," he says, "this Cy. wine, 3 merchants were undone." In Massinger's Very Woman iii. 5, Antonio assures Borachia, "'Tis wine forsooth, good wine, excellent Cy. wine." To which she replies : "Is this a drink for slaves ? Why, saucy Sirrah (excellent Cy. wine !), reach me the bottle." In May's Old Couple ii. 1, Theodore speaks of "Rich Canaries or sweet Cn. wines." In Davenant's Rhodes A., a song occurs with the line, "The wine bravely works which was brought us from Cy." Donne, in Ode to Painted Lady, says, "Often times we see Rich Cn. wines in wooden bowls to be." In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Petillius complains that the Roman soldiers are grown so dainty that "No oil but Cy., Lusitanian figs, And wine from Lesbos now can satisfy 'em." In their Beggars i. 3, Goswin, speaks of "Cy. sugars." In Greene's Friar ix. 268, Bacon says, "Cy. shall yield the richest of her canes." Sir Adolphus Ward's note is : "This place, which still gives its name to an infantile sweetmeat, is in Ceylon." With all respect for my old teacher, I think this is wrong. First, sugar-cy. has nothing to do with the place Cy., whether in Ceylon or elsewhere, but is derived from the Persian qand, meaning crystallized sugar ; and second, sugar was not imported from Ceylon. On the other hand, Eden, in Treat. New Ind. (1553), p. 41, speaks of "Sugar which excelleth the sugre of Candye or Sicilia," where Candye obviously means Crete ; and Heylyn (s.v. CRETA) says of Crete, "They transport sugar candie, gummess, honey," etc. So that there is little doubt that Cy. in this passage means Crete, or Candia.

CANDIE. In Barnes' Charter. See GANDIA.

CANE. See CAEN.

CANIBEY. In the old Shrew (Haz., p. 511) Aurelius says, "When I crossed the bubbling C. And sailed along the crystal Hellespont, I filled my coffers of the wealthy mines." I have not succeeded in identifying C. : possibly it is a corruption of Khandligen, or Kalliley, a place on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus ; and bubbling C. may mean the Bosphorus with its violent currents.

CANNÆ. A vill. in Apulia on the Aufidus, 6 m. from its mouth and abt. 200 m. S.E. of Rome. Here in 216 B.C. Hannibal inflicted a terrible defeat on the Romans, in which half their army was killed and a large number were taken prisoners. The battle appears to have been fought on the N. side of the river, though the evidence is somewhat conflicting. In Nero iii. 3, Seneca, bewailing the condition of Rome under the tyranny of Nero, says, "Let C. come, Let Allia's waters turn again to blood, To these will any miseries be light." In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 5, Cato of Utica, referring to the victory of Cæsar at Pharsalia, says, "O talk not now of Canna's overthrow." In Alimony i. 2, Timon speaks of the closing of the theatres in 1642 as "our great disaster at C. than which none ever more tragical to our theatre." In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 8, the Britons sing a warsong, "Black Allia's day and C.'s fray Have for a third long stayed." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1524, Earth laments the "valiant Roman spirits" who "Fell in one fatal day at Canna's field." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 2, Hannibal boasts, "I o'erthrew 6 Consuls, and at Cannas in one fight killed 100 Roman Senators." In Tiberius 1158, Germanicus, speaking of his victory over the Germans, says, "Not Cannas nor the fields of Pharsalie So dyed in blood as was Danubius."

CANNON ROW. A st. in Westminster running into Bridge St., E. of Parliament St. It led from the New Palace Yard to the Privy Garden, and took its name from being the residence of the Dean and Canons of St. Stephen's Chapel. The name was corrupted in the 18th cent. into Channel Row. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Gossip Tattle says she has "all the news of Tuttle St., and both the Alm'ries, the two Sanctuaries, long and round Wool-staple, with King's St., and Canon Row to boot."

CANNON ST. (or CANNING ST.). See CANWICK ST.

CANTERBURY (originally CANTWARA-BYRIG, the borough of the Kentishmen). A city in Kent, 55 m. S.E. of Lond., on the site of the old Roman Durovernum. It is the cathedral city of the Primate of All England, the 1st archbp. having been the missionary Augustine. The first ch. was entirely rebuilt by Lanfranc in 1070. It was burnt down in 1172 and rebuilt, the choir of the cathedral still remaining as it was then constructed. The nave was added in the 14th cent., and the central tower completed about 1500. Adjoining the cathedral was the Abbey of St. Augustine. Edward the Black Prince and Henry IV and his Q. were buried in the cathedral. The oldest ch. in the city is St. Martin's, where K. Ethelbert was baptized: the ch. itself is Norman, but some of the Saxon masonry can still be seen.

General references. In Hycke, p. 102, Frewyll relates how he got so drunk at Salisbury that he leaped "out of Burdeaux unto C., almost 10 m. between" (see under BORDEAUX). In Three Ladies 88, Lucre mentions C. as one of several towns where men "great rents upon little room do bestow," because of the numbers who flock thither to trade. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report claims to have been "at C., at Coventry, at Colchester." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker i. 1, 216, Maximinus says, "Our daughter Leodie We'll leave to keep her court at C."; and several of the later scenes in the play are enacted there. In Middleton's Queenborough v. 1, Aminadab informs Simon that the players whom he has been entertaining "only take the name of country comedians to abuse simple people with a printed play or two which they bought at C. for sixpence." C. is the nearest town to Queenborough where there would be bookshops; though hardly in the time of Hengist, in which the action of the play takes place. In Lyly's Bombe iv. 2, Dromio complains of the paces of the horse he has hired: "I had thought I had rode upon adduces [i.e. adders] between this [i.e. Rochester] and C." In Feversham v. 5, the Mayor sentences Mrs. Arden to be burnt alive "at Ce., the capital of the county in which the murder was committed."

Ecclesiastical references. Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 232, describes C. as "an old city, somewhat decayed yet beautiful to behold; most famous for a cathedral ch., the very majesty whereof struck them into a maze." Lanceland, in Piers B. xv. 437, reminds us that "Austyn at Caunterbury crystened the Kynge," sc. Ethelbert. In C. xviii. 274, he mentions the death of "seynt Thomas of Caunterbury" as an example of devotion to all bps. In Bale's Johan 2111, Dissimulation says, "I die for the ch. with Thomas of C." This is Thomas a Becket, who was murdered by the knights of Henry II in the cathedral in 1170. A magnificent shrine was erected to his memory in 1175, which became one of the most popular resorts of pilgrims during the Middle Ages. It was entirely destroyed by the commissioners of Henry VIII, but the place where the archbp. was murdered is still shown, and the apse at the E. end of the cathedral is called Becket's Crown. For the pilgrimages, see below. In K.J. iii. 1, 144, Pandulph charges K. John with having kept "Stephen Langton, chosen Archbp. Of C., from that holy see." Langton is also mentioned in Bale's Johan 1309. He was appointed archbp. by Pope Innocent III and consecrated in 1207. John, whose nominee was the Bp. of Norwich, refused to acknowledge Langton, and the Pope put his kingdom under an interdict in consequence. In 1215 John gave way and Langton was admitted to the see. In Trag. Richd. II v. 1, 57, the Ghost of the Black Prince says, "from my tombe late at Ce. The ghost of Edward the Black Prince is come." This tomb is still to be seen, with the arms of the Prince suspended over it. The archbp. mentioned in R2 ii. 1, 282 as one of those in revolt against Richd. was Thomas Arundel, brother of the Earl of Arundel, who had been deprived of his see for complicity in Gloucester's alleged conspiracy in 1398 and had taken refuge at Cologne. He was subsequently reinstated and died archbp. in 1414. The archbp. who in H5 i. 2 justifies Henry's claim to the Crown of France was Henry Chicheley (1414-1443). He was the founder of All Souls College, Oxford, and made important additions to Lambeth Palace. The archbp. who appears in R3 iii. is Cardinal Thomas Bourchier (1454-1486). The archbp. who presided at the divorce proceedings in H8 ii. 4, whose installation is announced to Wolsey (iii. 2, 401), who crowns Anne Bullen (iv. 1), and who is delivered by the King's intervention from the plot of the Privy Councillors (v. 3), is Thomas Cranmer (1533-1556). He was one of the Council of Government during the minority of Edward VI, espoused the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and was imprisoned for treason on the accession of Mary. In 1556 he was burnt for heresy at Oxford, near the present Martyrs' Memorial. In Sampson's Vow iv. 1, 82, "Wotton, Dean of C.," is one of the English Commissioners to treat with the Scotch and French after the siege of Leith in 1560.

The pilgrimages to the shrine of St. Thomas a Becket have their most enduring monument in the C. T. of Chaucer, which are based upon an actual pilgrimage starting from the Tabard, in Southwark, on April 17, 1386. In prol. 16, he says, "Than [i.e. in spring] longen folk to goon on pilgrimages. . . . And specially from every shires ende Of Engelonde to Caunterbury they wende The holy blisful martir for to seke That hem hath holpen, whan that they were seke." The pilgrims took the journey in four stages, and enlivened it with song, story, and jest. In H. A. i. 2, 140, Poin brings word that "there are pilgrims going to C. with rich offerings," who may be beset and plundered. These pilgrimages have left permanent traces in the language. A C. pace, or canter, is the easy amble which was the pilgrims' usual speed; C. bells were the bells they wore as pilgrim-signs, the name being afterwards transferred to a bell-shaped flower of the genus Campanula; a C. tale is a cock-and-bull story such as used to be told by the pilgrims. In Sampson's Vow. v. 2, 19, Miles says he has practised, for the part of the hobby horse in a morris dance, "my smooth ambles and C. paces." Bale, in Exam. of Thorne 1407 (Parker Soc.), 101, says, "Every town that the pilgrims come through, what with the noise of their singing, and with the sound of their piping, and with the jangling of their C. bells . . . they make more noise than if the K. came there." Latimer, Serm (Parker Soc. i. 107), says that "we might as well spend that time" given to reading the Bible "in reading of profane histories, of Ce. tales, or a fit of Robyn Hood" if we do not amend our lives accordingly. In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, Mayberry says, "A C. Tale smells not half so sweet" as the comedy. In Goosecap iii. 1, when it is said that Lord Tales is from C., Will says, "The best tales in England are your C. Tales." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 240, says of the story of the Fox and the Wolf, "I cannot tell whether it be a C. tale or a fable in Æsop." In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 45, the Palmer says that he has been as a pilgrim, "At Mayster Johan Shorne in C." This John Shorne was the Rector of N. Marston, in Bucks., and died early in the 14th cent. His body was enclosed in a shrine at N. Marston, and became a great resort of pilgrims, especially those suffering from ague. His well may still be seen near the vill. ch. He was reported to have conjured the devil into a boot, and a picture of him may be seen on the rood-screen of Gately Ch. in Norfolk, with the boot in his hand and the devil peeping out of it. Foxe, in Book of Martyrs, says that penitents were sometimes compelled as a penance to make pilgrimages to "Sir John Schorn." A ballad is quoted in Chambers' Book of Days, May 8th, "To Maister John Schorn, That blessed man born, For the ague to him we apply." Latimer, Serm (Parker Soc. i. 474), speaks of "the popish pilgrimage which we were wont to use in times past, in running hither and thither to Mr. J. Shorn or to our Lady of Walsingham." Bale, in Image of Both Churches xvii., gives a list of objects of papistical veneration, amongst which is "Master J. Shorn's boot." In Legh's Accidence of Armoury (1597) pref., there is a story of a coat which its owner had not worn "since he came last from Sir J. Shorne." Heywood can hardly have been ignorant that the shrine of Sir John was not in C., and it seems certain that we should read, "At Mayster Johan Shorne, in C.": 2 shrines being intended, Shorn's at Marston, and Becet's (which is otherwise not mentioned at all) at C.

Plays were regularly acted by the boys of the King's School, C., under the mastership of Anthony Rushe, in the middle of the 16th cent. It may have been these that gave Marlowe his first impulse towards dramatic writing. He was born at C., and his christening is recorded in the parish register of St. George the Martyr under date Feb. 26, 1564, "Christofer, the son of John Marlowe": he was educated at the King's School. Greene, in Menaphon, sneers at Marlowe's plays as "C. tales."

CANWICK ST. (originally CANDLEWRIGHT or CANDLEWICK ST.: then it became C. ST., then CANNING ST., and finally, as now, CANNON ST.). A st. in Lond. running from the S.E. corner of St. Paul's Churchyard to the corner of K. William St., parallel to Cheapside. In our period it only went as far as Walbrook: it was extended to St. Paul's Churchyard in 1854. It derived its name from the candlemakers who had their shops there, but as early as the 15th cent. it had passed from them to the cloth-dealers. Lond. Stone was originally on the S. side of the st., but was removed across the road in 1742. It is now built into the wall of St. Swithin's Ch., nearly opposite the railway station, 35 ft. N.E. of its original position.

In H6 B. iv. 6, the direction in F. 1 is: "Enter Jack Cade and the rest and strikes his staffe on Lond.-stone." Modern editions locate the scene as "Cannon St.," but it would be more exact to say "C. St." In T. Heywood's Prentices, sc. 1, Eustace cries: "O that I had with me as many good lads, honest prentices, from Eastcheap, C. St., and London-stone, to end this battle." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 2, Pisaro asks Frisco, "Why led you him through Cornhill? Your way had been to come through Canning-st." In Lickpenny 72, Lydgate relates, "Then went I forth by Lond.-stone Throughout all C.-st. Drapers much cloth me offered anon." In Nobody 378, Nobody says, "If my breeches had as much cloth in them as ever was drawn between Kendall and Canning-st., they were scarce great enough to hold all the wrongs that I must pocket." In Deloney's Newberie ix., Jack "took him a shop in Canweek st. and furnished [it] . . . with a thousand pounds worth of cloth." In his Reading vi., the clothiers' wives, coming up to Lond., saw "in Candleweeke ste. the weavers." A ballad follows, with the lines, "The day will come before the doom In Candleweeke st. shall stand no loom Nor any weaver dwelling there." Stow testifies, "There dwelled also of old divers weavers of woollen clothes brought in by Edward the third." In Middleton's Triumph Truth, one of the characters in the pageant is Sir John Poultney, who "founded a college in the parish of St. Laurence Poultney by Candlewick st." (see under LAURENCE POULTNEY, ST.).

CAPE, THE. Used for the C. of Good Hope, S. Africa. The first example of this use is in Milton, P. L. ii. 641, where Satan is compared in his flight to a fleet of merchantmen which "on the trading flood Through the wide Ethiopian to the C. Ply stemming nightly toward the pole." Fuller, Church Hist. ii. 11, 43, calls the Archbp. of Armagh (Usher) "the Cape-merchant of all learning."

CAPE DE VERD ISLANDS. In the N. Atlantic, 320 m. W. of C. Verd in Africa. They were discovered by the Portuguese in 1449, and have ever since belonged to them. They were attacked by Drake in his famous Island Voyage in 1585. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 333, the chorus tells how "The Q. sets forth a fleet of one and twenty sail to the W. Indies under the conduct of Francis Drake and Christopher Carlisle, who set on C. d. V., then Hispaniola."

CAPHAREUS. The rocky promontory at the S.E. extremity of Eubœa; now Kavo Doro. Here the Grecian fleet was said to have been wrecked on the return of the chiefs from the Trojan War. In Lochrine iv. 1, 61, Estrild envies the Q. of Pergamus, because she saw the overthrow of her enemies "Nigh to the rock of high C." Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 586, says of the returning Greeks, "Some on the rocks of C. are thrown, Some on th' Euboick cliffs in pieces rent."

CAPHTOR. Probably to be identified with Crete (q.v.). According to Amos ix. 7, the Philistines came from C. to Palestine; and this is borne out by the Egyptian records. Crete was a great pre-historic centre of Ægean civilization, and the Philistines, the sea-peoples of the Egyptian monuments, introduced it into Palestine towards the end of the 13th cent. B.C. Milton, in S.A. 1713, makes Manoah say that Samson "hath left . . . lamentation to the sons of C. Through all Philistian bounds."

CAPITOL. At Rome, the hill at the N.W. end of the Forum. It was divided into 2 peaks by a saddle in which it was said that the Asylum of Romulus was situated. The S.W. peak was actually the C., the N.E. being the Arx, but the whole hill was often spoken of as the C. On it was the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, begun by the Tarquins, and completed in 509 B.C. In 83 B.C. it was burnt down, and rebuilt by Sulla. Twice subsequently it was destroyed by fire: it was finally rebuilt by Domitian in A.D. 82, and this temple survived till the 5th cent. The site is now occupied by the Palazzo Caffarelli. Surrounding the main temple were smaller ones to Honour and Virtue, Fides, Jupiter Custos, and Jupiter Tonans. On the Arx was the Temple of Juno Moneta, the mint of ancient Rome.

In Milton, P. R. iv. 47, the Tempter says to our Lord, "There the C. thou seest Above the rest lifting his stately head on the Tarpeian rock, her citadel Impregnable." In Cor. iii. 1, 240, Coriolanus refuses the name of Romans to the plebeians, "Though calved i' the porch o' the C." In iv. 2, 39, Volumnia exclaims: "As far as does the C. exceed The meanest house in Rome, so far my son . . . does exceed you all." In v. 4, 1, Menenius says it would be easier to displace "Yon coign o' the C., yon corner stone" with a little finger than to move Coriolanus from his purpose. In J. C. i. 3, 20, Casca relates, "Against the C. I met a lion." In ii. 1, 111, Casca says, "the high east Stands, as the C., directly here." Possibly Shakespeare was thinking of the Tower of Lond., which is E. of the Globe Theatre. In ii. 2, 21, Calpurnia tells how armies have been seen fighting in the sky, "Which drizzled blood upon the C." In iii. 3, 27, we learn that Cinna, the poet, dwelt "by the C." In Jonson's Sejanus v. 1, Sejanus ridicules the importance of prodigies: if they are worth a thought, then "The running of the cat betwixt our legs As we set forth unto the C." were a prodigy. In his Catiline iii. 3, Catiline says, "Now's the time, this year, The 20th from the firing of the C., As fatal too to Rome." The C. was burnt 83 B.C.; the date of Catiline's conspiracy was 63 B.C. The prophecy was found in the Sibylline Books that the 20th year after the burning of the C. would be fatal to Rome. In Chivalry, Pembroke says, "I'll have his sepulchre hang richer with the spoils of proud passengers than was the Romans' wealthy C." When, in Cym. i. 6, 106, Iachimo speaks of "lips as common as the stairs That mount the C.," he is referring proleptically to the steps up to the C. erected in 1536 on the occasion of the visit of the Emperor Charles V. In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, young Geraldine tells how he has visited Rome and seen "their Pantheon and their C." In Jonson's Poetaster iv. 3, 30, Albinus swears, "By Jove and all the gods i' the C.," i.e. the other gods who had temples there. In the temple of Jupiter itself there were 3 shrines occupied by Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Milton, P. L. ix. 508, calls the God of the Romans "Cine." Jove.

Rome was sacked and burnt by the Gauls 390 B.C., but an attack on an undefended part of the Arx was betrayed by the cackling of the geese sacred to Juno and the valour of Manlius: who was nevertheless executed 6 years later by precipitation from the Tarpeian rock, which was part of the Cine. Hill, on the charge of attempting to make himself king by the help of the plebeians. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 1, Antony says that Cæsar, by his conquests in Gaul, "Recompensed the fiery C. With many cities unto ashes burnt." In Jonson's Staple v. 2, Pennyboy, being jeered at by the rest of the company, calls them geese; and Madrigal adds: "but such as will not keep your C." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Kate reviles the captains "that fight, as the geese saved the C., only with prattling." In Shirley's Honoraria iv. 1, a citizen says, "[I am] one of the birds that keep the C.; our feathers are all at your service, gentlemen; when you have plucked and picked us well, you may give order for our roasting." In Alimony iii. 5, the Constable addresses the watch: "My birds of the C., be it your care to watch while I sleep." In Tiberius 1800, Vonones says, "Brennus scaled the C." Brennus was the leader of the Gauls in this attack. In Fisher's Fuimus Ind., Brennus says to Camillus, "Bout your C. Pranced our vaunting steeds, defended more By geese than by your gods." In Middleton's Women Beware i. 2, Livy says, with some confused recollection of this story, "You are now in another country, where your laws are no more set by than the cacklings of geese in Rome's great C." In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 1, the Chancellor, presiding at the trial of Byron, draws a parallel between him and Manlius: "If his deserts have had a wealthy share In saving of our land from civil furies, Manlius had so that saved the C.; Yet for his after traitorous factions They threw him headlong from the place he saved."

The triumphal processions of victorious Roman generals went along the Sacred Way up to the C. Such a triumph is described in Massinger's Actor i. 4, where Cæsar is pictured "Riding in triumph to the C." In Tiberius 1276, Nero speaks of "Going to the C. to the triumph." In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 2, Nennius, after putting Cæsar to flight, cries ironically, "Open the C.'s ivory gates; Cæsar returns a victor!" In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, Torrenti says, "Say to the Duke that never Cæsar came More welcome to the C. of Rome." The Elizabethans, with the exception of Ben Jonson, fell into the natural mistake of regarding the C. as the place of meeting of the Roman Senate, the Parliament-house of Rome. As a matter of fact, the Senate met in the Curia Hostilia in the Forum, till it was burnt down in 52 B.C., or in various temples and other consecrated places. In Cor. i. 1, 49, the revolting plebeians cry: "To the C.!" In i. 1, 192, Coriolanus bitterly complains: "They . . . presume to know What's done i' the C." In i. 1, 244, the Senator invites Menenius and Marcus, "Your company to the C., where I know Our greatest friends attend us." In ii. 1, 74, the Senators are called, "Benchers in the C." The Senate-meeting of

ii. 2 is held in the C. In ii. 3, 243, the Tribunes exhort the plebeians to "repair to the C." to annul their election of Coriolanus to the consulship. In iv. 6, 75, the tribunes are summoned to the Senate, and Brutus says, "Let's to the C." In J. C. i. 2, 187, Brutus says, "Cicero looks . . . As we have seen him in the C. Being crossed in conference by some Senators." The meeting of the Senate at which Cæsar was assassinated was actually held in the Curia Pompeii, some distance N. of the C.; but both Shakespeare and the other dramatists uniformly represent the death of Cæsar as occurring in the C. In J. C. ii. 1, 201, the conspirators fear lest the augurers should "hold Cæsar from the C. to-day." The scene of iii. 1 is laid there. In line 11, Cassius says to Artemidorus, "Come to the C.": probably the Senate was discovered sitting in the back-stage, and Cæsar and his train went up from the front stage to the Senate at line 12. In Ham. iii. 2, 109, Polonius says, "I did enact Julius Cæsar; I was killed in the C." In Ant. ii. 6, 18, Pompeius describes the conspirators as "drenching the C." when they killed Cæsar. In B. & F. False One prol., it is stated that Cæsar "fell i' th' c." In their Gentleman v. 1, Marine says, "So Cæsar fell, when in the C. They gave his body two-and-thirty wounds." Chaucer, C. T. B. 3893, says, "This Julius to the Cie. wente . . . And in the Cie. anon hym hente This false Brutus." In Tit. i. 1, 41, Marcus entreats the crowd "in the C. and Senate's right" to withdraw. In Chapman's Chabot v. 3, 180, the King says, "Pompey could hear it thunder, when the Senate And C. were deaf to heaven's loud chiding." Pompey prevented the election of Cato by dismissing the Assembly under the pretext that he had heard it thunder (Plutarch Vit. Catonis 42). The C. was also called Mt. Saturnal from the legend mentioned in Verg. Æn. viii. 357, that Saturnus founded a city there. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., says of Jove, "Upon her [i.e. Rome's] head he heaped Mt. Saturnal."

C. is used generically for any senate or parliament-house or centre of government. In Peele's Ed. I. i., the K., sitting in state in the palace of Westminster, exclaims: "O glorious C. ! beauteous Senate-house !" In B. & F. Candy iii. 2, Cassilane says, "I think myself as great, As mighty, as if in the c. I stood amidst the senators": the reference being to the Senate-house of Candia, in Crete. Drummond of Hawthornden uses it of heaven, in Poems (1630), where he says of the ascending Christ, "The spotless spirits of light . . . Greet their great victor in his c." When Milton, P. L. i. 756, speaks of Pandæmonium as "the high Capital Of Satan and his peers" I am pretty sure that he meant to spell it C., and that the "a" is due to the mistake of his secretary. O.E.D. gives no other example of Capital used as a noun in this sense until 1750.

CAPO D'ISTRIA. A spt. on a small rocky island in the Gulf of Trieste, at the head of the Adriatic. It is the scene of Middleton's Widow.

CAPPADOCIA. Dist. in E. Asia Minor, S. of Pontus, E. of Galatia, and N. of the Taurus. It extended E. to the Euphrates, but its boundaries cannot be very exactly determined. It was for long an independent kingdom under a series of monarchs with Persian names. But in 39 B.C. Antonius put to death Ariarthes IX and set Archelaus on the throne. He was ultimately summoned to Rome by Tiberius to meet charges laid against him before the Senate, and died there in A.D. 17. In T. Heywood's Iron Age B. 1, Pentiselea, Q. of the Amazons, boasts, "We are those women who conquered Asia, Egypt, and C." This was a legend of pre-historic times. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "Proud C. saw her k. captived." This was Ariobarzanes, assassinated by order of Cassius 42 B.C. In Ant. iii. 6, 70, Cæsar mentions "Archelaus of C." as one of the kings levied for war by Antony. According to one form of the legend, St. George of England was a Cn. soldier, who afterwards was made bp. of Alexandria. In Harrington's Arragon ii. 1, he is called "St. George, that Cn. man-at-arms." In the old Timon ii. 4, Gelastus says, "In C. they choose a friend That's gelt, to keep their wives in chastity." In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 1, Simon Eyre speaks of his apprentices as "mad Cns.": elsewhere he calls them "Assyrians" and "Mesopotamians." The long words evidently tickled his fancy. Cappadochio, and its corrupted form, Caperdewsie, is used in the sense of a prison. In Puritan i. 3, Nicholas says, "How, captain Idle ! my old aunt's son . . . in Cappadochio !" In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. iv. 4, we have, "my son's in Dybel here, in Caperdohy, i' the gaol"; and in i. 1. 86, "He's in Caperdohy, Ned, in Stafford Gaol." It is suggested that this use is due to the fact that there were many slaves in C., but I think it is more probably due to the first syllable, which suggests cop, to catch, from which we get our "copper" for a policeman.

CAPRÆ (now CAPRI). A small island at the S. entrance of the Bay of Naples. It is separated from the mainland by a strait 3 m. in width. Augustus made it a part of the imperial domain, and often visited it; Tiberius resided there during the last 10 years of his reign, and built 12 villas on the island, the ruins of which are still to be seen. According to Tacitus and Suetonius, he retired there for the purpose of gratifying his unnatural lusts in privacy; but it is likely that they have exaggerated his depravity. In Jonson's Sejanus iv. 4, Macro advises Caligula, "To go for C. presently; and there Give up yourself entirely to your uncle"; and in iv. 5, Arrius says of Tiberius, "He hath his slaughter house at C., Where he doth study murder as an art." In Massinger's Actor iii. 1, Domitilla charges Nero with gratifying his passion at her expense "in a kind Tiberius at C. never practised." In Rawlin's Rebellion iv. 1, Giovannospeaks of "the whorish front of C." In Milton, P. R. iv. 92, the Tempter relates how Tiberius is "Old and lascivious, and from Rome retired To C., an island small but strong On the Campanian shore." In Bale's Johan 2088, the monk who poisons the K. hands him a cup, saying, "It passeth malmsey, capric, tyre, or hippocras." I presume capric wine means wine from Capri. This wine is mentioned in Russell's Bk. of Nurture (1460) and Harrison's England (1587).

CAPSA (now CAUSA). A city in an oasis in the extreme S. of Numidia, abt. 200 m. S. of Carthage. It was said to have been founded by the Libyan Hercules, and was destroyed by Marius in the Jugurthine war. In Bacchus the 8th guest "was of C., a town well known in Numidia: his name was Geoffrey Gooscap, and with him he brought a nightcap for god Bacchus." The name is chosen for the sake of the pun.

CAPUA. A city in Campania, near the Volturnus, abt. 90 m. S.W. of Rome. It was founded by the Etruscans in the 9th cent. B.C., but was captured by the Samnites in 424 B.C. It fell into the hands of Rome at the close of the Latin war, but revolted in the 2nd Punic War, and opened its gates to Hannibal, who spent the winter after Cannæ there. His subsequent ill-success was attributed by the Romans to the enervating influence of the city.

Under Julius Cæsar it became a Roman Colonia. It was partially destroyed by the Vandals in A.D. 256, and the destruction was completed by the Saracens in 840. The inhabitants rebuilt it on the site of the ancient Casilinum, but the site of the old city was occupied later by the village of Santa Maria di Capua. The scene of Act I of Nabbes' Hannibal is laid at C. during the winter of 216-5 B.C. In i. 1, Maharball calls it "Pleasure's only storehouse. Were I an Hannibal and conquest girt me As far as daylight spreads his crystal wings, One C. should ransom all." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "C., effeminate and amorous, wherein the Carthaginian captain's soldiers were spoiled and debauched with pleasures." In Lodge's Wounds of Civil War i. 1, Sulpicius speaks of "our legions Waiting our idle wills at C." His reference is to the 6 legions under Sulla's command which were destined for the Mithradatic war, and which Sulpicius wished to get transferred to Marius 88 B.C. In Jonson's Sejanus iii. 3, Tiberius declares his intention of proceeding to Campania "to dedicate a pair of temples, One to Jupiter at C." Tacitus, Ann. iv. 57 and 67, mentions this intention and its fulfilment in A.D. 27. In Davenant's Platonic v. 7, Theander says, "The arms I won at C. are thine." In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, Lucretia says, "This night I purpose privately to sup With my Lord Cardinal of C."

CARDIFF (Welsh, CAERDYDD). The capital of Glamorgansh. in S. Wales, on the Taff. For reference in Jonson's Wales, see under CAERLEON.

CARDIGAN. A spt. town in Wales, the capital of Cardigansh. It has an ancient ch. dedicated to St. Mary, and is in the diocese of St. David's. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Oldcraft relates that he has got a Welsh benefice in reversion for his nephew, "Dean of C.," though C. has no dean in the technical sense.

CARDINAL'S HAT. A tavern on the Bankside, Southwark, between Emerson St. and Moss Alley. The site was long marked by C.-Cap Alley. The name may have been given in honour of Cardinal Beaufort, Bp. of Winchester, whose Lond. palace was on Bankside. Taylor, Works ii. 173, denies the charge that had been made against him that he had been bribed by the players and had had a supper with them "at the C. H. on the Bankside."

CARDIS. See CADIZ.

CAREFUX. See CARFAX.

CARENTIGNE (CARENTAN). A maritime town of Normandy, in the department of La Manche, 14 m. N.W. of St. Lo and 160 W. of Paris. In Ed. III iii. 3, Prince Edward reports, "Some of their strongest cities we have won, As Harflew, Lo, Crotay, and C." This was in 1346. The town had a strong castle, but it surrendered after 2 days' siege, and was destroyed by the English.

CARFAX. From the Latin quadri-furcus, a place where 4 roads meet, especially the centre of a town where the 2 main sts. cross. It is particularly applied to the point in Oxford where the High St. is intersected by St. Aldates and the Corn Market. The intersection of Leadenhall St. and Bishopsgate, Lond., was also called Carfukes. In Abington iii. 2, Barnes sends word to Francis and Moll Barnes to go to Oxford; and says, "At C., boy, I mean to meet them." In Cuckqueans i. 3, Pearle says, "The word Finis, being cut in the waist, is Fine is, which, Carfox way, may indifferently be alluded to my mother, to my self, to my wife, as also, most adaptly, to this my bowl now." Carfox way means in 4 directions. In Seven Days iv., Sunday says, "Some men's hard lucks In Wednesday market lost their purse at Carefux." The scene is in Oxford. Executions were carried out there. In Scot. Presb. ii. 1, Priscilla says, "I will not . . . send [my son] to Oxford, send him to Cairfax rather, and see him caper in a string." Rabelais, Pantagruel ii. 10, speaks of "the Carrefours" of Paris, meaning the places where the main streets intersected.

CARIA. A dist. in S.W. Asia Minor. Artemisia, the valiant Q. of C., accompanied Xerxes to the battle of Salamis with 5 vessels. In Jonson's Queens, "chaste Artemisia, the Cn. dame," figures as one of the famous queens of times long gone. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 5, Pompey eulogizes his wife Cornelia as "far more loving than the Charian Q. That drank her husband's never-sundered heart." The reference is to Artemisia, the wife of the Cn. K. Mausolus. She is said to have mixed the ashes of his body with her daily drink; and she built the famous Mausoleum at Halicarnassus in his memory. She reigned 352-350 B.C. Mausolus is one of the interlocutors in T. Heywood's Dialogues xiii., and is addressed, "O Carion." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome ii., says, "Mausolus' work will be the Cns.' glory." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit 47, speaks of "that river in C. which turneth those that drink of it to stones." On page 145 he mentions "the stone that groweth in the river of C., the which the more it is cut the more it increaseth."

CARIBDIS. See CHARYBDIS.

CARIMANIA. See CARMANIA.

CARLEGION. Intended for the old name of Chester, Caer Leon Gawr, i.e. the city of the Great Legion. This the English made into Leganceaster, and it was finally cut down to Chester: often distinguished as W. Chester (see CHESTER). Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 5, says, "C. Chester vaunts her holy Dee."

CARLINGFORD. A spt. town on E. coast of Ireland in Co. Louth, abt. 50 m. N. of Dublin and 10 m. E. of Dundalk. Dundalk was attacked by the rebel Shane O'Neill in 1566 and, according to Stucley, Stucley played a large part in its defence, but it is doubtful whether he remained in Ireland after 1565. In the play the attack on Dundalk is described; and in line 885 O'Neale says, "Fan [i.e. when] O'Cane and Magennis come from C., we will enter lustily the town" (sc. Dundalk).

CARLISLE. The capital of Cumberland, on the Eden, 301 m. N.W. of Lond. It is a bishop's see, and the cathedral dates from the time of Henry I. In R2 iii. 3, 30, Percy, in a list of those who are supporting Richd., says there is "besides a clergyman Of holy reverence; who, I cannot learn." Northumberland says, "Belike it is the Bp. of C." In iv., the Bp. of C. alone protests against the usurpation of the throne by Bolingbroke; whereupon Northumberland arrests him for capital treason. In v. 6, 24, Bolingbroke permits him to go into retirement, "For though mine enemy thou hast ever been, High sparks of honour in thee have I seen." This was Thomas Merkes, who became bp. in 1397. He alone of the lords stood by Richd., and was committed to the Tower, but he was released and pardoned in 1400 "on account of the excellence of his character." The Countess Elinor of C. is mentioned in Greene's James IV i. 3. There was, however, no Earl of C. between the execution of Sir Andrew Harcla, 1st Earl, in 1323, and the creation of James Hay in 1622. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 24, says that Cairleill was built by "k. Leill," an ancient K. of Britain.

CARMANIA

CARMANIA (or CARIMANIA). A province of Asia on the N.E. side of the Persian Gulf. It corresponds to the S.E. corner of modern Persia, and the name is preserved in the town of Kerman. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, Callipinus is proclaimed "Emperor of Natolia . . . C. and all the 130 kingdoms late contributory to his mighty father." In Suckling's Aglaura iv. 1, Ziriff says, "The prince does intend to join with C."

CARMARDEN. See CAERMARTHEN.

CARMEL. The mtn. range terminating in the headland of C., on the W. coast of Palestine, on the S. of the Bay of Acre. It is chiefly remembered as the scene of the contest between Elijah and the priests of Baal, related in I Kings xviii. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 2, 155, an Angel, having carried Oseas through the air to Nineveh, says, "So was Elias rapt within a storm, And set upon Mt. C. by the Lord." There is nothing in the Biblical account to suggest this legend. In Milton, P. L. xii. 144, Michael points out to Adam "on the shore, Mt. C." as the W. boundary of the territories of Israel.

CARNARVONSHIRE. A county in N.W. Wales. It is very mountainous, and only one-third of the land is capable of cultivation. The chief peak is Snowdon. The capital is Carnarvon, on the Menai Straits, 235 m. N.W. of Lond. The castle was built by Edward I (1283-1293), and Edward II, Prince of Wales, was born there. In H8 ii. 3, 48, when Anne Bullen swears, "I would not be a queen for all the world," the old lady replies: "In faith, for little England you'd venture an emballing; I myself would for C.": the point being the poverty of the county. In Peele's Ed. 1, p. 49, Elinor asks that her young son may be "In Carnarvon christened royally." "Then," says the K., "Edward of Carnarvon shall he be, Born Prince of Wales." Earlier in the same play (p. 23), the Harper predicts, "When the weather-cock of Carnarvon steeple shall engender young ones in the belfry . . . Then shall Brute be born anew And Wales record their ancient hue." Apparently this is a riddling reference to the birth of the Prince of Wales there. In Jonson's Wales, Evan says of the old man who has been representing Atlas, "He is caull now Craigereri, a mtn. in Carnarvanseere."

CARNON. A mtn. range in Servia, near Belgrade, S. of the Danube, near the ancient city of Carnuntum. The huge underground reservoirs of Constantinople, known as the palace of the roof pillars, and the Subterranean Palace, were supplied with water from these hills. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, Bajazeth, who is besieging Constantinople, sends pioneers to "Cut off the water that by leaden pipes Runs to the city from the mtn. C."

CARPATHUS. An island in the Ægean, between Crete and Rhodes, some 50 m. N.E. of Crete, now called Skarpanto. Proteus, the seer and shepherd of Neptune's flocks, had a cave sacred to him in C. In Milton's Comus 872, Proteus is referred to as "the Carpathian wizard." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iv., Temperance speaks of "lampreys' guts fetched from Carpathian streights" as amongst the luxuries which foster gluttony. Pliny, Nat. Hist. ix. 29, speaks of the Scarus, or lamprey, being found abundantly in the Carpathian Sea.

CARPEIAN. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Anthony swears by "the overburning [i.e. everburning] fires of Vesta and C. towers of Jove." The reference is obviously to the Capitol, and I am satisfied that C. is a misprint for Tarpeian. One of the old names of the hill was the Tarpeian Hill.

CARTHAGE

CARRARA. A town and dist. close to the W. coast of Italy, some 200 m. N.W. of Rome, in the old Duchy of Modena. It has been famous from Roman times for the white marble which is quarried from the lower ridges of Monte Sagro. In Davenant's Wits iv., Engine speaks of "snails taken from the dewy marble quarries of C."

CARREBD. See CHARYBDIS.

CARTAGENA. A spt. on the N.W. coast of S. America, in New Granada. Its fine harbour is formed by 2 islands extending along the coast and protecting it like a natural breakwater. In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Nombre de Dios, C., Hispaniola with Cuba by Drake were ravished." Drake sacked Nombre de Dios in 1572, and the other places named in 1585.

CARTER LANE. A st. in Lond. running W. from the corner of Old Change and Cannon St. to Water Lane. The 1st quarto of Henry V (1600) was "Printed by Thomas Creede for Tho. Millington and John Busby. And are to be sold at his house in C. L., next the Powle Head." The Paul's Head was at the corner of Sermon L. and Carter L. One of Tarlton's Jestes (1611) begins, "In C. L. dwelt a merry cobbler." Richd. Quiney addressed a letter to Shakespeare "from the Bell in C. L., the 25 October, 1598."

CARTERTON. An alleged vill. in Sussex; but the name is obviously invented for the occasion. In Nabbes' C. Garden i. 2, Ralph says that his master's name may be found in the church-register at "C. in the Co. of Sussex"; and that he is the son of Rowland Dungworth of Dirlall Farm.

CARTHAGE (Cn. = Carthaginian). An ancient Phœnician city on what is now the Bay of Tunis on the N. coast of Africa. It was founded, according to tradition, by Dido, who fled thither from Tyre to escape from her brother Pygmalion, who had murdered her husband. The Roman legends told how Æneas, after the capture of Troy by the Greeks, was driven by a storm to C. and was warmly welcomed by Dido, who bore him a son. In obedience to the gods, however, he left her and proceeded to Italy, and she in despair burnt herself to death on a funeral pyre as his ships departed. Her sister and confidant, Anna, followed Æneas to Italy and, becoming the object of his wife Lavinia's jealousy, drowned herself in the Numicius and was afterwards worshipped as Anna Perenna. C. became the leading commercial city of the Mediterranean, and during the 5th cent. B.C. made herself mistress of Sardinia, Corsica, Sicily (where she came into conflict with the Greek colonies and was defeated by Timoleon 343 B.C.), and the Balearic Islands, and founded colonies in Spain. In 264 B.C. she came into conflict with Rome, and the 1st Punic war lasted with varying fortune, but on the whole favourably to Rome, until 241. In 218 the 2nd Punic war began with the invasion of Italy by Hannibal, who conquered the Romans at the battles of Lake Trasimene and Cannæ, but was finally driven from Italy. Scipio then carried the war into Africa, and finished it by the victory of Zama in 202. In Temp. ii. 1, 72, Adrian, referring to the recent marriage of the K.'s daughter to the K. of Tunis, says, "Tunis was never graced before With such a paragon to their queen." "Not," says Gonzalo, "since widow Dido's time."—"She was of C.," replies Adrian, "not of Tunis"; to which Gonzalo responds, "This Tunis, Sir, was C." In M. N. D. i. 1, 173, Hermia swears, "By that fire which burned the C. queen When the false Trojan under sail was seen." In Merch. v. 1, 12, Lorenzo says, "In such a night Stood Dido with a willow in her hand Upon the wild sea banks, and waft her love To come again to C." In Shrew i. 1, 159, Lucentio says to Tranio, "Thou art to me as secret and as dear As Anna to the Q. of C. was." Chaucer tells the story of Dido in Leg. Fair Women 924, and refers to it in House of Fame i. 221. Marlowe makes it the subject of a tragedy (Dido, Queen of C.). Jonson, in Tub, has a woman called Dido Wispe, whom in i. 2 Puppy refers to ironically as "brave C. queen!" In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 173, Rodomant says that Orlando "Skipped from his country as Anchises' son And means, as he did to the C. queen, To pay her ruth and ruin for her loss." In B. & F. Maid's Trag. ii. 2, Aspatia speaks of "The C. queen when from a cold sea-rock Full with her sorrows, she tied fast her eyes To the fair Trojan ships." In Shirley's Venice iii. 4, Thomazo, referring to Rosabella, the hostess of the inn, says, "Drink, whilst I embrace my queen of C.," i.e. Dido.

Historical references. In Massinger's Bondman, the scene is laid in Syracuse in 343 B.C., when Timoleon delivered Syracuse from the attacks of the Cns. In i. 1, Leosthenes assures Timagoras, "The thundering threats of C. fright not me." In iii. 3, Graculo dresses Asotus as an ape, and asks him, "What for the Cns.?" —whereupon Asotus "makes moppes." Apes were trained to show contempt for Spain, or the Turk, or the Pope, by refusing to come aloft, or by making grimaces, when they were mentioned. Probably Massinger meant this play to be more or less significant of existing political conditions: Spain is intended by C., and Gisco the Admiral represents the D. of Buckingham. Marlowe's Faustus prol. opens: "Not marching now in fields of Thrasimene Where Mars did mate the Cns. . . . Intends our Muse to vaunt his heavenly verse." Mate is used in the sense of match, not defeat; for Marlowe cannot have been ignorant that the Cns. were the victors at L. Trasimene 217 B.C. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 1, Cæsar's Ghost speaks of Hannibal as "the stout Cn. lord, The fatal enemy to the Roman name." In Brandon's Octavia 115, Octavia says of her husband Marcellus, "Proud C. knows, his youthful sword did pay Large tributes of their souls to Stygian lake." This is an absurd confusion between the great M. Claudius Marcellus, who fought against Hannibal in the 2nd Punic war and was killed in battle 208 B.C., and C. Claudius Marcellus, the husband of Octavia, who died about 41 B.C. Sir P. Sidney, in Sonnet, My Mistress Lowers, says, "If e'er my face with joy be clad, Think Hannibal did laugh when C. lost." In Milton, P. R. iii. 35, the Tempter tells our Lord that, before he was his age, "young Scipio had brought down The Cn. pride." Scipio took command against C. in Spain when he was 24, and gained his surname Africanus when he was 33. In Massinger's Actor i. 3, Paris, defending the stage, points out the stimulating effect of an actor showing "Scipio, After his victories imposing tribute On conquered C." In Machin's Dumb Knight i. 1, Phylacles thinks that "Cæsar's Pharsalia nor Scipio's C." were worthy of chariots of triumph. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Cæsar quotes Scipio Africanus as saying, "Let pity then move us to rue no traitorous C. fall." In Skelton's Magnificence, Fancy speaks of "Typpo, that noble C. wan." Typpo is a misprint for Scipio. Scene I of Massinger's Believe is laid in the neighbourhood of C. about 190 B.C., after the defeat of Antiochus the Gt. by the Romans at Magnesia. The play begins: "You are now in sight of C., that great city, Which in her empire's vastness rivals Rome." Amilcar, Prince of the Cn. Senate, and 3 other senators take part in the play.

Chaucer refers to the final destruction of C. in 146 B.C., when Hasdrubal killed himself and his wife and children flung themselves into the flames of his funeral pyre. In Nun's Priest's Tale B. 4555, he tells how the hen shrieked when the fox carried off Chaunticleer, "Ful louder than dide Hasdrubales wyf Whan that the Romayns hadde brend Cartage." In F. 1399, he says, "What shal I seyn of Hasdrubales wyf That at Cartage birafte hirself hir lyf?" In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline boasts that he will do "what the Gaul or Moor could ne'er effect, Nor emulous C.," i.e. destroy Rome. In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero says, "C. and Sicily we have subdued." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier i. 1, Hubert brings the news that he has taken "Eugenius, bp. of C.," and later his martyrdom is related. This is all wrong: Eugenius was Bp. of C. 2 years after the death of Genserich, who is here represented as his persecutor; and he died in Gaul A.D. 505. In Chapman's Cæsar i. 2, 275, Cæsar tells of one so clear-sighted that from Sicily he "could discern the Cn. navy And number them distinctly leaving harbour, Though full a day and night's sail distant." Plutarch is the authority for this impossible story. The scenes of Marlowe's Dido, Marston's Sophonisba, and Act IV of Nabbes' Hannibal are laid at C.

CARTHAGENA (the ancient CARTHAGO NOVA). A spt. in Spain, on the coast of Murcia, 240 m. S.E. of Madrid. It was founded by the Carthaginians 242 B.C., and was taken by Scipio 211 B.C.: the fortress was supposed to be impregnable, but Scipio surprised it by marching his troops over the shallows laid bare by the ebbing tide. It is one of the finest harbours in Spain, and was the headquarters of the Spanish plate-fleet, which came and went annually to the W. Indies for tribute to Spain. In Tiberius 1109, Germanicus says, "The elder African [i.e. Scipio Africanus Major] in Spaine By ebbing Thetis scarred Carthage walls." In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 767, Marsilius, who is represented as K. of Spain, says to Mandrecarde, "Mine shall honour thee And safe conduct thee to Port Carthagene." In Shirley's Heir v. 4, Alfonso, who has come to help to restore Ferdinand to the throne of Murcia, says, "We had command To steer our course by sea to C." In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 333, the D. of Medina says, "Non sufficit orbis, our proud Spanish motto, By the English mocked, and found at Carthagen, Shall it not now take force?" In Davenant's Rutland, p. 221, the Parisian compares Moorfields with its acres of old linen hung out to dry with "the fields of C. when the 5 months' shifts of the whole fleet are washed and spread," i.e. on the return of the plate-fleet from America.

CARVENOW (probably CARMENOW). A manor in the parish of Mawgan, in S.E. Cornwall, abt. 7 m. S.W. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. iii. 94, Pilate gives "C." to the gaoler for his good service.

CASBIN (or CASBEEN, i.e. KAZVIN). An important city in Persia, 90 m. N.W. of Teheran. It was made the capital by Tahmasp (1524-1576), and remained so till Shah Abbas removed the seat of government to Ispahan early in the 17th cent. In 1598 Sir Anthony and Robert Sherley visited C. and were warmly welcomed by Abbas. Robert remained there in the service of the Shah, but he fell out of favour through the machinations of Haly Beg and died in C. in 1628. His adventures, and those of his 2 brothers, are the subject of Day's Travails. In

i. 1, Sir Anthony and Robert are welcomed with "a peal of shot, The like till now was never heard in C." Milton, P. L. x. 426, describes the retreat of the Bactrian Sophi (i.e. the Shah of Persia) from the Turks "To Tauris or C."

CASIUS (now EL KATIEH or RAS-EL-KASARON). A sand-hill on the coast of Egypt, abt. 50 m. E. of Port Said. Milton, P. L. ii. 593, describes the Serbonian Bog (i.e. L. Tanais) as lying "Betwixt Damiatra and Mount C. old."

CASPIA. In Chapman's Blind Beggar ix., Clearchus says to Ptolemy, "Your bands in Memphis and in C., joined with your power of Alexandria, Will double all the forces of these kings." The context seems to show that some city or dist. in Egypt is meant: possibly Casium, which lies just E. of Pelusium at the foot of Mt. Casius, where Pompey was buried. See CASIUS.

CASPIAN. The largest inland sea of Asia, between the Black Sea and the Sea of Aral. It derived its name from the Caspii, who lived on its S.E. shores, in the dist. called Caspia. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Cosroes is crowned Emperor of Asia and "chief Lord of . . . the ever-raging C. Lake." The word is used a little earlier in the Act for a very remote place: "Allegiance," says Mycetes, "is fled to the C. or the Ocean main." In ii. 3, Tamburlaine speaks of the "craggy rocks of Caspia." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says that Alexander, "Through Hydaspis and the C. waves His praise did propagate." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 7, 14, speaks of the evils endured by the man "Who swelling sails in C. sea doth cross" for the sake of wealth. Milton, P. L. ii. 716, describes a thunderstorm "when two black clouds With heaven's artillery fraught, come rattling on Over the C." In P. R. iii. 271, he mentions "Araxes and the C. Lake" as the bounds of the Assyrian Empire. Fuller, Church Hist. ii. 11, 43, describes certain scholars as "like the C. Sea, receiving all and having no outlet."

CASSIANS. The Cassi, a British tribe living in the basin of the Thames, possibly in Bucks., Beds., and Herts., where the hundred of Cashio and Cashibury, close to Watford, may preserve their name. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Mandubratius says to Cæsar, "By me the Trinobants submit and C." See Cæsar B. G. v. 21.

CASTALIA. A spring at the foot of Mt. Parnassus, close to Delphi, dedicated to the Muses, and hence supposed to impart poetic inspiration to anyone who drank of its waters. In Barnes' Charter i. 2, a Gentleman says, "We poets Which in Cn. fountains dipped our quills, Are forced of men's impiety to plain." T. Heywood, in Hierarchie of Blessed Angels B. 4, says, "Famous Jonson, though his learned pen He dipt in Castaly, is still but Ben." In Brewer's Lovesick King ii., Thornton says, "I'll sit down and write, sweet Helicon inspire me with thy Cn. luck!" On the title page of Venus and Adonis, Shakespeare put the couplet from Ovid Am. I. xv. 35, "Viliu miretur vulgus; mihi flavus Apollo Pocula C. plena ministret aqua." In Jonson's Poetaster i. 1, Luscius asks Ovid, "Why, young master, you are not Cn. mad, ha?" i.e. poetry mad; and in iii. 1, Crispus speaks of the city ladies sitting "in every shop, like the Muses offering you the Cn. dew and the Thespian liquors." Spenser, in Ruines of Time 431, says of Achilles, "But that blind bard did him immortal make With verses, dipt in dew of Castalie." Nash, in Some-what to Read (1591), says to the Countess of Pembroke, "Thou only . . . keepest the springs of C. from being dried up." Herrick, in Farewell to Sack (1647), calls the Muses "Those thrice three Cn. sisters." The name was also applied to a spring which watered the grove of Apollo at Daphne, in Syria, close by Antioch (see Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. xxxiii, note 106). Milton, P. L. iv. 274, denies that "that sweet grove Of Daphne, by Orontes and the inspired Cn. spring," could vie with the beauties of the Garden of Eden.

CASTEL-BLANCO. There are several places in Spain so called. This particular one must be sought in the neighbourhood of Osuna and Seville. In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo calls himself "master Bailly of C.-B.," and immediately afterwards speaks of "master Dean of Seville, our neighbour."

CASTILE, Sp. CASTILLA (Cn. = Castilian). One of the ancient kingdoms of Spain, so called from the forts, or castillos, built on its borders by Alfonso I to defend it from the Moors. It occupies the N. and central parts of the peninsula. At first a province of the kingdom of Leon, it was erected into a separate kingdom in 1033, and in 1037 was united to Leon. In 1212 the Moors were driven out of it into S.W. Spain, and the dist. recovered from them was distinguished as New C., the N. portion being Old C. In 1469 Isabella of C. married Ferdinand of Aragon, and the united kingdoms became the kingdom of Spain. In Greene's Friar iv., the K. of C. is entertained in England by Henry III. This was Ferdinand III, the Saint, whose daughter Elinor married our Edward I. There are many allusions to her Spanish origin in Peele's Ed. I. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight relates that "Fat Sanctius, k. of C., was killed by an herb, taken to make him lean, which old Corduba, k. of Morocco, counselled his fear to." Sanctius is Sancho III (1283-1295) and old Corduba is Mahomet Mir Almir, or Miramoline (1272-1302). In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 50, Lancaster says, "Why, the proud Castillyan, Where John of Gaunt writes king and sovereign, Would not throw off their vile and servile yoke By treachery so base." John of Gaunt assumed the title of K. of C. after his marriage with the daughter of Pedro the Cruel, but the throne was actually occupied by Henry of Trastámara. In Kyd's Span. Trag. there is a Cyprian, D. of C., whom the king addresses as "my loving brother of C.," and after his death laments him as the heir to his throne, "That Spain expected after my decease." In Act I Hieronymo says that "John of Gaunt . . . came to Spain And took our K. of C. prisoner." This is not true. A D. of C. also appears in the dumbshow at the beginning of Jeronimo. In Webster's Malfi ii. 5, the Cardinal, in conversation with Ferdinand, D. of Calabria, says, "Shall our blood, The royal blood of Aragon and C., Be thus attainted?" This was Ferdinand V, who in 1498 became K. of Naples. He died in 1516. The supposed date of the play is given in ii. 3, as 1504. In Stucley, 1545, Philip II of Spain speaks of his wish for many years "that Portingall And fruitful C., being one continent, Had likewise been the subject of one sceptre." This was in 1578, and in 1580 he gained his wish and added Portugal to his dominions. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy relates how Byron "did take Beaune In view of that invincible army led by the Lord great Constable of C." This was in 1595, during the wars of the League: John Ferdinand de Velasque, the Constable of C., was one of the chief commanders on the Spanish side; but he was in Lombardy and had not yet marched into France at the time when Byron took Beaune. In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says that when Drake sacked the Spanish W. Indies, "the Cn. lion began to roar." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 335, Ricaldus mentions "14 great ships of Biskey, of C.," as forming part of the Spanish Armada. In Greville's Mustapha ii. 1, Achmat says he is "no governor of C., No petty prince's choice whose weak dominions Make weak counsels current."

Cn. is used for Spanish. In Dekker's Fortunatus iii. 1, Insultado is called indifferently, "my Spanish prisoner" and "my Cn. prisoner." In his Shoemaker's ii. 3, Eyre says, "Firk, scour thy throat! Thou shalt wash it with Cn. liquor," i.e. Spanish wine. In Three Lords (Dods. vi. 458), Policy says, "Now, Fealty, prepare thy wits for war To parley with the proud Cns.," and again, p. 466, "With London's pomp C. cannot compare." In M. W. W. ii. 3, 34, the Host says to Caius, "Thou art a Castalion king-Urinal; Hector of Greece, my boy." Needless difficulty has been made of the word. It is clearly intended as an ironical compliment, like the Hector of Greece which follows. The K. of Spain was the wealthiest monarch in Europe; and his Court had the reputation of being the most dignified and proudest in the world. Caius is but a king-urinal, a king of physicians, but for all that he is a Cn. king, a king of the first water. In Marston's Malcontent i. 4, Malevole says to Bilioso, "Adieu, my true court-friend, farewell, my dear Castilio": where Castilio may mean a dignified courtier, or may be an allusion to Baldessar Castiglioni, the author of the Courtier. In Glapthorne's Privilege ii. 1, Adorni tells how "A Cn. was in Paris to be whipped through the sts., and, being admonished to be more swift of foot, in scorn answered he would rather be flayed alive than break a tittle of his gravity." In Cowley's Riddle iii., Alupis calls Don Hercules Alcido de Secundo "A brave Cn. name": in allusion to the high-sounding titles of the Spanish grandees.

In Tw. N. ii. 3, 34, Sir Toby says to Maria, when Sir Andrew is entering, "What, wench? Castiliano vulgo; for here comes Sir Andrew Aguecheek." It is perhaps hardly necessary to suppose that Toby meant anything at all by this exclamation, unintelligible as it stands: if something has to be made of it, Warburton's conjecture, "Castiliano volto," i.e. put on a grave Spanish countenance, is as good as any. Possibly there may be some connection with the drunkenery, "Castiliano rivo." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 6, Ithamor, in the midst of a drinking bout, cries: "Hey, Rivo-castiliano! a man's a man!" In Look about iv., it is said of a drunken man, "And Rivo will he cry and C. too." Rivo alone is found as a drunken exclamation in H4 A. ii. 4, 124: "Rivo, says the drunkard"; and in Marston's What you ii. 1, "We'll quaff or any thing; Rivo, St. Mark!" O.E.D. takes Rivo to be perhaps the Spanish Arriba (up, upwards), but it cannot be said that any satisfactory explanation of either part of the phrase has been discovered. Cn. soap was made out of olive-oil and soda, and had a great reputation. In Jonson's Devil v. 3, Meercraft instructs FitzDottrel how to feign epilepsy by foaming at the mouth; "a little castle-soap will do 't, to rub your lips." Burton, A. M. ii. 4, 3, recommends "suppositories of Cn. soap" as a purge. In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont says, "The cymbals of India call Cn. cornets forth." Why the cornet should be called Cn., I do not know.

There were 3 languages spoken in the peninsula: (1) the Catalan, spoken in the N.W., a dialect of the Langue d'Oc of S. France; (2) the Cn. in the centre, the parent of modern Spanish; (3) the Portuguese. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 2, Pedro says to Sancho, "Thy father was as brave a Spaniard as ever spake the haut Cn. tongue." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Carionil says, "My long residence in the Spanish Court hath made me speak the Cn. language perfectly." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that in the golden age "there was no Spaniard to brave his enemy in the rich and lofty Cn."

CASTLE INN. A tavern on the N. side of Paternoster Row, Lond., near the site afterwards occupied by Dolly's Coffee House, close to Queen's Head Passage. Later still it became the Oxford Bible Warehouse. The C. I. was kept at one time by Tarlton; and one of his Jests relates how 2 of his friends "foxed Tarlton [i.e. made him drunk] at the C. in Pater Noster Row." There was a C. Tavern on the N. side of Cornhill, near the R. Exchange. Davenport's New Trick was "Printed for John Okes for Humphrey Blunden and are to be sold at his shop in Cornhill next to the C. Tavern. 1639."

CASTLE INN. (1) An inn in St. Albans near which Somerset was killed in the 1st battle of St. Albans, 1455. In H6 B. v. 2, 68, Richd. apostrophizes his dead body: "So lie thou there; For underneath an alehouse' paltry sign, The C. in St. Albans, Somerset Hath made the wizard famous in his death." In H6 B. i. 4, 38, the spirit conjured up by Bolingbroke had warned Somerset, "Let him shun castles."

(2) An inn in Plymouth where Bess Bridges, the heroine of T. Heywood's Maid of West, was barmaid. "The C. needs no bush," says one of the Captains in i. 1; "her beauty draws to them more gallant customers than all the signs i' the town else." The next 2 scenes take place in front of the inn and in one of its rooms respectively.

CASTLE NOVO (i.e. CASTEL NUOVO at Naples, fronting the Largo del Castello). It is strongly fortified with a wall and ditch, and was founded in the 13th cent. by Charles of Anjou. In Webster's Law Case v. 6, the scene of which is laid at Naples, Romelio says, "Run To C. N.; this key will release A Capuchin and my mother, whom I shut into a turret."

CASTLE OF ANTWERP. A fort built on the S. of the city by the D. of Alva in 1567. Its site is now appropriated for new docks. In Larum A. 3, Danila speaks of the Spaniards as being "sole commanders of the C.," in which the scene is laid.

CASTOR AND POLLUX (TEMPLE OF). In Rome on the S.W. side of the Forum, between the Basilica Sempronia and the Temple of Vesta. It was built in 494 B.C. by Aulus Postumius, and restored in 119 B.C. by Metellus Dalmaticus and in A.D. 6 by Tiberius. Three Corinthian columns, which formed part of it, are still conspicuous. It was often used for meetings of the Senate. In Chapman's Cæsar i. 1, 48, Statilius reports, "I saw C. and P. t. thrust up full With all the damned crew" of Cæsar's agents. The next scene is laid in the Forum, before the T. of C. and P.

CATADUPES. The people living by the cataracts (Greek Katadoupoi) of the Nile in Upper Egypt. Heylyn (s.v. EGYPT) says, "In the place where this Egypt and Habassia meet is the last cataract of Nilus; which is a fall of the waters after much struggling with the rocks for passage, an incredible way down into the lower vallies. The hideousness of the noise which it maketh not only deafeth all the by-dwellers, but the hills also are torn with the sound." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 7, Memory says, "The Egyptian C. never heard the roaring of the falls of Nilus, because the noise was so familiar unto them." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. (quarto edition), Clement says, "No; we'll come a step or two lower then in style—From Catadupa and the banks of Nile Where only breeds your monstrous crocodile Now are we purposed for to fetch our style." Lodge, in Wits Miserie (1596), says, "Sien of my science in the Cata-dupe of my knowledge, I nourish the crocodile of thy conceit."

CATAIA, or CATHAY (Cia. = Cataia). The names used vaguely for China, especially N. China, in mediæval Europe. They were derived from the Khitai, the 1st of the foreign dynasties which conquered China, and which was displaced by the Nyuche in A.D. 1123. After the conquests of Jenghiz Khan and Kublai Khan in the 13th cent. C. became known in Europe through the Dominican and Franciscan missionaries, and Italian travellers and merchants, like the Polos. By the end of the 16th cent. C. had been replaced by China as the name of the country, and was mostly used in a vague sort of way for the mysterious, distant E. Heylyn (s.v. CATHAIE) says "The people are very warlike, strong in matters of action, fearless of the greatest dangers, and patient of labour and want. They are of mean stature, little eyes, sharp sight, and wear their beards thin. They are of a very good wit, dress themselves gorgeously, and fare on occasions sumptuously. They are the most honourable people of the Tartars, indifferently civil, lovers of arts both mechanical and civil." In Experience's lecture on geography in Elements, Haz. i. 32, he says, "But eastward on the sea-side A prince there is that ruleth wide, Called the Can of Catowe"; and he estimates that America, "the new lands," "from the Can of Catowes land cannot lie little past 1000 miles." In Rabelais' Pantagruel, iv. 1, the oracle of the Holy Bottle "lay near Catay in the Upper India." For the vagueness of the 17th cent. notions about C. see under CHINA.

In B. & F. Prize iv. 5, Maria says to Petruchio, "When I hear not from you once a quarter, I'll wish you in the Indies or Cataya: Those are the climes must make you." Petruchio comments, "She'll wish me out of the world anon." In their Span. Cur. ii. 1, Diego says, "Nova Hispania! and Signor Tiveria! What are these? He may as well name you friends out of Cia." In iii. 2, Lopez greets Arsenio and Milanese: "You look like travelled men; may be, some old friends that happily I have forgot; some Signors in China or Cia." Nash, in Lenten (p. 302), says of Yarmouth, "Not any where is justice soundlier ministered betwixt this and the Grand C. and the strand of Prester John." In Barry's Ram iv. 2, Smallshanks exhibits Capt. Face as a baboon, and describes him as "an outlandish beast lately brought from the land of Cia." In Brome's Antipodes i. 3, Barbara says of Peregrine, "He talks much of the kingdom of Ca., Of one great Caan, and Goodman Prester John." Milton, P. L. x. 293, describes icebergs "that stop the imagined way Beyond Petsora eastward to the rich Cian. coast," i.e. the much-sought-for N.E. passage. In P. L. xi. 388, Cambalu (Pekin) is called the "seat of the Cian. Can." One of the ingredients of Maquerelle's restorative in Marston's Malcontent ii. 4 is "amber of Cia." In Dekker's Match me ii., Bilbo says, "The musk, upon my word, Sir, is perfect Cathayne."

Cian. is used in a slang way for a sharper. In M.W.W. ii. 1, 148, Page, speaking of Nym, says, "I will not believe such a Cian., though the priest of the town commended him for a true man." In Tw. N. ii. 3, 80, Sir Toby says, "My lady's a Cian., we are politicians, Malvolio's a Peg-o-Ramsey": where the name is simply abusive. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 1, Matheo says, "Shallow knight! poor squire Tinacheo! I'll make a wild Cian. of 40 such; hang him, he's an ass, he's always sober": apparently he means that it would take 40 such fools to make one clever sharper.

CAT AND FIDDLE. The sign of a Lond. ordinary or eating-house, in Cheapside, near the Cross. In Middleton's Witch i. 2, after the stage direction, "Hecate conjures; enter a Cat playing on a fiddle, and Spirits with meat," Almachides remarks, "The C. & F. is an excellent ordinary." The nursery rhyme, "Hey diddle diddle, the cat and the fiddle," does not appear to be earlier than the 18th cent. Day, in prol. to Law Tricks, asks, "Must a musician of necessity dwell at the C. & the F.?"

CAT AND PARRETS. The sign of T. Pavier's bookshop in Cornhill, near the Exchange. The 1602 quarto of Henry V was "Printed by Thomas Creede for Thomas Pauier and are to be sold at his shop in Cornhill at the sign of the C. & P. near the Exchange." The 1602 edition of the Span. Trag. was published at the same place.

CATARYNA, SANTA. See KATHERINE'S, SAINT.

CATEATON ST. Lond., running from the junction of Old Jury and Lothbury to Lad Lane. It is now called Gresham St. Stow calls it Cat's St. The change of name was made in 1845. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv., Moll, being surprised by the watch at the corner of Bishopsgate St. and Cornhill, says to Randall, "Go you back through Cornhill, I'll run round about the Change, by the Ch. corner, down C. St., and meet you at Bartholomew Lane end." To which Randall replies, "Cat's St. was call hur?"

CATHANEA (or CATANIA). A spt. town on the E. coast of Sicily, 31 m. N. of Syracuse. In Gascoigne's Supposes ii. 1, Erostrato tells how he has persuaded a traveller from Sienna to pretend that he is "a Sicilian of C."

CATHARINE'S (SAINT) HALL. University of Cambridge, founded by Robert Woodlark in 1475. It stands on the W. side of Trumpington St., opposite Corpus Christi. James Shirley, the dramatist, was at one time a student there.

CATHARINE WHEEL. An ancient tavern in Southwark, between Union St. and Mint St., opposite St. George's Ch.: it survived until 1870. The name was corrupted into The Cat and Wheel. Taylor, in his Carriers' Cosmography, mentions the C. W. in Southwark as the lodging of the carriers from Tunbridge and other places in Kent. I suspect that it is the tavern meant by the Cat, or the Cats, in the following passages. In Brome's Northern i. 5, Pate asks, "Where's the supper? at the Bridgefoot or the Cat?" In his Moor iv. 2, Quicksands mentions "the Bridgefoot Bear, the Tunnes, the Cats, the Squirrels" as taverns frequented by his wife and her gallant.

CATHARINE WHEEL. The sign of Thomas Creed's bookshop in Thames St., Lond. The Tragedy of Selimus was "Printed by Thomas Creede, dwelling in Thames ste. at the signe of the Kathern Wheele neare the olde Swanne. 1594."

CATHAY. See CATAIA.

CATHERIA. Possibly CATHÆA is meant, a dist. in the Punjab, between the Ravee and the Gharra, whose capital was Sangala, now Lahore. In Day's Travels, Bullen, p. 50, the Grand Turk Ahmed I says, "Are we not Hamath, Soldan and Emperor of Babilon, of C., Ægypt, Antioche?"

CATHERINE'S (SAINT) CREE. A ch. in Lond. on N. side of Leadenhall St. It was built about 1300, but was pulled down, all but the tower, in 1628 and rebuilt. Holbein is said to have been buried here. The churchyard was used in the Middle Ages for the acting of morality plays. In 1565 there is a record of 27/8 being paid by the players for the right to act there.

CATHNESIA. See CAITHNESS.

CATOMPYLON. See HECATOMPYLOS.

CATTI (or CHATTI). A German tribe inhabiting the modern Hessen, which preserves their name. Germanicus, in his campaigns of A.D. 15 and 16, destroyed their capital Mattium, but they were never reduced to permanent submission. Domitian at the beginning of his reign conducted 2 campaigns in Germany, and celebrated a triumph over the C. and Dacii on his return to Rome, but his alleged victories were without any result. In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Latinus says, "'Tis frequent in the city he [Domitian] hath subdued The C. and the Daci, and, ere long, The second time will enter Rome in triumph." In Tiberius 1156, Germanicus says, "Of stiff-necked Chatti, never yet controlled, An hundred thousand perished in one field."

CATWADE (or CATTWADE). A small vill. just at the head of the estuary of the Stour in the parish of Brantham, in Suffolk. Amongst the holy places visited by the Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. is "the great God of Katewade." I think that we should read "rod," or "rood," for "God," and that there was a rood or cross at C., though I have not been able to find any other record of its existence.

CAUCASUS. The well-defined range of mtns. running from the Black Sea to the Caspian, and forming the boundary at that point between Europe and Asia. The central part of the range is lofty, and most of the peaks rise above the limit of perpetual snow. The highest peak is Elburz (18,526 ft.). Æschylus introduced the C. into literature by making it the scene of the sufferings of Prometheus, who was chained to a cliff there whilst his liver was daily devoured by a vulture: his crime being that he had stolen fire from heaven to bestow it on men. In Tit. ii. 1, 17, Tamora is "Faster bound to Aaron's charming eyes Than is Prometheus tied to C." In Jonson's Catiline iii. 1, Catiline says of Cethegus, "This man, If all our fire were out, would fetch down new Out of the hand of Jove; and rivet him To C., should he but frown; and let His own gaunt eagle fly at him, to tire." In Richards' Messalina v. 1, 2076, the Emperor speaks of suffering "Tortures no less than if on C. We were exposed, a never-dying prey, To the eagle's beak." In Peele's Ed. i. iv., Lluellen speaks of "The chains that Mulciber erst made To tie Prometheus' limbs to C." In Lochrine v. 4, 191, Guendoline talks of Titius, i.e. the Titan Prometheus, "bound to houseless C." Constable, in Diana (1594) v. 10, 4, speaks of "Prometheus . . . Bound fast to C.'s low foot beneath." In Mason's Mulleasses 2349, Mulleasses says, "If on C. My growing liver were exposed a prey To ravening vultures, I still would laugh."

In R2 i. 3, 295, Bolingbroke asks, "Who can hold a fire in his hand By thinking on the frosty C.?" In Stucley 2352, Muly Hamet speaks of the teeth of his queen as "More white Than Caucas frosty clots." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 105, advises the lover: "If thou be as hot as the mt. Ætna, feign thyself as cold as the hill C." In Marlowe's Dido v., Dido says to the faithless Æneas, "Thou art sprung from Scythian C. And tigers of Hyrcania gave thee suck." In his Ed. II v. 5, Edward says to Lightborn, "Thy heart, were it hewn from the C., Yet will it melt." In Nero i. 4, Scævinius says that, compared with Nero, "The inhospitable C. is mild." In Selimus 1236, Zonara says to Acomat, "Thou wast born in desert C. And the Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck": a couplet filched from Marlowe (see above). In Brandon's Octavia 2119, Octavia says, "O Antony, some cruel C. Did thee begot." Barnes, in Parthenophil lxxv. 10, asks Cupid, "Was craggy C. thy crabbed sire?" In the old Timon iv. 1, Timon prays, "Mt. C. Fall on my shoulders, so on them it fall!" In Fisher's Fuinus iv. 1, Cæsar begs Mars to utter a roar, "Which C. may as a catch repeat." Burton, A. M. ii. 3, 1, 1, says, "You may as soon remove Mt. C. as alter some men's affections." In Lochrine ii. 5, 44, Albanact says, "I'll over-run the mtn. C. Where fell chimæra in her triple shape Rolleth hot flames from out her monstrous paunch." The Chimæra was not associated with C., but with Mt. Chymæra in Lycia, q.v. In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Deianeira professes that she would feel safe in the arms of Hercules, even were she attacked by "Those rude bears that breed in C." Milton, P.R. iii. 318, mentions troops from "the Hyrcanian cliffs Of C." When Chaucer, C. T. D. 1140, uses the phrase "Betwix this and the mt. of Kaukasus" he means to include all possibilities of place.

CAUX. A dist. in France at the mouth of the Seine. The chief town is Caudebec, on the Seine, abt. 30 m. E. of Havre. Drayton, in Ode XII on Agincourt (1606) 6, says, "At C., the mouth of Seine, With all his martial train Landed K. Harry."

CAYRO. See CAIRO.

CAYSTER. A river in Asia Minor, in the S. of Lydia, flowing W. from Mt. Tmolus to the Ægean Sea close to Ephesus. The flats in its lower course were known as the Asian Plain, or Caystri Campus, and were famous for swans and other wild fowl that abounded there. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1924, Thisbe says, "The white Caistran bird to me did yield." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander, "Shalt sleep upon a bed of purest down Driven from white necks of C.'s swans."

CAZATES. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles, describing his African expedition, says, "I marched along the r. Nile to Machda [i.e. Magdala, in Abyssinia]; From thence unto C. did I march Where Amazonians met me in the field . . . And with my power did march to Zanzibar." Evidently C. must be looked for somewhere between Magdala and Zanzibar: Kazeh, which lies some 200 m. S. of the Victoria Nyanza Lake and 400 m. from the coast of Zanzibar, may be the place intended. It is also known as Unyanyembe.

CECROPIA. An ancient name for Athens, derived from the tradition that its citadel was built by Cecrops. In Peele's Alcazar i. 2, 85, the Moor cries, "Roll on, my chariot wheels . . . till I be safely set in shade Of some un haunted place . . . there To sick [i.e. to sicken] as Envy at C.'s gate." See Ovid, Metam. ii. 775.

CECUBUM. See CÆCUBUS AGER.

CELÆNÆ. A city of Phrygia, in a cave near which the r. Marsyas had its source. The Meander also rose at Celænæ. Legend said that Apollo hung up the skin of Marsyas in this cave, and that it moved in rhythm with the sounds of Phrygian music, but not when music appropriate to Apollo was sounded. Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 321, says, "The Phrygian harmony being moved to the Celænes it maketh a great noise, but being moved to Apollo it is still and quiet."

CELTIBERIA. Properly the central dist. of Spain, but also loosely applied to the whole country. In Jonson's Neptune, written to celebrate the return of Prince Charles and Buckingham from their fruitless wooing of the Spanish Infanta in 1623, he says, "The mighty Neptune late did please to send His Albion forth through C." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 5, one of the minor characters is Lucius, who describes himself as "A prince amongst the Cns."

CELTIS. Applied by the Greeks and Romans to the inhabitants of ancient Gaul and other kindred tribes. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 2, Cassius says, "Brutus, thou hast commanded The feared C. and Lusitanian horse," i.e. the Gaulish and Portuguese cavalry. In Milton, Comus 60, Comus is described as "Roving the Celtic and Iberian fields," i.e. the plains of Gaul and Spain. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 5, calls Gaul "the Celtick mainland," and in ii. 10, 29, speaks of Codelia's husband as "Aggannip of Celtica." Milton, P. L. i. 121, says that the old Greek gods fled with Saturn "over Adria to the Hesperian fields And o'er the Celtic [sc. region, i.e. Gaul] roamed the utmost isles."

CEMONIAN. See GEMONIES.

CENIMAGNIANS. The Cenimagi, a British tribe, by some identified with the Icenii. They lived in Suffolk and Norfolk. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Mandubratius says to Cæsar, "By me the Trinobants submit And C." See Cæsar B. G. v. 21.

CEPHISSUS. A r. of Attica, now the Sarandaforo, rising in Mt. Cithæron and flowing past Eleusis into the N. end of the Saronic Gulf. The river-god was said to have been the father of Narcissus. Spenser, F. Q. i. 11, 30, speaking of the Well of Life, says, "Ne can Cephise, nor Hebrus, match this well." In iii. 2, 44, Britomart says, "I, fonder than Cephisus' foolish child, Who, having viewed in a fountain sheer His face, was with the love thereof beguiled."

CERAUNIA (or CERANNIA); ACROCERAUNIA, q.v. In Marlowe's Dido i., Æneas reminds his followers that they have overpassed "The Cyclops' shelves and grim C.'s seat." In Loorine iii. 6, 30, Humber curses the sea "that did not rive my ships Against the rocks of high C."

CERES. See SERES.

CESILL. See SICILY.

CESTUS. See SESTOS.

CEUTA (the ancient SEPTUM). A spt. in Morocco, on a peninsula opposite to Gibraltar. It was taken from the Moors by the Portuguese in 1415, and from them it passed to the Spanish in 1580, to whom it still belongs. In Stucley 2461, Abdelmelek mentions "Aginer, Zahanra, C., Penon, Melilla" as towns in Africa held by the Portuguese.

CHÆRONEA. A town in ancient Boeotia, which commanded the entrance from Phocis, and so became the scene of many battles. It was 25 m. N.W. of Thebes.

The most famous of the battles was that in which Philip of Macedon defeated the united forces of the Athenians and Boeotians in 338 B.C., and so destroyed the liberties of Greece. Isocrates, the orator, died soon after this battle. Milton, Sonn. to Margaret Ley 7, says, "that dishonest victory At C., fatal to liberty, Killed with report that old man eloquent."

CHALCEDON. A city of Bithynia at the entrance of the Pontus, opposite to Byzantium, some 2 m. S. of the present Scutari. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight enumerates amongst dainties for the table "The pelamis which some call summer-whiting, From C." Strabo and Pliny both speak of the shoals of pelamys which pass through the Bosphorus; but they add that a white rock at C. frightened them across to Byzantium, the fishermen of which made a great profit out of them. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Maharball says of Capua, "Here we are feasted With Cian. tunny."

CHALCOT. A suburb of Lond., N. of Regent's Park. corrupted into Chalk Farm. Upper C. was at Haverstock Hill, and Lower C. has left its name on C. Cresc. and Chalk Farm Rd. The old Chalk Farm Tavern, the modern representative of which stands at 89 Regent's Park Rd., was a well-known resort for Londoners in the 18th cent., and many duels were fought there. In Jonson's Tub i. 1, "Diogenes Scriben, the great writer of C.," is a member of the "Council of Finsbury," who have joined together in order to find a husband for Awdrey, the daughter of the High Constable of Kentish Town.

CHALDÆA. Originally the district to the W. and N. of the head of the Persian Gulf, where the Kaldæ were settled. In the later books of the O.T. the Cns. mean the Babylonians, and C. the country round Babylon. Their language was partly adopted by the Jews during their captivity in Babylon, and certain parts of the books of Ezra and Daniel are in Cn. The Cns. were great students of astrology, and after the destruction of the Babylonian Empire by Cyrus the name Cn. lost its national significance and was used as a generic name for the official astrologers of the court, as in the earlier chapters of Daniel. During the earlier days of the Roman Empire the eastern astrologers and fortune-tellers who flocked to Rome were called Cns.; and so the word came to mean simply a soothsayer. The Puritans affected the study of Hebrew and Chaldee as being the sacred languages of the O.T. Chaucer, C. T. B. 3387, uses Chaldeye for Babylonia; and "Caldey, Tartare, and Inde" were among the countries visited by Hycke, p. 88. Milton, P. L. xii. 130, tells how Abraham left "Ur of Chaldea" at the Divine call (see Ur). In Darius, p. 89, Zorobabell speaks of the time "when Jerusalem was . . . by the Chaldees dejected." In Jonson's Sejanus iv. 5, Arrius says that Tiberius is "retired Into an obscure island, where he lives Amidst his route of Chaldees." Tacitus tells of the superstitious regard paid by Tiberius to the Cn. soothsayers. In Massinger's Actor iv. 1, Parthenius is commanded "with all speed to fetch in Ascleterio, the Cn., who is condemned of treason for calculating the nativity of Cæsar." In Middleton's Changeling iv. 2, Alsemero talks of "a pretty secret by a Cn. taught me." In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, Maquerelle says, "Look ye, a Cn., or an Assyrian, 'twas a most sweet Jew, told me, Court any woman in the right sign, you shall not miss." In Shirley's Sisters iii. 1, Giovanni says, "My lady hath given the Cn. her nativity, who is to give account how the stars will dispose of her." In Davenant's

Italian i. 1, Rossa says, "Thy province is C.; thy father was a Rabbi and thy aunt a Sybil." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 163, Selinthus says, "I can speak thus, Though from no Memphian priest or sage Cn." In May's Agrippina v. 87, Petronius says, "I dare swear Poppæa ere this time Has asked and heard what the Cns. say About her fortunes; our fine dames of Rome Must still be tampering with that kind of cattle." In Mayne's Match ii. 2, Baneswright promises the Puritan waiting-maid Dorcas to help her into the service of a lady who "can expound, and teaches to knit in Chaldee and work Hebrew samplers." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood, pretending to be a scholar, says to Grace, "I'll court you now in the Cn. or Arabick tongues."

CHALONS-SUR-SAÔNE. The ancient Caballinum, a city in France on the Saône, 239 m. S.E. of Paris. In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel says he left his father "at C. in Burgundy." In Wilson's Inconstant v. 3, the D. of Burgundy tells how he had a child who died "going from Chalon Castle to Besançon."

CHALYBES. A tribe who lived near the S. coast of the Black Sea in Asia Minor, a little W. of Trapezus, to the N. of the river Lycus. They worked the iron ore from the mtns. to the S. of their home, and were probably the first to supply it to the Greeks. In Milton's S. A. 133, the Chorus describes how the prowess of Samson "made useless . . . the forgery Of brazen shield and spear, the hammered cuirass, Chalybean-tempered steel, and frock of mail."

CHALYBON. A city in Syria, afterwards called Berœa, abt. 60 m. due E. of Antioch. Its wine was the chosen drink of the kings of Persia; and Plutarch De Alexandro Magni Virtute i. 5, praises Alexander for not drinking "vinum Chalybonium." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 2, 144, Byron transfers Plutarch's praise to Philip II of Spain: he did not spend his wealth on "Median luxury, Banquets and women, Calydonian wine, Nor dear Hyrcanian fishes." Either Chapman's edition of Plutarch had a different reading, or he made a slip in his transliteration.

CHAMBERY. The capital of the old Duchy of Savoy, in the valley of the Liesse, 45 m. S.W. of Geneva. In Davenant's U. Lovers iv. 4, Galeotto shows "the very sword I won in duel from the famed Da Roche I' th' vale of Chamberie."

CHAMONT (or CHAMOND). A town in France on the Rhône, near St. Etienne, abt. 260 m. S. of Paris. In Webster's Weakest ii. 1, the D. of Medina says, "Chamont shall stoop, Medina says the word."

CHAMPAGNE. A province in N.E. France on the Upper Seine, N. of Burgundy. The sparkling wine which now bears its name appears to have been introduced into England after the restoration of Charles II. The 1st reference to it by name is in Butler's Hudibras (1664). In H6 A. i. 1, 60, word is brought to Bedford that "Guienne, C., Rheims, Orleans, Paris, Guysors, Poitiers are all quite lost." In Chettle's Hoffman ii., Lorrique, disguised as a French doctor, says, "I have for tendre to your Excellence de service of one poor gentlehome of Champagne."

CHANCERY LANE. A st. in Lond., running N. from Fleet St., just E. of the New Law Courts, to Holborn. It was originally called New St.; then, during the 14th cent., Chancellors Lane, probably from Ralph Neville; then, in Elizabeth's time, it was abbreviated to C. L. In Wise Men iii. 3, Simplom tells Antonio, who has sent him to see his lawyer, "Sir, I met him in Chauncery L." In Dekker's Jests 326, one of the haunts of the foyst, or pickpocket, is "the dark entry going to the 6 clerks office in C. L." It is sometimes called The Lane par excellence. In Jonson's Devil iii. 5, Meercraft says that Lady Tailbush lives "here, hard by in the L.": the scene being in Fitzdottrel's house in Lincoln's-Inn. In iv. 5, Fitzdottrel says that Mr. Justice Eitherside is "A knight here in the L." Merlin was "sold at the Princes Arms in C. L." Marlowe's Ed. II, ed. 1612, is to be sold "By Roger Barnes at his shop in Chauncerie L. over against the Rolles." Machin's Dumb Knight, ed. 1633, is to be sold by "William Sheares at his shop in C. L. near Seriants Inn." Middleton's Quiet Life was "Printed by Tho. Johnson for Francis Kirkman and Henry Marsh and are to be sold at the Princes Arms in C. L. 1662." Bacon's Essays were "Printed for Humfry Hooper and are to be sold at the Blacke Beare in Chauncery L. 1597." T. Heywood's Hogsdon was "Printed by M. P. for Henry Shephard and are to be sold at his shop in Chancerie-L. at the sign of the Bible, between Serjeants-Inne and Fleete St. 1638."

CHANGE. See EXCHANGE.

CHANNEL. Used specifically of the sea between England and France: Fr., La Manche. In H6 B. iv. 1, 114, Suffolk says to the Capt. of the vessel, "I go of message from the Q. to France; I charge thee waft me safely cross the C." In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, the lady speaks ironically of "the dangers of the merciless C. 'twixt Dover and Calais." In Davenant's Rutland H., p. 223, the Londoner says, "I make bold to cross the C., march up to Paris." See also NARROW SEAS.

CHAPEL, THE. St. Anthony's Chapel is meant, which lies at the extremity of the N. spur of Arthur's Seat in Edinburgh. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 123, Crosse, at the siege of Leith in 1560, says of the French, "The Crag and C. They make a refuge 'gainst our great Artillery." Immediately afterwards Grey announces "The Crag and C.'s ours."

CHARBID'S (an obvious misprint for CHARYBDIS, q.v.). Barnes, in Parthenophil Elegy ix. 27, prays, "Zanclean C. me devour."

CHARING CROSS. A cross erected by Edward I in honour of his Queen, Elinor, at the vill. of C., between Lond. and Westminster. The Queen died at Herdelie, near Lincoln, in 1290, and her body was brought to Westminster for burial. Wherever the bier rested the K. set up a cross. There appear to have been 14 of these crosses, of which those at Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham alone remain, the last 2 being in Cheapside and at C. The 1st cr. at C. was of wood, but it was replaced by a fine one in Caen stone in 1294. This was destroyed by the Puritan Parliament in 1647. It stood at the W. end of the Strand, at its junction with Whitehall. The present cr. in front of the C. Cr. Station was erected in 1863 near to the original site, from a design by Barry based on drawings of the old cr. The only reference to it in Shakespeare is in H4 A. ii. 1, 27, where the Carrier at Rochester announces that he has "a gammon of bacon and 2 razes of ginger, to be delivered as far as C. cr." The origin of the Cr. is described in Peele's Ed. I. v., where the K. says, "In remembrance of her [Q. Elinor's] royalty Erect a rich and stately carved cr., Whereon her statue shall with glory shine, And henceforth see you call it C. Cr." There was a curious legend about this same Q. Elinor and C. Cr., which is dramatically rendered in the same play. Elinor is accused of having made away with the Lady Mayoress of Lond. She exclaims (p. 69), "Gape, Earth, and swallow me . . . if I were author of That woman's tragedy": she is taken at her word and sinks into the ground. Her daughter Joan cries out, "Ah, C. Green, for ever change thy hue . . . But wither and return to stones, because That beauteous Elinor sunk on thee." The engulfed Q. rises up at Potter's Hive, to the consternation of the Potter's wife, who exclaims (p. 71), "It is the Q., who sunk this day on C. Cr., and now is risen up on Potter's Hive." Potter's Hive, or Hythe, was therefore rechristened Q. Hythe, as the title of the play records. In Cartwright's Ordinary v. 4, Hearsay suggests that the fellows for whom the Watch is searching are "Sunk, like the Queen; they'll rise at Queen-hive, sure." There is a ballad on the subject in Evans' Old Ballads i. 237. In Middleton's Witch i. 1, Almachildes says to Amoretta, who refuses to kiss him, "Amsterdam swallow thee for a Puritan and Geneva cast thee up again! like she that sunk at C. Cr. and rose again at Queen-hive." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 3, Knavesby says, "I will sink at Q. Hive and rise again at C. Cr., contrary to the statute in Edwardo primo." In all the above passages C. Cr. is used proleptically, for the Cross was not erected until after Q. Elinor's death.

By the beginning of the 17th cent. the cr. had fallen into a very ruinous condition, and early in the reign of James I it was proposed to take it down, and, indeed, the different parts of it were bespoken by various people. It was not, however, till 1643 that it was finally condemned, and the actual destruction was not carried out till 1647. The author of Old Meg (p. 11) speaks of "Charing Cr. . . . losing his rotten head, which (through age being windshaken) fell off, and was trod upon in contempt." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Honey-suckle says, "They say C. Cr. is fallen down since I went to Rochelle; but that's no such wonder; 'twas old and stood awry." In Peacham's Dialogue between the Crosse in Cheap and C. Cr. (1641), C. Cr. says, "The greatest danger of all I was in was in the time of K. James." In Dekker's Satiro. iii. i. 235, Tucca calls Miniver "my mouldy decayed C. Cr." In Dekker's Dead Term (1608), Westminster laments the decay of "that ancient and oldest son of mine [C. Cr.] with his limbs broken to pieces, his reverend head cut off, the ribs of his body bruised, his arms lopped away, his back almost cleft in sunder." In Day's Law Tricks iv. 2, Jocular tells a cock-and-bull story about a dispute between Westminster and Winchester, and goes on: "In parting the fray C. cr. got such a box o' the ear that he will carry it to his death day." In Wise Men iv. 2, the Puritan wife of Hortano says of her hopeful son, "He never sees the relics of C. cr. but wisheth he were on horseback with a lance in his hand in full speed to bear it down." Taylor, Works ii. 1, has a poem on the "Dismal Downfall of Old C. Cr.," and there is a ballad on the subject in Percy's Reliques beginning, "Undone, undone the lawyers are; They wander about the town; Nor can find the way to Westminster Now C. Cr. is down." This last ballad refers to the final destruction of 1647. The equestrian statue of Charles I at the head of Whitehall is on the actual site of the old cr. It was set up just before the beginning of the Civil War, but taken down by the Parliament and sold to a brazier named Rivett to be broken up. He concealed it, however, in the vaults of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and it was re-erected in 1674.

Donne, Satire iv. (1597), speaks of "Those Ascaparts, men big enough to throw C. Cr. or a bar." In Dekker's Northward i. 2, Doll, the courtesan, says, "I'll change my lodging, it stands out o' the way; I'll lie about C. Cr., for if there be any stirrings, there we shall have 'em." In Phillips' Grisill 50, Politick Persuasion tells how he fell from heaven, "but C. Cr. was my friend and caught my leg in his hand." In Chaunticleers v., Welcome says of Bung, "He has tricks enou' to furnish all the tapsters between C. Cr. and Fleet Bdge." In Killigrew's Parson ii. 7, the Capt. says, "Any porter at C. Cr. may take you like a letter at the carrier's." Taylor, in Carriers' Cosmography, mentions the Chequers near C. Cr. as a carriers' inn.

In Day's B. Beggar iv., young Strowd says, when he is asked to go and see the motion of Norwich in the corner of a little chamber, "I had as lieve thou hadst told me C. Cr. stood in Cheapside," i.e. he does not believe it possible. In Brome's Northern ii. 5, Pate promises Humphrey, "thou shalt instantly start up as pretty a gentleman Usher as any between Temple Bar and C. Cr.; marry, further I cannot promise you." In his Antipodes i. 6, the Dr. says that foreign travel "is not near so difficult as for some man in debt and unprotected to walk from C. Cr. to th' Old Exchange." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. 225, a Spaniard kills an Englishman at C. Cr., and is sentenced by K. Philip to be hanged there. In Nobody 1145, No-body, being driven out of Fleet St. by 2 swaggerers, goes down to the Thames and "desired a waterman To row me thence away to C. Cr." In Nash's Penn. Parl. 38, it is enacted that "the images in the Temple ch., if they rise again, shall have a commission to dig down C. Cr. with their fauchions." In Shirley's Pleasure i. 2, Celestina, who lives in the Strand, intends to have her house so frequented that "the horses shall be taught, with frequent waiting upon my gates, to stop in their career toward C.-cr." In Randolph's Muses ii. 2, Deilus has seen a comet which "reached from Paul's to C." He is probably referring to Halley's comet, which was visible in 1608. In Lupton's London Carbonadoed (1632), it is predicted that when "the women are all fair and honest, then Cheapside shall stand by C. Cr." In Shakespeare's time the King's Mews, then used as stables, stood to the N. of C. Cr.; and there were shops in the neighbourhood, for in Harman's Caveat (1567) C. 12, the author speaks of a seal which he bought "beside C.-crosse," and the bookseller Robert Wyer dwelt "in St. Martin's parish in the D. of Suffolk's rents, beside Ce. Cre." (Title page of The Booke of Fortune.) Milton lived for a few months in 1649 "at one Thomson's, next door to the Bull Head Tavern at C. Cr., opening into the Spring Garden."

CHARLECOT HOUSE. The residence of Sir Thomas Lucy, who built the present mansion in 1558. It lies on the Kinton Rd., 4 m. E. of Stratford. According to the very probable legend Shakespeare got into trouble for poaching in the C. deer-park; certainly he ridiculed Sir Thomas as Justice Shallow in H4 B. and M. W. W. The house is still in the Lucy family.

CHARLTON. There are about a dozen villages of this name in the S. of England; probably one of the 2 Kentish Cs. is meant in the following passage. In S. Rowley's When You F. 1, Will Summers, when Wolsey says, "I have a quarrel to you," replies: "About your fair leman at C., my Lord; I remember."

CHARNECO. A vill. near Lisbon, in Portugal, which, according to Steevens, gave its name to the wine so called. There were 2 villages of this name: one abt. 5 m. N. of Lisbon; the other near the sea, between Colares and Carcavellos. In H6 B. ii. 3, 63, one of the Lond. crowd says, "Here's a cup of C." In The Puritan iv. 3, Sir Godfrey says, "We'll talk of your noble acts in sparkling Charnico." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 3, Short-hose professes his intention of following Lady Heartwell to the country, and Luce says, "where no old C. is, nor no anchovies." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iii. 4, Clem asks the company what wine they will drink: "Aragoosa or Peter-see-me, Canary, or charnico?" In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 3, the vintner brings in "a pottle of Greek wine, a pottle of Peter-samee, a pottle of Charnico and a pottle of Leatica." In Middleton's Black Book (1604), p. 38, the devil says, "Thou and thy counter-leech may swallow down 6 gallons of Charnico." In Contention, Part I, Haz., p. 453, one of the neighbours says, "Here's a cup of C." In Black Dog of Newgate, we have in a list of wines, "charnoco, malago, etc."

CHARTERHOUSE. See CHARTREUSE.

CHARTREUSE (commonly corrupted in England into the form CHARTER-HOUSE). A vill. in the dept. of Isère, 14 m. N. of Grenoble, in France, where Bruno founded the 1st Abbey of the Carthusian Order in 1084. It had several monasteries in England, of which the most famous was the Charter-House N. of Smithfield, Lond., in the angle between Aldersgate St. and Clerkenwell Rd. It was founded by Sir Walter Manny in 1371 on a piece of land known as Pardon Churchyard. The monastery was dissolved by Henry VIII in 1537, and the brethren and their Prior, John Houghton, were treated with great cruelty, and some 10 of them were either executed or died in prison from their ill-treatment. The house was given to Sir Thomas Audley, and passed successively through the hands of Lord North, the D. of Northumberland, and the D. of Norfolk. On Norfolk's execution in 1572 it escheated to the Crown, but was restored to the Norfolk family by Elizabeth and became the town residence of Lord Thomas Howard under the name of Howard House. From him it was bought by Thomas Sutton for £13,000, and made into a hospital for aged men and a school for the children of poor parents. The letters patent were issued in June 1611, and on Dec. 12th Sutton died. He is buried in the chapel of the Charter House. Provision was made for 80 pensioners and 40 free scholars. Of the old priory there still remain the gateway and part of the chapel. The school was removed to Godalming, in Surrey, in 1872 and the buildings sold to the Merchant Taylors Company, who use it as a school. In H3 i. 1, 221, "A monk of the C., Nicholas Hopkins," is mentioned as implicated in the supposed plot of Buckingham; and in i. 2, 148 the surveyor of the D. says, "He was brought to this By a vain prophecy of Nicholas Hopkins . . . a Chartreux friar." He was a monk of the Charter House at Henton, near Bristol. Nash, in Lenten (p. 311), speaks of "Valiant Sir Walter Manny, the martial tutor unto the Black Prince, he that built the Charter-House."

CHARYBDIS. A whirlpool in the Straits of Messina, which has been made famous by Homer's account of it in Odyssey xii. Opposite, on the Italian coast, was the rock of Scylla, and the difficulty was to avoid the one without falling into the other. The whirlpool is due to the action of the tides and currents, and though our modern steamers pass through it without noticing it, it is dangerous for small craft. The classical writers are full of allusions to it, all depending on the Homeric story; and from them it has passed into modern literature. In Merch. iii. 5, 19, Launcelot says to Jessica, "When I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into C., your mother." In Jonson's Staple iv. 1, Pennyboy, junr., says, "My princess . . . hales me in, as eddies draw in boats, Or strong C. ships that sail too near The shelves of love." In Chapman's Bussy iii. 1, Monsieur exclaims, "Oh, the unsounded sea of women's bloods! Not any wrinkle creaming in their faces, When in their hearts are Scylla and C." In Randolph's Muses v. 1, Mediocrity says, "I am . . . The middle tract 'twixt Scylla and C." In the old Timon v. 5, Timon cries: "Or in the wide devouring Scylla's gulf Or in C. I will drown myself Before I'll show humanity to man." In Greene's Alphonso iii. 3, 1084, Iphigina says, "So shall we soon eschew Caribdis lake And headlong fall to Sylla's greedy gulf." Evidently Greene was not clear as to the nature of either. In Brandon's Octavia 620, Octavia asks the messenger who brings news of Anthony's faithlessness, "What Sylla, what C. can impart But half those horrors which in thee appear?" In Shirley's Ct. Secret iv. 1, Pedro says, "I have dangerous sailing betwixt your Grace's Scylla and her C." In W. Rowley's Wonder iii., Foster, hearing of the loss of his ships between Dover and Lond., cries: "What English C. has the devil digged to swallow nearer home?" In Milton's Comus 259, when Circe sung, "fell C. murmured soft applause." In Apilus, Haz. iv. 139, Virginius says, "The huge Carrebd his hazards thou for him hast off assayed; Was Silla's force by thee oft shunned, or yet Lady Circe's land?" Milton, P. L. ii. 1020, tells how "Ulysses on the larboard shunned C., and by the other whirlpool steered." But Scylla was not a whirlpool, as Milton ought to have known.

CHATHAM. A town in Kent on the Medway, 30 m. S.E. of Lond. The dockyard was founded by Elizabeth, who erected Upnor Castle on the other side of the river for its defence. It is still the seat of great dockyards and an arsenal. In H6 B. iv. 2, 92, the story is told of the execution of Emmanuel, "the clerk of C.," by Jack Cade, because he can write his name.

CHATTI. See CATTI.

CHEAP-GATE. A little gate at the N.E. corner of St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond., leading into Cheapside. Sidney's Apology for Poetry was "Printed for Henry Olney and are to be sold at his shop in Paul's Churchyard, at the sign of the George, near to C.-g., anno 1595."

CHEAPSIDE (CHEAP, or WEST CHEAP); Cp. = Cheap. As its name implies, the old Market Place of Lond., extending from the N.E. corner of St. Paul's Churchyard to the Poultry. The names of the sts. running into it indicate the points where the various wares were exposed for sale, e.g. on the S. side, Friday St., where fish was sold, and Bread St.; on the N., Wood St., Milk St., Honey Lane, and Ironmongers Lane. At first the N. side was open ground, and when buildings were erected they were on the line of the old market stalls, and left the st. as it now became, the widest in old Lond. "Tis thought," says Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632), "the way through this st. is not good, because so broad, and so many go in it; yet though it be broad, it's very straight, because without any turnings." There were 4 erections down the centre of the market or st.: at the W. end, near the ch. of St. Michael le Quern, was an old cross, sometimes called the Brokers' Cross, which was taken down in 1390; on its site was erected in 1442 a conduit, known as the little, or pissing, conduit; opposite the end of Wood St. was the Cross, one of those set up by Edward I at the place where the body of Q. Elinor rested on its way from Lincoln to Westminster. The others were at Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, and Charing. Those at Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham still remain. It was re-edified in 1441, and often regilded and otherwise restored during the Tudor period. The Puritans, however, regarded it with detestation as a Romish symbol, and the images of the Virgin and Saints were constantly defaced by them; and in 1596 a naked figure of Diana with water trilling from its breasts was put in the place of the image of the Virgin: it must have been a poor piece of work, for Stow says it was decayed in 1603. Probably this is the Diana referred to by Rosalind in As iv. 1, 154, "I will weep for nothing, like Diana in the fountain." On May 2, 1643, the Cross was pulled down by order of Parliament to the sound of drums and trumpets, and amid the shoutings of the Puritan crowd. A little further to the E., opposite the end of Milk St., was the Standard, a square pillar with a conduit, statues round the sides, and an image of Fame on the top. At the E. end of Cheapside, at its junction with the Poultry, was the Gt. Conduit, to which water was brought in lead pipes from Paddington, set up in 1285 and new-built in 1479. Walking down the S. side of Cp. from the W. end, Shakespeare would first pass Old Change, where bullion was received for coining; then the Nag's Head Inn at the corner of Friday St. and the Mermaid at the W. corner of Bread St., then Goldsmiths Row, consisting of "10 fair dwellings and 14 shops, all in one frame uniformly built 4 stories high"; then the Ch. of St. Mary de Arcubus, or Bow Ch., standing 40 ft. back from the st. with a stone pavilion in front of it, called Crown-sild, or Seldam, from which the kings and queens used to watch the tournaments and pageants which were held in the Cp., and which is now represented by a stone gallery on Sir Christopher Wren's steeple: beyond the ch. were shops, chiefly occupied by mercers and drapers. Crossing Sopar's Lane, now Queen St., he would reach the end of Bucklersbury, where the grocers and druggists had their headquarters. Crossing over by the Gt. Conduit and turning back towards the W., on the N. side of Cp., he would pass the Mercers' Chapel and Hall on the site of the old Hospital of St. Thomas of Acon, and cross in succession Ironmongers Lane, Lawrence Lane (New King St. was not cut through to the Guildhall till after the Gt. Fire), Milk St., Wood St., Gutter Lane, and Foster Lane, and so into St. Paul's Churchyard to the booksellers' shops.

In H6 B. iv. 2, 74, Cade boasts, "In C. shall my palrey go to grass"; and in iv. 7, 134, Dick asks Cade: "My lord, when shall we go to C. and take up commodities upon our bills?" C. was the scene of all the City pageants. In Chaucer's C. T. B. 4377, it is said of the prentice Perkyn, "Whan ther any ridyng was in Chepe, Out of the shoppe thider wolde he lepe." It was also a promenade for people of fashion. In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meercraft advises Gilthead to buy his son a Captain's place and "let him with his plumes and scarfs march through C. and draw down a wife there from a window." In Davenant's Wits i., Thwack "will match my Lord Mayor's horse, make jockeys of his hench-boys, and run them through C." In Barry's Ram iii., Throate promises himself: "My coach shall now go prancing through C." Hall, in Satires v. 4, 14, ridicules the farmer's son, who "hires a friezeland trotter . . . To drag his tumbrell through the staring Cp." Public proclamations were usually made at the Cross, and executions were often carried out at the Standard. In More iii. 1, the Sheriff gives orders that "a gibbet be erected in C., hard by the Standard, whither you must bring Lincoln . . . to suffer death." Taylor, ii. 311, says, "The rebels beheaded the Lord Say at the Standard in Cp." Harman, in his Caveat 11, tells of a "crafty Crank" who for his offence "stood upon the Pillory in C." In Mayne's Match ii. 1, Dorcas refers to Prynne's Histriomastix as "a book that suffered martyrdom by fire in C." It was burnt there by order of the Star-chamber. Drayton, in Barons' Wars iv. 43, tells how Stapleton "Beheaded was before the Cross in Cp."

References to the Cross are plentiful. In Elynour Rummung iv., drunken Alice comes in with tales "how there hath been great war between Temple-Bar and the Cross in Cp." Earle, in Microcosmus lxxviii., says of the Lond. citizen, "The gilding of the Cross he counts the glory of this age." This refers to the gilding of the Cross in 1600. In Marston's Mountebanks, the Mountebank says, "I could encounter thee . . . with Cheape Crosse, though it be new gilt." In Randolph's Muses' v. 1, Mrs. Flowerdew, the Puritan, says that Mediocrity "looketh like the Idol of C." Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632), says, "Puritans do hold it [C.] for a fine st. but something addicted to popery for adorning [adoring] the cross too much." There was an abundant crop of pamphlets in regard to the destruction of the Cross, such as The dialogue between the Cross in Chepe and Charing Cross; Articles of High Treason Exhibited against C. Cross; The Downfall of Dagon, or The Taking down of C. Cross, and many more. The Cross was one of the best-known objects in old Lond. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon v. 1, Old Chartley, returning from his travels, says, "This 7 years I have not seen Paul's steeple or Cp. Cross." In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings swears by "C. Cross and loud Bow-bell."

The Conduits were utilised in the pageants for decorative purposes and speeches were delivered from them. In the Ovatio Carolina, describing the entry of Charles into Lond. in 1641, it is recorded that "the great conduit in C. ran with claret wine." When Anne Boleyn went from the Tower to Westminster just before her coronation "at the Little Conduit of C. was a rich pageant"; and when Elizabeth entered the City on her accession there was a grand Allegory of Time and Truth at the Little Conduit (see also s.v. CONDUIT). The Lord Mayor's show went along C. on St. Simon and Jude's Day, Oct. 28th. In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "Men and women are born and come running into the world faster than coaches do into C. upon Simon and Jude's day." In Shirley's Riches, Clod says, "The next day after Simon and Jude you go a feasting to Westminster; you land in shoals and make the understanders in C. wonder to see ships swim upon men's shoulders." Originally the Lord Mayor went to Westminster by land; but Sir John Norman in 1485 went in a barge rowed by silver oars, and this practice continued for 4 centuries. On the return journey he landed at Paul's Wharf and went by C. to the Guildhall, the oarsmen carrying their boats on their shoulders. In Phillips' Grissil 54, Politick Persuasion tells how, when he was saved from destruction as he fell from the sky, "The Cross in Cp. for joy did play on a bagpipe and the Standard did dance." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood says, "The cross and standard in C. I will convert into Hercules' pillars; and the little conduit that weeps in lamentation for the Ch. removed that it did lean on, it shall be still filled with wine and always running. The great Conduit shall be a magazine of sack." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity promises Pug, "I will fetch thee a leap from the top of Paul's steeple to the Standard in Cp." In Nature (Lost Plays, 98), Lust says he knocked so hard at Margery's door that "a man might have heard the noise from Poules to the farthest end of Cp."

In the neighbourhood of C. were the 2 City counters, or lock-ups, in Wood St. and the Poultry. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, Ilford talks of being arrested by a couple of sergeants and falling "into one of the unlucky cranks about C., called Counters." In Lyly's Bombie v. 3, the Sergeant threatens the Hackneyman "with such a noverim as C. can show none such." "Noverim" is a mistake, or misprint, for "Noverint," the first word in a writ. The shops of C. furnished a large number of prentices, who formed a compact body capable on occasion of causing no little trouble. In More ii. 1, the scene is laid in C. and is opened by the entrance of "3 or 4 Prentises of trades with a pair of cudgells." The cry of "Clubs!" brought these young fellows out in a swarm ready for any kind of mischief. The Black May-Day riot directed against the Lombards started with the prentices of C., and forms the subject of Acts II and III of More. In T. Heywood's Prentices, sc. iv., p. 82, Charles cries: "Oh for some C. boys for Charles to lead!" Their work ceased when Bow-bell rang the curfew: hence the old rhyme in which the apprentices address the clerk of the ch., "Clerk of the Bow bell with thy yellow locks, For thy late ringing thy head shall have knocks." To which he replies: "Children of Chepe, hold you all still; For you shall have Bow bell rung at your will." The mercers' shops were mostly in the E. end of Cheap. In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit challenges "all C. to show such another" habit as his wife is wearing. In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, Goldwire promises Shav'em, "The tailor and embroiderer shall kneel to thee; C. and the Exchange shall court thy custom." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iii. 2, Chartley tells Luce, "There are brave things to be bought in the city; C. and the Exchange afford variety and rarity." In Jonson's Underwoods ix., "Another answers, 'las, those silks are none . . . as he would deride Any comparison had with his C.'" In Lydgate's Lickpenny, the author says: "Then to the Chepe I began me drawn, Where much people I saw for to stand; One offered me velvet, silk and lawn, Another he taketh me by the hand, 'Here is Paris thread, the fin'st in the land.'" In Mayne's Match i. 4, we are told of a mercer who "lives in C." In Brome's City Wit iii. 3, Crack says, "All the suttin in C. were not enough to make you a wedding-gown." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 10, Spicing says, "You know C.; there are the mercers' shops Where we will measure velvet by the pikes And silks and satins by the st.'s whole breadth." Donne, Satire iv. (1597), says of the courtiers, "Whoe'er looks . . . o'er C. books, Shall find their wardrobe's inventory." In Deloney's Reading vi., Simon's wife would swear it was quite spoiled "If she thought a tailor of C. made not her gown."

Between Bread St. and Bow Ch. was Goldsmiths' Row. In Richard the Redeless iii. 139, the poet complains that the young lords "Kepeth no coyne that cometh to here hondis But chaunchyth it ffor cheynes that in Chepe hangith." In Nobody 441, the Clown tells Nobody, "Go into C. and Nobody may take up as much plate as he can carry." In Field's Amends ii. 1, Proudly says to the Page, "What said the goldsmith for the money?" And having heard the answer: "How got that wit into C., trow?" In the prologue to Marston's Malcontent, Sly says, "I'll lay a hundred pound, I'll walk but once down by the Goldsmiths' Row in Cp., take notice of the signs, and tell you them with a breath instantly. They begin, as the world did, with Adam and Eve; there's in all just five-and-fifty." In Eastward v. 4, Quicksilver sings, "In C., famous for gold and plate, Quicksilver I did dwell of late." In T. Heywood's Prentices, sc. vii., p. 90, Guy speaks of the time "When once I was a goldsmith in C." In More iii. 2, Faulkner says, "If the locks were on again, all the goldsmiths in C. should not pick them open." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Hornet, who is wearing a copper chain round his neck, explains: "Your right whiffler hangs himself in St. Martin's, not in C." St. Martin's (q.v.) was a sort of Alsatian market for finery of the second class, like this copper chain: C. sold the genuine article. In Marston's Courtesan ii. 1, Mulligrub "will to C. to buy a fair piece of plate." In Eastward v. 4, Quicksilver sings, "Farewell, C. I farewell, sweet trade Of goldsmiths all, that ne'er shall fade." In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Husie promises Mendwell, "Thou shalt be a constable, carry thy staff with the red cross and dagger, in as much state as the best goldsmith that ere bore office in C." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Bellamie says, as he gives Alicia a ring, "I would not that he should know for all the rubies in C. where I bought this but now." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 10, Falconbridge says, "We'll shoe our coursers with no worse than the purest silver that is sold in C." In Nabbes' C. Garden iv. 4, Ralph says, "'Tis a fine chamber, it shines like a goldsmith's shop in C." In Deloney's Craft ii. 11, Anthony says that his ballad "hath made me as well acquainted in C. as the cat in the cream-pan; for as soon as the goldsmiths' wives spy me, and as I pass along by the merchants' daughters, the apes will laugh at me." In his Reading vi., the clothiers' wives "when they were brought into C., there with great wonder they beheld the shops of the Goldsmiths; and on the other side, the wealthy Mercers, whose shops shined with all sorts of coloured silks." Herrick, in Tears of Thames (1647), relates that he was born in "the golden C."

There were, of course, other things sold in the market. In More i. 1, Caveller enters with a pair of doves and says, "I bought them in C." Dove Court, running from Old Jewry to Grocers' Hall Court, still preserves the name of the place where doves were sold. In Cartwright's Ordinary v. 3, Shape, relating Bitefig the miser's confession, says, "I've often bought a C. custard, and so refreshed my soul under my cloak." In Jonson's Epicene iv. 1, Truewit advises: "Give cherries at time of year or apricots; and say they were sent you out of the country, though you bought them in C." In Webster's Weakest i. 3, Bunch says to Smelt, "Ye Smelt, your kinsfolks dwell in the Thames and are sold like slaves in C. by the hundreth, two pence a quarter." In Jonson's New Inn i. 1, the Host guesses that "C. debt-books" are weighing on Lovel's spirits. In Jonson's Eastward iv. 4, Touchstone speaks of himself as "a poor C. groom." "A rakyer [scavenger] of Chepe" is one of the merry party in Piers B. v. 322. In Lupton's London Carbonadoed (1632), he says, "If all the men be rich and true, and the women all fair and honest, then C. shall stand by Charing Cross for a wonder." In Day's B. Beggar iv., young Strowd, hearing of what he regards as an impossibility, says, "I had as lieve thou hadst told me Charing Cross stood in C." C. is used for the shopkeeping class, as when in Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Clare says that young Holdfast, fresh from Cambridge, "is learned enough to make C. a college"; and in iii. 1, Knowell speaks of "Illustrious names, the glory of C., Stars of the City."

The Dagger Inn, famous for its pies, was at the corner of Foster Lane. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 257, a prentice says, "I must need step to the Dagger in Cheape, to send a letter into the country unto my father." C. is mentioned by Dekker, in Bellman 158, as a favourite haunt of foysts, or pickpockets.

CHEAT-LOAF. A sign in Holborn, Lond. C.-bread was bread of the 2nd quality, somewhat coarser than manchet. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 1, an advertisement is read setting forth that those who wish to be instructed in the art of "roaring" should "repair into Holborn to the sign of the C.-l." Chough comments, "Now your bill speaks of that I was wondering a good while at, your sign; the l. looks very like bread, i' faith, but why is it called the C.-l.?" To which the first speaker replies: "The house was sometimes a baker's, Sir, that served the Court, where the bread is called c."—"Ay, ay," says Trimtram, "'twas a baker that cheated the court with bread."

CHEBAR. River, or perhaps canal, near Babylon, where Ezekiel saw his first vision of the Cherubim (Ezekiel i. 1). Possibly it was a name for the Royal Canal of Nebuchadnezzar; but it is not certain. Milton, in Ode on Passion 37, speaks of "those rushing wheels That whirled the prophet up at C. flood."

CHECKER. A tavern on the E. side of Dowgate Hill, Lond., near Queen Hythe. In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 2, one of the promoters proposes, "Let's e'en go to the C. at Queen-hive, and roast the loin of muton."

CHELSEA. Now a W. suburb of Lond. on the N. of the Thames, but formerly a separate vill. It was a favourite country residence in Elizabeth's time, and Sir Thomas More had his house there. The old ch. near Battersea Edge. has a monument to his memory. Near to the ch. Crosby Hall was re-erected in 1910. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Pompey remarks, "I ha' got a stomach 6 times and lost it again, as often as a traveller from C. shall lose the sight of Paul's and get it again." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Mrs. Openwork, suspecting her husband of having gone by the Thames to Brentford with another woman, says to him, "The star by which you sail shines yonder above C.": C. being on the way to Brentford. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, one of the projects of Banauus is to found "a college of physicians too at C. only to study the cure of the French pox": the suggestion being that the place was a haunt of young profligates. In Jonson's Forest vi., he asks Celia for as many kisses as "the sands in C. fields." Several of the scenes in More are laid in his house at C. In iv. 2, he is ordered on his arrest to "strait depart unto your house at Chelsey"; and in iv. 3, Roper's wife tells how in a dream she saw her father, Sir Thomas, "here in Chelsey Ch. Standing upon the rood-loft now defaced," which fell with him and killed him. In the 10th Merry Jest of the Wido Edyth, that lady walks from Eltham to a thorp called Batersay, takes a wherry, and is rowed over to C. to Sir T. More's. The 2nd title of Middleton's City Love (1616) is "an entertainment by water at Chelsey and Whitehall."

CHENFORD (CHINGFORD). A vill. in Essex on the borders of Epping Forest, abt. 8 m. N. of Lond. In Day's B. Beggar ii., Old Strowd says to his son, "Go post to C., run to Mr. Glasscock"; and the son passes on the order to his man Swash, "Hie thee to C. for the roo pound, and soon towards evening I'll meet thee at Ilford": Ilford being 6 m. S.E. of C.

CHENNARY (now CANARA). A farm in the Mylor Downs, 2 m. from Penryn, in S. Cornwall. In Cornish M. P. i. 2772, the Bp. gives to the executioner of Maximilla "Hag ol C. an clos," i.e. "All C. of the Close."

CHEPSTEAD. A vill. in Kent, near Sevenoaks, 15 m. due W. of Maidstone. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 10, Smoke says, "I hope Smoke, the smith of C., is as good a man as Chub, the chandler of Sandwich."

CHEPSTOW. A spt. in Monmouthsh. on the Wye, 135 m. W. of Lond. The castle, now in ruins, was built soon after the Conquest by Fitz-Osborne, Earl of Hereford. In Downfall Huntingdon iii. 1, FitzWater says to Prince John, "Earl C.'s daughter is thy married wife." This lady was heiress to the House of Gloucester, and John divorced her in order to marry Isabella of Angoulême.

CHERITH. A brook, or ravine, where Elijah was fed by the ravens, or, more probably, Arabs (I Kings xvii. 3). It was probably E. of the Jordan: the old identification with the Wady es Kelt between Jerusalem and Jericho cannot be maintained. Milton, P. R. ii. 266, says of our Lord after His 40 days' fast, "Him thought he by the brook of C. stood, And saw the ravens with their horny beaks Food to Elijah bringing."

CHERSONESE, THE GOLDEN. The Malay Peninsula, running to the S. of Farther India, between the G. of Siam and the Straits of Malacca. Josephus, Ant. viii. 6, 4, calls it Aurea Chersonesus, and identifies it with Solomon's Ophir. Milton, P. L. xi. 392, makes Adam survey in vision all Asia, "Down to the golden C." In P. R. iv. 74, the Tempter shows to our Lord ambassadors coming to Rome, "From India and the Golden C." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "I would examine . . . where Ophir was whence Solomon did fetch his gold; from Peruana, or that Aurea Chersonesus."

CHERSONESON. Apparently for Chersonesian; the Chersonese being the peninsula running along the N. side of the Hellespont. The C. Sea may mean the Sea of Marmora. In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Hercules says, "Have we in the Argoe pierced Samothrace, The C. sea, the Hellespont?"

CHERTSEY. A town in Surrey, 20 m. S.W. of Lond. There was an ancient monastery there, which was re-founded in 964 by K. Edgar and placed under the rules of St. Benedict. It became a wealthy establishment. Here Henry VI was buried, but the body was afterwards removed to Westminster by Henry VII. In R3 i. 2, 29, we are shown the funeral of Henry on its way to C., but in 225 Richd. orders the bearers to take the body first to White Friars, apparently a slip for Black Friars. In the charm for worms in Thersites (A. P. i. 220), mention is made of "Mabel of C." as a witch.

CHESHIRE. A county on the W. coast of England. It was made a county Palatine by William I. It has long been noted for its salt and its cheese. In Ret. Pernass, Pt. I, prol. 10, we read: "He never since durst name a piece of cheese, Though C. seems to privilege his name." In Dekker's Northward iii. 1, Doll says, "If you should but get 3 or 4 C. cheeses, and set them a running down Highgate-hill, he [the Welshman] would make haste after them." Markham, in Country Contentments (1611), advises the choice of "the largest dogs which have the greatest mouths and deepest flews, such as your W. country, C., and Lancashire dogs are." In Mayne's Match iii. 1, Roseclap, hanging out the picture of a strange fish, says, "Others say, 'tis the fish caught in C.": referring, no doubt, to some recent occurrence. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 213, the K. gives "Cheshmere" and several other counties to his favourite Bushy.

CHESHUNT (also called CHESSUM, or CHESTON). Town in Herts., some 4 m. N. of Edmonton. There was a Benedictine nunnery there, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, founded in the 12th cent. In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, the Clown charges Cuddy Banks with being in love with Carter's daughter, and in confirmation says, "I have seen you walk up to Carter's of Chessum." In Drayton's Merry Devil i. 2, Clare says, "There are crosses, wife; here's one in Waltham, another at the abbey, and a third at C.": and later in the scene he declares his intention of sending his daughter "unto C. nunnery."

CHESSUM. See CHESHUNT.

CHESTER. The capital of Cheshire, on the Dee, 179 m. N.W. of Lond. It is the only city in England that is entirely surrounded by a wall. At the S.W. of the city on the banks of the Dee is the Roodee, a large common, named from the Rood, or Cross, which, according to tradition, was originally at Hawarden; but being thrown into the river by the people of Hawarden it floated down to C., and was re-edified there and became a famous place of pilgrimage. The Chester M. P. were celebrated from the latter part of the 13th cent. They were acted by the members of the Trade Guilds on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of Whit-week. In H4 B. i. 1, 39, Travers tells how he was caught on his way from Shrewsbury to Warkworth by a messenger who "asked the way to C." There is an Earl of C. in Dekker's Fortunatus, which is supposed to take place in the reign of Athelstan; and in Merlin there is an Edoll, Earl of C., and general to K. Aurelius of Britain. These are both imaginary personages, but bear witness to the knowledge on the authors' part of the antiquity of the city. In Piers B. v. 402, Sloth professes, "I can rymes of Robin Hood and Randolf erle of Chestre": this was Randle, or Ranulph, who was Earl from 1181 to 1232, and who being besieged by the Welsh in Rhuddlan Castle was delivered by a rabble of minstrels led by Roger Lacy. This event was celebrated by an annual procession on St. John the Baptist's day, which lasted till 1756. Fair Em iv. 1, is laid at C., and Valingford endeavours to win Em by telling her that her lover, Manville, has forsaken her, and "at C. must be married To a man's daughter of no little wealth." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 5, Mrs. Merrythought claims to be niece "to a Worshipful gentleman and a conductor: he has been 3 times in his Majesty's service at C." A conductor was an officer in charge of military stores and supplies. One of the characters in T. Heywood's Royal King is the Earl of C.; but no particular person is meant. The scene of Munday's John Kent is laid in C., and one of the characters is Ranulph (the Randle mentioned above), Earl of C. In v. 1, John a Kent says, "These weddings must be at C. Abbey," i.e. the Abbey of the Monastery, now the cathedral. The same Earl of C. is one of the characters in Davenport's Matilda. In Trouble. Reign, Haz., p. 295, "C.'s banishment" is one of the grievances alleged by the revolting Barons. This was the same Ranulph. In Piers B. v. 467, and Richard the Redeless, prol. 56, we find, "bi the rode of C." as an oath. In Fulke's Rejoinder to Martiall (1580), art. x., he says, "Who went a pilgrimage to the Roods of Boston, Dovercourt, and C.?" Were they not Papists? In Gascoigne's Government ii. 4, Eccho says, "They are as much akin to the Margrave as Robyn Fletcher and the sweet Roode of C.," i.e. not akin at all.

In Richard the Redeless iii. 317, we read of "chyders of C.," who were made counsel in the Courts for the K. Richd. had courted the favour of C. by assuming the title of "Prince of C.," and there was a rising in his favour in C. after his return from Ireland. In Jonson's Gipsies an explanation is given of the practice of making jugs with a man's head and beard on them by the fact that a mother and her son, meeting one another unexpectedly, "turn'd stone, upon the sight each of other, at C.," and were reconciled by a jug of the town ale. These jugs were known as Greybeards, or Bellarmines, from their supposed resemblance to the cardinal of that name. They were made in the Low Countries: the only reason I can guess for dragging in C. is that the son is described just before as "a spark struck out of Flintsh.," which is next door to C., "upon Justice Jug's daughter." See also WEST CHESTER.

CHESTON. See CHESHUNT.

CHETAS. The 4th gate of Troy. Troil., prol. 16, "Priam's six-gated city, Dardan, and Tymbria, Helias, C., Troien, And Antenorides." The names are taken from Caxton (see the passage s.v. ANTENORIDES). Is this name a survival of the Hittites, or Kheta, who were the most powerful people in Asia Minor at the time of the Trojan War?

CHEYNEY. See CHINA.

CHIAN. A mistake for Ceian, i.e. belonging to Ceos, one of the group of the Cyclades in the Ægean, now Zea, 13 m. S.E. of the promontory of Sunium in Attica. Simonides, the lyric poet, was born at Iulis, the capital of the island. E. D., in Trans. of Theocritus Idyl xvi., speaks of "Simonides the C. poet." The original has the adjective correctly, "Ceian."

CHICK LANE. A st. in Lond., otherwise known as West St., running from Field L. to the Sheep Pens in Smithfield. It was near a timber bidge. crossing the Turnmill Brook, as the upper part of Fleet Ditch was called, N. of the Holbourn Bidge. No. 3 was the infamous Red Lion Inn, which abutted on the Fleet Ditch at the back, and was a notorious haunt of thieves and ruffians. It was at the corner of Brewhouse Yard, a few steps from Saffron Hill. The whole dist. had a most evil reputation. The Red Lion was pulled down in 1844, and the improvements made in 1857 swept away C. L. altogether. In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Moll, dressed as a man, tells Trapdoor she is one of the Temple; but, she adds, "Sometime I lie about C. L."

CHIEGO. According to Prof. Moore Smith, this is a mtn. on the coast of Spain at the entrance of the straits of Gibraltar. In Sharpam's Fleire iv. 17, Petoune swears "by the towering head of high mt. C., the seaman's southward mark."

CHIERONTE (CHÆRONEIA). A town of Bœotia, on the border of Phocis. It occupied a strong military position and commanded the entrance to Bœotia from Phocis. It is chiefly celebrated on account of the victory of Philip of Macedon over the Athenians and Bœotians under Theagenes in 338 B.C. In Lyly's Campaspe i. 1, Timoclea says to Alexander, "I am the sister of Theagenes, who fought a battle with thy father before the city of C., where he died valiantly."

CHIMERA. See CHYMERA.

CHINA (Ce. = Chinese). The country on the E. coast of Asia which occupies the centre of the continent. The name first appears in English about the middle of the 16th cent. It gradually took the place of the older Cataia, or Cathay, which had always been used somewhat vaguely. Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, indicates the uncertainty that was felt about the exact meaning of the words: he imagines himself possessing the power of flight and surveying the whole world from the air: "I shall soon perceive," he says, "whether Marcus Polus the Venetian's narration be true or false of that great city of Quinsay and Cambalu; whether there be any such places, or that, as Matth. Riccius the Jesuit hath written, C. and Cataia be all one, the great Cham of Tartary and the K. of C. be the same." Ultimately C. came to be the geographical name, and Cathay was limited to vague and poetical use. C. first became known in the W. world through the Mongol conquest of N. C. by Jenghiz Khan in 1234; 40 years later Kublai Khan added S. C. to the Mongol Empire. Missionaries of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders ventured into the Mongol Empire, and 2 of them have left accounts of what they saw. Carpini (1245) says, "They seem kindly and polished folk enough. They have no beard and in character of countenance have a considerable resemblance to the Mongols, but are not so broad in the face." He goes on to speak of their peculiar language, their skill in various crafts, and the wealth of the country in corn, wine, gold, silver, and silk. William of Rubruk (1253) says, "They are little fellows, speaking much through the nose, and . . . their eyes are very narrow. They are first-rate artists . . . and physicians." He remarks on their paper-money, and their use of brushes for pens in writing. Later the Italian Polos brought back much further information to Europe. In 1268 the Mongol power was broken and Yuen-Chang, the founder of the Ming Dynasty, became Emperor. In 1644 the Ming Dynasty was overthrown by the Manchos, who founded the Ta-Tsing Dynasty, which endured till the end of the 19th cent. Though some of its products were known, C. was felt to be a mysterious and very distant land. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Peregrine has heard "that your baboons were spies, and that they were a kind of subtle nation near to C." In B. & F. Span. Cur. iii. 2, Lopes says, "You look like travelled men; Some Signors in C. or Cataya." In their Chances v. 3, Don John tells Antonio that his lady has "gone to C., to be the Gt. Cham's mistress." The Gt. Cham is the usual title for the Emperor of C. In their Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forbosco suggests to the tailor to go to the new world in the moon for his fashions: "this," he says, "lies beyond C." In Davenant's Favourite i. 1, Thorello says, "The Q. Dowager of C. should not remove my suit." In his Albino ii. 1, Conrade says of the courtiers, "They are men of C., for aught I know." In Dekker's Match me iii., the Q. says, "I keep the fashion of the Kings of C., who never walk abroad but, besides their attendants, have 5 or 6 as richly attired as themselves, to cut off treason." Davies, in Nosce, says of the soul, "She's sent as soon to C. as to Spain." Hoskins, in verses prefixed to Coryat's Cruelities (1611), says, "Fame is but wind, thence wind may blow it . . . From Mexico and from Peru To C. and to Cambalu."

During the 2nd half of the 16th cent. the Jesuits established a Mission in C., which was very successfully prosecuted by Mateo Ricci. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, it is asked: "Ha' you any miracle Done in Japan by the Jesuits, or in C.?"

In Marston's Parasitaster iii. 3, Dulcimer says, "They say in C., when women are past child-bearing they are all burnt to make gunpowder." The Chinese are supposed to have discovered gunpowder in a remote antiquity, Heylyn says, "3 or 4 years before or after the departure of Israel out of Egypt!" But I have not found any other authority for the use of the old women for the manufacture of explosives. The Ce. had light wagons propelled by sails: I remember as a boy seeing a picture of one, but I can't recall where it was. In Jonson's New World, the Herald says, "The coaches go only with wind"; and the Chronicler comments, "Pretty; like C. waggons." Milton, P. L. iii. 438, speaks of "Sericana, where Chineses drive With sails and wind their cany waggons light." Heylyn, p. 680, says of the Chinoys, as he calls them, "They have coaches and carts driven ordinarily with sails." He also credits them with the invention of gunpowder, and, doubtfully, of printing. Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 3, speaks of the "C. flat" nose.

Dishes made of C. clay were brought to Europe by the Portuguese towards the end of the 16th cent., and the name for the material (C.) was already in use throughout the East. In this sense the word was pronounced, and often spelt, Chiney or Chaney. In Meas. ii. 1, 97, Pompey speaks of "a dish of some three-pence . . . they are not C. dishes, but very good dishes." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 2, Huntley, describing a Scotch festival, speaks of "Ale in dishes never fetched from C." In Massinger's Renegado i. 3, Gazet, advertising the goods in his shop, cries: "What do you lack? Your choice C. dishes?" In Drake's Voyages (1579), Hakluyt, iii. 736, we read of "fine C. dishes of white earth and great store of C. silks." Florio (1598) defines porcellana as that "whereof they make C. dishes, called Porcellan dishes." Sir T. Browne, in Paradoxes (1646) ii. 5, 7, says, "We are not thoroughly resolved concerning porcellane or C. dishes that according to common belief they are made of earth." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Cable says that the people of Plymouth "would sell the very air, if they could serve it out in fine C.-bottles." In his Love Hon. i. 1, Frivolo says, "You may dip your morsel in good C. earth." Blount, Glossographia (1656) (s.v. PORCELLANE), says, "Porcellane or C. dishes, brought out of C., are made of a chalky earth . . . which being formed they gild or paint." Herbert, in Travels (1634) 41, speaks of "Cheney Sattin, Cheney ware."

Silks and other textile fabrics were brought from C. In B. & F. Beggars i. 3, the freight of a ship just come in includes "Indigo, cochineal, choice C. stuffs, and cloth of gold, brought from Cambal." In their Valour v. 1, we read of "half an ell of C. damask." A sort of coarse Ce. cloth was called Cheyne: in their Wit S. W. ii. 1, Lady Ruinous says that £13 "will put a lady scarce in Philip and cheyne": Philip being also a kind of coarse stuff. Drugs were imported from C., especially the root of Smilax C. Burton, A. M. ii. 5, 1, 5, says, "I may say the same of a decoction of C. roots . . . C. makes a good colour in the face." In ii. 4, 1, 3, he calls it "C. sarsaparilla." In B. & F. Hon. Man v. 3, Montague tells the Capt. he will live to see him "bring in rotten pippins To cure blue eyes, and swear they came from C." Blue eyes are what we call black eyes. Nash, in

CHINA-HOUSES

Pierce E. 2, inveighs against the glutton who has factors abroad "to provide him of strange birds, C. mustard, and odd patterns to make custards by." Tea was not introduced into England till the middle of the 17th cent., but Heylyn (s.v. C.) says, "It yieldeth an herb out of the which they press a delicate juice which serveth them instead of wine, and also preserveth their health and freeth them from the evils which the immoderate use of wine doth breed unto us." See also CATAIA.

CHINA-HOUSES. The name given to shops in Lond. where Chinese silks and porcelain were sold. They were a favourite resort of women of fashion, and were often used as places of assignation: hence the word came to mean in the later 17th cent. a brothel. In Jonson's Epicoene i. 1, Sir La-foole "has a lodging in the Strand . . . to watch when ladies are gone to the c.-h. or the Exchange, that he may meet them." In the same scene La-foole says that Otter's wife "was the rich c. woman, that the courtiers visited so often"; and in iii. 1, Lady Haughty comes to Mrs. Otter's "to see some C. stuffs." In iv. 2, she invites the heroine to "go with us to Bedlam, to the c.-h., and to the Exchange." In his Alchemist iv. 2, Subtle promises Dame Pliant "6 mares to hurry her through Lond., to the Exchange, Bethlem, the c.-h." In Brome's Sparagus ii. 2, Moneylack says, "Though now you keep a c.-shop, and deal in brittle commodities, pots, glasses, pusslane dishes, and trinkets, you must not forget your old trade."

CHIOS. An island in the Ægean Sea off the coast of Asia Minor, at the S. of the Gulf of Smyrna. The modern name is Scio. It was one of the places that claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. It has long been famous for its excellent wines. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Trebizond announces that he is bringing forces from "Trebizond, C., Famastro, and Amasia." In J. Heywood's Weather 106, the Merchant says, "I trust or Mid-lent to be to Scio." In Davenant's Rhodes A. i., the Admiral announces, "The Bassa's fleet appears, To Rhodes his course from C. steers." Lodge, in Answ. to Gosson, p. 11, says, "What made the Chians and Colophonians fall to such controversy? Why seek the Smirniens to recover from the Salaminians the praise of Homer?" In B. & F. Corinth ii. 4, the Vintner asks his guests what wine they will have: "C. or Lesbos, Greek?" Milton, P. R. iv. 118, mentions wines of "C. and Crete" as esteemed highly by the Romans. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight mentions amongst dainties esteemed by the Romans "cockles from C." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 394, says, "There is in Chio the image of Diana, which to those that enter seemeth sharp and sour, but returning after their suits made looketh with a merry and pleasant countenance." This story is told in Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvi. 4. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 5, 12, speaks of him "that thought For Chian folk to pourtrait beauty's Queen." The reference is to the picture of Aphrodite by Apelles; but it was in the temple of Cos, not C.

CHIPPING NORTON. A mkt. town in Oxfordsh., 20 m. N.W. of Oxford and 72 m. N.W. of Lond. In Three Lords, Dods. vi. 393, Simplicity has a ballad called, "C.-N., 1 m. from Chapel o' th' Heath—a lamentable ballad of burning the Pope's dog." Probably the allusion is to some outburst of Protestant enthusiasm in connection with the arrest of Campion in Oxfordsh. in 1581. Was the Pope's dog a Dominican Friar (Domini canis) burnt in effigy?

CHRIST-CHURCH, LONDON

CHIRKE. A vill. in Denbighsh. in Wales, on the border of Shropsh. The old Norman castle, one of the strongholds of the Lords Marchers, is still in a good state of preservation. In Marlowe's Ed. II., the elder Mortimer is called "Lord Mortimer of C."

CHIURLU. A vill. in Rumelia, near Adrianople on the E., where Selim I attacked his father Bayazet, and where he himself died on his way from Constantinople to Adrianople. In Selimus 2163, Acomat says to Selim, "Selim, in C. didst thou set upon Our aged father in his sudden flight; In C. shalt thou die a grievous death."

CHOASPES. A river in S.W. Persia, rising in the mtns. of Luristan and flowing S. into the Tigris, a little below its junction with the Euphrates. Susa was built on its banks, and according to Herodotus i. 188, the Kings of Persia would drink no other water and had a supply of it carried with them on all their campaigns. It is now called Kerkhah. Milton, P. R. iii. 288, tells of "Susa by C., amber stream, The drink of none but kings."

CHOKA (perhaps a misprint for MOCHA, or MOKHA). A spt. on the E. coast of the Red S., at the S.W. point of Arabia, just within the Straits of Babelmandeb, chiefly known for its export of coffee. In Bacchus, the 13th guest "came from C., a city in Arabia, named Nicholas Neverthrive; he brought with him a pudding-pie."

CHRISCIS (apparently CHRYSE is intended). A city on the coast of the Troad in Asia Minor. In T. Heywood's Iron Age v., Ulysses boasts, "'Twas I sacked Thebes, C. and Scylla with Lernessus walls."

CHRIST CHURCH. Canterbury Cathedral, originally the chapel of the Priory of Christ Ch. Deloney, in Craft i. 6, tells how Crispine met a friar in Canterbury "at C. Ch. one evening after the anthem."

CHRIST CHURCH. The famous Oxford college founded (under the name of Cardinal College) by Wolsey in 1525, on a scale of great magnificence. His fall in 1529 put an end to the building, and the N. side of the quadrangle was not completed till the reign of Charles II. In Nash's Lenten, p. 299, he refers to the "imperfect works of C.-ch. in Oxford," which has "too costly large foundations to be ever finished." Richd. Edwards, the dramatist, was at one time a member of C. Ch. Armin says in the preface to his Ninnes, "I was admitted in Oxford to be of C. Ch." Nicholas Grimald wrote his Archipropheta sive Johannes Baptista whilst a lecturer here in 1548. William Gager's Meleager was performed at C. Ch. in 1581 in the presence of Sidney, Leicester, and other distinguished visitors.

CHRIST-CHURCH, LONDON. At the dissolution of the monasteries Henry VIII gave the monastery of the Grey Friars on the N. side of Newgate St. to the City of Lond., and made the old ch. the head of a new parish to be called C. Ch., the monastery itself being at the same time dedicated to the purpose of the education of poor children (see CHRIST'S HOSPITAL). The graveyard of the old Ch. was invested with a peculiar sanctity in the popular imagination, and a large number of distinguished people had been buried there, including Margaret, wife of Edward I, Isabella, wife of Edward II, Roger Mortimer, John, D. of Bourbon, who was taken prisoner at Agincourt, and Sir T. Malory. The ch. was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. In Eastward i. 1, Quicksilver says of Touchstone, "His mother sold gingerbread in C. Ch.;" and in Taylor's Works ii. 234, he says, "The world runs on wheels like the great gridiron in C.-ch." In both cases the reference is to the school. The old lady doubtless came to sell gingerbread to the boys; and the great gridiron would be used for cooking their meals. In Heywood's Captives iv. 1, a document is produced stating that Mirable was "born in C.-ch., Lond., anno 1600." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 320, Lady Ramsie says, "I have known old Hobson sit in Christs Ch. morn by morn to watch poor couples that come there to be married and give them some few angels for a dower." Armin, in Ninnies, mentions "a cobbler, next to C.'s Ch. gate in Newgate Market." Burton, A. M. Intro., says, "Had I been as forward as some others I might have haply printed . . . a sermon at C.-ch."

The 1609 edition of Shakespeare's Sonnets "Are to be sold by John Wright, dwelling at C. Ch. gate." The Booke of Mery Riddles, to which Slender refers in M. W. W. i. 1, 209, was "Printed by Edward Alde, dwelling in Little Saint Bartholomewes, neere C.-ch. 1600." Chapman's Cæsar was "Imprinted by G. E. for John Wright, and are to be sold at his shop at C.-ch. Gate."

CHRISTCHURCH. A spt. in Hants, 101 m. S.W. of Lond. The parish ch. was the abbey of the Priory founded in the reign of Edward the Confessor. It is a noble building, almost on the scale of a cathedral. It contains a monument to Shelley. John Marston, the dramatist, was for a time vicar of C., after he had deserted the stage for Holy Orders in 1607.

CHRISTENDOM. That portion of the world that had embraced Christianity, as opposed to the heathen countries, and especially to the nations that were Mohammedan. Hence it is practically equivalent to Europe. In Shrew Ind. ii. 26, Sly says, "Score me up for the lyingest knave in C." In ii. 1, 188, Petruchio calls Katharine "the prettiest Kate in C." In H6 B. ii. 1, 125, Gloucester calls Saunder "the lyingest knave in C." In H6 C. iii. 2, 83, Clarence says that K. Edward is "the bluntest wooer in C." In R3 iii. 4, 53, Hastings says of Richd., "I think there's never a man in C. That can less hide his love or hate than he." In K. J. ii. 1, 74, Chatillon says that the English army is the bravest that ever set out "To do offence and scath in C." In iii. 1, 162, John speaks of "all the kings of C." being led so grossly by the Pope. In H4 A. i. 2, 109, Falstaff swears, "I'll be damned for never a king's son in C." In iii. 1, 164, Hotspur says, "I had rather live With cheese and garlic in a windmill, far, Than . . . have him talk to me In any summer-house in C." In H6 A. ii. 4, 89, Somerset says, "I'll maintain my words On any plot of ground in C." In v. 4, 96, Beaufort says, "The States of C. . . Have earnestly implored a general peace." In H3 ii. 2, 88, Wolsey commends the King for "committing freely Your scruple to the voice of C." In iii. 2, 67, Suffolk says that "all famous colleges Almost in C." are in favour of the divorce. In iv. 2, 63, Griffith says of Wolsey, "C. shall ever speak his virtue." In Mac. iv. 3, 192, Malcolm says of Siward, "An older and a better soldier none That C. gives out." In Thracian iii. 3, the Alcalde says, "In Africa the Moors are only known, And never yet searched part of C." In Middleton's Queenborough v. 1, Simon cries: "The K. of Kent! The K. of Kirsendom Shall not be better welcome. For you must imagine now, neighbours, this is The time when Kent stands out of Kirsendom For he that's king here now was never kirsened." The phrase "In Kent and C." was proverbial for the whole world. In Ford's Queen ii. 912, Lodovico says, "Your Ladyship shall be ballated through all C., and sung to scurvy tunes." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, George says, "At all the world we'll play, But C., that is our tiring-house, The rest our stage."

CHRISTOPHER. A tavern at Gravesend. Taylor, Works iii. 77, says, "Landing at Gravesend, we all went to C., where we took a Bacchanalian farewell one of another." There was a tavern with the same sign at Waltham. One of Tarleton's Jests relates an adventure of his with the hostess of the C. at Waltham.

CHRISTOPHER STREET. Mentioned in Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 2, as a st. in Milan. I cannot find any such st.: possibly the name was suggested by C. St., Lond., running from the N.E. corner of Finsbury Sq. to Clifton St.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE. University of Cambridge, at the top of St. Andrew's St., in C. Lane, opposite the end of Petty Cury. It was founded by the Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII, in 1505. Gurton was staged here about 1552. (The author was probably William Stevenson, a fellow of the college.) Milton was a student at C. C., and a mulberry tree in the garden is said to have been planted by him. Nicolas Grimald, the author of Christus Redivivus and Archiphrota (1543, 1548), was a student of this college at one time, but went to Oxford in 1542.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL. Lond., on the N. side of Newgate St., a little to the E. of the Old Bailey. It is on the site of Christ Ch., q.v. In 1552 Edward VI, at the instigation of Ridley, founded and endowed it as a school for poor children. Two or three arches on the S. side of the quadrangle are all that remains of the original building, which was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. The scholars were dressed in blue, hence the popular name "The Bluecoat School." In 1902 the school was removed to W. Horsham, and one of the most interesting buildings in Lond. was swept away. The new buildings of the G.P.O. occupy the site.

In Awdeley's Fraternity of Vagabonds (1575), he describes the Cheatour, or Fingerer, as walking "in such places whereas gentlemen and other worshipful citizens do resort, as at Poules, or Christes H., and sometime at the Royal Exchange." In Middleton's Widow ii. 1, Valeria's suitor congratulates himself that his 2 bastard children "are well provided for, they're i' the H." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 1, Kately explains that he picked up Cash as a child at his door, and "bred him at the H." In Ford's Queen i. 1, 99, Mureto says, "A H. boy in a blue coat shall transcribe as much in 6 hours." Armin, in Ninnies 50, says, "Write the sermon, boy, as the H. boys do." Machin, in his Diary 33, speaks of "all the children, both men and women children, all in blue coats, and wenchies in blue frocks." Armin's More-clacke has for a 2nd title, "The Life and Simple Maner of John in the H." The direction on the 1st entry of John is, "Enter John, Nurse, Boy, all in blue coats"; and later, "Enter John o' th' H. and a blue-coat boy with him." In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, Tryman says of his brother, "He has been one of the true Blue boys of the H." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 319, Lady Ramsie tells of one Master Rowland, "now an able citizen, late chosen a master of the H." Armin, in Ninnies, says, "On Easter Sunday the ancient custom is that all the children of the h. go before my Lord Mayor to the Spittle" (see SPITTLE). The Anatomy of a Woman's Tongue was "Printed for Richd. Harper and are to be sold at his shop at the H.-Gate. 1638." The Gate was opposite Warwick Lane. In Wise Men i. 1, Proberio says of Antonio's writings, "We'll put them in print and set them up to be sold at the H. porch near St. Nicholas Shambles."

CHYMÆRIAN. See CIMMERIAN.

CHYMERA. A mtn. in Lycia, just S. of Phaselis. An unquenchable flame was said to issue from a cleft in the mtn., which seems to have been due to a jet of gas. The legend of the fire-breathing Chimæra probably took its origin from this phenomenon. In Richards' Messallina v. 2175, Sautellus says, "My heart is far more Unpassable than C. mt." In T. Heywood's Gold Age iii., Saturn, being exhorted to be patient, cries: "Teach me to mollify the Corsicke rock Or make the Mt. C. passable." In his B. Age i., Deianeira speaks of being attacked by "the lions in Chimera bred."

CICELY. See SICILY.

CILICIA. The province in S.E. Asia Minor, between the Taurus Range and the sea. Up till the time of Alexander the Gt. it was ruled by kings under the title of Syennesis. It then passed under the power of the Seleucid dynasty at Antioch, and was constituted a Roman province by Pompeius in 66 B.C. In Ant. iii. 6, 15, Cæsar mentions it as one of the provinces assigned by Antony to his son Ptolemy: "To Ptolemy he assigned Syria, C., and Phœnicia." This is a verbal quotation from Plutarch. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass, the scene of which is laid at Nineveh in the time of the prophet Jonah, a K. of C. appears as one of the characters. In T. D.'s Banquet, there is an unhistorical K. of C. called Armatries. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 125, the K. of C. offers his services to Pompey: there was no such K. at this time, C. being a Roman province. Spenser, in Virgil's Gnat 671, speaks of "Saffron, sought for in Cn. soil." Browne, in Britannia's Pastorals i. 2, speaks of "Saffron, confected in C."

CIMBRI. A Celtic tribe whose exact home is uncertain. Along with the Teutones they invaded Italy 101 B.C., and were defeated by C. Marius at Campi Raudii. In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline says, "Behold this silver eagle; 'Twas Marius' standard in the Can. war." In Kyd's Cornelia iii. chor., we have, "Noble Marius, Arpin's friend, That did the Latin state defend From Cymbrian rage." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iv. 2, Tamburlaine compares himself and his troops to "an herd of lusty Cymbrian bulls." The meaning would seem to be savage, untamed, like the C. So Spenser, F. Q. i. 8, 11, speaks of a herd of bulls "in Cymbrian plain."

CIMMERIANS (Cn. = Cimmerian). A legendary people who dwelt beyond the Ocean-river in perpetual darkness unvisited by the rays of the sun (Hom., Odys. xi. 14). The name is also applied historically to a Thracian tribe living about the Tauric Chersonese, who in early times invaded Asia Minor and caused widespread terror amongst the Greeks on the coast. But it is the legendary C. who have through Homer passed into literature.

In Tit. ii. 3, 74, the Moor is spoken of as "your swarth Cn.," the reference being to his dark colour; for all Shakespeare's Moors are represented as black. Marlowe, in Tamb. A. v. 1, speaks of "the Cn. Styx": meaning to suggest the gloom of the underworld. In Massinger's Virgin iv. 3, Antoninus says, "the glorious sun himself To me's Cn. darkness." In Chaucer, House of Fame i. 73, the abode of the God of Sleep is "Besyde a folk men clepe Cymerie." In Milton's L'Allegro 10 (1632), Melancholy is adjured, "There under ebon shades and low-brow'd rocks, In dark Cn. desert ever dwell." Taylor, Works iii. 111, has "the Leathean den of oblivious Cimerianism." In Chettle's Hoffman iv., Hoffman cries: "All ye yellow tapers of the heaven Vail your clear brightness in Ciamerian mists." In Brome's Concubine iv. 8, the K. prays, "Shew me some light Through these Cymmerian mists of doubts and fears." In W. Rowley's All's Lost v. 5, 126, Julianus says, "Where's this tyrant? Turn me but to him, and from these darkened eyes I shall discover his Cymmerian face." In Cowley's Cutter i. 5, Worm says, "Dost thou not live, Cutter, in the Chymærian darkness of ignorance?" At which Jolly protests, "Cymmerian, Capt., let it be Cymmerian." Evidently Worm thought the word had to do with Chymæra. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts, "I displayed the Eagle . . . in the rough Cn. Bosphorus," i.e. the modern Strait of Kertch connecting the Sea of Azov with the Black Sea. The reference is to Cæsar's campaign against Pharnaces 47 B.C.

CINQUE PORTS (Lat. QUINQUE PORTUS: the 5 ports). On the S.E. coast of England, viz. Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich, to which were added later Winchelsea and Rye. They furnished the greater part of the English navy, and had in return many privileges, including freedom from taxation and full cognizance of all criminal and civil cases within their liberties. The Governor of Dover Castle is also Warden of the C. P.: the Barons of the C. P. had the right of bearing the canopy over the Sovereign at his coronation. In H3 iv. 1, in the order of Q. Anne's coronation procession, we find: "8. A canopy borne by 4 of the C. P.; under it, the Q. in her robes." Lower down (29) one of the spectators says, "They that bear The cloth of honour o'er her are 4 Barons Of the C.-p." The "Barones de Hastings et de quinque portibus" are mentioned in a Charter of Richard I, 1191. In Oldcastle iv. 3, the Bp. charges the Lord Warden, "That all the C. P., whereof you are chief, Be laid forthwith that he escape us not." In Look about xxxiii., old Richard Fauconbridge is described as "Lord of the C. P." In Armin's Moreclacke D. 4, Sir William, when his daughter has eloped, demands "a warrant for a general search, restraints for Cinck-p." The phrase was also applied to the 5 senses. Taylor, Works i. 79, speaks of "the C.-port senses" of Lond. Rogers, Sacraments ii. 7 (1633), says, "Conscience keeps the C. p., the out-lets and in-lets of the heart and life." It is also used of the gates of a city, port being taken as equivalent to porta. In Timon i. 2, Eutrapelus says, "I walked through the byways of the town, the Schools, the C. p., the market places." The scene is at Athens, and it is just possible that Eutrapelus means the harbours of the city, which were within the Long Walls. In Three Lords (Dods., vi. 398), Simplicity says to Wealth, "Thou are no C.-port man; thou art not wit-free": the allusion being to the freedom from taxation enjoyed by the C. P.

CIRCASSIA. The dist. N. of the Caucasus Range, between the Caspian and the Black Seas. The women are fair and famous for their beauty, and are sold in large numbers for the harems of the Turks. In Davenant's Rhodes B. iv., Solyman speaks of Mustapha as "the pledge of my Cn. wife."

CIRCEII. A town on the coast of Latium, some 50 m. S.E. of Rome. It was a favourite summer resort of the Romans, and was specially celebrated for its oysters. In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline, speaking of the luxury of the nobles, says, "Circei too is searched To please the witty gluttony of a meal."

CIRENCESTER (called sometimes CICESTER, sometimes CIREN). A town in Gloucestersh., abt. 90 m. W. of Lond. It was a British town and, as its name implies, a Roman station. It has one of the finest parish churches in England, with a tower 132 ft. high. In R2 v. 6, 3, Bolingbroke says, "The rebels have consumed with fire Our town of Cicester in Gloucestersh." The account is given in Holinshed. The leaders of the army were in the town and their army camped outside. They were attacked in their Inns by the bailiff, and as a signal to their army set one of the Inns on fire. The army, taking this to be a signal of Bolingbroke's approach, fled; but the fire burnt a large part of the town. William Cartwright, the dramatist, was the son of an innkeeper at C.

CIRRHA. The port of Delphi on the Gulf of Corinth, at the foot of Mt. Cirphis. The plain around it was dedicated to Apollo, the god of poetry. In Nero i. 4, Lucan, the poet of the Civil Wars of Rome, says, "I love the unnatural wounds from whence did flow Another C., a new Helicon": a somewhat egotistical reference to his poems. In Barclay's Lost Lady i. 1, the Physician says of Lycides, "He lost his mistress; her urn is in C., which my lord nightly visits." In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiv. 4392, Crates tells of 2 rich men who "being from Sycion to Cyrra bound Were in the midway near Iapygium drowned." In going from Sycion to C. they would not get outside of the Corinthian Gulf, so would not be near Iapygium at all.

CIRTA (now CONSTANTINEH). The ancient capital of the Massylii in Numidia. It lies 185 m. S.E. of Algiers and 45 m. from the coast. It was a strong fortress, and was captured by Metellus in 108 B.C. from Jugurtha. The scene of Marston's Sophonisba is laid at C. in 203 B.C. during the war between the Romans and Syphax. In ii. 2, Jugurtha says, "Syphax runs his well-breathed horse Direct to C., the most beauteous city Of all his kingdom." The scene of Act II of Nabbes' Hannibal is laid at the Court of Syphax in Cyrtha, 204 B.C.

CISSEPHUS. I suspect a misprint, or mistake, for Cephissus, the little stream which flowed through Athens to the B. of Phalerum. Heywood seems to think of it as in Sicily, but he may have confused the Eleusinian Mysteries, which celebrated the story of Persephone and were held at Eleusis, near Athens, and the annual festivals held in honour of the goddess at Enna, in Sicily. There were many streams at Enna, but I cannot find one with this name. In T. Heywood's Mistress v. 1, Pluto says, "This day The virgins of Sicilia on C. banks Are gathered in well-ordered multitudes" to celebrate the return to upper Earth of Persephone.

CYTHÆRON. The range of mtns. separating Boëtia from Attica. It was the scene of the deaths of Actæon and Pentheus. It abounded in game. In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Montsurry says that men will not be stayed "Till they embrace within their wife's 2 breasts All Pelion and Cythæron with their beasts." In Mason's Mulleasses 2376, Borgias cries in death, "Sink, sink, Cythæron; high Pallene, tremble": cf. Seneca, Herc. Fur. 979. In Pickering's Horestes C. 2, in a song by Ægisthus, it is said that Helen found occasion to meet Paris "in Cytheron where each of them the other did greet the feast upon." There was an annual festival to Zeus on the top of C., called the Dædala. In Peele's Arraignement v. 1, Venus swears, "By all the honour and the sacrifice That from C. and from Paphos rise." There is probably a confusion here between C. and Cythera, the island sacred to Venus. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 6, 29, also speaks of "Cytheron hills" as one of the haunts of Venus; and again in vi. 10, 9. In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, the mad Frederick says, "Carry me up to Hymettus top, Cytheron, Othris or Pindus where she [Diana] affects to walk and take the air." Hall, in Satires i. 2, 19, says, in reference to the erotic poetry of the day, "Cytheron hill's become a brothel bed."

CITY MILLS. In Cor. i. 10, 31, Aufidius says, "I am attended at the cypress grove; I pray you—'Tis S. the c. m.—bring me word thither." Aldis Wright points out that in 1588 the Mayor and Corporation of Lond. petitioned the Q. for power to build 4 cornmills on the Thames near the bidge.: these would be near to the Globe and familiar to the audience. For a similar transference of a local reference, see under CAPITOL.

CIVILL. See SEVILLE.

CIVITA VECCHIA. The port of Rome, 38 m. N.W. of the city on the coast of the Mediterranean. It was constructed by the Emperor Trajan, and later was strongly fortified. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, Pope Alexander offers to Charles VIII "to render presently the citadels of Terracina, C. V., and Spoleto" as the condition of peace. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have visited, amongst other places in Italy, "Roma, V., Bonomia, etc."

CIZICUM. See CYZICUM.

CLAN-GIBBON. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, Knavesby, pointing to a map of Ireland, says, "Here is C.-G., a fruitful country and well-wooded." This upper part is the Cossacks' land; here runs the Kernesdale, admirable feed for cattle; and hereabout is St. Patrick's Purgatory." All these places seem to be imaginary, though Patrick's Purgatory has found a local habitation on an island in Lough Dearg, in Donegal.

CLAPHAM. Originally a vill. in Surrey, abt. 5 m. S.W. of St. Paul's; now a suburb of Lond. The Common is an open space abt. 200 acres in extent. Taylor, Works ii. 1, says, "I saw the cedars of Lebanon read a sad lecture unto C. Heath."

CLARE HALL (now CLARE COLLEGE). University of Cambridge, founded by Elizabeth de Burgh in 1359. It stands on the river, which is crossed at this point by C. Bidge., W. of King's. Robert Greene, the dramatist, proceeded M.A. from C. H. in 1583. The recently discovered play called Club Law, a diverting account of the feud between Town and Gown, was performed at C. H. in 1597.

CLARE'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond.: possibly that which afterwards became Jonson's Hotel in Clare Court, on the E. side of Drury Lane next to Blackmoor St. In Barry's Ram iii. 1, Ruff, describing what he would do if he could get a rich wife, says, "I would eat at C. o. and dice at Antony's."

CLAUDIAN AQUEDUCT. An aqueduct at Rome, begun by Caligula and finished by Nero. It brought water to the city from the Alban Hills across the Campagna, over a series of noble arches of travertine, the ruins of which are still a conspicuous feature of the landscape. Its whole length was 46 m., and for 10 of them it was carried on arches. It entered the city at the S.E. corner. In May's Agrippina i. 1, 338, Vitellius mentions amongst the buildings of Rome, "Julius' Temple, Claudius' Aqueducts."

CLEMENT DANES (ST.). A ch. in Lond. at the E. end of the Strand, in the middle of the rd. and slightly athwart the direction of it owing to its exact orientation E. and W. The origin of the suffix D. is variously explained as due to the burial there of Harold Harefoot, the illegitimate son of Canute; or to a defeat of the D. by the Londoners in the reign of Ethelred; or to a small settlement of D. who were allowed to remain after the expulsion of the rest from England. The 1st ch. was built somewhere about A.D. 1000. It was repaired at various times during the 17th cent., and was finally pulled down in 1680 and rebuilt by Wren, the steeple being added in 1719. It was repaired and restored in 1839. It has a fine peal of 10 bells, cast in 1693, to replace those whose chimes Falstaff and Shallow "heard at midnight" when they were students in C.'s Inn (H4 B. iii. 2, 228). They figure in the nursery rhyme, "Oranges and lemons, Say the bells of St. Clemens." Dr. Johnson occupied a pew in the N. gallery, indicated by a brass plate affixed in 1851. Stow tells of the disturbances caused in the neighbourhood of the church by the "unthrifths of the Inns of Chancery." In Jonson's Augurs, the bearward sings, to the dancing of his bears, "Nor the Vintry-Cranes, nor St. C. D., Nor the Devil can put us down." The point would seem to lie in the opposition to bear-baiting by the players, who found that that sport diminished their houses: doubtless the young lawyers supported them in their protest. In Middleton's Five Gallants, the 1st Gallant is "of St. C.'s parish"; and in v. 1, we learn that young Franklin's tailor is "Master Weatherwise by St. C.'s ch." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellamont advises Kate to set up as perwig maker in the Strand, and promises, "You shall have as good a coming in by hair and by other foolish tiring as any between St. C.'s and Charing." Sweetnam was "Printed for Richd. Meighen and are to be sold at his shops at St. Cs. Ch., over-against Essex House, and at Westminster Hall. 1620."

CLEMENT'S INN. One of the Inns of Court in Lond., lying immediately W. of the New Law Courts, and near the Ch. of St. C. Danes on the N. of the Strand. Near by was C. Well, which in Shakespeare's time was paved and curbed and always full of water. It was connected with the Inner Temple, and was an I. of Chancery before the reign of Edward IV. These Is. were places of residence for students of the Law, and resembled in many ways the colleges of the universities. Shallow, in H4 B. iii. 2, indulges in some pleasant reminiscences of the time when "I was once of C. I., where I think they will talk of mad Shallow yet." It was "55 year ago," and Jane Nightwork "had Robin Nightwork by old Nightwork before I came to C. I." He remembers being Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show, "when I lay at C. I." Falstaff was his fellow student there: "I do remember him," says the Fat Knight, "at C. I. like a man made after supper of a cheeseparing: when he was naked, he was for all the world like a forked radish with a head fantastically carved upon it with a knife." Harman, in his Caveat ii., tells of a counterfeit crank who begged about the Temple the most part of the day, "unless it were about xii of the clock he went on the backside of C. I. without Temple Bar; there is a lane that goeth into the Fields; there he renewed his face again with fresh blood which he carried about him in a bladder."

CLEMENT'S (SAINT) LANE (now C. LANE). A st. in Lond. running from 28 Lombard St. to K. William St., just above its junction with East Cheap. In Deloney's Craft i. 10, Mrs. Eyre says, "We'll dine at my cousin John Barber's in St. C. L., which is not far from the George in Lumbard-st."

CLEONÆ. A town in the Peloponnesus, between Corinth and Argos, abt. 15 m. N.E. of the latter city. It was close to Nemea, and the Nemean games were celebrated in its territory. In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., the Herdsman says of the Nemean lion that it "commands the Cleonian continent, Unpeoples towns." The lion was killed by Herakles. In Scot. Presb. v. 1, Anarchy says, "Cleonian lions and Daonian bears Are not so ravenous."

CLERKENWELL. A dist. in Lond., N. of C. Rd., between Gray's Inn Rd. and Goswell Rd. So named from a well at the S.E. end of Ray St., which was used by the Brothers of St. John and the Benedictine nuns. The dist. shared with Hockley-in-the-hole and Turnmill St. a particularly bad reputation as a haunt of thieves and loose women. In Middleton's Mad World iii. 2, the Courtesan, supposed to be on her deathbed, sends her commendations "to all my good cousins in C. and St. John's." In Randolph's Muses' iv. 3, Justice Nimis reckons, "The yearly value of my fair manor of C. is pounds so many," and adds Turnbal, Pickthatch, and Shoreditch as other contributors to his income. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, the Wise Woman, in a list of female quacks and fortune-tellers, says, "There's a very reverend matron on C. Green, good at many things." In Dekker's News from Hell, we are told of the "whores and thieves that live in C." Taylor, Works ii. 102, speaks of a certain lady as "the honestest woman that dwells between Smithfield Bars and C." In Marston's Courtesan i. 2, Cocledemoy says, "They [bawds] must needs both live well and die well, since most commonly they live in Clerkenwell and die in Bridewell." In Middleton's No Wit i. 1, Weatherwise says, "Some lousy fiddler run away with your daughter; may C. have the first cut of her and Houndsditch pick her bones!" In Brome's City Wit ii. 2, Crack says of Mrs. Tryman: "She was born in Clearkewell and was never half a day's journey from Bridewell in her life." There was an annual wrestling match at C. which was attended by competitors from all parts of the country. Hentzner tells how he saw the Lord Mayor present at it in all the glory of his state robes.

CLERMONT (more fully, C. FERRAND). The capital of Basse-Auvergne, 237 m. S. of Paris. It is the old Augustonometum, or Aveni. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, built in 1248. Here the Council was held in 1095 which decided on the 1st Crusade. In Marlowe's Ed. II v. 5, the unhappy K. recalls how he ran at tilt in France for the sake of his Q. Isabel, "And there unhorsed the D. of C." In Cavendish's Life of Wolsey iii., we are told that the Viscount C. was one of the prisoners brought back from France by Henry VIII in 1513.

CLEVELAND. The dist. around Cleves, on the Rhine, 75 m. E. of Rotterdam. It was part of the theatre of the war between the Spaniards and the Dutch in the early years of the 17th cent.; and Cleves was taken by the Dutch in 1625. Many English volunteers assisted the Dutch in these wars. In Dekker's Hon. Wh., B. v. 2, Bots boasts of having served there: "In C. I missed but little, having the bridge of my nose broken down with 2 great stones, as I was scaling a fort." There is a double entendre here. In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Kate says to Capt. Pout, "I shall be here at home, and you in C. abroad." In Taylor's Works iii. 24, we are told that "Lieut. Puffe from Cleaveland is returned." In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Jenkin speaks of "all the Low Countries in Christendom, as Holland and Zealand, and Netherland and C. too." In B. & F. Scornful v. 3, Loveless says of Morecraft's reformation, "There will be no more talk of the Cleve wars while this lasts." In the next scene Welford says to Martha, "When you can hold out no longer, marry some cast Cleve capt. and sell bottle-ale."

CLEVES (German, CLEVE). A town in Rhenish Prussia, 70 m. N.W. of Cologne. The old castle of Schwanenburg, the former residence of the Dukes of C., is now the public offices of the town. Here was born Anne of C., the 4th wife of Henry VIII. In S. Rowley's When You F. i. the K. says, "Anne of Cleave shall be sent home again."

CLIFFORD'S INN. Originally the town house of the Cliffords, leased to the students of Law by Isabel, widow of Robert de Clifford, in 1344. It lies on the N. side of Fleet St., between Chancery Lane and Fetter Lane, behind St. Dunstan's Ch. It was the oldest of the Is. of Chancery. The Honourable Society of C. I. was dissolved in 1902, and the hall and some of the buildings have been recently acquired by the Society of Knights Bachelors. In Middleton's R. G. iv. 1, Moll, disguised as a man, pretends to be a teacher of music "right against C. I." Andromana was "Printed for John Bellinger and are to be sold at his shop in C. I. Lane in Fleet St. 1660." C. I. Lane was the entrance to the I. from Fleet St., by St. Dunstan's Ch.

CLIFTON (more fully C.-CUM-GLAPTON). A vill. in Notts., 3 m. S.W. of Nottingham. It possesses a fine old ch. and almshouses for 6 old women. C. is the home of the heroine of Sampson's Vow. In v. 2, 58, Miles quotes from the ballad which is the foundation of the play: "Not far from Nottingham of late In C., as I hear, There dwelt a fair and comely dame, For beauty without peer."

CLINK. A prison on the Bankside, Southwark, W. of Winchester House, at the corner of Maid Lane. C. St. still preserves the name. It was removed to Deadman's Place in 1745 and was burnt down by the Gordon rioters in 1780. Bp. Hooper was committed "from the Counter in Southwark to the C." (Works ii. 181). After Bradford's excommunication in St. Mary Overies, he was "delivered to the sheriffs of Lond., and so had to the C." (Works i. 492). In T. Heywood's Fortune iii. 4, the Clown, who is making a proclamation at the dictation of the Pursevant, changes "Purser and Clinton" into "Lost their purses at the C." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says, "I have . . . left my wits fast fettered in the Ce." C. is used to-day as a slang term for prison.

CLOTH-FAIR. A st. in Lond. running from the E. side of W. Smithfield, parallel to and just S. of Long Lane: it formerly went right through to Aldersgate St., but now stops at Kinghorn St. It is one of the last surviving bits of mediæval Lond. It was, as the name implies, the resort of drapers and clothiers. In Jonson's Barthol. Ind., the Stage-keeper regrets that Tarleton had not lived to have played in Bartholomew Fair: "You should have seen him come in, and have been cozened in the c.-quarter so finely!"

CLOUGH. A narrow valley between 2 steep hills. Clym, or Clem, o' the C. was one of the trio of famous archers, the others being Adam Bell and William of Cloudeley. The ballad detailing their exploits will be found in Percy's Reliques. Their home was in the forest of Englewood, near Carlisle. In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, Ample speaks of Thwack as "this rude Clim o' the C." In Lawyer ii., Curfew addresses Vaster as "My brave Clem o' th' C." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 2, Randall says the hills near Kingston "are no more near mountains in Wales than Clim of the C.'s bow to her cozen David's harp." In Jonson's Alch. i. 1, Face says, "I bring you no cheating Clim o' the Cloughs, or Claribels." Nash, in Pierce, calls the devil "Clim of the C., thou that usest to drink nothing but scalding lead and sulphur in hell."

CNIDOS. See GNIDON.

COBHAM. A vill. in Kent, 4 m. S. of Gravesend. In R2 ii. 1, 279, "Rainold, Lord C." is mentioned amongst those who accompanied Bolingbroke from Brittany in his attack upon Richd. II. This Rainold, or Reginald, is praised by Froissart as one of the best warriors in England: he was banished to Jersey in 1398 for complicity in Gloucester's supposed plot. His daughter and heiress Joan married the famous Sir J. Oldcastle, who by this marriage became Lord C. He is the hero of the pseudo-Shakespearean play Oldcastle, and the part afterwards transferred to Sir J. Falstaff in the Henry IV plays was originally given to him. He headed an insurrection of the Lollards and was hanged as a traitor and burned as a heretic in 1417. In the very lame disclaimer (quis'excuse s'accuse!) in the Epilogue to H4 B., it is said "Falstaff shall die of a sweat; for Oldcastle died a martyr, and this is not the man." The Prince addresses Falstaff in H4 A. i. 2, 47, as "my old lad of the Castle"; and in Fam. Vict., the part is assigned to Sir John Old-Castle which Shakespeare gives to Falstaff. The Eleanor C. of H6 B. ii. 3 was the 3rd daughter of Sir Reginald C., son of the 2nd Lord Reginald C. mentioned above. She was the 2nd wife of the good D. Humphrey of Gloucester, and died in prison in the Isle of Man in 1454. In H6 C. i. 2, 40, York sends his son Edward to win over "my Lord of C. With whom the Kentishmen will willingly rise"; and in line 56 we learn that "noble Warwick, C., and the rest" have been left by York as protectors of the King. In Oldcastle several of the scenes are laid at Sir John's house at C. In iii. 3, Doll complains to the priest of Wrootham, "You might have left me at C. until you had been better provided for"; and in iv. 1, this same priest, who is also a highwayman, mentions "Chobham Down" as one of the places which pay him tithes.

COCITUS. See COCYTUS.

COCK. A well-known tavern in Fleet St., Lond., near the corner of Chancery Lane. It was originally called the C. and Bottle. It escaped the Gt. Fire and can be traced back to the time of Elizabeth, when John Garlak wrote to Mr. Latimer "at the sign of the C. near St. Dunstan's Ch." It was pulled down to make room for a branch of the Bank of England in 1887, but was reopened under the old name on the opposite side of the rd. in 1888. The old sign, said to have been carved by Grinling Gibbons, is preserved in the house: the sign outside is modern. Everyone knows Tennyson's lyrical monologue to Will Waterproof, "the plump headwaiter at the C." There were other C. Taverns in Tothill St., Westminster, pulled down in 1873 to make room for the Aquarium; in Bow St.; and on the S. side of Old St. Harman, in Caveat, speaks of another in Kent St., in Southwark. It was also a bookseller's sign. Arthur of Little Bretayne was "Imprinted at Lond. in Powles Ch. yard at the sign of the Ce. by Roberte Redborne."

COCK AND HEN. A tavern in Highgate. Highgate, being the last stage on the way to Lond., had a great many taverns. Hone, in Every-Day Bk. (1826), enumerates 19 in the High St. In Jonson's Tub i. 2, we are told of Sim Valentine, who "kept brave house at the C.-and-Hen in Highgate."

COCKATRICE. One of the taverns in Rome (i.e. Lond.) enumerated by Valerius in T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5: "The punk unto the C." C. was often used for a prostitute; and the name of the tavern may have been invented to suit the author's purpose. I have not been able to find any reference to a tavern with this sign.

COCKERMOUTH. An ancient town in Cumberland, at the junction of the Cocker and Derwent, 24 m. S.W. of Carlisle. It has a finely situated castle, which was in olden times a strong fortress. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xii., in a nonsensical dialogue between Folly and Fancy, Folly irrelevantly turns the conversation by saying, "Marry, Sir, C. is a good way hence." To which Fancy retorts: "What? Of Cokermouth spake I no word." Folly seems to mean, if anything at all, "I am far from flattering you."

COCK LANE. A st. in Lond. running E. from Snow Hill to Giltspur St., in W. Smithfield. Pie Corner is at the corner of Giltspur St. and Cock L. It is mentioned in 1383 as the only allowed place of abode for courtesans on that side of the city; and Clarice of Cokkeslane is one of the merry company of Glutton's fellowship in Piers B. v. 319. In Whetstone's Promos iv. 1, Gresco orders the beadles to "search Ducke Alley, Cockelane, and Scouldes corner" for lewd persons. There was another C. L. in Shoreditch, now called Boundary St., running N. from Church St. to Austin St. This is the one referred to by Davenant in Wits v. 3, "O, Sir, 'twill make 'em sing like the silk-knitters of C.-l."

COCKNEY. In the sense of a born Londoner only occurs after 1600. The original meaning is a cock's egg (cocken-ey) which was supposed to be small and misshapen; then a milksop, a foolish, affected person. It is in this sense only that Shakespeare uses the word—Tw. N. iv. 1, 15: "This great lubber, the world, will prove a c."; and Lear ii. 4, 123, "Cry to it, nuncle, as the c. did to the eels when she put 'em i' the paste alive." The 1st example of the localized sense quoted in O.E.D. is in Rowlands' Lett. Hum. Blood iv. 65 (1600), "I scorn to let a Bow-bell C. put me down." Minshew, Ductor (1617), says, "A C., or Cockney, applied only to one born within the sound of Bow-bell"; and goes on to give an absurd derivation of it from a young Londoner going into the country and talking about a cock neighing. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 5, the Lord Mayor of Lond. says of his daughter, "My fine c. would have none of him." In Prodigal ii. 1, Oliver, the Devonshire clothier, in response to Flowerdale's chaff about his provincial pronunciation, says, "Ay, and well said, cocknell, and Bow-bell too." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "As Frenchmen love to be bold . . . so cs., especially she-cs., love not aqua vitæ when 'tis good for them." In Day's B. Beggar v., Stroud says, "I think you be sib to one of the London-cs. that asked whether haycocks were better meat boiled or roasted." In Brome's Northern ii. 1, Widgin says, "I am a C.

and was never further than Hammersmith." In his Ct. Beggar iii. 1, Swaynwit says to Citywit, who has just been boasting that he was born in the City, "Darst thou tell me of clowns, thou c. chicken-hearted whelp thou?"

COCKPIT. Properly an enclosed circle for the sport of cock-fighting; then applied to a theatre, especially to the pit. So Shakespeare, H5 prol. 11, says, "Can this C. hold The vasty fields of France?" L. Digges, in Shaks. Suppl. i. 71, says, "Let but Beatrice and Benedict be seen; lo! in a trice The C., galleries, boxes, all are full." The name was then appropriated to one particular theatre, erected on the site of a c. in Drury L. about 1615. It was sacked by the prentices in 1617 and reopened under the name of the "Phoenix." In Dekker's Owl's Almanac (1618), we read: "Shrove Tuesday falls on that day which the prentices pulled down the C."; and in Middleton's Inner Temp. 174, Dr. Almanac says, "Stand forth, Shrove Tuesday! 'tis in your charge to pull down bawdy-houses; ruin the C.! the poor players never thrived in it." It may fairly be regarded as the progenitor of the famous Drury Lane. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 2, Centaure talks of the lovers who "invite us to the C. and kiss our hands all the play-time." L. Digges, in Shaks. Suppl. i. 71, says, "May the Bull or C. have Your lame blank verse to keep you from the grave." The actors, in their Remonstrance (1643), say, "It is not unknown to all the audience that have frequented the private houses of Blackfriars, the C., and Salisbury Court, without austerity we have purged our stages from all obscene and scurrilous jests." Brome, in a note at the end of the Antipodes, says, "It was at first intended for the C. stage." In Dekker's Babylon 214, Plain Dealing says, "This one little C. is able to shew all the follies of your kingdom, in a few apes of the kingdom." In Nabbes' C. Garden i. 1, Ralph is delighted that his master is coming to live in Covent Garden: "we shall then be near the C., and see a play now and then." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 2, Lorece says, "I at any time will carry you to a play either to the Black Friar's or C." In the 1st Folio (preface) of Shakespeare, the authors address the critics as you that "Sit on the stage at Blackfriars or the C. to arraign plays daily." Glapthorne's Hollander was "acted at the C. in Drury Lane"; and his Argalus "at the private house in Drury-Lane," which is obviously the C.

COCKPIT-IN-COURT. See under WHITEHALL.

COCK'S HEATH. A heath in Kent, mentioned, in Old-castle iv. 1, by the parson of Wrotham as one of the places from which he levies tithe as a highwayman.

COCYTUS. A river of Epirus flowing into the Acheron, now the Vuvo. Homer places it in the lower world: Odys. x. 514, "There into Acheron C. glides, Streaming from Styx and Piriphegethon." Vergil is not altogether self-consistent, but seems to regard C. as a deep pool into which the Acheron discharges itself down a great steep; and describes it as a stagnant marsh with black mud and hideous reed beds. Dante makes it a frozen lake into which all the waters of Hell collect. In Tit. ii. 3, 236, Martius describes Aaron's pitfall as "this fell, all-devouring receptacle, As hateful as C.' misty mouth." In the old Timon iv. 3, Timon declares that Speusippus "deserves the pain Of Sisyphus, thirst of Tantalus, And in thy lake, C., to remain." In Marlowe, Tamb. A. v. 1, Bajazeth invokes "Furies from the black C. lake." Vergil calls C. "the dread river of the Furies" (Æn. vi. 375). In Massinger's Believe iii. 2, Berecinthus says, "I do not fear thee, Pluto, though thou hast Assumed a shape not to be matched in C." : where the conception is vague and the accent wrong. In Wilson's Cobler 677, Charon tells the Cobbler that in order to accommodate the huge crowds that are coming to hell, "C., Lethe, Phlegeton, shall all be digged into Styx." In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Caesar asks, "Can I too soon go taste C.' flood?" In T. Heywood's Mistress iii., Psyche speaks of "Cocitus, That fearful stream, which feeds the river Stix." In Marston's Leaguer i. 2, Jeffrey says, "We shall fall into a lake that will foully dight us, Darker and deeper than Styx or C." : where the rhyme should be noted. In Lochrine iii. 6, 13, Humber invokes "You ugly sprites that in Cocitus mourn And gnash your teeth" : where it means simply Hell. Milton, P. L. ii. 579, names the rivers of Hell, Acheron, Styx, "C., named of lamentation loud Heard on the rueful stream," and Phlegeton; Lethe, the river of oblivion, flows "far off from these." In Contention, Pt. I, Haz., p. 435, Bullenbroke, in his invocation, says, "Send up, I charge you, from Sotetus lake The spirit Askalon to come to me."

CODEMIA. A town near the Dniester, or Tyras, alleged in Marlowe, Tamb. B. i. 3, to have been subdued by Theridamas: "By the r. Tyras I subdued Stoka [Starakostaninow], Podolia, and C." It is probably Kodma, a small town in the Polish province of Volhynia, just N. of Podolia, on a confluent of the Bug of the same name.

CODPIECE ROW. A court in Westminster on the S. side of Petty France, now York St. It was notorious as a haunt of women of bad character, from which it doubtless gained its name. In Middleton's Inner Temp. 173, Dr. Almanac says, "Stand forth, Shrove Tuesday! 'Tis in your charge to pull down bawdy-houses: deface Turnbull and tickle C. R." The reference is to the annual attack made by the prentices on houses of ill-fame on Shrove Tuesday. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Nicholas addresses the prostitute Damaris as "old Countess of C. R."

COIMBRA. A city of Portugal 110 m. N. of Lisbon on the road to Oporto. It is the seat of a university. In Stucley 2671, the "Bish. of Cambra" is named in the list of those who were slain at the battle of Alcazar.

COINTREE. See COVENTRY.

COKERMOWTHE. See COCKERMOUTH.

COLCHESTER (the CAMALODUNUM of the Romans). An ancient town in Essex, on the Colne, 51 m. N.E. of Lond. It had a special reputation for the excellence of its oysters. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick relates that Mass Stone, the fool, had "weekly intelligence" of foreign affairs conveyed "sometimes in C. oysters and your Selsey cockles." In Massinger's New Way iv. 1, Overreach asks Greedy, "Did you not devour this morning a shield of brawn and a barrel of C. oysters?" Nash, in Lenten, mentions the "C. oystermen." In J. Heywood's Weather, Farmer, p. 99, Merry Report claims to have been, amongst many other places alliteratively enumerated, "at Canterbury, at Coventry, at C." Dekker, in News from Hell, says that the miles to Hell "are not half so long as those between C. and Ipswich in England." C. is only abt. 15 m. from Ipswich. In Percy's Cuckqueans (first performed in the Tarlton Inn in C.), the stage represents simultaneously Harwich, C., and Maldon. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 58, says of K. Coyl (old K. Cole), "He of his name Coyl-chester built of stone and lime." Drayton, in Polyolb. xix. 125, speaking of C., asks, "Think you our oysters here unworthy of your praise?" Deloney, in Craft i. 5, tells how the Q. of Logria "was laid in prison in C. Castle."

COLCHOS. The dist. at the extreme E. end of the Black Sea: it is chiefly known through the story of the Argonautic expedition, which set out under the leadership of Jason to recover the fleece of the golden ram on which Phrixus had fled thither from his father Athamas, K. of Thessaly. Jason got the fleece through the help of Medea, the daughter of the K. Aeetes, and returned with it to Greece, having married Medea. The legend is a very ancient one and was known to Homer. In Merch. i. 1, 171, Bassanio says of Portia, "Her sunny locks Hang on her temples like a golden fleece, Which makes her seat of Belmont C.' strand, And many Jasons come in quest of her." Chaucer, in Leg. of Good Women 1368, tells the story of Medea: "in an ile that called was C., beyond Troye, estwarde in the see, etc.," and mentions the dragon and the "2 bolles maked al of bras, that spitten fire" who kept guard over the fleece. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 4, Tamburlaine promises his soldiers, "Damascus [shall be] spoils as rich to you As was to Jason C.' golden fleece." In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 1, Byron, hearing the predictions of the astrologer La Brosse, exclaims: "The bulls of C. . . could not have burnt my blood so." In Nero iii. 3, Seneca cries: "O Rome, the Getes, the men of Colchis at thy sufferings grieve": the men of C. standing for the most savage barbarians. In Greene's Orlando v. 2, 1437, Orlando speaks of "That gallant Grecian keel That brought away the Colchian fleece of gold." In Alimony iii. 6, the Ghost says, "Jason won much at Colchis." In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Jason says, "Our next expedition Shall be for C. and the golden fleece." In Day's Law Tricks ii. 1, Horatio says, "Your hair is softer than the Colchian fleece." In May's Agrippina ii. 33, Otho says, "Fire-breathing bulls did guard the Colchian fleece." W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) xxxvii, speaks of the "Golden Fleece Which Jason stout from C. island bore." Puttenham, Art of Poesie ii., says, "Charles V, Emperor, gave for his new order the Golden Fleece, usurping it upon Prince Jason and his Argonauts' rich spoil brought from C." In Philotus 162, the Lovers sing, "Was greater gladness in the land of Greece When Jason came from C. home again?" C., as the home of Medea, was supposed to be fertile in deadly poisons. In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 3, Hannibal, having drunk a poison, says, "C. never yielded A juice more baneful." Spenser, F. Q. v. 8, 47, speaks of "fell Medea, when on Colchicke strand Her brothers' bones she scattered all about": he is thinking of her murder of her brother Absyrtus, whose remains she mangled and left behind to check her father in his pursuit of her and Jason.

COLD HARBOUR, or COLDHARBOROUGH: often spelt COLE HARBOUR (Ce. H. = Cole Harbour). Originally a fine mansion in Upper Thames St., Lond., next door to Allhallows Ch., on the site where the City of Lond. Brewery now stands. It is first mentioned in the reign of Edward II. It became a little later the property of Sir John Poultney, and was called Poultney's Inn. After passing through many hands it was pulled down about 1570 by the Earl of Shrewsbury, and a number of small tenements was built on the site. In some obscure way it had acquired the right of sanctuary. In Middleton's Trick to Catch iii. 1, a plot is laid to abduct the Courtesan "by boat to Ce.-H., have a priest ready, and there clap it up instantly." In iii. 3, Lucre, being told that "they have took Ce.-H.," exclaims: "The devil's sanctuary!" In his R. G. iv. 2, Goswell, punning on the word, says, "I sweat; would I lay in C. H.!" In his Black Book i. 14, we find, "Is not our house our own Ce. H.?" i.e. sanctuary. In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 3, Morose, cursing his nephew, says, "It knighthood shall take sanctuary in Ce.-h. and fast." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, the Wise Woman, in a list of female quacks and fortune-tellers, says, "There's another in Ce.h., that's skilled in the planets." T. Heywood and Rowley, in Fortune iii. 1, say, "C. H., where, of 20 chimnies standing, you shall scarce, in a whole winter, see 2 smoking." In Dekker's Westward iv. 2, Justiniano says, "You swore you would build me a lodging by the Thames side with a water gate to it, or else take me a lodging in Ce. H." In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 3, young Franklin says, "Go, take water at Ce. H." In his Hubbard, p. 96, he says, "Shoreditch was the only Ce. H. [i.e. sanctuary] for wenches and soldiers." Hall, in Satires v. 1, 99, satirizes the man who let his "starved brother live and die Within the cold Coal-h. sanctuary." Healy, in Disc. of New World, p. 182, says, "Here is that ancient model of Coal H., bearing the name of the Prodigal's Promontory, and being as a sanctuary for bankrupt debtors."

COLDHARBOUR. See under TOWER.

COLEBROOK. In M. W. W. iv. 5, 80, Sir Hugh Evans warns the host of the Garter: "There is 3 cozen-germans that has cozen'd all the hosts of Readings, of Maidenhead, of C., of horses and money." He evidently means Colnbrook, a vill. on the Colne, some 5 m. E. of Windsor. In Abington i. 2, Coomes says, "Now do I stand like the George at C.": the landlord of which was doubtless one of those who were cozen'd by Evans' Cozen-germans. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram, as a sample of "roaring," wishes that Meg "may be burnt to [? at] C. for destroying of Maidenhead." The double pun on the names hardly needs elucidation. Deloney, in Craft ii. 11, tells how the Green K. of St. Martin's, after staying the night at Brainford, "told his friends he would bring his wife to see the George in C." He then made them walk on to Bristol. C. is on the main road from Lond. to the W. Deloney, in Reading, tells how the W. clothiers always dined at C. on their way to Lond.; and how Cole of Reading was murdered by the innkeeper there, from which the river Cole and the town got their name, which is, of course, mere nonsense.

COLEMANHEDGE (or COLEMANHAWE). A garden on the S. side of Fenchurch St., Lond., near the Ch. of St. Katharine Coleman. In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Frescobaldi calls the leader of a gang of prostitutes "the grand Capt. of Coleman-hedge."

COLEMAN STREET. A st. in Lond., running N. from the E. end of Gresham St. to Fore St. It probably got its name from the charcoal dealers who lived there. It was a haunt of Puritans, and the Star Inn in C. St. was a meeting-place for Oliver Cromwell and his friends. It was there that the 5 members (Pym, Hampden, etc.) took refuge when Charles I. came to demand them from the H. of Commons (Jan. 1642).

In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 2, Brainworm speaks of "Justice Clement's house here in C. St." Cash later (iii. 2) specifies that it was "in the middle of C. St.;" iii. 3, and v. take place there. In Prodigal ii. 4, Lancelot is led to believe that Flowerdale has left him "a housen furnished well in Cole-man St." The Bell in C. St. was the inn used by the Cambridge carriers (Taylor's Cosmographie 1637). In Middleton's Five Gallants iii. 5, Pursenet tells of a wound he had received "in a paltry fray in C. St." Cowley transformed his play, The Guardian, into The Cutter of C. St., the scene of which is in Lond. in the year 1658. In iv. 5, Tabitha says, "Brother Abednego, will you not pronounce this evening-tide before the congregation of the Spotless in C.-st.?" Dekker, in Seven Sins, tells how Lying "musters together all the hackney-men and horse-coursers in and about Colman-st." Abington was "Imprinted at Lond. for Joseph Hunt and William Ferebrand, and are to be sold at the corner of Colman St., near Laathburie. 1599."

COLESHILL. A town in Warwicksh., on the Cole, 7 m. E. of Birmingham. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV. A. 43, Hobs, the tanner of Tamworth, says to the supposed highwayman, "I fear thee not, for I have wared all my money in cowhides at C. mkt."

COLINA. See COLLINE GATE.

COLITIENSAN. See COLLYTUS.

COLLATIUM (more properly COLLATIA). A city of Latium, 10 m. E. of Rome. It was subjected to Rome by Tarquinius Priscus, and was the home of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, the husband of Lucretia. Its site is probably marked by the ruins known as Castel dell' Osa. It is mentioned in T. Heywood's Lucrece, arg. 15, and ii. 4 and 50, as the scene of the rape of Lucrece.

COLLEN. See COLOGNE.

COLLICKE (i.e. COLWICK). A vill. on the Trent, abt. 1 m. S.E. of Nottingham. In Sampson's Vow iv. 2, 246, Mother Prattle says of Ann, "Drowned we found her on the river side Nigh C. Ferry."

COLLINE GATE (the PORTA COLLINA). The gate at the N.E. corner of the old Servian wall of Rome. It stood at the point where the Via Salaria diverged from the Via Nomentina. The place of burial of unfaithful vestals was in the Campus Sceleratus, just outside the Porta Collina. In Richards' Messallina v. 1, 2112, Vibidea speaks of the Vestal Virgins being "hurried in sad silence unto The gate Colina . . . there to be buried alive."

COLLUMPTON (or CULLOMPTON). A vill. in Devonsh., 11 m. N.E. of Exeter. A lost play by Day and Haughton, produced in 1599, was entitled Cox of C., and was probably a story of domestic tragedy founded on fact.

COLLYTUS. A deme of Athens, lying between the Pnyx and the Museum: it was a fashionable residential quarter. Timon the Misanthrope and Plato the Philosopher belonged to it. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 2249, Mercury describes Timon as "son to Echicratides, in Collite born." In the old Timon v. 5, Timon is described as "Timon, the son of Echeratides, the Colitensian."

COLMEKILL (more fully I-COLME-KILL: that is, the island of the cell of Columb). The island of Iona, one of the W. Hebrides, at the S.W. extremity of Mull. It was the residence of St. Columba, who evangelized Scotland about the middle of the 6th cent. It contains the ruins of St. Mary's Cathedral, 5 chapels, of which the most ancient is St. Oran's, and a nunnery. In the burial-ground were the graves of many of the old kings of Scotland. In Mac. ii. 4, 33, Ross asks, "Where is Duncan's body?" And Macduff answers: "Carried to C., The sacred storehouse of his predecessors, And guardian of their bones."

COLME'S INCH (or INCHCOLM, i.e. the island of Columba). In the Firth of Forth, off the coast of Fife, Scotland. It was once occupied by St. Columba (see above), and contains the ruins of an abbey dedicated to him. In Mac. i. 2, 62, Ross relates that Sweno, the Norway's K., "disbursed, at St. C. I., 10,000 dollars to our general use." Colme must be pronounced as a dissyllable.

COLOGNE (or KOLN). The ancient Colonia Agrippina, on the left bank of the Rhine, 390 m. S.W. of Berlin. The magnificent cathedral, begun in 1248, was not finished until 1848. In it is the shrine of the 3 kings, or Wise Men of the E., and the chapel of St. Ursula and her virgins. The Archbp. of C. was one of the 7 Electors of the Holy Roman Empire; and in Chapman's Alphonsus, "The Bp. of Cullen" appears in that capacity. He was Conrad von Hochstaden. In Barnaveit iv. 3, Sir John mentions amongst his letters one from "the Archbp. of Cullen": it was probably concerned with the closing of the Rhine by the Dutch, which seriously affected the commerce of Cologne. The Bp. of Cullen is one of the characters in Hector. It was a famous place of pilgrimage in the Middle Ages: the wife of Bath had been "at Coloigne" (Chaucer, C. T. A. 466). In Garton ii. 2, Diccon makes Dame Chat swear to keep his secret "by the 3 kings of Kullaine." In Woodes' Conf. Cons. iii. 4, Hypocrisy speaks of 3 men as being "as honest as the 3 Kings of C."; and in the same scene Cacon, the country parson, says, "The service whilk on 12th Day mun be done Ay seek bay the mark of the 3 Kings of C." The visit of the Kings was celebrated at Epiphany, the 12th day after Christmas Day. Their names are traditionally Caspar, Melchior, and Balthasar.

COLOPHON. A city in Ionia, on the Hales, near to the W. coast of Asia Minor, some 10 m. N. of Ephesus. It was one of the 7 cities that claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. In Lodge's Answer to Gosson, p. 11, he asks, "What made the Chians and Colophonians fall to such controversy? Why seek the Smirnians to recover from the Salaminians the praise of Homer?"

COLOPS (probably COLOBA is meant). The capital of the Colobi, a tribe of the Troglodytes, who were supposed to have lived near Ras Benass on the W. coast of the Red Sea, on the boundaries of Egypt and Nubia. In Bacchus, the 7th guest was "one Simon Swil-kan: he came from C., a city in Africa, and presented to Bacchus a buttock of bacon."

COLOSSÆ. A city of Phrygia, on the Lycus, 130 m. E. of Ephesus. The ch. there was founded by Epaphras; and an epistle was addressed to it by St. Paul during his 1st imprisonment at Rome about A.D. 63. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus quotes from "the 3rd chapter to the Colossians."

COLOSSUS. A gigantic statue, especially applied to a statue of Apollo at Rhodes, which was said to have stood astride of the entrance to the harbour and to have been 70 cubits high. In H4 A. v. 1, 123, Falstaff appeals to Prince Hal, "if thou see me down in the battle and bestride me, so; 'tis a point of friendship." Hal replies: "Nothing but a C. can do thee that friendship." In J. C. i. 2, 136, Cassius says of Cæsar, "He doth bestride the narrow world like a C." In Troil. v. 5, 9, Agamemnon describes Margarelon standing "c.-wise, waving his beam." Shirley, in Mart. Soldier v., says, "The mightiest kings of earth Carry Colossi heads." Dekker, in Match me, iv. 202, says, "On kings' shoulders stand The heads of the Colossi of the gods Above the reach of traitors." In Marston's What You i. 1, Iacomo cries: "Ruin to Chance and all that strive to stand like swollen Colosses on her tottering base." In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, the hero says, "So now methinks I stand like a C. through whose spacious arch Flows the vast sea of honour." In Nabbes' Hannibal iv. 3, Hannibal says, "I will stand like a C. to be gazed at by all beneath me." In Chapman's Chabot iv. 1, 17, the K. speaks of Chabot as "a C. That could so lately straddle o'er a province." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome ii., says, "The antique Rhodian will likewise set forth The great Colosse."

COLTS, THREE. See THREE COLTS.

COLUMB, SAINT. A town in Cornwall, abt. 35 m. N.E. of Penzance. In Brome's Damoiselle ii. 1, Amphilus, showing the shoes of his dead mare, says, "She would have carried me on this little iron from Pensans to St. C. on a day."

COMAGENE. A dist. in N. Syria, between the Euphrates and the Amanus and Taurus Ranges. It formed part of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucids, but about the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C. it regained its independence and was governed by kings until its annexation to the Roman Empire in A.D. 17. In Ant. iii. 6, 74, "Mithradates, K. of C.," is mentioned as one of the allies of Antony against Cæsar.

COMBE PARK. See COOMBE HOUSE.

COMBERLAND. See CUMBERLAND.

COMERTON. Mater's charm for the worms in Thersites (A. P. i. 218) opens, "The cowherd of C. with his crooked spade Cause from thee the worms soon to vade." There is a C. in Cambridgesh., and there are 3 in Worcestersh.: it is impossible to say which is meant here.

COMPOSTELLA (more commonly called SANTIAGO). A city in N.W. Spain, abt. 300 m. N.W. of Madrid. Hither the body of the apostle James (Iago) was said to have been miraculously transported over the sea, and to have been discovered by a star which appeared over the place. It became one of the most famous shrines of the Middle Ages, and was visited by hosts of pilgrims (see s.v. JAMES, St.). In T. Heywood's Dialogues i. 410, a man in danger of shipwreck vowed, if he were saved, "steps he'd tell To where St. James yet lives in Compostell." Burton, A. M. Intro., says, "In our days they run to C., our Lady of Sichem, or Lauretta, to seek for help."

CONCORD (TEMPLE OF). One of the most famous temples of Rome. It stood at the N.W. corner of the Forum, and was built in 367 B.C. to celebrate the union of the patricians and plebeians. It was restored by Tiberius in A.D. 10. It was often used for meetings of the Senate. In Jonson's Catiline, the scene of v. 2 and 4 is laid in the T. of C., and in v. 6, on the receipt of the news of Catiline's defeat, Cicero proposes to "withdraw into the house of C."

CONCORDIA. A legendary Temple of C. in Lond., at which Locrine intended to marry Estrild. In Locrine v. 4, 81, Locrine says to Estrild after their defeat, "Ne'er shall we view the fair C. Unless as captives we be thither brought."

CONDÉ. A town of France, near Valenciennes, at the junction of the Scheldt and the Haine, 139 m. N. of Paris. It gave their name to a branch of the House of Bourbon, Louis de Bourbon (1530-1569) being the first to assume the title. His son Henry was the Prince of C. in Marlowe's Massacre, and cousin to Henry of Navarre.

CONDUIT (pronounced Condit). The water-supply of Lond. was at first obtained from the Thames and the streams which ran into it from the N., and from the wells which were sunk successfully, as Stow tells us, "in every st. and lane of the city." The largest of the tributaries of the Thames was that which ran into the r. between Bridewell and the Blackfriars, and which was known first as the Wells river, then as Turnmill Brook, and finally as Fleet Ditch. It was bridged at the bottom of Fleet St. and at Holborn, and was navigable up to the Holborn Bdge. Above that point it was called the Old Bourne, the Hole Bourne, or the Hil-Bourne. It had become in Shakespeare's time a noisome open sewer, as described by Jonson in the Famous Voyage. It is now conveyed underground into the main sewer of the Embankment. Further W. was the Tye-bourne; and to the E. Walbrook and the Langbourne, both of which had been underground by the beginning of the 17th cent. The principal wells were Holy Well, Clement's Well, Clerken-well, Skinner's Well, Faggess Well, near Smithfield, Tod Well, Loder's Well, Radwell, Dame Annis le Clere, the Horse Pool in Smithfield, and the Pool by St. Giles' Ch. The water from these various sources was conveyed to the houses by water-carriers, one of whom is sketched by Jonson in Ev. Man I. in the person of Oliver Cob. During the 14th cent. the practice became common of erecting conduits, or fountains, in the principal sts. to which the waters from the sources to the N. of the City were conveyed in leaden pipes, and so made available for the use of the citizens. The 1st and most famous of these was the Great C. at the E. end of Cheapside (1285), to which the water was brought from the Tye Bourne, in Paddington. The convenience was appreciated and, partly by private benefactions, partly by the city authorities, many similar cs. were set up. Amongst them were the Standard in Cheapside (13th cent.), the Tun in Cornhill (1401), the Little C. (or Pissing C.) at the W. end of Cheapside (1442), the Standard in Fleet St., which was adorned with the image of St. Christopher and surmounted by angels who chimed the hours on bells (1471), cs. in Aldermanbury (1471), Grace St. (1491), Holborn Cross (1498), repaired and adorned by William Lambe (1577), Stock's Market (1500), Bishopsgate (1513), Lond. Wall (1528), Aldgate Without (1535), Lothbury (1546), Coleman St. (1546), and Dowgate (1568). There were also bosses, or fountains, projecting from the wall, in Billingsgate, Paul's Wharf, and St. Giles without Cripplegate. These cs. were often adorned with sculptured figures, and formed striking architectural features in the sts.; and when pageants traversed the City they were utilized for the exhibition of masques, and on great occasions were made to flow with claret instead of water. The water was mostly brought from reservoirs constructed at Highbury, Pentonville, Bayswater (i.e. Baynard's Watering), and other N. suburbs, and these c.-heads became favourite summer evening resorts. An important development took place in 1582, when Peter Moris, a Dutchman, set up a force-pump, worked by horse-power, near Lond. Bdge., to pump Thames water into the houses of the City: other forciers, as they were called, were soon erected, and with the extension of this system of private supply the cs. became less necessary; so that when they were destroyed in the Gt. Fire they were not re-erected, and a very characteristic feature of Elizabethan Lond. disappeared. But in those days the sound of running water must have formed as delightful an accompaniment to the open-air life of the City as it does in Rome to-day. In the dramatists the cs. are often specifically mentioned; and figures drawn from the pipes that brought water to them, and the statues that adorned them, are of frequent occurrence.

In Err. v. 1, 313, old Ægeus speaks of the "cs. of his blood" being frozen up by age. In Cor. ii. 3, 250, Brutus recalls the names of Publius and Quintus Marcius, "That our best water brought by cs. hither." Brutus speaks prophetically, for the Aqua Marcia at Rome only dates from 144 B.C., but the allusion would be congenial to the Londoners, who would think of men like William Lambe, who magnificently repaired the c. in Holborn, which bore his name, and Barnard Randolph, who had quite recently (1583) made the munificent gift of £900 for the City cs. In Lucr. 1234, Lucretia's weeping maidens are compared to "Ivory cs. coral cisterns filling." In W. T. v. 2, 60, the old shepherd stands by, weeping for joy "like a weather-bitten c. of many kings' reigns." In Tit. ii. 4, 30, Marcus compares the wounded body of Lavinia to "a c. with 3 issuing spouts." In Rom. iii. 5, 129, Capulet, finding Juliet weeping, exclaims, "How now? a c., girl? What, still in tears?" In As iv. 1, 155, when Rosalind says "I will weep for nothing, like Diana in the fountain," there is probably an allusion to the figure of Diana, with water trickling from its breasts, which was set up on the Cheapside Cross in the place of the image of the Virgin Mary in 1596, but was decayed in 1603: if so, it is decisive as to the date of the production of the play, which on other grounds appears to be about 1600. In More ii. 1, Robin says to his fellow prentice, "The head drawer at the Miter by the great C. called me up and we went to breakfast into St. Anne's Lane." This is the Mitre Tavern, at the corner of Bread St. and Cheapside (see Mitre). In Mayne's Match ii. 6, Timothy professes to have made some speeches "which have been spoke by a green Robin Goodfellow from Cheapside C." The allusion is to the practice of having complimentary orations, or verses, spoken at the Great C. on the occasion of pageants and processions. The name "Pissing C." seems to have been applied to more than one of the smaller cs. Stow definitely states that the c. by the Stocks mkt., which was at the N. end of Walbrook, near the present Mansion House, was so called. The name seems to have been suggested by the slenderness of the stream of water. But when, in H6 B. iv. 6, 3, Cade commands that "the pissing c. run nothing but claret wine this 1st year of our reign," it is more likely that he is thinking of the Little C. at the W. end of Cheapside. Similarly, in Middleton's Chaste Maid, Allwit, whose house is in Cheapside, says to the gossips, "Come along presently by the Pissing-C." (iii. 2): where the Cheapside c. seems the one intended. The word, however, is generic rather than specific in some passages. Thus, in Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Frisco, wandering about Fenchurch St. in the night with Delion and Alvaro, says, "Now for a dirty puddle, the pissing c., or a great post, that might turn these 2 from asses to oxen by knocking their horns to their foreheads." In B. & F. Mad Lover ii. 1, Memnon is giving directions to Chilar for a pageant. "Make me," he says, "a heaven, for here shall run a constellation."—"And there," interjects Chilar, "a pissing c. . . . with wine, Sir." In Nash's Wilton A. 4, the hero says, "I have wept so immoderately that I thought my palate had been turned to Pissing C. in Lond." In Nice Wanton iii. 1, Thirsty says, "Your miserable churl dribbles like the Pissing C." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 5, Firk says, "[I am as sure of it as I am sure] that the Pissing C. leaks nothing but pure Mother Bunch." Mother Bunch was a tavern-keeper whose ale was of the weakest: hence pure Mother Bunch means "nothing but water." In B. & F. Women Pleased i. 2, Penurio, when his miserly master gives him for his dinner the water he has boiled an egg in, says, "I shall turn pissing-c. shortly."

In Nabbes' Totenham iii. 5, George having hidden in a tub, one of the maids pours a bucket of water over him, and cries: "Mischief on you, Sir; you have spoiled me a pail of c. water, cost me many a weary step the fetching." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon v. 1, Charley says he can be found "at Grace Ch. by the C." Stow says there was a c. in Grassstreet erected in 1491. In Ovatio Carolina (1641), we are told that on the entry of the K. into Lond. "the c. in Cornhill and the great c. in Cheapside ran with claret wine"; and in the afternoon "the little c. in Cheapside and the c. in Fleet St. ran with wine as the other 2 cs. had done in the morning." In Massinger's Madam iv. 1, Hoist predicts that on Luke's return "all the cs. [will be] spouting canary sack." The names of benefactors to the City appear to have been inscribed on the cs. In Eastward iv. 4, Touchstone predicts that Gresham and Whittington shall be forgotten, and Golding's name "shall be written upon cs." The cs. were great gathering places for the prentices who came to get water for their masters' households, and all the gossip of the town was retailed there. In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 1, Eyre says, "I promised the mad Cappadocians [his fellow prentices] when we all served at the C. together, that if ever I came to be Mayor of Lond. I would feast them all." In Massinger's Parl. Love iv. 5, Chamont says to Perigot, "Live to be the talk of the c. and the bakehouse." In Trouble. Reign ii., we have c. as a verb: "My eyes should c. forth a sea of tears." In Nash's Summers', Haz. viii. 83, Christmas complains of the extortionate rates of the water-carriers: "These water-bearers will empty the c. and a man's coffers at once." In Glaphorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sconce says, "This cup was as deep as Fleet-st. C." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. 1. 2, Knowell says to Stephen, "A gentleman of your sort to talk o' your turn i' this company, and to me alone, like a tankard-bearer at a c. ! Fie ! " Of course, the tankard-bearer had to take his turn at the c., but Stephen is such a wit that he can speak when he likes. In Nabbes' Bride i. 2, Theophilus says that the cook's taunts "Will be the sts.' discourse, the cs.' lecture." Woodes' Conf. Cons. was "Printed by Richard Bradocke dwelling in Aldermanbury, a little above the Conduict. 1581." Three Ladies was "Printed by Roger Warde dwelling near Holburne C. at the signe of the Talbot." In Marston's Courtezan ii. 1, Cocledemoy mentions "the C. at Greenwich, and the under-holes that spouts up water." This c. was in Greenwich Park, and was still in existence in 1835. Phillip's Grissil was "Imprinted at Lond. in Fleetestreat beneath the C. by Thomas Colwell."

CONEY STREET. One of the principal sts. in York, running parallel to the Ouse, past the Guildhall and St. Michael's Ch. In Taylor, Works ii. 14, he tells how he sold his boat "to honest Mr. Kayes in Cunny St."

CONGO. A dist. on the W. coast of Africa, between Loango and Angola. In Milton, P. L. xi. 401, Adam is shown "the realm Of C. and Angola farthest S."

CONNAUGHT. The most W. of the 4 provinces of Ireland. In Jonson's Irish, Dennis, one of the footmen, says, "We be Irishman . . . of Connough, Leymster, Ulster, Munster."

CONSTANTINOPLE. The capital of the Ottoman Empire, on the European side of the Sea of Marmora, at its junction with the Bosphorus. It was founded by Constantine the Gt. on the site of the ancient Byzantium A.D. 328, and was the capital of the Roman Empire of the East until 1453, when it was besieged and taken by the Sultan Mohammed II. Since then it has remained the capital of the Turkish Empire. In H5 v. 2, 222, Henry says to Katharine, "Shalt not thou and I compound a boy . . . that shall go to C. and take the Turk by the beard?" In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, 846, Amurack sends Bajazet to bid his vassals "To come and wait on Amurack their k. At his chief city C." This is historically inaccurate, as C. was not taken by the Turks till 1453 and Amurack died in 1389. In Kyd's Solyman v., Basilisco informs us: "The Great Turk whose seat Is C. hath beleaguered Rhodes." In Marlowe's Tamb A. iii. 1, Bajazeth reports that Tamburlaine "thinks to rouse us from our dreadful siege Of the famous Grecian C." Bajazeth did not besiege C.: Marlowe is probably thinking of the siege by Amurath in 1422, which was not successful. In Massinger's Renegado iii. 5, Asambeg, viceroy of Tunis, sends "a well-manned galley for C.," to take the news of his niece's apostasy to Amurath, i.e. Murad III. In B. & F. Double Mar. i. 1, Virolet thinks that the sufferings of Naples are so great "As that fair city that received her name From Constantine the Gt., now in the power Of barbarous infidels, may forget her own To look with pity on our miseries." In their Malta v. 2, Colonna, who had been taken by the Turkish galleys, says he has since lived "in C." In Nabbes' Totenham iv. 7, Stutchwell says, "I will beget a race of warriors shall cage thy great Turkship again, and restore C. to the Emperor."

C. was invested with the glamour of the East, and, in spite of the length and danger of the journey, was not infrequently visited by English travellers and merchants. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. ii. 1, Roughman boasts, "There shall be doings that shall make this Windmill my grand seat, my mansion, my palace, and my C." In Marlowe's Faustus ix., Mephistopheles complains, "From C. am I hither come Only for pleasure of these damned slaves." To which Robin coolly responds: "You have had a great journey." Hycke, p. 88, has been "at Rhodes, Constantyne, and in Babylonde." In Jonson's Case ii. 1, Valentine has seen C. in the course of his travels. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 295, one of the Lords says, "I have been in Turkies great C.; the merchants there meet in a goodly temple, but have no common Burse." Nash, in Pierce B. 2, describes the traveller who "will despise the barbarism of his own country, and tell a whole legend of lies of his travels unto C." There was a chance of making great profits at C., but the journey was dangerous, and it was a common practice to insure one's safe return by putting down a sum of money, to be paid back fivefold when the insurer came back; otherwise, the person accepting the insurance premium kept the money. In Jonson's Epicone ii. 4, Morose, in contemplation of his nephew's ruin, says, "It shall not have hope to repair itself by C., Ireland, or Virginia." In his Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Puntarvolo, setting out on his travels, is determined "to put forth some 5000 pound, to be paid me 5 for 1 upon the return of myself, my wife, and my dog from the Turk's court in C." In Fynes Moryson's Itin. (1595) i. 3, 198, he tells how his brother Henrie "was then beginning that voyage [i.e. to C. and Jerusalem], having to that purpose put out some £400, to be repaid £1200 upon his return from those 2 cities." Cf. Temp. iii. 3, 48, where Gonzalo speaks of the travellers' tales "which now we find Each putter-out of 5 for 1 will bring us Good warrant of." Obviously we should read "1 for 5." The scene of Massinger's Emperor is laid in C. during the reign of the Emperor Theodosius the Younger.

CONTINENT is used (1) for the bank of a river. In M. N. D. ii. 1, 92, Titania says that the rivers have "overborne their cs." In H4 A. iii. 1, 110, Mortimer speaks of the Trent by its winding "Gelding the opposing c." (2) For the solid land as opposed to the sea. In H4 B. iii. 1, 47, the K. remarks that the revolution of the times makes "the c., Weary of solid firmness, melt itself Into the sea." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes speaks of having "with the cannon shook Vienna walls And made it dance upon the c." (3) For the sun. In Tw. N. v. 1, 278, Viola speaks of "that orb'd c., the fire That severs day from night." The use of the word for one of the 4 great divisions of the world is found early in the 17th cent.: the 1st example of it, in the special sense of the C. of Europe, apart from the British Isles, is quoted in O.E.D. from R. Johnson's Kingdom and Commonwealth (1601). In B. & F. Malta v. 2, Valetta banishes Mountferrat from Malta "to the c., i.e. the c. or mainland of Europe; but there is another reading, "We banish you the c., i.e. from the boundaries of Malta, which I think is more likely to be right.

CONYTUS (a misprint for COCYTUS, q.v.). In Nash's Pierce (1592) A. 4, the devil is addressed as "Marquesse of C."

COOMBE HOUSE (or COOMBE PARK). The ancient seat of the Nevilles of Warwick. It was in Surrey, abt. 1 m. from Kingston-on-Thames. The H. has disappeared. The Park was the scene of many highway robberies. Fleming, in English Dogs (1576), tells of a man who was robbed on his way to Kingston in "Come P.; a perilous bottom, compassed about with woods, too well known for the manifold murders and mischievous robberies there committed." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 2, Capt. Carvegut and Lieut. Bottom spur "towards Coomb-h." in order to waylay and rob Randall in C. P., or, as the Capt. nicknames it, "Coxcomb p." The scene of a large part of Middleton's Five Gallants is laid in C. P. In iii. 2, Tailby rides to Kingston to see his mistress, and is robbed in C. P. In S. Rowley's When you E. 3, one of the prisoners in the Counter tells the disguised K., "I got some hundred pound by a crooked measure at Coome-P." In Middleton's Black Book 37, the Devil says to Gregory, the highwayman, "I make thee keeper of Combe P., sergeant of Salisbury Plain."

COPPERSMITHS' HALL. There was no company of Coppersmiths in Lond., nor was there any such Hall. The phrase is coined from the analogy of Goldsmiths' H.; and is used humorously for a tavern, where the toppers' noses became copper-coloured through their drinking. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 3, 202, the Clown says, "His nose . . . was so set with rubies that after his death it should have been nailed up in C. H. for a monument." In Greene's Friar ii. 2, 537, Edward asks, "Where is Brasen-nose College?" And Miles answers: "Not far from Coppersmithes H." Nash, in Prognostication ii. 165, speaks of drunkards as "knights of Coppersmith"; and Middleton, in Black Book prol., calls them "copper captains."

COPTHALL. Two blocks of houses in Lond.: (1) on the W. side of Dowgate Hill, now the Hall of the Skinners' Company; (2) in an alley running N. out of Throckmorton St., close to Drapers' Hall. In Brome's Sparagus iii. 10, a gentleman, who is being dunned for his bill by the keeper of the Garden, says to the servant, "Tell your mistress that the Countess of Copt Hall is coming to be her neighbour again and she may decline her trade very dangerously."

CORCE. See CORSICA.

CORCYRA (now CORFU). The largest of the Ionian Islands, off the coast of Epirus in the Ionian Sea. In Richards' Messallina iii. 1, 1274, Annæus Mela, after referring to his brother Seneca's banishment, says to his soul, "Fly to the island of C., there Learn the soul's comfort, sweet Philosophy." It is evidently a mistake for Corsica, where Seneca lived for 8 years (A.D. 41-49). Later on he calls it "the Ile of Corce," and says it is "on the Tyrrhen shore."

CORDOVA (CORDOBA or CORDUBA). The capital of the Province of C., in S. Spain, on the N. bank of the Guadalquivir, 180 m. S.W. of Madrid. It was a Roman Colonia, founded in 152 B.C.: the poet Lucan and the philosopher Seneca were born there. Martial, Epig. i. 62, 8, says, "Duosque Senecas unicumque Lucanum facunda loquitur Corduba." The Moors held it from A.D. 756 to 1234, when it was taken by Ferdinand of Castile. The cathedral was originally a Moorish mosque, the roof of which was supported by a grove of over 1000 costly pillars, some 850 of which still remain. The city was famous for its silver filagree-work and for its goat-skin leather, which was a favourite material for shoes in the Middle Ages. When the Moors were expelled from Spain they transferred the leather industry to Morocco. The forms cordwain (i.e. leather) and cordwainer (i.e. shoemaker) appear in English from the 11th cent. onward. Towards the end of the 16th cent. we get the form Cordovan, or Cordovant, taken directly from the Spanish. Chaucer's Sir Thopas (C. T. B. 1922) had "his shoon of cordewane." In the Coventry M. P. 241, we read of "a goodly peyre of long pekyd schon off fyne cordewan." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre, being asked by the Lord Mayor, "Are all these shoemakers?" replies: "All cordwainers, my good Lord Mayor." In Spenser's F. Q. vi. 2, 6, Tristram wears "buskins of costliest cordwayne." In B. & F. Shepherdess i. 1, Clorin describes a shepherd-boy with "hanging scape of finest cordevan." In their Subject iv. 7, the Ancient apostrophizes a Russian gentleman as "You musk-cat, Cordevan-skin": alluding to the strong smell of Cordevan leather. In Davenant's Love Hon. iv. 1, Altesto says, "I kiss your soft hands. Noble Sir, keep on your cordevan; I swear your glove is a preferment 'bove the merit of my lips": where cordevan means glove. In Jonson's Magnetic iii. 3, Compass says that Ironside "is but a currier's son, And has not two old Cn. skins to leave in leather caps to mourn him in." In B. & F. Maid in Mill v. 2, Gillian tells how "nurse Amaranta in a remove from Mora to C. Was seized on by a fierce and hungry bear." In Middleton's Gypsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "If one city cannot maintain us, away to another! Valladolid is open; so C., so Toledo." Hall, in Virgideum i. 3, refers to Seneca as "the famous Corduban." In Middleton's Chess v. 3, Mahomet Mir Almir is spoken of as "old Corduba, K. of Morocco." The scenes of B. & F. Span. Cur. and of Davenant's Distresses are laid at C. A Don Hugo de C. is mentioned in Webster's Weakest v. 1. Dekker's Match me opens in C.

CORINTH. The Greek city on the isthmus of C., between the Peloponnesus and the mainland of Greece. It was allied with Sparta against Athens in the Peloponnesian war. Politically it rivalled Athens and Sparta, and its colonies, especially Corcyra and Syracuse, added to its importance. C. became the capital of the Achæan League, and was taken and completely destroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman general, 146 B.C. It lay in ruins for a cent., and then Julius Cæsar refounded it as a Roman Colonia. The visits and epistles of St. Paul gave it a prominent place in the early history of the Christian Ch. The modern town, Gortho, is small and unimportant, but it has given its name to the currant, one of its principal exports. In Massinger's Bondman, the background of the play is the war between the Syracusans and the Carthaginians in the 4th cent. B.C., and Timoleon of C. is one of the chief characters. Corinth is the scene of B. & F. Corinth, but there is nothing historical about the play, and its period is quite indeterminate. The authors go so far as to speak of the exposure of traitors' heads on "the poles on C. bidge." just as if it was Lond., but in iii. 2, Euphanes quite properly says, "There are 2 seas in C." In Massinger's Believe ii. 1, Chrysalus tells Flaminius that after the Achæan war he and Antiochus "sailed to C., thence to India." In Nero i. 3, "C., proud of her 2 seas," is mentioned as one of the Greek cities that has been fascinated by the Emperor's literary and musical accomplishments. In Ford's Lover's Melan ii. 1, Rhetias tells how Eroclea "was conveyed like a ship-boy from the country where she lived into C. first, afterwards to Athens." In Err. i. 1, Ægeus relates how, after his shipwreck, his wife and son were picked up from a floating mast by "Fishermen of C.," and in v. 1, 351, the Abbess supplements his story by explaining that they were at first picked up by a ship of Epidamnus, but that her son and his slave, the Antipholus and Dromio of Ephesus, were taken from it by "rude fishermen of C.," she herself being left behind. In Glapthorne's Argalus iii. 4, Parthenia, infected with leprosy, was cured "by the Q. of C.," but this all belongs to the fairyland of Arcadia. In Brewer's Lovesick King i., Canute says of his lady, "Fair Phædra, who in C. once was found, Compared to her, as different would they show As sable ebony to Alpine snow." The mythological Phædra had nothing to do with C.: possibly Brewer was thinking of Phryne of Athens, the rival in beauty of Lais of C. In Brome's Lovesick Ct. iii. 1, Geron says, "My business is the same that whilom drew Demosthenes to C., some repentance." Of St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, Bale, in God's Promises, Epil., says, "St. Paul doth write unto the Cians. plain."

C., from its situation on the Isthmus, was a very important mercantile city; and the great wealth so gained the people spent in objects of art and luxury. The Cians. Order bears witness to their initiative in architecture; Cians. bronze to their skill in metal-work; and their ivory and plate were famous throughout the ancient world. In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Flamineo ridicules the idea of calling Vittoria's brow "The snow of Ida or ivory of C." In Davenport's Matilda v. 3, the K. demands, "Cian. ivory, her sweet shape to raise," after the death of Matilda. In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 1, Mahaball says, "Boys serve the banquet up In golden dishes or Cians. plate." Spenser, in Ruines of Rome xxix., speaks of "C. skilled in curious works to grave." In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline, inveighing against the luxury of the Roman nobles, says, "They buy Ephesian pictures and Cians. plate." In Massinger's Renegado i. 3, Vitelli says, "Cians. plate, studded with diamonds Concealed off deadly poison." So, in his Actor i. 3, Paris, in defence of his profession, urges: "We show no arts of Lydian panderism, Cians. poisons, Persian flatteries." Possibly these references to poison are due to the story of Medea, Q. of C., killing Jason's bride, Creusa, by sending her a poisoned robe and diadem as a wedding-present.

C. had a great reputation for the beauty and profligacy of its courtesans, the most famous of whom was Lais, whose tomb is still to be seen near the city, and who received after her death honours almost divine. Their charges were in proportion to their beauty, and were often the cause of the ruin of merchants who came there and were ensnared by their charms: hence the proverb quoted by Horace (Epp. i. 17, 36): "Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum." In Nero iv. 7, Petronius says that in Elysium "Every man his own desires enjoys; Nor us, though Roman, Lais will refuse; To C. any man may go," i.e. in the future life there will be no difficulty in any man attaining his desires. In Mason's Mulleasses 1866, Timoclea, offering herself to Mulleasses, says, "Kings shall not come to C., where thou mayest." In Massinger's Great Duke iii. 1, Sanazarro refers to "the cold Cynic whom Cians. Lais (not moved with her lust's blandishments) called a stone." This was Diogenes of Sinope, whose tomb, by a singular freak of Fate, is close to that of Lais. In T. Heywood's Captives i. 1, Raphael asks, "Because we read one Lais was unchaste Are all Cians. ladies courtesans?" In Daniel's Arcadia, one of the characters is "Techne, a subtle wench of C." In Massinger's Believe iv. 2, Sempronius says of the Courtesan, "Her mother sold her To a Cians. lecher at 13." In Tim. ii. 2, 73, the Fool says to the servants, "Would we could see you at C.!" i.e. in a house of ill fame. Cians. was used, with a double reference to the licentiousness of the city and the brass for which it was famous, in the sense of a brazen profligate. In H4 A. ii. 4, 13, Prince Hal says, "They will tell me flatly, I am not a proud Jack, like Falstaff, but a Cians., a lad of mettle." It must be remembered that mettle and metal are the same word, and the 2 were not differentiated either in spelling or pronunciation in the 16th cent. In Bacchus, the 6th of the toppers was "One Francis Franckfellow, a Cians. in the coasts of Achaia; with him he brought a box of oil."

CORIOLI. An ancient town of Latium which fell into the hands of the Volscians, and was taken from them by the Romans 493 B.C. under the leadership of Caius Marcius, who received for his valour on that occasion the name of Coriolanus. After his expulsion from Rome he recaptured the town for the Volscians. The whole story is unhistorical. The site of the town is uncertain. Pliny says that it had entirely disappeared in his time. It was evidently not far from Antium: the most probable site is Monte Giove, 19 m. from Rome, on the rd. to Antium. Others place it at Osteria Vecchia, some 4 m. further S. It is mentioned several times in Coriolanus.

CORK. A city in Ireland, near the mouth of the Lee, 166 m. S.W. of Dublin. John a Water, Mayor of C., is one of the characters in Ford's Warbeck. Warbeck landed in C. in 1492 and gained a great deal of support from the Irish. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 44, says, "The spreading Lee that, like an island fair, Encloseth Ce. with his divided flood."

CORNHILL. A st. in Lond., running E. from the end of the Poultry past the Royal Exchange to Leadenhall St. It was originally the Corn Market for Lond., and in 1310 had the privilege granted of holding a market after noon, all the other markets being closed at noon. Later it came to be mainly occupied by drapers. In C. were a stocks and pillory, a prison called the Tun, a conduit, and a standard erected in 1582 to supply water pumped up from the Thames. In Piers C. vi. 1, the author says, "Ich wonede on Cornehulle, Kytte and Ich in a cote, clothed as a lollere." Lydgate, in Lickpenny, says, "Then into Corn-hyl anon I yode, Where was much stolen gere amonge; I saw where hongre myne owen hooche, That I had lost amonge the thronge." In Fair Women ii. 278, Roger tells how he followed Sanders from his own door to C., where he stayed an hour and then went directly to the Burse. In More ii. 3, the Lord Mayor commands, "Gather some forces to C. and Cheapside" to quell the riot of the prentices. In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 2, Frisco explains, "when we came from Bucklersbury into C. you should have turned down on your left hand." And Pisaro exclaims, "You ass! You dolt! why led you him through C.?" Your way had been to come through Canning St." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meercraft exhorts Gilthead to buy his son a capt.'s place, "and let him with his plume and scarfs march through Cheapside or along C." In Dekker's Shoemaker's ii. 1, we learn that Sybil, the maid of the Lord Mayor's daughter, watched Lacy pass in his scarf and feathers "at our door in C.": where evidently the Lord Mayor lived. In the same play (v. 5), the K. says to Simon Eyre, "that new building Which at thy cost in C. is erected Shall take a name from us; we'll have it called The Leadenhall, because in digging it You found the lead that covereth the same." The Leadenhall, which was built by Eyre on the site of an old mansion belonging to Sir Hugh Neville and presented by him to the City as a storehouse and market for grain, was not actually in Cornhill, but on the E. side of Gracechurch St., near the corner of Fenchurch St. (see LEADENHALL; for reference to C. in W. Rowley's Match Mid., see under CATEATON ST.). In the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we find "the Mermaid in C." This is not the famous Mermaid Tavern, which was at the corner of Bread St., in Cheapside. In Three Lords (Dods., vi. 397), Simplicity says of Tarlton, the actor, that in his youth he was a water-bearer, "and hath tossed a tankard in C. ere now." In W. Rowley's Wonder iii. 1, Mrs. Foster says, "It is my gossip, the rich widow of C." Ford's Heart was "Printed by J. E. for Hugh Beeston and are to be sold at his shop near the Castle in Corn-hill. 1633." Gresham's Royal Exchange was built in C. In T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. 289, Ramsie says to Gresham, "We have determined of a place for you In C., the delightful of this city, Where you shall raise your frame." In his F. M. Exch. 38, Anthony says, "In C. by the Exchange Dwells an old merchant, Flower they call his name." Sidney, in Remedy for Love, speaks of "C.'s square Exchange."

CORNUBIA (i.e. CORNWALL, q.v.). In Locrine v. prol. 12, we are told that Guendoline "Flies to the dukedom of C."

CORNWALL (Ch. = Cornish). A county in the S.W. of England. It remained a Celtic kingdom under its own chiefs long after the rest of Britain had been conquered by the Angles and Saxons. It was not until the 10th cent. that it came completely under English rule.

William I conferred the Earldom of C. on his half-brother, Robert of Mortain, and the earldom remained an appanage of the Crown through the Norman and Plantagenet periods. In 1336 it was made a duchy and conferred on the Black Prince; and since then the Prince of Wales has always been D. of C. The old Celtic language lingered till the 18th cent., but is now extinct. Fortunately, a set of Mystery Plays in Cornish has been preserved and made accessible to students. Tin-mining was carried on in C. at a very early period, and the Phœnicians traded in Ch. tin and gave the name of Cassiterides (Tin-islands) to C. and Devon. The copper-mines were not worked to any purpose till the close of the 17th cent. In our period the Ch. were nicknamed "Choughs," from the Fregillus Graculus, a bird with red bill and legs, common on the coast of the county. They were famous as wrestlers, and the Ch. hug was a hold from which it was not at all easy to escape without a fall. The husband of Regan, in Lear, is the D. of C.: his name, according to Holinshed, was Hennesius. There is also a D. of C. in the old Leir, but he is the husband of Goneril. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth., the scene of Arthur's last battle and death is fixed near the Camel in C. In Locrine i. 1, 135, Corineus says that, as a reward for fighting Gogmagog, "brave C. I received." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 12, says, "Corineus had that province utmost west . . . Which of his name and memorable gest He called Cornwaile": an entirely fanciful derivation. C. is really the horn-shaped country. In Fisher's Fuinis iv. 4, Cassibelanus says, "The Ch. band made havoc of their [i.e. the Roman] ranks." The Earl of C. is one of the principal characters in K. K. Knave; the time being the reign of Edgar the Peaceable. So in the old English courts in Nobody, and Dekker's Fortunatus, we find a Lord of C. Richd. Earl of C., the younger brother of Henry III, was elected Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire in 1257, though the Electors afterwards changed their minds and chose Alfonso of Castile. Chapman's Alphonsus deals with the dispute between these rival claimants, and Richd. of C. is one of the characters in the play. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, the K. creates Gaveston "Earl of C., k. and lord of Man." In Trouble. Reign, p. 300, the oath sworn by the English lords is "to Lewis of France, as true and rightful k. to England, C., and Wales." In Ford's Warbeck iv. 5, the scene is laid on the coast of C., where Warbeck landed to raise the district in his favour. In World Child, Haz. i. 251, Manhood claims "Calais, Kent, and C. have I conquered clean." The reference would seem to be to the English conquest of Kent and C., or to the suppression of rebellions in those counties.

In H5 iv. 1, 50, the disguised K. gives his name to Pistol as "Harry le Roy"; and Pistol replies: "Le Roy! A Ch. name; art thou of Ch. crew?" In Brome's Northern v. 8, when Squelch, disguised as a Spaniard, pretends not to understand English, Nonsense says, "I will spout some Ch. at him: Peden bras vidne whee bis cregas." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) i., gives a number of Ch. sentences and phrases. The Cornish Mystery Plays, edited by Mr. E. Norris, with a translation, probably date from the 14th cent., and were acted in the "rounds," or amphitheatres, which may still be seen. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon, thinking that he is going to get the philosopher's stone, says, "I'll purchase Devonshire and C. And make them perfect Indies," i.e. by transmuting the tin and copper to gold. Quartz crystals found in the mines were used as gems, and were called Ch. diamonds. In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough says of himself and his servant, "We are right Ch. diamonds." And Trim adds: "Yes, we cut our quarrels [i.e. panes of glass] and break glasses where we go." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meercraft says to Gilthead, "You have there now Some Bristol stone or Ch. counterfeit You'd put upon us." In Nash's Lenten, p. 300, he says, "It pities me that in cutting of so fair a diamond as Yarmouth I have not a casket of dusky Ch. diamonds by me, the better to set it forth." In his Somewhat to Read (1591), he says, "'Tis as good to go in cut-fingered pumps as cork shoes, if one wear Ch. diamonds on his toes."

In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 1, Chough informs the company, "In C. we are all for wrestling"; and in ii. 2, when he meets Russel's daughter, he exclaims, "I'll show her the Ch. hug, Sir." For reference to wrestling in Nabbes' Totenham, see s.v. BARTHOLOMEW (St.) THE GREAT. In Jonson's Magnetic i. 1, the boy of the Playhouse gives his name as "John Try-Gust; a Ch. youth and the poet's servant . . . Faith, we do call a spade a spade in C." In Locrine v. 3, Locrine asks, "Are the Ch. chuffs In such great number come to Mertia?" In Ford's Warbeck iv. 2, Astley advises Warbeck to "pell-mell run amongst the Ch. choughs presently." The Cornishman in Middleton's Quarrel is called Chough, and lodges appropriately "at the Crow in Aldgate." In Rabelais' Pantagruel iii. 14, Panurge predicts that his wife "will be jocund, feat, compt . . . even as a pretty little Ch. chough." C., with a recollection of its derivation from Cornu, a horn, is taken jocosely to be the land of cuckolds. In Nabbes' Cowen G. v. 6, Ralph predicts that if Worthy marries a city wife "You shall be shipped at Cuckolds Haven, and so transported into C." Hycke, p. 88, has travelled in "Cornewale and Northumberlonde." St. Michael's Mt. is spoken of as the Mt. in C. In Brome's Antipodes i. 3, Barbara speaks of news "beyond the moon and stars, I think, or mt. in C."

CORPUS CHRISTI (COLLEGE). University of Cambridge, formerly called St. Bene't, founded in 1352 by the Guilds of C. C. and of the Blessed Virgin. After the Reformation it became a Puritan stronghold. It is in Trumpington St., between Downing St. and Benet St., which keeps the old name. Richd. Fletcher, the father of the dramatist, was President of Bene't. Marlowe entered at Bene't in 1580.

CORPUS CHRISTI (COLLEGE). University of Oxford, on the S. side of King St., between Merton and Christ Ch. It was founded by Bp. Fox in 1516. Richd. Edwards, the dramatist, was a member of this college.

CORRUCUS. In Chapman's Blind Beggar ii., Bragiardo says to the Count, "We'll meet at C. and we'll have a pipe of Tobacco"; and in v., Leon says that the Count "took his horse and rode unto C." It is evidently some place near to Alexandria: if it is anything but an invented name, I suggest that it is a mistake for Canopus, which lies a few m. E. of Alexandria, or possibly a muddled reminiscence of Rhacotis, the Egyptian quarter of the city. The Corycos in Cilicia, and the Corruca in Hispania Bætica are too far away to suit the context.

CORSICA (Cc. = Corsic). An island in the Mediterranean, N. of Sardinia. It has successively passed under the domination of the Phocians, Tuscans, Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals, Goths, Pisans, and Genoese. In 1768 it was ceded to France by the Genoese, and still remains under French Government. In Ford's Trial iii. 2, Martino says to Auria, "Our state of Genoa hath cast upon you the government of C." The Genoese conquered the island in 1481. In Marlowe's Jew ii. 2, Bosco relates the successful issue of a fight he has had with a Turkish fleet "upon the coast of C." In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, amongst the slaves redeemed from the galleys of Algiers by Eumena, are some "of C." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "How base and sordid it appears To have our cellars stuffed with Corsike wines." Wine is made in C., but it has only a poor reputation. In Davenant's Platonic ii. 4, the D. takes a "rouse of Cck. wine"; and in his Albovine ii. 1, Albovine says, "This is legitimate blood Of the rich Cck. grape."

Seneca lived in exile in C. A.D. 41-49. In Richards' Messallina iii. 1, Mela, his brother, exhorts himself to "Fly to the island of Corcyra": where he obviously means C. Later on (line 1642) he says to Montanus, "Make for the Ile of Corce . . . there on the Tyrrhen shore . . . we'll practise to be heavenly wise." Corsica is very mountainous. In Span. Trag. iii., Hieronimo says, "My cause May melt the Ccke. rocks with ruthless tears." In Richards' Messallina v. 2174, Saufellus says, "My heart is like the Cck. rock, more hard." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iii., Saturn, exhorted to patience, cries: "Teach me to mollify the Ccke. rock." A play by Francis Jaques entitled The Queen of C. is in manuscript in the British Museum. The scene of Partiall is laid at the court of an imaginary K. of C.

COS (now STANCHO). An island off the S.W. coast of Asia Minor, in the mouth of the Gulf of Kos. It was the centre of the worship of Æsculapius, the god of Healing, and there was a famous medical school attached to his temple. Hippocrates, the Father of Medicine, was born at C. 460 B.C. In Shirley's Honorio iii. 3, Traverse says to the Dr., "If I thrive, thou shalt be K. of C., my learn'd Hippocrates." In the temple of Aphrodite at C. was a picture of the goddess by Apelles, which was taken to Rome by Octavian. This is referred to by Spenser, F. Q. iv. 5, 12, where, however, he by a not uncommon mistake speaks of it as being at Chios.

COSSA (a misprint for OSSA, q.v.). In Tiberius 2341, Seianus says, "Had Pelion and C. been conjoined . . . Yet would Sejanus, like Briarius, Have been embowelled in this earthly hell To save the life of great Tiberius."

COSSACKS. The tribes inhabiting the S. and S.E. borders of the Russian Empire, probably of Tartar descent. They became known in England towards the end of the 16th cent. as a savage and predatory people. They fought on horseback, and after being subjugated by Russia furnished the larger part of her cavalry. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, Knavesby applies the word to the Irish: showing a map of Ireland, he says, "this upper part is the C.' land."

COTSWOLD (or COTSALL). A range of hills running from the N.E. to the S. of Gloucestersh., and dividing the basins of the Severn and the Thames. They reach something over 1000 ft. above sea-level. The soil is poor, but produces good feed for sheep, which are largely bred there. The C. sheep are big in the carcass and coarse in the wool. Winchcombe, the centre of the dist., is abt. 24 m. S. of Stratford-on-Avon; and it is plain from the local references in H4 B. iii. 2 and v. 1 that Shakespeare knew it well. "How a score of ewes now?" asks Shallow; and Silence opines they may be worth £10 (iii. 2, 55). In v. 1, 16, Davy asks, "Shall we sow the headland with wheat?" and is answered: "With red wheat, Davy." The allusion is to the local custom of sowing red Lammas wheat early in the season. Hinckley, where William lost his sack at the Fair, is in Leicestersh., about 50 m. away from Winchcombe. Wincot, or Woodmancote, is 3 m. W. of Winchcombe, and the Visors, or Vizards, were living there until quite recently. The hill where Clement Perkes lived is Stinchcombe Hill, and a certain J. Purchas, Esq. (i.e. Purkes), of Stinchcombe Hill, died at Margate in 1812 (v. 1, 42). In Shrew Ind. ii. 95, for Old John Napps of Greece we should probably read "of Greet," the "dingy Greet" of local rhyme, a hamlet close to Winchcombe; and the Wincot where Marian Hacket, the fat ale-wife, lived is most likely the Wincot already mentioned (Shrew Ind. ii. 22). In H4 B. iii. 2, 23, Shallow mentions "Will Squele, a C. man," as one of his fellow-students at Clements Inn. In M. W. W. i. 1, 92, Slender has heard that Page's fallow greyhound "was outrun on C." In R2 ii. 3, 9, we find Bolingbroke traversing "in Glostershire These high wild hills and rough uneven ways"; and Northumberland bethinking himself "what a weary way From Ravenspur to C. will be found In Ross and Willoughby." In Brome's M. Beggars ii. 1, Vincent asks, "Will you to the hill-top of sports then, and merriments, Dover's Olympicks or the C. Games?" These games were founded in the reign of James I by Robert Dover, of Barton on the Heath, probably the home of Christopher Sly, "old Sly's son of Burton Heath" (Shrew Ind. ii. 19). They are celebrated in a volume published in 1636 entitled "Annalia Dubrensia, upon the yearly celebration of Mr. Robert Dover's Olympic Games upon C. Hills," and were held annually for 40 years.

It was a humorous bit of slang to call a sheep a C. lion. In Roister iv. 6, Merrygreke says, "I will set him on; then will he look as fierce as a Cotsold lion." In Oldcastle ii. 1, Sir John of Wrotham calls Harpool "you old stale ruffian, you lion of C.!" In Thersites (Dods. i. 400), the hero exclaims: "Now have at the lions on Cots'old." In Nature (Lost Plays 108), Lust says to Wrath, "Ye are wont to be as bold As it were a lion of C." Jewel, in his Defence of the Apology (1569) iii. 415, says, "This proverb might better become a sheep of Cotswould with his bell." Drayton, in Polyolb. xiv. 256, gives a description of the C. sheep: they are "of the whitest kind . . . The staple deep and thick . . . A body long and large, the buttocks equal broad." He also mentions that the Isis has its source in the C. Hills. In Idea (1594) xxxii. 9, he says, "C. commends her Isis to the Tame."

COUNTER (or COMPTER). The latter is the official spelling since the 17th cent. A prison for debtors connected with the City court in Lond. There were 2 cs. in Lond. in the 16th cent.: the Poultry C., taken down in 1817, and the Bread St. C., transferred in 1555 to Wood St. This last was transferred to Giltspur St. in 1791, and the Giltspur St. C. was closed in 1854. The Poultry C. was on the N. side of the st., 4 doors W. of the Ch. of St. Mildred, which stood at the corner of the Poultry, opposite to Walbrook. The Bread St. C. was on the W. side of the st.: it was transferred to Wood St. because of the cruelty of the keeper, one Richd. Husband, to the prisoners; and also because he had allowed thieves and strumpets to lodge there at 4-pence a night, in order to escape arrest. The Wood St. C. was on the E. side of the st., N. of Lad, or Ladle Lane, now Gresham St. There was also a C. in Southwark on the site of the old Church of St. Margaret, q.v.

The only references to the cs. in Shakespeare are the punning one in Err. iv. 2, 39, where Dromio describes a sheriff's officer as "a fellow all in buff, A back-friend, shoulder-clapper . . . A hound that runs c. and yet draws dry-foot well" (a hound is said to hunt c. when he goes back on the scent and so pursues the game in the opposite direction to that which it is taking: to draw dry-foot is to follow the game by the scent alone); and Falstaff's remark in M. W. W. iii. 3, 85, "Thou mightst as well say I love to walk by the C.-Gate, which is as hateful to me as the reek of a lime-kiln."

In Nobody i. 307, an unnamed person says, "I am, Sir, a Keeper of the C., and there are in our wards above 100 poor prisoners that are like ne'er to come forth without satisfaction." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 2, Ingenioso tells how "the silly Poet goes muffled in his cloak, to escape the C." In More ii. 3, More reports that the "captains of this insurrection . . . came but now To both the Cs. where they have released Sundry indebted prisoners." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. ii. 1, Downright declares, "an he [Wellbred] think to be relieved by me, when he is got into one of your city-pounds, the Cs., he has the wrong sow by the ear." In Ev. Man O. Ind., Asper speaks of the Puritan (or Non-Conformist) conscience: "[It] is vaster than the ocean and devours more wretches than the Cs." In v. 4, Brisk is arrested and taken to the c.; and in v. 7, Fallace visits him there and opens the scene by exclaiming, "O Mr. Fastidius, what pity 'tis to see so sweet a man as you are in so sour a place!" [kisses him]. Cordatus, who is watching the play along with Mitis, says to him, "As upon her lips, does she mean?" To which Mitis, "O, this is to be imagined the C., belike." The passage is interesting, for it shows that no scenic devices were used to indicate that the actors were in the c.: it had to be inferred from the dialogue. In Eastward ii. 2, Quicksilver exhorts Sir Petronel, "Put 'em in sufficient sureties; let 'em take their choice; either the King's Bench, or the Fleet, or which of the 2 Cs. they like best." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, Ilford says, "So sure will I be arrested by a couple of sergeants, and fall into one of the unlucky cranks about Cheapside, called Cs." In Barry's Ram iii. 3, Mrs. Taffeta cries: "Run to the C., fetch me a red-bearded serjeant." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, Wengrave makes an elaborate comparison between the c. and the university: "A C. ! Why, 'tis an University, who not sees? As scholars there, so here men take degrees. Scholars learn first Logic and Rhetoric; So does a prisoner; with fine honeyed speech At 's first coming in, he doth persuade, beseech, He may be lodged with one that is not itchy, To lie in a clean chamber, in sheets not lousy: But when he has no money, then does he try, By subtle Logic and quaint sophistry, To make the keepers trust him. Say they do, Then he's a Graduate. Say they trust him not, Then is he held a freshman and a sot, And never shall commence; but, being still barred, Be expelled from the Master's side to the Two-penny ward, Or else in the Hole beg place . . . When he can get out clear, he's then a Master of Arts. Sir Davy, send your son to Wood St. College: A gentleman can nowhere get more knowledge." The accommodation afforded to the prisoners depended on what they could pay. There seem to have been 4 grades: (1) the Master's side; (2) the Knights' Ward; (3) the Two-penny Ward; and (4) the free Quarters, or the Hole. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 563, Holdfast, the servant of the Master of the C. in which Spendall is lying, asks him for money, and says, "If you have no money, You'd best remove into some cheaper ward."—"What ward should I remove in?" asks the debtor. "Why," replies Holdfast, "to the two-penny ward; or, if you will, you may go into the Hole, and there you may feed for nothing."—"Aye," says Spendall, "out of the alms basket." The poor wretches in the Hole used to hold a basket out to the passers-by through a grating and beg for food. We have an interesting picture in Eastward v. 2, where Wolf, the officer of the c., explains to Golding, "The knight will be in the knights' ward, do what we can, Sir: and Mr. Quicksilver would lie i' the Hole, if we would let him. I never knew or saw prisoners more penitent or more devout. They will sit you up all nights singing of Psalms and edifying the whole prison. Only Sincerity sings a note too high sometimes; because he lies i' the two-penny ward far off, and cannot take his tune. And he has converted one Fangs, a serjeant: he was called the Bandog o' the Counter, and he has brought him already to pare his nails and say his prayers." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo says, "He walks as melancholy as one o' the Master's side in the C." In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, Monopoly asks, "Which is the dearest Ward in prison, serjeant? the Knight's Ward?"—"No, Sir," is the answer, "the Master's side." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii. 1, Ilford declares, "I, Frank Ilford, was inforced from the Mitre in Bread St. to the Compter in the Poultry. If you shall think it meet to submit myself from the feather-bed in the Master's side, or the flock-bed in the knights' ward to the straw-bed in the Hole, I shall do 't." In the Puritan iii. 4, Puttock says, "These maps are pretty painted things: they say all the world's in one of them, but I could ne'er find the C. in the Poultry." Nash, in his Prognostication, predicts that the stones in Cheapside will grow so hot "that divers persons should fear to go from Paul's to the C. in the Poultry." The lawyers who touted for clients at the Cs. were naturally of an inferior class. In Barry's Ram iv., Justice Tutchin says to Throate, "You, some common bail, or C.-lawyer, marry my niece!" In Dekker's Westward iii. 1, Tenterhook says to his wife, "Buy a link and meet me at the C. in Wood St." In 1598 Henslowe provided 40/- to secure Dekker's release from "the C. in the Poultry." In W. Rowley's Wonder v., the Sheriff orders, "See your prisoners presently conveyed From Ludgate unto Newgate and the Cs." In Middleton's Inner Temp., Fasting Day says that Plumporridge "moves like one of the great porridge tubs going to the C.": presumably for the feeding of the prisoners. In Wapull's Tarrieth F. 2, the Sergeant says to the Debtor, "ro groats thou shalt pay, or else to the C. we must out of hand." In Dekker's Northward i. 3, Philip says that he has come "from the house of prayer and fasting, the C." In Fam. Vict., p. 330, the boy says that as the result of a street fray, "the young Prince was carried to the C." by the mayor and sheriffs. In B. & F. Mad Lover i. 1, the Fool says to Chilax, "I'll have a shilling for a can of wine, When you shall have 2 sergeants for a c.": where a pun is intended between counter and shilling.

COURCELLES. A town in Belgium, near Charleroi, some 30 m. S. of Brussels. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, it is one of the places which Byron "peopled with the triumphant issue of victory."

COVENT GARDEN (or more properly CONVENT G.) was so called from the fact that it belonged originally to the Abbey of Westminster. It lay N. of the Strand at the back of Burghley House, now Exeter Hall. In the 16th cent. it was a large enclosed g., with no buildings on it except a cottage or two. At the dissolution of the monasteries it came to the Crown and was given to the D. of Somerset: at his execution it reverted to the Crown, and in 1552 was granted to the Earl of Bedford. The square, with piazzas on the N. and E. sides and the Ch. of St. Paul on the W., was built about 1631 from designs by Inigo Jones. The flower and fruit market began about the middle of the 17th cent. in a small way, but its real foundation was in 1678. It soon became a resort of women of loose character, and is frequently mentioned by the restoration dramatists. In Davenant's Wits iv. 2, Thwack says, "A new plantation [i.e. colony] is made i' the C. G. from the sutlery o' the German camps and the suburbs of Paris." In News from Hell C. G. is mentioned in a list of places where whores and thieves live. St. Hilary's Tears (1642) are "shed upon all professions from the C.-G. Lady of Iniquity to the Turnbull-st. Trull." In the London Prentices' Declaration (1642), it is stated that they met "at the piazza's in C. G." In Shirley's Ball (licensed 1632) v. 1, Freshwater invents a story that when he was in Venice "2 or 3 English spies told us they had lain lieger for 3 months to steal away the Piazza and ship it to C. G." In Killigrew's Parson iv. 3, the Widow says, "We'll go to my nephew's at C. G." For reference to C. G. in Underwit, see s.v. COCKPIT. Brome's Covent G. tells of the efforts of Justice Cockbrain to purify the G. from the loose women and profligate men who were already beginning to haunt it. He exclaims (i. 1), "Here's Architecture expressed indeed! It is a most slightly situation and fit for gentry and nobility. Yond magnificent piece, the Piazza, will excell that at Venice." The New Ch. (St. Paul's) is spoken of, and the "belconies," which were the first examples of that feature of domestic architecture in England. The scene of Nabbes' C. Garden is laid here: in i. 3, Mrs. Tongall speaks with enthusiasm of the "balconees"; "they set off a lady's person well when she presents herself to the view of gazing passengers." The word was accented on the 2nd syllable up to the beginning of the 19th cent.

COVENTRY. A city in Warwickshire, on the Sherbourne, 10 m. N.E. of Warwick and 91 m. N.W. of Lond., on the N.W. Rd. to Chester and the N. It derived its name from the Benedictine Convent founded by Earl Leofric in 1043. It was surrounded by walls, which were demolished by Charles II. Its ancient cathedral was levelled with the ground by Henry VIII, but the Churches of St. Michael and Trinity, and the spire of the old Grey Friars Ch., now attached to Christ Ch., are still the most prominent features of the city, and give it its name of "The City of the Three Spires." St. Mary's Hall, erected in the reign of Henry VI, is a fine example of 15th cent. architecture. The noble Gothic cross, set up in the market-place in the 16th cent., was removed in 1771. Drayton, in Polyolb. xiii. 321, describes C. "Flourishing with fanes and proud pyramides; Her walls in good repair, her ports so bravely built, Her halls in good estate, her cross so richly gilt." In Hymn on his Lady's Birthplace (1619), he says, "C., thou dost adorn The country wherein I was born." He was born at Hartshill, in Warwickshire. Parliaments were held here in 1404 and in 1459.

C. was famous for its pageants and processions, and especially for its Mystery Plays, which were performed on movable stages in the sts. on Corpus Christi Day. It is but a short 20 m. from Stratford to C., and there can be little doubt that the boy Shakespeare saw some of these performances, and had them in his memory when he wrote of "out-Heroding Herod" (Ham. iii. 2, 16); compared Falstaff to "Herod of Jewry" (M.W.W. ii. 1, 20); likened an infuriated soldiery to "Herod's bloody-hunting slaughtermen" (H5 iii. 3, 41); or thought of a smut on Bardolph's red nose as "Dives in his robes, burning, burning" (H4 A. iii. 3, 36). In J. Heywood's Four PP., p. 18, the Pardoner claims the acquaintance of the devil, who met him at the gate of Hell, "For oft in the play of Corpus Christi He hath played the devil at C." The Puritan opposition to the plays is indicated in B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, where one of the fiddler's ballads is "Jonas his crying out against C." Jonah's mission to Nineveh was often used as a parallel, or exemplar, of protesters against modern abuses, as e.g. in Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass. An annual procession was held in honour of Lady Godiva's devotion in riding naked through the streets to save the citizens from the exactions of Earl Leofric. St. George headed the procession, and Lady Godiva herself was represented. In Shirley's Hyde Park ii. 4, Mrs. Carol says, "You would not have me ride through the city naked, as once a Princess of England did through C." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 1, Saunders says, "My lady talked about what a goodly act it was of a Countess, Northamptonshire breed belike, that to make C. a corporation rode through the city naked." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, St. George is represented as "heir to the Earl of C.," doubtless because of the part he played in the procession. In Jonson's Owls, Cox, on his hobby-horse, says, "He is the Pegasus that uses To wait on Warwick Muses; And on gaudy-days he paces Before the C. Graces," i.e. in the pageant. In Sampson's Vow v. 2, 35, Miles, who is preparing to take part in a pageant, says, "I'll stand out like a man of C."

In J. Heywood's Weather, Farmer, p. 99, Report claims to have been "At Canterbury, at C., at Colchester." In John, Tyb, Farmer, p. 72, John says that Margery "is the most bawdy hence to C.," i.e. between Lond. and C. In John Evangel. B. 3, Evil Counsel says, "I will no more go to C., for there knaves set me on the pillory and threw eggs at my head." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, the Bp. of C. is arrested and taken to the Tower for his share in the banishment of Gaveston, and the revenues of his see are given to the favourite. The appeal to combat between "Hereford and fell Mowbray" was arranged to take place "At C. upon St. Lambert's day" (R2 i. 1, 199), and the proceedings in "the lists at C." are described in i. 3. Falstaff marched his "150 tattered prodigals" by way of C. to Shrewsbury, though he was ashamed to take them through the city, and kept them outside whilst he sent Bardolph in to fill his bottle with sack (H4 A. iv. 2, 1, 42). In H6 C. iv. 8 some rearrangement is urgently needed. The scene is in the palace in Lond., and at the beginning Warwick is present, and goes out at line 32, saying, "Farewell, sweet Lords; let's meet at C." Then K. Edward enters, seizes K. Henry, and says, "Towards C. bend we our course Where peremptory Warwick now remains." Evidently a new scene should begin at line 33. The next scene (v. 1) is before the walls of C. Warwick appears on the walls with the mayor, looking out for his friends: Oxford from Dunsmore between Daventry and C., Montague from Daventry, and Clarence from Southam to the S.E. He is looking in the direction of Southam (line 12), and hears behind him the drums of Edward's army which is advancing from Warwick in the S.W. to the Greyfriars Gate through which the Warwick Rd. entered. Finding this closed against him, Edward marches round towards the New Gate, or the Gosford Gate, on the E. of the city; meanwhile Oxford, Montague, and Somerset arrive and enter through one or other of the E. gates. Clarence now arrives and joins himself unexpectedly to Edward's forces. Warwick then marches out to Barnet, where the great battle of the next scene takes place.

The chief manufactures of C. in the 15th and 16th cents. were woollens, broadcloths, caps, and a thread of a special colour called C. blue, in the production of which the water of the Sherbourne was supposed to play an essential part. Ribbon-weaving and watch-making were introduced at a later time. In Jonson's Owls, the 3rd Owl is described as "a pure native bird this, And though his hue Be not C. blue Yet is he undone By the thread he has spun; For since the wise town Has let the sports down Of may-games and morris . . . Where the maids and their makes . . . Had their smocks all bewrought With his thread which they bought It now lies on his hands." This owl represents a Puritan of C. who has spoilt the trade in blue thread by putting down the pageants. In his Gipsies, we have "The C. blue Hangs there upon Prue." In Greene's George ii. 3, Jenkin has a shirt collar wrought over with "right C. blue," which he thinks is better than gold. In Stafford's Brief Concept of English Policy (1581), we are told "The chief trade of C. was heretofore in making of blue thread; but now our thread comes all from beyond sea. Wherefore that trade of C. is decayed." In Drayton's Dowsabell, the shepherd's breech was of "Cointree blue." In Greene's Quip, p. 228, the Broker wears "a C. cap of the finest wool." In his James IV iv. 3, Slipper says, "Edge me the sleeves with C.-blue." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 86, Hobs gives the king "a handkercher wrought with . . . C.-silk blue thread." In Sampson's Vow i. 2, 52, Miles leaves a handkercher "wrought with blue C."

In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions, amongst other curiosities, "The C. Boares-shield," i.e. the hide of the boar slain by Guy of Warwick, but Peacham appears to be confusing the boar of Windsor with the great cow of Dunsmore, near C., both of which were the victims of Guy's prowess. The dramatist John Marston was born at C.

COW CROSS. An old cross in Lond. near Smithfield, in C. C. St., which runs from St. John St., past the S. end of Turnmill St., to Farringdon Rd. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 57, Crosby tells how he was picked up as an infant by an honest citizen "near unto a cross, commonly called C. C., near Islington," and taken to the Foundling Hospital. Hence he was named John Crosby.

COW LANE. A st. in Lond., now called King St., running from the N.W. corner of W. Smithfield to Snow Hill. In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, Mrs. Littlewit tells, "My mother has had her nativity-water cast lately by the cunning men in C. L., and they have told her her fortune." The 1599 edition of Span. Trag. was printed by William White in C. L.; he also published The Fraternitie of Vagabondes in 1663.

COWE. A place visited by Hycke in his travels (p.88): "I have been in Gene and in C., Also in the land of Rumbelowe." Possibly he means Cowes in the I. of Wight, which took its rise from the building of a castle at W. Cowes by Henry VIII.

COWLING CASTLE. An ancient castle in Kent, some 3 m. S. of Gravesend. It was built in the reign of Richard II, and the ruins are still considerable. It belonged to Lord Cobham (Sir John Oldcastle). In Old- castle iii. 1, Lord Cobham says to the Earl of Cambridge and his companions, "Will ye not take C. for your host And see what entertainment it affords?" In Bale's Process against Lord Cobham (1544), he says, "The Archbp. sent a very sharp citation unto the castle of C., where he [i.e. Cobham] at that time dwelt for his solace."

COYLCHESTER. See COLCHESTER.

CRACKFIELD. See CRATFIELD.

CRACOVIA (CRACOW). The ancient capital of Poland, on the Vistula, 158 m. S.W. of Warsaw. In its magnificent cathedral the Kings of Poland were crowned, and here most of them were buried. In B. & F. Pestle iv. 1, the citizen's wife says, "Let Ralph travel over great hills, and come to the K. of C.'s house." In the next scene Ralph comes to the court of Moldavia, which is held at C.: as a matter of fact, Poland claimed the lordship over Moldavia and had many wars with the Turks about it in the 16th cent. Ralph refuses the love of the k.'s daughter . . . "He will not stoop to a Cn." In Davenant's Albion iii. 1, Paradine says to the Messenger, "You bring me letters from C., Sir?"

CRAIG, THE. The conical hill on the S.E. of the city of Edinburgh, commonly called ARTHUR'S SEAT. It rises to a height of 822 ft., and is crowned by an ancient castle. On the W. it is encircled by a range of precipitous rocks, called Salisbury Cs., or The Cs. At the time of the siege of Leith by the English in 1560 it was held by the French, the English troops being encamped near its foot. For reference to the Crag in Sampson's Vow-Breaker, see s.v. CHAPEL, THE.

CRAIG ERIRI (or, more properly, CREIGIAN'R ERYRAU). The Welsh name for Snowdon. In Jonson's Wales, Evan says, "Is called the British Aulpes, C. E., a very sufficient hills."

CRANBORNE. A town in Dorsetsh., 27 m. N.E. of Dorchester. It has a fine old Gothic ch. In Nabbes' Totenham v. 1, one of the neighbours tells how he and his companions slept soundly, "and dreamed we were in C. Ch. at a drowsy sermon."

CRANE. The sign of a bookseller's shop in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Middleton's Mad World was "Printed by H. B. for Walter Burre; and are to be sold in Paule's Church-yard at the sign of the C. 1608." The 4th Folio of Shakespeare's works was "Printed for H. Herringham, E. Brewster, and R. Bentley at the Anchor in the New Exchange, the C. in St. Paul's Church-yard, and in Russel-St., Covent Garden. 1685." Massinger's Dowry was "Printed by John Norton for Francis Constable and are to be sold at his shop at the C. in Paul's Churchyard. 1632." W. Rowley's New Wonder was "Imprinted by G. L. for Francis Constable and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the C. in St. Pauls Churchyard. 1632."

CRANES, THREE. See THREE CRANES.

CRANFORD. A vill. in Middlesex, on the Crane, 2 m. S.W. of Southall. In Harman's Caveat 24, "the Cross keyes in C. parish" is mentioned as one of the haunts of vagabonds in Middlesex.

CRANON. A town in ancient Thessaly, 10 m. S.W. of Larissa. It was the home of the Scopadæ, and the poet Simonides resided there for some time under their patronage. E. D., in trans. of Theocritus' Idyl xvi., says, "The Scopedans had many droves of calves . . . and shepherds kept in the C. dales Infinite flocks."

CRATFIELD (or CRACKFIELD). A vill. in Suffolk, 9 m. N. of Framlingham. In Greene's Friar xiii. 23, one of the scholars says, "Our fathers' lands adjoin: In C. mine doth dwell, and his in Laxfield."

CRAY. The name of 4 villages in Kent, lying S.W. of Dartford, on the rd. from Crayford to Farnborough. They run in order from N. to S.: North C., Footsray, St. Paul's C., and St. Mary's C. In Oldcastle iii. 3, Sir John of Wrotham and Doll being on their way from Cobham to Blackheath, Sir John says, "Come, Doll; I'll see thee safe at some alehouse here at C." In Fair Women ii. 156, Barnes sends his son to Lond. to "pray Mr. Saunders to be here next week about the matter at S. Mary C." In ii. 189, Old John, meeting Beane near Woolwich, asks him, "Walk ye to Greenwich or walk ye to C.?"

CREED LANE. St. in Lond., running from near the top of Ludgate Hill to Carter L. It was originally called Spurriers Row, but the name was changed in the reign of Elizabeth to C. L., from the scribes who lived there and wrote copies of the Pater Noster, Ave, Creed, Graces, etc. Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar, 1st edn., was "Printed and sold by Hugh Singleton, dwelling at the sign of the Golden Tun, in C. L., near unto Ludgate." An undated edition of Elinor Rummie was "Imprinted at Lond., in Crede L., by John Kyage and Thomas Marche."

CREET. See CRETE.

CREMA. A town in N. Italy, on the Serio, 25 m. S.E. of Milan. In Cockayne's Obstinate ii. 1, Lorece, in his wholly imaginary account of his travels, says, "From thence to Naples in Savoy; from Naples to C.; and thence to Alexandria."

CREMONA. A city in N. Italy, on the Po, 45 m. S.E. of Milan. Vergil was born between C. and Mantua: after the Civil War the lands of C. were confiscated by Octavian, and Mantua was involved in its troubles; hence Vergil's well-known line (Ecl. ix. 28): "Mantua vae miseræ nimium vicina Ce." The lofty belfry-tower of the Duomo is seen from many miles round. It is chiefly famous for the incomparable violins made there by the families of the Amati and Stradivari in the 18th cent. In Ford's 'Tis Pity iv. 2, Richardetto advises his niece to free her years "From hazard of these woes by flying hence [from Parma] To fair C., there to vow your soul To holiness." Parma is some 25 m. S.E. of C. In T. Heywood's B. Age iv., Jason speaks of Hercules as "he by whom the C. giants fell"; and Hercules himself says, "I the 100 giants of C. slew." This was when he passed through Italy after capturing the oxen of Geryon: Alebion and Nemausus, princes of the Ligurians, tried to get the oxen, and he fought with them and killed them and their supporters. Milton, Ode on Passion 26, speaking of those who had dealt with the same theme, says, "Loud o'er the rest C.'s trump doth sound." The reference is to the Christiad of Vida of C. (1490-1566).

CRESCENTIA (CHURCH and NUNNERY OF). A ch. and nunnery in Modena. St. C. was a virgin of whom little is known, except that her tomb is near Paris. In Laelia, the heroine is placed by her father in the nunnery; and in i. 4, 53, we have mention of the ch.

CRESSINGHAM. Two adjoining vills. in Norfolk, Gt. and Little C., some 26 m. W. of Norwich. In Middleton's Quiet Life iv. 1, Sir Francis C. says, "C. of C. has continued many years, and must the name sink now?"

CRESSY. A small town in France near the mouth of the Somme, abt. 100 m. N. of Paris. It is chiefly known through the defeat of the French there by Edward III on Aug. 26, 1346. In H5 ii. 4, 54, the French K. recalls the day "When C. battle fatally was struck, And all our princes captiv'd by the hand Of that black name, Edward, Black Prince of Wales." The battle is described in Ed. III iii., where the name is spelt Cressi and Cressey. Jonson, in Prince Henry's Barriers, speaks of "that Mars of men, The Black Prince Edward, who then At C. field had no more years than you." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 35, Lancaster speaks of the "warlike battles won At Cressey field, Poyteeres, Artoyse and Mayne" by the Black Prince. Drayton, in Ballad of Agincourt (1606) 41, says, "Poitiers and C. tell, When most their pride did swell, Under our sword they fell."

CRETE (Cn. = Cretan). The large island in the S. of the Ægean archipelago. The capital is Candia, whence the Elizabethans call the whole island Candy, or Candia (q.v.). When they speak of C. they almost always refer to the island as it appears in Greek mythology and history. According to legend, Rhea, in fear of Cronos, who was in the habit of swallowing his children, bore Zeus in a cave in C., where he was suckled by the goat Amalthea, whilst a stone was palmed off on Cronos in his place. Hence C. became one of his principal shrines. In Wilson's Pedler 754, the Mariner says, "Jupiter over a far country, Creta, was king." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 2233, Timon prays Jupiter to take vengeance of the sins of men: "Else still to those reproaches subject be, The Cns. cast upon thy tomb and thee." Callimachus, Hymn to Zeus 8, says, "The Cns. are ever liars; for, O Lord, they have fabricated a tomb for thee; but thou didst not die, for thou art everlasting." In T. Heywood's Gold. Age iv. 1, Jupiter says, "Our unkind father Left to our head the imperial crown of Crete"; and a line or two later he calls himself "the Cn. Jupiter." Milton, P. L. i. 514, says of the Greek gods, "These, first in C. And Ida known." It was the kingdom of the mythological Minos, the husband of Pasiphae. As he failed to sacrifice to Poseidon the snow-white bull which had risen from the sea, the god inspired Pasiphae with a monstrous passion for the bull, and she bore as the result the Minotaur, a hideous brute with the head of a bull and the body of a man. Minos confined this creature in the famous labyrinth. Having conquered the Athenians, Minos imposed on them a tribute of 7 youths and 7 maidens to be sent every year. These were devoured by the Minotaur. But Theseus, the son of Ægeus, came as one of the youths and, having killed the monster, escaped from the labyrinth by means of a thread given him by Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who had fallen in love with him. Theseus took her away with him, but deserted her on the isle of Naxos. Dædalus, the constructor of the labyrinth, had furnished Ariadne with a clue, and to escape the vengeance of Minos he made wings for himself and his son Icarus and they flew away N. Icarus got too near the sun, and, the wax by which the wings were attached to his shoulders having melted, he fell into the Icarian sea and was drowned. Dædalus reached Sicily and Minos, pursuing him, was slain there. In H6 A. iv. 6, 54, Talbot, rushing into the battle, says to his son, "Then follow thou thy desperate sire of C., Thou Icarus." In H6 C. v. 6, 18, Gloucester says, "Why, what a peevish fool was that of C., That taught his son the office of a fowl; and yet, for all his wings, the fool was drowned." (Note the pun on "fowl" and "fool.") In Histrio ii. 335, Landulpho boasts of a mistress "whose intangling wit Will turn and wind more cunning arguments Than could the Cn. Labyrinth ingyre," i.e. intertwine. In B. & F. Thomas iii. 3, one of the ballads of the Fiddler is entitled, "In C. when Dedimus first began": where "Dedimus" is an absurd mistake for Dædalus. In Middleton's Change-lin iv. 3, Isabella, feigning madness, cries: "Stand up, thou son of Cn. Dædalus, And let us tread the lower labyrinth; I'll bring thee to the clue." "Cn. Dædalus" is mentioned in Marston's Insatiate. Chaucer tells the story of Ariadne, or Adriane, as he calls her, in the Leg. of Good Women 1886. In C. T. A. 980, he refers to "The Mynotaur which that he [Theseus] slough in C."; and in D. 733 he hints at the grisly story of "Phasipha that was the Q. of C." In Mason's Mulleasses 1788, Borgia cries: "Let the Cretian bull Bellow and burst my brains." In Bale's Laws iii., Ambition says, "I gape for empire and worship desire as Minos did in C." In Shirley's Duke's Mist iii. 1, Valerio says, "Unless this face content you, you may stay till the Cn. lady go to bull again." The reference is to Pasiphae and her monstrous passion. In Pickering's Horestes A. 2, Rusticus says, "Horestes to C. with Idomeneus did go." Idomeneus was the grandson of Minos and took part in the Trojan War. I can find no authority for this visit of Orestes to Crete. In Apus 181, Virginia sings, "When Dædalus from Crete did fly With Icarus his joy, He naught regarding father's words Did seek his own annoy."

In Shrew i. 1, 175, Lucentio says, "I saw sweet beauty in her face Such as the daughter of Agenor had, That made great Jove to humble him to her hand, When with his knees he kissed the Cn. strand." The reference is to Europa, the daughter of Agenor, whom Zeus carried off from Phœnicia into C. In M. N. D. iv. 1, 118, Hippolyta relates, "I was with Hercules and Cadmus once, When in a wood of C. they bayed the bear." This conjunction of celebrities will not fit in with any scheme of their relative periods; and, beside, there never were any bears in C.: a lady, however, may be allowed some latitude in her sporting reminiscences. C. was no doubt a hunting country. Theseus says (line 131), "A cry more tuneable Was never holla'd to . . . In C., in Sparta, nor in Thessaly"; and in H5 ii. 1, 77, Pistol, with his usual affectation of classic knowledge, apostrophizes Nym as a "hound of C." The ancient proverb, "The Cns. are alway liars," received a new lease of life from St. Paul's quotation of it in Titus i. 12. In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudolus, professing himself a worldling (i.e. a citizen of the world), tells some amazing travellers' tales: on which Pædio says, "This is no worldling, he's some Cretian." In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Mendacio (Liar) says, "Three thousand years ago was Mendacio born in Greece, nursed in C., and ever since honoured everywhere." In Edwards' Damon, sc. xi. p. 86, Stephano, after giving his name wrongly as Onaphets (which is Stephano read backwards), says, "I turn my name in and out, Cretico cum Cretense, to make him a lout." In this sense we find Creticism, or Cretism, and Cretize (see O.E.D.). In Tiberius 685, Sejanus says that the man who will climb must adapt himself to circumstances: "Flatter in Crete and faun in Grecia."

There are a few examples of the modern geographical use of the word. In Ford's Lover's Melan. ii. 1, Sophronos reports, "Letters are come from C." to Cyprus. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Callipine proposes to arrive in Turkish seas "twixt the isles of Cyprus and of C."

In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, the voluptuary's bath includes "The milk of unicorns and panthers' breath Mixed with Cn. wines" (see CANDIA). In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Scioltio speaks of "good pure muskaden of C."; and in iv. 5, Euritheia speaks of "Cn. wines that are too excellent to last." In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Frescobaldi has washed his "liver, lungs, and heart in Cn. wines." Milton, P. R. iv. 118, speaks of wines of "Chios and C." as highly esteemed by the ancient Romans. In Ford's Sun v. 1, Winter says, "Plump Lyæus Shall in full cups abound of Cn. wine." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, 72, says, "C. ever wont the cypress sad to bear." The cypress grows luxuriantly there. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 10, says, "No owl [will] live in C." See Pliny, Hist. Nat. x. 41.

CRETICK SEA. The S. part of the Ægean Sea, round the island of Crete. In Hercules iv. 3, 2256, Jove, as Amphitruo, claims to have subdued the pirates who "awed . . . the Ionian, Ægean, and C. Seas."

CRIPPLEGATE. One of the N. gates of Lond., between Moorgate and Aldersgate. Stow says it was so called from the cripples who begged there, but this looks like an afterthought. It was new-built in 1244, and again in 1491. It was sold and pulled down in 1760. The name is preserved in C. Buildings, 11 Fore St. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. Ind., Asper speaks of one "as lame as Vulcan or the founder of C.": another unlikely suggestion as to the derivation of the name. In T. Heywood's Woman killed iv. 5, Nicolas says of the gate, "It must ope with far less noise than C. or your plot's dashed": from which it may be inferred that the gate had some reputation for creaking when it was opened. Taylor, Works i. 87, puns on the name: "Footmen are brought to anchor in the harbour of C." Dekker, in Seven Sins, makes Apishness "come prancing in at C." because of the lame imitations he gives of those whom he copies. In his Shoemaker's iv. 3, Firk chaffingly says to Ralph, "Thou lie with a woman—to build nothing but Cs.!" In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 96, the soldier says, "I came hopping out of my lodging like old lame Giles of C." Deloney, in Reading vi., tells a cock-and-bull story of a cripple who stole the silver weathercock of St. Paul's, and with the proceeds of the theft "build'd a gate on the N. side of the city which to this day is called Cripple-gate."

CROME. One of the places of pilgrimage visited by the Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1. It has not been located with certainty. It is said by some authorities to have been in Kent, near Greenwich, but it may possibly be Croom in Worcestersh., the ch. of which is dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. In John, Tyb i. 1, John swears "by our Lady of C." to beat his wife when she comes home.

CRONIAN SEA (the ARCTIC OCEAN). Pliny, Nat. Hist. iv. 30, calls it Cronium Mare from Kronos, or Saturn. Milton, P. L. x. 290, describes "two polar winds blowing adverse Upon the C. s." and blocking the N.E. passage to China by icebergs.

CROOKED LANE. A st. in Lond., which formerly ran from New Fish St. to St. Michael's L. Part of it was taken down to make the approach to the new Lond. Bdge.: what is left of it runs from near the corner of Cannon and K. William Sts., S. to Miles L. Just above the end of it, in Fish St. Hill, was an old inn called the Black Bell, formerly the house of Edward the Black Prince. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas puns on the name: "Last is child Rowlan, and a straight young man, Though he come out of C. L." In Dekker's

Edmonton ii. 1, the Clown says, in response to Cuddy's request for bells, "Double bells—C. L.—ye shall have 'em straight in C. L." The reference is probably to the Black Bell Inn at the corner of the Lane. In Middleton's No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise says, "Her crabbed Uncle, dwelling in C. L., crossed the marriage." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 221, the Parisian, in his account of Lond., says, "Football is not very conveniently civil in the sts., especially in such irregular and narrow roads as C. L." In Brome's City Wit v. 1, the boy sings a song "made by a couple that were lately married in C.-L." In Urquhart's Rabelais i. 28, Friar John says, "They go into Paradise as straight as a sickle or as the way is to Faye (like C. L. at Eastcheap)."

CROSBY HOUSE (or CROSBY PLACE). A mansion in Lond. on the E. side of Bishopsgate St. Within, which covered the greater part of what is now Crosby Sq. It was built by Sir John Crosby about 1470, and was then the highest house in Lond. He occupied it till his death in 1475, when it was let by his widow to Richd., D. of Gloucester. Sir T. More lived in it from 1516 to 1523, and after him his friend Antonio Bonvici, an Italian merchant. Later still it was occupied by the Countess of Pembroke, "Sydney's sister, Pembroke's mother." In 1672 the great hall became a Presbyterian chapel; and 2 years later the house was partly destroyed by fire, though luckily the Hall was spared. About 1769 it was converted into a warehouse. It was partially restored by public subscription in 1836, and from 1840 to 1860 was the home of a Literary and Scientific Institute. Then it was turned into a restaurant, and—"last stage of this eventful history"—was pulled down in 1910 and re-erected at Chelsea, near the ch. In R3 i. 2, 213, Gloucester invites Anne to "Presently repair to C. H.," but as this was in 1471 C. was still living, and it was not till after his death that Gloucester went to reside there. In i. 3, 345, he bids the murderers of the young princes, "When you have done, repair to C. Place"; and in iii. 1, 190, he tells Catesby, "At C. H. there shall you find us both": himself, that is, and Buckingham. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 57, Sir John C. says, "In memory of me, J. Crosbie, in Bishopsgate St. a poor house have I built And in my name have called it C. H."

CROSS. The sign of an inn at Valetta, in Malta. In B. & F. Malta iii. 1, one of the watchmen says, "Let's eat [our breakfast] at the C." To which the Corporal responds: "There's the best liquor." It is mentioned in Middleton's Widow iv. i., as the sign of an inn in Capo D'Istria, where a quack doctor has hung out his flag.

CROSS KEYS. A tavern in Cranford, mentioned in Harman's Caveat 24 as a haunt of Morts and their Doxies. There was also a C. K. Tavern on the W. side of Gracechurch St., Lond., between Lombard St. and Cornhill, where Henslowe relates that Lord Strange's company played about 1590. Here Banks used to exhibit the wonderful feats of his horse Morocco. In Tarlton's Jests, we read: "There was one Banks who had a horse of strange qualities, and being at the Crosse-Keys in Gracious St., Tarlton came into the Crosse-Keys among many people." It was one of the 5 taverns in which plays were acted before the building of the theatres.

CROTAY (i.e. CROTOY). A town in France on the N. side of the estuary of the Somme. In Ed. III iii. 3, Prince Edward says, "Some of their strongest cities we have won, As Harflew, Lo, C., and Carentigne."

CROTONA

CROTONA. A Greek colony in S. Italy, at the S.W. corner of the Gulf of Tarentum, at the mouth of the Assarus. It was one of the most powerful and populous cities of Magna Græcia, and the rival of Sybaris. At the period of its greatest prosperity it controlled the whole dist. across to the Tyrrhenian Sea. The country is rough and mountainous, and doubtless sheltered many wolves. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iv., Phsyander talks of the moon being "affrighted with the howlings of Cæan wolves."

CROW. The sign of an inn in Aldgate. I suspect that it is the same as the Pye Inn in Aldgate High St., over against Houndsditch. One of the tokens of the Pye Inn is extant, dated 1648; and The Presbyterian Lash (1661) was "acted in the great room at the Pye Tavern in Aldgate." In Middleton's Quarrel i. 1, Russell says that Chough has his lodgings "at the C. in Aldgate."

CROWLAND. An ancient town in Lincolnsh., 60 m. N. of Lond. It possesses a unique triangular bidge., with a statue, said to be of Alfred the Grt., and the ruins of a monastery. It was in the Fen country, and was much resorted to for duck hunting.

In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Fitzdottrel tells his wife, "All C. is ours; and the fens from us in Norfolk to the utmost bounds in Lincolnsh." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Sconce says that his father "undertook to have drained the Fens and there was drowned, and at the ducking time at C. drawn up in a net for a widgin." Ducking time means the duck-shooting season. In Brome's Northern i. 2, when Widgine says, "Our ancestors flew out of Holland in Lincolnsh. to prevent persecution," Tridewell says, "From C., I warrant you, a little before a moulting time." The suggestion is that they were geese. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 353, says of Ethelbald of Mercia, "Then to the Eastern Sea, in that deep watery fen . . . He that great Abbey built of C."

CROWN. A bookseller's sign in Lond. Look about was "Printed for William Ferbrand and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the C. near Guildhall Gate. 1600." Kinsmen was "Printed at Lond. by Tho. Cotes for John Waterson; and are to be sold at the sign of the C. in Paul's Churchyard. 1634." Webster's Malfi has the same imprint, 1623.

CROWN. A Lond. tavern sign. A C. Tavern is in the list in T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5: "The gentry to the King's Head, the nobles to the C." There were C. Inns on the N. side of Holborn, near Furnival's Inn; on the E. side of Warwick L., near Newgate St.; on the W. side of Coleman St., about halfway up the st.; and on the N. side of Aldgate, near the gate. In Bale's Later Exam. of Anne Askewe (1547), Anne says, "I was sent from Newgate to the sign of the C. . . where the Bp. of Lond. went about to persuade me from God." This was probably the C. in Warwick Lane. In Glapthorne's Hollander v. 1, Sconce says, "Ere I went to the ch. I had gotten a touch in the C."

CROWN. An inn in Cambridge, probably the Rose and C., in Rose Cresc., fronting the Market Pl. and running back to Trinity St. The old balcony and part of the house still remain. In Pilg. Pernass v. 633, Ingenioso says, "Seest thou not my host Johns of the C.?" The mention of Hobson, the carrier, in the same paragraph seems to show that Johns was a real person at Cambridge.

CRUTCHED FRIARS

CROXTON. There are 5 vills. of this name in England: one each in Cambridge, Lincoln, and Norfolk, and 2 in Leicester. The play of the Blessed Sacrament was acted at one of the Cs.—it is uncertain which—between 1461 and 1500.

CROYDON. Mkt. town in Surrey, on the Wandle, 9 m. S. of Lond. Large quantities of charcoal were made there for the supply of Lond. There are 2 fairs, on July 6 and October 2, the latter being specially famous for its walnuts. The Archbps. of Canterbury had a palace here from the Conquest onward. It was sold in 1780, and the old chapel is used as a school of industry for girls. In Jonson's New Inn iv. 3, Pinnacia tells how Stuff hires a coach and "runs in his velvet jacket, thus, to Rumford, C., Hounslow or Barnet" along with her. In Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Treedle says, "We will keep our wedding at my own house at C." The scene of ii. 1, is laid there. In Prodigal i. 1, Flowerdale orders his father, who is disguised as a serving-man, to get some new clothes: "thou shalt ride with me to C. Fair."

Grim, the Collier of Croydon, is the title of an old anonymous play, and Grim appears in Edwards' Damon, where Jack compliments him ironically on his good complexion: "a right C. sanguine, beshrew me!" A Cn. sanguine is said by Nares to be a kind of fallow colour, but in this quotation it seems to mean no more than that Grim has a black face. In Grim ii. 1, the hero says, "There's never a day in the week but I carry coals from C. to Lond." In Lochrine ii. 6, Trumpart calls on the "Colliers of C. and rusticks of Royden and fishers of Kent" to lament the death of Strumbo the cobbler. In Greene's Quip, p. 235, one of the characters says, "Though I am black, I am not the devil, but indeed a collier of C." There was also a Tom Collier of C. introduced in Fulwell's Like, about whom there was an ancient quatrain: "Tom Collier of C. hath sold his coals, And made his market to-day; And now he danceth with the devil, For like will to like away." There is a Grim, a collier, in Brewer's Lovesick King; but in iii., he predicts, "Newcastle coals shall conquer C." Just above he has said, "There are a new sort of colliers crept up near Lond., at a place called C., that have found out a way by scorching of wood to make charcoals." In the Cobler of Canterbury (1608), the author says, "I confess 'tis a book; and so is the collier's jade of C. a horse as well as the courtier's courser." In Killigrew's Parson ii. 4, Faithful tells of a charitable Member of Parliament that "got an order to have it but 5 m. to C. for ease of the market-women." In Wise Men vi. 4, Purgato says to Antonio, "Will you take up the best chamber and spend but 2 pence for your part; and this at C. near Lond.?" Nash's Summers was acted at, or near, C. in 1592.

CRUK HEYTH (i.e. BARROW HEATH; now GRUGITH). In the parish of St. Keverne in S. of Cornwall, 8 m. S. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. iii. 377, it is one of the places given by Pilate to the soldier who has guarded the tomb of our Lord.

CRUTCHED FRIARS. A st. in Lond., running E. from Mark Lane to Fenchurch Station and then N. to Aldgate. It was so called from a Convent of C., or Crossed, F. which stood at its S.E. corner. The C. F. were a minor order distinguished by their wearing a red cross on the breast of their habit. The convent was founded in 1298, and after the dissolution of the monasteries was converted into a glass-house, where the first window-glass was made that was produced in England. In Haughton's

Englishmen i. 2, as the company are walking over Tower Hill, Harvey accounts for Heigham's liking for it because it "leads to C. F. Where old Pisaro and his daughters dwell." Much fun is gained in iv. 1 from the wanderings about Lond. of the various foreigners who are looking for Pisaro's home. In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Birdlime says, "I keep a hot-house in Gunpowder L., near C. F." In Davenport's New Trick, Bernard and Friar John belong to the C. F. In iii. 1, Friar John says, "We are now at Islington; what hope have we to get to C. F. before the gates be shut?"

CTESIPHON. A famous city in S. Assyria, on the Tigris, abt. 50 m. N.E. of Babylon. It was built by the Parthian kings near the ruins of Seleucia, and was used by them as a winter residence. It has completely disappeared, but its site is called by the Arabs Al Madain. In Milton, P. R. iii. 292, it is mentioned amongst the cities shown to our Lord by the Tempter; and in 300 he says, "Now the Parthian K. In C. hath gathered all his host Against the Scythian."

CUBA. The largest of the W. Indian islands, discovered by Columbus in 1493 and settled in by the Spaniards in 1511. Greene, in his Orlando, makes one of the suitors of Angelica, Rodamant, k. of C., and another, Mandrecarde, K. of Mexico. In Ariosto's poem they are respectively kings of Algiers and of Tartary. In i. 1, 36, Rodamant describes, "C. my seat, a region so enriched With savours sparkling from the smiling heavens . . . The earth within her bowels hath enwrapt Millions of gold." In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant relates how "C. by Drake was ravished." This was in 1585. A particular way of smoking was called the Cn. ebullition. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Puntarvolo speaks of "the practice of the Cn. ebullition, Euripus, and Whiff" as parts of the gentlemanlike use of tobacco.

CUBAR. The land of the negroes on the W. coast of Africa. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles says, "By the coast of Byather [Biafra] at last I came to C. where the negroes dwell"; and thence he goes to Nubia by way of Borno in Central Africa.

CUCKOLDS HAVEN (or CUCKOLDS POINT). On the Surrey side of the Thames at the entrance of Limehouse Reach, below Rotherhithe Ch., and opposite the W. India Docks. The legend goes that the Miller of Charlton, having discovered K. John kissing his wife, demanded compensation, and was granted all the land he could see from his door. He therefore claimed all as far as this point, which was thereafter called C. P. The K., however, added this condition, that he should walk every 18th of October (St. Luke's Day) to the point with a pair of buck's horns on his head; and he also gave him the right to hold a fair at Charlton on that day, which was called Horn Fair: it was kept up till 1872. A post was erected at the point with a pair of horns upon it. In the Diary of a Resident of London 283, we read that "the same day [May 25, 1562] was set up at the Cuckold H. a great May-pole by botchers and fisher-men, full of horns." Hentzner, in his Travels, describes "the long pole with rams' horns upon it" on the opposite shore to Radcliffe. In Eastward iv., "Enter Slutgut with a pair of ox-horns, discovering C. H. above." He proceeds, "All hail, fair h. of married men only! For there are none but married men cuckolds. For my part, I presume not to arrive here, but in my master's behalf, a poor butcher of Eastcheap, who sends me to set up, in honour of St. Luke, these necessary ensigns of his honour." He then rescues

Security, Winifred, and Quicksilver, whose boat has been overturned on their way to Drake's ship, where they had proposed to sup before seeing Sir Petronel off to Virginia. "What!" cries Security, "landed at C. H.? Hell and damnation! I will run back and drown myself." In Prodigal iii. 1, Civet says, "My estate is £40 a year; besides 20 mark a year at C. H., and that comes to us all by inheritance." In Dekker's Edmonton ii. 2, Warbeck says, "That confidence is a wind that has blown many a married man ashore at C. H." In Day's Gulls ii. 1, Manassas says, "Now doth my master long more to finger that gold than a young girl, married to an old man, doth to run her husband ashore at C. H." In Northward iii. 2, Squirrel says, "I will tell thee the most politic trick of a woman that e'er made a man's face look withered and pale, like the tree in C. H. in a great snow." In Westward iv. 1, Birdlime says, "You went to a butcher's feast at C. H. the next day after St. Luke's day." St. Luke is usually represented as an ox in ancient symbolism. Taylor, Works ii. 21, laments the decay of the H.: "Passing further I at first observed That C. H. was but badly served; For there old Time hath such confusion wrought That of that ancient place remaineth nought, No monumental memorable horn Or tree or post which hath these trophies borne Was left." In Wit Woman 1461, Veronte tells Rinaldo that his wife "will make thy head like C. H.," i.e. put horns on it. In Dekker's Match me i. 1, Bilbo says, "If she should drive you by foul weather into C. H. before St. Luke's day comes, Signor Luco, how then?" In Nabbes' C. Garden v. 6, Ralph predicts that Worthy will marry a wife in the city: "you shall then be shipped at C. H. and so transported into Cornwall," i.e. the land of horns. In Dekker's News from Hell, he says that though hell stands farther off than the Indies, "yet you may sail sooner thither than a married man can upon S. Luke's day to C. H. from St. Katherine's." Dekker, in Raven's Almanac (1609), predicts, "Upon St. Luke's day bitter storms of wind and hail are likely to happen about C. H." In Day's Travails, Bullen, p. 59, Kemp says, "You are in the right way to C.-h.; St. Luke be your speed!" In Day's Gulls iii. 1, Basilius says, "An a duchess long to give her husband the horning let it never grieve butchers to do homage at c. h."

CUE. See Kew.

CULLEN. See COLOGNE.

CUMA (more properly CUMÆ). An ancient town on the coast of Campania in Italy, some 10 m. N. of Naples. It was famous in antiquity as the home of the Sibyl. It was completely destroyed by the Saracens in the 13th cent., and is now only a mass of ruins. In Davenant's Favourite iii. 1, Eumena announces, "The Chancellor of C.'s dead." C. was for some time an archbishopric, but at its destruction the see was annexed to that of Naples. Apparently Davenant thought that the title survived, as it probably did.

CUMBERLAND. A county in N.W. England. The name Cumbria was at first applied to the whole kingdom of Strathclyde, but in the 10th cent. it became limited to the part of it S. of the Solway Firth. It was formally handed over to Malcolm of Scotland by Edmond in 945; and the heir to the Scottish Crown was entitled Prince of C. William Rufus conquered it and built Carlisle, which had been destroyed by the Danes, but it was not till the reign of Henry III that it was definitely recognized as belonging to England, and for a long time it was a sort of no-man's land, or March, between the 2 kingdoms. In Sackville's Ferrex i. 2, Philander recalls how "Morgan slain did yield his conquered part Unto his cousin's sword in C." The battle is related in Geoffrey of Monmouth ii. 15. In Brewer's Lovesick v., Alured grants to the K. of Scotland "all those our N. borders Bounding on C., from Tine to Tweed," in return for his help against the Danes. In Mac. i. 4, 39, Duncan makes his eldest son, Malcolm, "prince of C."; and Macbeth, recognizing that this was equivalent to declaring him heir to the throne, says, "The Prince of C. ! that is a step On which I must fall down, or else o'erleap, For in my way it lies." In Munday's John Kent, John a Cumber is a Scotchman, Cumber being used for the whole of Strathclyde. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 217, the K. gives "Comberland" and several other counties to Sir Thomas Scroope. In H6 B. v. 2, 1, Warwick challenges "Clifford of C." This was Thomas, 8th Lord de Clifford, sheriff of Westmorland and member for that county, which was not yet clearly distinguished from its neighbour C. In Respublica v. 6, Avarice tells Respublica, if she would have trusted him, "Somersetsh. should have taught to C.": the point being their remoteness from each other. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, a cutpurse is described as "one of C.," in order to give Moll the opportunity of saying, "'Tis one that cumbers the land indeed."

CUMNOR. Vill. in Berks., some 5 m. S.W. of Oxford. Here Amy Robsart was murdered by Anthony Forster: notwithstanding, he is described in his epitaph in C. Ch. as amiable and accomplished! In the string of nonsense rhymes in Thersites D. 1, occurs the couplet, "Simkin Sydn'am Sumn'nor, That killed a cat at C."

CUNDRESTINE (i.e. CUNERTON). A hill in E. Roxburgh, Scotland, 6 m. S.E. of Jedburgh. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, Surrey says, "Can they [the Scots] look on the strength of C. defaced?"

CUNNY STREET. See CONEY STREET.

CUPS, THREE. See THREE CUPS.

CURRIERS' HALL. Stood in Lond. Wall near Philip Lane. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt in 1670. It was again re-erected in 1874. For a long time it was used as a meeting-place for a dissenting congregation, and even in the time of James I seems to have been connected with Puritanism. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas, declaring that he is a good Protestant, says, "The Masque . . . was intended, I confess, for C. H."

CURTAIN. The second Playhouse built in Lond., the Theatre being the first. It was erected in 1577 at the point where Hewett St. debouches into Curtain Rd. Shoreditch, on the opposite side to St. James' Ch., a little to the N. of it. It took its name from C. Close, a meadow belonging to the Holywell Priory, the C. being some part of the outworks of the old Lond. walls. Here Shakespeare's Henry V was probably produced, in which reference is made to its shape and construction: Prol. 12, "May we cram Within this wooden O the very casques That did affright the air at Agincourt?" An unsuccessful attempt was made to close it, as the result of a riot that broke out in the neighbourhood. The riot is described in a letter from William Fleetwood, the City Recorder, to Lord Burleigh, 1584. Indeed, as the letter says, "Upon Sunday my lord sent 2 aldermen to the court for the suppressing and pulling down of the Theatre and C." It was still standing in 1627. John Stockwood, in a sermon at St. Paul's Cross in 1578, complains, "If you resort to the Theatre, the C., and other places of plays in the city, you shall on the Lord's day have those places so full as possible they can throng." In Northbrooke's Treatise against Dicing (1577), he speaks of "Places builded for such plays and interludes as the Theater and C. is." Wither, in Abuses Strip and Whipt, says, "Base fellow, whom mere time hath made sufficient to bring forth a rhyme, a C. jig, a libel, or a ballad." Middleton, in Hubbard, p. 90, adds to its bad reputation: "The camp," he says, "was supplied with harlots as well as the C." In Tarlton's Jests a story is told of how someone in the audience interrupted Tarlton, "he then playing at the C." Marston, in Scourge of Villainie (1598), says that Romeo and Juliet "won C. plaudites."

CURTIAN GULF (i.e. LACUS CURTIUS). A puteal or well-mouth in the centre of the Forum at Rome, marking the spot where about the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. a gulf opened in the Forum, which could not be closed until the most precious thing in Rome had been flung into it. M. Curtius leapt in on his horse and the gulf at once closed (Livy vii. 6). In Chapman's Consp. Byron iii. 1, Byron compares the K.'s ingratitude to this gulf: "Did ever C. G. play such a part?" In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Mayberry says of Featherstone, "He's in the C. G. and swallowed, horse and man." In Richards' Messallina iii. 1, 1575, Montanus speaks of "the C.-g.-like appetite" of Messallina. In Marston's Courtesan i. 2, 193, it is said of a lady: "She's none of . . . your C. gs. that will never be satisfied until the best thing a man has be thrown into them." In B. & F. Custom iv. 4, Rutilio cries: "But women! women! . . . Curtius' G. was never half so dangerous." In their Brother iii. 1, Rollo says, "My mother here, My sister, this just lord, and all had filled The C. g. of this conspiracy." In their Double Mar. iv. 4, the D. says, "Like Curtius, I'll leap the g. before you, fearless leap it." In their Prize i. 2, Maria says, "Like Curtius, to redeem my country, have I leaped Into this g. of marriage."

CUSCO. A city in the centre of Peru, abt. 350 m. S.E. of Lima. It was the capital of the Empire of the Incas, whose last K., Atahualpa, called by the Spaniards Atabalipa, was conquered by Pizarro in 1533. Milton, P. L. xi. 408, says of Adam: "In spirit perhaps he also saw . . . C. in Peru, the richer seat of Atabalipa."

CUSTOM-HOUSE. On the S. side of Lower Thames St., Lond., E. of Billingsgate. During Chaucer's tenure of the Comptrollership of Customs, the C. H. was rebuilt, a little to the E. of its present site, in 1385. In the reign of Elizabeth it was replaced by a larger building, which was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. It was rebuilt by Wren, and again burnt down in 1718. The next building was also destroyed by fire in 1814. The present building was then erected, but so badly that extensive repairs had to be made in 1828. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii., Wellbred, after being taken in by Brainworm, says, "Would we were e'en pressed to make porters of, and serve out the remnant of our days in Thames St. or at C. H. Key, in a civil war against the carmen!" In his Devil i. 1, Iniquity says to Pug, "From thence we will put in at C.-H. Key there, And see how the factors and prentices play there False with their masters and geld many a full pack." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Honeysuckle says to his wife, "[I am going] to the C. H., to the 'Change, to my warehouse, to divers places." In W. Rowley's New Wonder iv., George informs Brewen that his wares have been conveyed "in carts to the C. H., there to be shipped."

CUTHEIA (i.e. CYTÆA). On the r. Phasis in Colchis, at the E. end of the Black Sea. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 1, Frederick announces that "Natolia hath dismissed the greatest part Of all his army pitched against our power Betwixt C. and Orminius' mt.": i.e. Mt. Orminius, on the borders of Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

CYCLADES. A group of islands in the Ægean Sea, lying in a circle round Delos, S.E. of Eubœa. There were 12, or, according to other authorities, 15 of them. Delos was the smallest, though the most famous, of them, but Samos was on the other side of the Ægean. Milton, P. L. v. 264, compares Satan's first view of the earth thus: "as when . . . A pilot from amidst the C. Delos or Samos first appearing kens, A cloudy spot."

CYDNUS. A r. in Cilicia, running from the Taurus range past Tarsus into the Mediterranean. It has silted up so rapidly that it can only be entered now by the smallest boats, and it is 12 m. from Tarsus to its mouth. In the 1st century it was navigable by large vessels up to Tarsus, which was less than 1 m. from the sea. Its water is cold, and Alexander, bathing in it when he was in a violent perspiration, caught a chill which almost cost him his life. When Antony came into Asia Minor in 41 B.C. he summoned Cleopatra to appear before him on the charge of having refused to help the triumvirs in their campaign against the murderers of Cæsar. She was now in her 28th year and in the prime of her beauty, and she sailed up the Cydnus to Tarsus reclining as Venus in a gorgeous barge with purple sails and silver oars. Her judge speedily became her lover, and the rest of his life is the story of his infatuation for the serpent of old Nile. Plutarch's description of this famous meeting in his life of Antony is too familiar to need quotation; and Shakespeare has enshrined it in immortal verse in Ant. ii. 2, 190 ss. In v. 2, 228, as she attires herself for her death, Cleopatra exclaims: "Go fetch My best attires; I am again for C. To meet Mark Antony." The story wrought in the tapestry of Imogen's bedchamber, as Iachimo relates in Cym. ii. 4, 70, was "Proud Cleopatra, when she met her Roman, And C. swelled above the banks, or for The press of boats or pride." In Daniel's Cleopatra v. 5, Titus says, "Great Cleopatra sat, Even as she was, when on thy crystal streams, Clear Cydnos, she did shew what earth could shew."

CYLLENE (now called ZYRIA). A lofty mtn. in N.E. Arcadia in the Peloponnesus, where, according to tradition, Hermes (Mercury) was born. In Jonson's Penates, Mercury says, "This place is the Arcadian Hill C., the place where myself was both begot and born." In Marston's Parasitaster iv. 4, Herod exclaims, "Where are we now? Cyllyenian Mercury, And thou, quick issue of Jove's broken pate, Aid and direct us!" In his Malcontent v. 4, Mercury calls himself "Cyllyenian Mercury, the god of ghosts." In Milton's Arcades 98, the song begins: "Nymphs and shepherds, dance no more On old Lycæus or C. hoar."

CYMBRI. See CIMBRI.

CYMERIAN, CYMMERIAN. See CIMMERIAN.

CYNE. In Misogonus iii. 3, Cacurgus says, "I have seen the black Moors and the men of C." The word, however, rhymes with "kind," and is obviously a misprint for Inde.

CYNOSARGES. A sanctuary of Hercules and a gymnasium at Athens, on the E. of the city, at the foot of the S.E. extremity of Mt. Lycabettus. Antisthenes taught here, and his followers were in consequence called Cynics. In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 2, Trimalchio calls Holland's Leaguer, a well-known house of ill-fame, "A C., such as Hercules Built in the honour of his pedigree For entertainment of the bastard issue Of the bold Spartan." Hercules is meant by the bold Spartan, and the reference is to the reception of his son Hyllus by Deianira at Athens after he had been expelled from Trachis.

CYPARISSUS. A town of ancient Greece in Phocis, near Delphi, famous for its cypress trees. In Greene's Orlando v. 2, 1445, Orlando says, "Our planks and sides framed out of cypress wood That bears the name of C. Change," i.e. is bought from C. in the course of trade.

CYPRUS (Cn. = Cyprian). The island in the N.E. corner of the Mediterranean Sea, nearly equi-distant from the coasts of Asia Minor and Syria. Originally colonized by the Phœnicians and Greeks, it was conquered by the Egyptians in the 6th cent. B.C., but in 525 it declared in favour of the Persians, and remained a part of that empire until the time of Alexander the Gr. After his death it was the object of constant contention between the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids at Antioch. In 58 B.C. the Romans seized it from its Egyptian governor and incorporated it in their empire. On the division of the Empire it naturally passed to the Eastern Emperors. The Caliph Othman destroyed Salamis, the capital, in A.D. 646, and held the island for 2 years; and Haroun el Raschid had possession of it for a short time after 802, but in each case it was recovered by the Greek Emperors of the East. In 1184 it became an independent kingdom under Isaac Comnenus. In 1195 Richd. I took it and conferred it on Guy de Lusignan, whose descendants occupied the throne until 1487, when their last representative, Catherine, ceded it to the Republic of Venice. The Venetians held it successfully against the Turks until 1571, when Selim II invaded and captured it, and it remained a part of the Turkish Empire until 1878, when by the terms of the Turkish Convention it passed under English administration, although nominally a part of the Ottoman Empire. In ancient times it was the chief source of copper, or Æs Cyprium. In the Middle Ages it gave its name to a kind of fine gauze (cypres, c., or cypress: sometimes spelt with an initial "s"). At Paphos was one of the most celebrated temples of the Goddess of Love (Aphrodite, or Venus), whence she was constantly called the Cn. Goddess (diva potens Cypri: Hor. Od. i. 3, 1).

In Chapman's Alphonsus, the Emperor's secretary is called "Lorenzo de C." He is an entirely imaginary person. Othello is sent by the Venetian Council to defend C. against the Turk, who "with a most mighty preparation makes for C." (i. 3, 221). He had already seen service there: "At Rhodes, at C., and on other grounds" (i. 1, 29). In Act II he arrives at "a seaport town in C.": undoubtedly Famagosta, the strongly fortified capital of the island, attacked by Selim II in 1569 and taken in 1571. Here the rest of the action of the play takes place; and one of the towers of the old castle is pointed out still as "Desdemona's Tower." In Ant. iii. 6, 10, Cæsar complains that Antony has made Cleopatra "Of lower Syria, C., Lydia, Absolute Queen." The statement is taken verbatim from Plutarch. In Ford's Lover's Melan. i. 1, Amethus, the cousin of the Prince of C., says, "This little isle of C. sure abounds In greater wonders, both for change and fortune, Than any you have seen abroad." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, Callapine boasts that his army is as great as that of Tamburlaine "that, from the bounds of Phrygia to the sea Which washeth C. with his brinish waves Covers the ... plains." In his Jew i. 2, the Turkish Bassoes come "from Rhodes, From C., Candy, and those other isles That lie betwixt the Mediterranean seas." The date of the play is therefore to be supposed later than 1571. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortunatus compares women to "the great bell of St. Michael's in C., that keeps most rumbling when men would most sleep." This is probably enough "that dreadful bell" which Othello silenced for frightening the isle from her propriety (Oth. ii. 3, 175). The scene of Cartwright's Lady Errant is laid in C. The Prince of C. is one of the characters in Kyd's Soliman. The date is 1522. In Downfall Huntington iv. 1, John says, "Richd. is a k. in C.": referring to his conquest of the island in 1195. A Prince of C. is a suitor for the hand of the Princess of Corsica in Partiell. One of the characters in Marston's Insatiate is "Roberto, Count of Cyprus." Some scenes in Dekker's Fortunatus are laid in C.: the date is in the early 16th cent. The scene of Ford's Lover's Melan. is laid at Famagosta in C. during the reign of Palador: the date is vague, but seems to be, judging by the names of the characters, some time during the Persian period and before the coming of Alexander the Gt. Athens is evidently an important city. But it is doubtful if the author had any very definite idea of the period he was describing. The scene of Machin's Dumb Knight is laid in C., and the K. of C. engages in a combat with the K. of Epire. Chapman's Widow's Tears also takes place in C. at some date before the Roman occupation.

In Jonson's Case iii. 3, Aurelia says to her sister, "I thought you'd dwell so long in Cyprus isle, You'd worship Madam Venus at the length." In Massinger's Picture ii. 2, Ladislaus says to Honoria, "The Cn. Q., compared to you, in my opinion, is a negro." In his Great Duke v. 3, Cozimo swears "by all the vows which lovers offer at the Cn. goddess' altars." Marston, in Scourge of Villanie i. 3, talks of consuming all the year in Cn. dalliance, i.e. in love-making; and in his Pygmalion he uses "Cn." in the sense of a profligate: "See how he paceth like a Ciprian." In his Parasitaster ii. 1, Tiberio says, "I court the lady & I was not born in C., i.e. I am not a devotee of the Goddess of Love. Content, Sonnets (1591) ii. 26, speaks of going a pilgrimage "Towards Love's holy Land, Fair Paphos or C." Percy, in Cælia (1594) ii. 4, calls love "the cup of Cypria." Cupid, as the son of Venus, is called the Cn. boy. In Rutter's Shepherd's Hol. v. 3, Daphne says, "The Cn. boy from our abundance shall take his fires to kindle other hearts." In Middleton's Five Gallants iii. 5, Goldstone exclaims: "What has Fate sent us, in the name of Venus, goddess of C.?" In Davenant's Cr. Brother iv. 4, Foreste says to his mistress, "When must you quench the Cn. fire?" i.e. the fire of love. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Damaris refers to women of loose morals as "Cn. dames." In Glapthorne's Argalus iv. 1, Kalandar says, "Our dull wits are not so fortunate in rich conceits as your quick Cn. intellects": where Cn. means "inspired by love." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 61, Mandrecarde says, "Paphos and brave Cypres set aside, With me sweet lovely Venus would abide."

In W. T. iv. 4, 221, Autolycus enumerates amongst his wares "Lawn as white as driven snow; cypresse black as e'er was crow." In Tw. N. iii. 1, 131, Olivia declares, "A cipresse, not a bosom, hides my heart," i.e. a fabric so transparent that it can be easily seen through. In Dekker's Shoemaker's, iii. 1, Firk asks, "can you Dutch speaken for a ship of silk C., laden with sugar-candy?" He is, of course, talking nonsense: he means a ship made of thin lawn. Nash, in Unfortunate Traveller 84, speaks of "a hundred pages in suits of white cipresse." Jonson, in Epigr. lxxiii, tells of Fine Grand's "partie-per-pale picture, one half drawn in solemn c., th' other cobweb lawn." In J. Heywood's Four PP., p. 10, the pedlar has in his pack "Sypers, swath-bonds, rybandes and sleve laces." In the Puritan i. 1 [stage direction], "Enter the Widow, Her 2 daughters . . . all in mourning apparel, Edmond in a Cypresse hat." Black Cypress was used, like crêpe nowadays, as a sign of mourning. Milton, Penecoso 36, dresses Melancholy in "sable stole of cypress lawn." "Wine of C." is mentioned amongst the commodities brought to Bruges by traders in B. & F. Beggars i. 3. Jonson, in Devil iv. 1, speaks of "soap of C." amongst the ingredients of a skin-wash. In Massinger's Emperor iv. 4, Empiric puts first amongst his drugs "my boteni terebinthina of Cypris": apparently some kind of turpentine. Heylyn mentions wine and turpentine amongst the products of the island.

CYRENE. A famous Greek colony on the N. coast of Africa, abt. 500 m. W. of Alexandria. It was founded by Battus of Thera 631 B.C. It fell successively under the domination of the Ptolemies and the Romans. Its ruins are very extensive. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight says, "There was once a ruler, C.'s governor, choked with his own paunch." This was Magas, and the story is told by Athenæus, in Deipnosophistæ xii. 12. Milton, P. L. ii. 904, says that the hosts of warring atoms in chaos were "unnumbered as the sands Of Barca or C.'s torrid soil."

CYRTHA. See CIRTÀ.

CYTHÆRON. See CITHÆRON.

CYTHERA (Cea. = CYTHEREA). An island off the S.E. extremity of Greece. It was an ancient settlement of the Phœnicians, and it was supposed that the worship of the Syrian Goddess of Love was introduced from C. into Greece. Hence the legend arose that Aphrodite, when she was born from the sea, first came to C. Venus is called "sweet Cea." (Pass. Pilg. 43, 73). In Shrew, Ind. ii. 53, she is "Cea. all in sedges hid." Violets are "sweeter than Cea's breath" (W. T. iv. 4, 122). Iachimo, in Cym. ii. 2, 14, apostrophizes Imogen as "Cea." In B. & F. Woman Hater i. 1, the D. prays to Venus as "Bright Paphian Q., thou Cean goddess." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says that the presence of Cleopatra at Alexandria makes "Paphian temples and Cytherian hills bonnet vail to it." Watson, in Tears of Fancie (1593) v. 5, speaks of "Cea. from Olympus mt. Descending." Daniel, in Sonnets after Astrophel (1591) xi. 2, calls Cupid "Cea's son." R. Linche, in Diella v. 9, says, "Cea. checked her lordly son." Herrick, in Oberon's Palace (1647), speaks of "Citherea's ceston which All with temptation doth bewitch." Milton, P. L. ix. 19, calls Æneas "Cea's son."

C., like other islands in the Ægean, was used in the time of Tiberius as a place of banishment for persons who had come under the Emperor's suspicion. In Jonson's Sejanus i. 2, Tiberius thanks the Senate for "their grace in confining of Silanus to the isle Cithera at the suit of his religious sister."

CYVILT. See SEVILLE.

CYZICUM. A city on the neck of the peninsula on the S. coast of the Propontis in Mysia. It is now a heap of ruins. It was celebrated amongst the Romans for its oysters. Drayton, in Polyolb. xix. 118, praises the oysters of Walfleet as being "As excellent as those which are esteemed most, The Cizic shells, or those on the Lucrinian coast."

DACIA. The country of the Getæ or Dacii, formed into a Roman province by Trajan A.D. 104. It lay along the N. bank of the Danube between the Black Sea, the r. Theiss, and the Carpathian Mtns., thus including the modern Transylvania and Wallachia, and parts of Hungary, Moldavia, and Galicia. The column of Trajan at Rome was set up to celebrate his victory over this warlike tribe. In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Latinus says of Domitian, "'Tis frequent in the city He hath subdued the Catti and the Daci." This was at the beginning of Domitian's reign; but his conquest was quite imaginary and led to nothing. In Lochrine ii. 1, 6, Humber boasts, "Nor could the barbarous Dn. sovereign . . . Stay us from cutting over to this isle." The whole story is purely legendary. In the old Timon iii. 3, it is used in the sense of a remote and barbarous dist. Pseudocheus says to Gelasimus, "If any thing can help thee that doth grow upon the mtns. of Armenia, in D. or Tingitania . . . it shall be had forthwith."

DAGENHAM. Vill. in Essex near the Thames, a few m. E. of Lond. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, the Palmer has been "at the good rood of Dagnam."

DAGGER. The sign of a tavern and ordinary in Holborn, Lond. It was celebrated for its pies, its ale, and its frumety. In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity invites Pug to come to the Custom House and "see how the factors and prentices play there False with their masters, and geld many a full pack, To spend it in pies at the D. and the Woolsack." In the Alchemist i. 1, Face tells how he lighted on Dapper "last night, in Holborn, at the D." In v. 2, Subtle informs Dapper that the Q. of Fairy "would have you eat no more Woolsack pies, no D. frumety." In Gascoigne Diet. Drunkardes, we read, "We must have March beer, double, double beer, D.-ale, Rhenish." In Dekker's Satiro., we have, "When shall we eat another D.-pie?" In i. 2, 367, Tucca says to Horace, "I'll not take thy word for a D.-pie."

There was another D. Inn in Cheapside, also famous for its pies. In Penn. Parl. 32, the writer essays to prove "that a mince-pie is better than a musquet; and he that dare gainsay me, let him meet me at the D. in Cheap and I will answer it." This D. was at the corner of Foster Lane. This is the tavern referred to in Middleton's Quiet Life v. 1, where George says of his mistress, "Her sparing in housekeeping has cost [her husband] 'some-what; the D.-pies can testify.'" He had to go there for his meals! In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 257, the Prentis says, "I must needs step to the D. in Chepe to send a letter into the country to my father." In Cutlers, Dagger says, "Go before to my house, to the D. in Cheap."

DAINTRY. See DAVENTRY.

DALMATIA. The S. part of Illyricum on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea. The Romans first entered D. in 156 B.C., when it was made tributary to Rome. It revolted in 119 and again in 48 B.C.; but was finally made into an imperial province by Augustus 34 B.C. In 16 B.C. the inhabitants made an unsuccessful effort to free themselves, and in 11 B.C. joined the Pannonians in a dangerous revolt; and it was not till A.D. 9 that the country was reduced to subjection. The Emperor Diocletian was born in D., and on his resignation of the purple he retired to his native country, where he spent the last 9 years of his life in retirement at Salona. There he died A.D. 314. D., long part of the Hapsburg dominion, is now, as for a small part, in Italy, and for the rest in Jugo Slavia.

In Cym. iii. 1, 72, Cymbeline reports, "I am perfect That the Pannonians and Dns. for Their liberties are now in arms;" and in iii. 7, 3, a Senator announces that "the common men are now in action 'Gainst the Pannonians and Dns." The reference is to the revolt of 34 B.C., which is given by Holinshed as the reason why Augustus did not exact the tribute withheld by the Britons in the 10th year after the death of Julius Cæsar. In B. and F. Prophetess, the scene of which is laid at Rome at the end of the reign of the Emperor Carinus A.D. 285, Aurelia in iii. 3, denounces Dioclesian as "a poor Dn. slave." In Massinger's Virgin i. 1, Dioclesian says to the Ks. of Epirus, Pontus, and Macedonia, "Your company I wish, confederate princes, In our Dn. wars." This is quite unhistorical, as there were no such Ks., nor had Dioclesian any wars in D. The Dalmatic, a long tunic with sleeves, partially open down the sides, and decorated with 2 stripes, which is the official dress of the Deacons in the Roman Ch., and is also one of the coronation vestments of the Ks. of England, is supposed to have been derived from the royal robe of the Ks. of D. During the 16th cent. D. belonged partly to Hungary, partly to Venice; and there were many fights between them about it. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 2, the disguised Brainworm pretends to have served "in all the late wars in Bohemia, Hungaria, D., Poland, where not?"

DAMASCUS (dk. = damask). One of the most ancient cities in the world, lying in a fertile plain at the E. end of the Anti-Libanus range in N. Syria, 60 m. from the Mediterranean, and abt. 150 m. N.E. of Jerusalem. It is watered by the Barada, the ancient Abana, which runs through the city. The position is not a strong one, but it is the centre of all the great eastern caravan routes, and that is the reason of its prosperity and continuous existence. It is first mentioned in connection with the history of Abraham (Gen. xiv. and xv.); it formed part of the kingdom of David, and subsequently became the capital of the Syrian Ks. It passed successively under the domination of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans; after belonging for centuries to the Turks it is now (since 1919) the capital of an independent Arab kingdom. It has given its name to the dk. rose and the damson plum; in metal work to the process of damascening, and D. swords; to silk and linen dks.; and to dk.-powder, a kind of scent. In H4 A. i. 3, 39, Winchester says to Gloucester, "This be D., be thou cursed Cain, To slay thy brother Abel, if thou wilt." The reference is to the legend that Adam was created at D. Sir John Maundeville xi. says, "In that place where Damasc was founded, Kaym sloughe Abel his brother." Chaucer, C.T., B. 3198, says, "Lo, Adam, in the feeld of Damysene With Goddes owne fynger wrought was he." Milton P. L. i. 468, says of Rimmon his "delightful seat Was fair D." In Greene's Friar iv. 27, Elinor speaks of "Edward's courageous resolution Done at the Holy Land 'fore Damas' walls"; and in viii. 113, Edward soliloquises, "Edward, art thou that famous Prince of Wales Who at Damasco beat the Saracens?" As a matter of fact, however, Edward was never at D. Milton, P. L. i. 584, speaks of the knights who jousted in "Damasco or Marocco or Trebisond"; referring to the time of the Crusades. In Piers C. xviii. 261, the Pope is criticized for making prelates "that bereth name of Neptalyrn, of Nynnye and of Damaske." The Pope used to appoint Bps. in partibus infidelium, who never dreamt of visiting their supposed dioceses. The siege and capture of D. by Tamburlaine in 1401 is described in Marlowe's Tamb. A. iv. 1.

The dk. rose was Rosa Gallica Damascena, and is described by Lyte, Dodoens vi. 1, 654, as "of a mixed colour, betwixt red and white." In Sonn. 130, 5, Shakespeare says, "I have seen roses dked, red and white," and in As. iii. 5, 123, Phoebe describes the difference between Rosalind's lips and complexion as "just the difference Betwixt the constant red and mingled dk." In L. L. L. v. 2, 296, Boyet punningly speaks of "Fair ladies . . . Dismasked, their dk.'s sweet commixture shown." In W. T. iv. 4, 222, Autolycus sings of "Gloves as sweet as dk. roses." In B. & F. Shepherdess iv. 4, Amoret tells of "Those curled locks where I have often hung Ribbons and dk. roses." The scent distilled from roses was called dk. water. In Elements Dods. i. 44, we have "dk. water made so well That all the house thereof shall smell As it were Paradise." In H6 B. ii. 1, 102, Simpson tells how his wife "desired some damsons," and made him climb to get them. In The Squirr of Low Degree 36, we read of "the date, also the damyse." In T. D.'s Banquet ii. 1, Clown says, "5 of your silken gallants are swallowed [by a usurer] easier than a dke. prune." In Dekker's Fortunatus iv. 2, Andelocia and Shadow, disguised as Irish costermongers, cry, "Buy any apples, feene apples of Tamascos, feene Tamasco peepins." In B. & F. Elder B. v. 1, Cowsy describes his sword as "A Milan hilt and a Damasco blade." In T. Heywood's Royal King iv., the Clown says, "Now, farewell, gunpowder, I must change thee into dk.-powder; for if I offer but to smell like a soldier the courtiers will stop their noses."

DAME ANNIS A CLEARE. See ANNIS A CLEARE.

DAMIATA (now DAMIETTA). The town at the most E. mouth of the Nile. It rose to importance under the Saracen rule in Egypt, and was frequently besieged during the Crusades. Milton, P. L. ii. 593, locates the Serbonian Bog "Betwixt D. and Mt. Casius old."

DAN. One of the tribes of Israel. They were at first settled on the Mediterranean coast in a small dist. N. of the Philistine pentapolis; but finding themselves constrained for room they sent out an expedition to the N., and captured the Phœnician town of Laish at the source of the Jordan, and changed its name to D. It is the present Tell-el-Qady, in the plain to the W. of Banias, abt. 20 m. N. of the N. end of the Sea of Galilee. It was the most N. settlement of the Israelites, and the phrase "from D. to Beersheba" was used for the whole of the Holy Land. The distance between the two is about 170 m. In Peele's Bethsabe iii. 2, Cusay advises Absalom to "gather men from D. to Bersabe" in order to fight David. In Spenser's Shep. Cal., July 51, Morrell speaks of our Lord "Feeding the blessed flock of D. Which did himself beget," where D. is used by synecdoche for the whole of Israel. Milton, P. L. i. 485, says that Jeroboam doubled the sin of the ancient Israelites "in Bethel and in D., Liking his maker to the grazed ox." See I. Kings xii. 29. In P. R. iii. 431, our Lord points out the danger of Israel's relapsing "to their gods perhaps Of Bethel and of D." Samson belonged to the tribe of D. Milton, P. L. ix. 1059, calls him "the Danite, strong Herculean Samson." In S. A. 332, Manoah addresses the chorus as "men of D."; in 976 Dalila expects that her name will stand defamed "in D.," and in 1436 the chorus refers to the Spirit that rushed on Samson "In the camp of D."

DANAW. See DANUBE.

DANCING BEARS. The sign of a tavern in St. Katharine's, Lond. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, Thomas reports, "The perpetual motion is here found out by an alewife in St. Katharine's, at the sign of the D. B."

DANE. See DENMARK.

DANISH, DANSKER. See DENMARK.

DANSOTHA (probably TRESOOTH). In S. Cornwall, in the parish of Budock, 2 m. S. of Penryn. In Cornish M. P. iii. 377, Pilate gives to the soldier who has watched the tomb of our Lord "Gon D.," i.e. the plain of D.

DANTZIG. An ancient spt. in W. Prussia near the mouth of the Vistula. From the 14th cent. it was held by the Teutonic Knights; but in 1454 it fell into the hands of the Poles, though it was treated by them as a free city. In 1793 it became (by the Second Partition) a part of the kingdom of Prussia, and is now again a free city.

In Chettle's Hoffman C. 1, it is mentioned as the residence of the Duke of Prussia; Jerom says, "I'll practice again at Dantzike, you say in the Duke's mead; I'll meet thee, Mathias; there's my glove." The D. freebooters interfered seriously with British trade in the Baltic in the latter part of the 16th cent. In Dekker's If it be (Pearson iii. 352), there is a scene in hell, in which many notorious characters are introduced, such as Ravaillac, Moll Cutpurse, and Guy Fawkes. Amongst them is one called "the Dantziker" and the "Dutch schellum" (i.e. rascal); Rufman says, "He scoured the seas so well, Charon will make him ferryman of hell." It has been mistakenly supposed that Danske means belonging to D.; whereas it is equivalent to Danish.

DANTZIG SEA. The Baltic Sea, so-called from the important port of Dantzig, q.v. In Greene's Friar vii., Mason speaks of "the W. ks. That lie along the D. seas by E., N., by the clime of frosty Germany."

DANUBE, or DANOW. The 2nd longest r. in Europe, rising in the Black Forest and flowing eastward into the Black Sea, after a course of nearly 2000 m. In Peele's Old Wives, p. 212, Eumenides says to Delia, "Leaving fair Po, I sailed up Danuby, As far as Saba, whose enhancing streams Cut twixt the Tartars and the Russians." The Saba is the Save, which falls into the D. on its N. bank at Belgrade. The lines are repeated verbatim in Greene's Orlando i. 1, 67. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes says, "On Danubius' banks Our warlike host in complete armour rest," and, again, "Danubius' stream that runs to Trebizon, Shall carry . . . The slaughtered bodies of these Christians," and again, "The Terrene Main, wherein Danubius falls, Shall by this battle be the Bloody Sea." The geography is not quite accurate; the D. falls into the Black Sea some 600 m. to the W. of Trebizond, and not into the Terrene, or Mediterranean, at all. In Lochrine iv. 4, Humber asks, "O, what Danubius now may quench my thirst?" In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 1, the Roman Empire is described as extending "from D.'s banks Unto Mt. Atlas side." In v. 6, Cæsar says, "So Danow, crawling from a mtn.'s side, Wider and deeper grows, till his wide mouth On the Euxine sea-nymph gapes." In Tiberius 1142, etc., Germanicus describes his victory over the Germans as being "on Danubias stream," where it "did meet the main." It was really near the mouths of the Enns and the Weser, and nowhere near the D. Milton, P. L. i. 353, speaks of the hosts which the N. poured "from her frozen loins to pass Rhene or the Danaw"—referring to the invasions of the Empire by the Goths, Huns, and Vandals. In P. R. iv. 79, the Tempter points out to our Lord embassies coming to Rome: "Germans and Scythians and Sarmatians N. Beyond Danubius to the Tauric pool."

DAPHNE. A grove near Antioch in Syria, on the Orontes, sacred to Apollo. Milton, P. L. iv. 273, says that Eden far surpassed "that sweet grove of D. by Orontes."

DARBY, DARBY-SHIRE. See DERBY.

DARDANIA (Dn. = Dardan). The dist. around Troy in the N.W. corner of Asia Minor; so called from the legendary Dardanus, the son of Zeus, who was said to have settled there before the foundation of Troy and built the ancient town of Dardanus on Mt. Ida.

In Lucrece 1436, "And from the strand of Dn., where they fought, To Simois' reedy banks the red blood ran." In Troil. prol. 13, "Now, on Dn. plains the Greeks do pitch Their brave pavilions." In line 16, the 1st gate of Troy is called "Dn." In this Shakespeare follows Caxton, who says, "In this city were 6 gates; the one was named Dne." In T. Heywood's Iron Age B. ii., a Trojan says, "'Twas an alarum sure that frightened me In my dead sleep; 'twas near the Dn. port." In Fisher's Fuimus ii, 1, Nennius says that all the Britons are "edged with Dn. spirit." The Britons were supposed to be descended from Brute and his Trojans, who came to Britain after the Trojan war. In Merch. iii. 2, 58, Portia compares herself to Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon, K. of Troy, who was sacrificed to a sea-monster, but delivered by Herakles. "I stand for sacrifice. The rest aloof Are the Dardanian wives, come forth to view The issue of the exploit." In Marlowe's Faustus xiii., Faust tells how Sir Paris carried off Helen "And brought the spoils to rich D." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Vergil speaks of Æneas as "Venus' Dn. nephew." Æneas was, however, the son, not the nephew of Venus.

DARIEN. The Isthmus of Panama, which unites N. and S. America, and separates the Atlantic from the Pacific Ocean. Milton P. L. ix. 81, describes Satan as seeking for Paradise "W. from Orontes to the ocean barred At D."

DARNEX. A corruption of Dornick, the Flemish name of Tournai; a town in Belgium, 160 m. S.W. of Brussels, celebrated for its manufactures of textiles and carpets. In B. & F. Gentleman v. 1, Jaques says, "I have a fair D. carpet of my own, laid cross for the more state." Cotgrave has "Huis Verd, a piece of tapestry or Darnix hanging before a door." In Sampson's Vow iii. 4, 3, Ann says, "Look well to the Darneicke hangings, that it play not the court page with us"—i.e. "See that no one is hidden behind it to overhear us."

DAROTE (or DEIROUT). A town in Egypt on the Rosetta branch of the Nile, near its mouth. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 2, Callapine says, "By Cairo runs to Alexandria Bay D.'s streams."

DARREINE TOWER. The tower at Argos in which Acrisius confined Danae. According to Pausanias, the subterranean chamber in which Danae was confined was still shown at the foot of the ridge of Deiras, which lies on the N.E. of the Larissa, or main citadel, of Argos. D. means "at Deiras," though the spelling is a little eccentric. In T. Heywood's S. Age i. 1, Pretus says to Acrisius, "Now, you that trusted to your D. strength,

The brazen tower that erst enclosed thy child, Stand'st at our grace."

DARTFORD. A town in Kent, on the rd. to Canterbury from Lond., abt. 15 m. from the latter. It was the end of the 1st stage of the pilgrims' way to the shrine of St. Thomas, and here Chaucer's Pilgrims probably spent their 1st night. The scene of H6 B. v. 1, is laid in the fields between D. and Blackheath, somewhere near Deptford, q.v. One of the earliest paper-mills in England was erected at D. about 1588 by one John Spillman, a German from Württemberg.

DARTMOUTH. Spt. in Devonsh. on the harbour formed by the mouth of the Dart, 202 m. S.W. of Lond. Chaucer's Shipman (C. T. A. 389) "was of Dertemouthe" and "His barge ycleped was the Maude-layne." A vessel with this name is actually mentioned as belonging to D. in 1379 and 1386. Hycke, p. 88, mentions amongst the ships he saw going to Ireland the "Barbara of Darmouth." In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough puns on the name: "I will part at D. with" (your daughter) "Sir." (Kisses her.)

DARWEN. A river in Lancs. which falls into the Ribble near Preston. It was in this neighbourhood that Cromwell defeated the Scots in the battle of Preston in 1648. In his description of the battle in a letter to Lenthall, dated Aug. 20, he says, "We possessed the bidge. over D. also, and a few houses there." Milton, in Sonn. to Cromwell 7, speaks of "D. stream with blood of Scots inbrued."

DATCHET LANE. D. is a vill. in Bucks. on the Thames, over against Windsor; the rd. from Windsor to D. was called D. L.; and the fields on the S. bank of the r., opposite to D., were called D. Mead. In M. W. W. iii. 3, 15, Mrs. Ford directs her servants to take up the buck-basket when she tells them, and to "carry it among the whitsters in D. Mead, and there empty it in the muddy ditch by the Thames side." In line 141, Mrs. Page in Falstaff's hearing advises her "to send him by your 2 men to D. Mead." In 151, Mrs. Ford commands her men "Take up those clothes; carry them to the laundress in D. Mead quickly." In iii. 5, 101, Falstaff tells the disguised Ford that "a couple of Ford's knaves were called forth by their mistress to carry me in the name of foul clothes to D. L."

DAULIS. An ancient town in Phocis near the frontier of Boeotia in Greece. It was the residence of Tereus, the husband of Procne; and it was here that Procne was turned into a swallow and her sister Philomela into a nightingale. Hence the poets call the nightingale the Daulian bird. Herrick in Farewell Frost (1647), says, "The while the Daulian minstrel sweetly sings With warbling notes her Terean sufferings."

DAUNCASTER. See DONCASTER.

DAVENTRY, or DAINTRY. A borough in Northants., 72 m. N.W. of Lond. In H6 C. v. 1, 6, Warwick, encamped before Coventry, asks, "How far off is our brother Montagu?" to which the messenger replies, "By this at Daintry, with a puissant troop." This was just before the battle of Barnet, 1471. D. is abt. 18 m. from Coventry on the main rd. from Lond. In H4 A. iv. 2, 50, Falstaff, having arrived with his tattered demotions from Lond. at Coventry, says, "There's but a shirt and a half in all my company . . . and the shirt, to say the truth, stolen from my host at St. Albans, or the red-nose innkeeper of D." Both places are on the rd. from Lond. to Coventry. Taylor's Scourge of Baseness is dedicated "to Mr. Andrew Hilton at the sign of the Horseshoe at Daintree," with whom, as he states later, he had stayed on one of his journeys. Mr. Hilton may be the aforesaid "red-nose innkeeper," or possibly his successor.

DAVID'S, SAINT. A city in Pembrokesh., near St. David's Head, 265 m. W. of Lond. It was the Roman Menevia, and after the Christianization of Britain it became one of the first Episcopal sees. The name was afterwards changed to St. D. in honour of the Archbp. and patron saint of Wales, whose tomb and shrine are in the cathedral. The fame of the shrine was very widely known, and it was a great resort of pilgrims. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i., the Palmer says he has been "at Saynt Davys and at Saynt Denis." In Bale's Johan 1363, Private Wealth says that the Pope's Interdict shall be published in Wales and Ireland by "The bp. of Landaffe, seynt Assys, and seynt Davy."

DEAD SEA (see ASPHALTIC POOL). The sea into which the Jordan flows, in S. Palestine. Mortimer in Drayton's Heroical Epp., says, "In the D. S. sink our houses' fame." In Scot. Presb. iii. 1, Liturgy says that before he will recant "Sodom's dead lake (shall) revive, and entertain Leviathan and Neptune's hungry train." In B. & F. Scornful ii. 2, Savil says, "There's a d. s. of drink in the cellar in which goodly vessels be wrecked." Bacon in Sylva viii. 773, says, "The d. s. which vomiteth up bitumen is of that crassitude, as living bodies . . . cast into it have been borne up and not sunk."

DEAL. A spt. in Kent between the N. and S. Forelands, 74 m. S.E. of Lond. It is possible that D. wine, which is often mentioned in the 17th cent., was so called because it was imported at D.; though it hardly seems likely. In Jonson's Mercury we have "white bread and d.-wine." In Shirley's Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell says, "D. and backrag and what strange wine else They dare but give a name to . . . Shall flow into our room." In Davenant's Wits iv. Thwack complains, "Our French and D. wines are poisoned with brimstone by the Hollander." In Brome's Moor iv. 2, Quicksands talks of his wife and her gallant "at the Stillyard, sousing their dried tongues In Rhenish, D., and Backrag." In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Mendwell tells how "'twixt D. and Dover, one fishing for flounders drew a Spaniard's body up."

DEANERY OF WINDSOR. The residence of the Dean of the Royal Chapel of St. George, on the S. side of the court in which the Chapel stands. In M. W. W. iv. 6, 27, Fenton tells how Mrs. Page has arranged that Caius is to run off with Anne Page and be married to her "at the d." In v. 3, 3, the doctor receives his instructions from Mrs. Page: "Away with her to the d., and dispatch it quickly." In v. 5, 216, Mrs. Page informs her husband that "she is now with the Dr. at the d., and there married," which, of course, was not the case.

DECAN. Used for the whole of India S. of the Nerubudda. The original form is Dacshina, meaning the S. Milton, P. L. ix. 1103, says that Adam and Eve used the leaves of "The fig-tree—not that kind for fruit renowned, But such as, at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or D. spreads her arms, Branching so broad and long that in the ground The bended twigs take root." The Banyan is intended (Ficus Indica). But the idea that its leaves are specially large is a mistake, arising from a confusion between it and the banana.

DEDFORD. See DEPTFORD.

DEE. A river rising in Merionethsh. in L. Bala, and flowing past Chester into the great estuary which separates Chesh. and Flintsh. It was regarded by the Druids as a holy r. In Munday's John Kent i. 1, Gosselen says, "7 score bowmen, wight and tall, have I lodged in the wood near to the r. D." Spenser, F. Q. i. 9, 4, speaks of "the r. D. as silver clean" rising under the foot of Rauran, i.e. Rauran-vaur in Merionethsh. In iv. 11, 39, he mentions "D., which Britons long ygone Did call divine, that doth by Chester tend." Milton, in Lycidas 55, speaks of Deva's "wisard stream." In Vacation Exercise 98, he calls it "ancient hallowed D." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 5, says, "Carlegion Chester vaunts her holy D."

DEEPE. See DIEPPE.

DEGREES. The Scalæ Gemoniæ, a set of steps at the N.E. corner of the Forum Romanum between the Carcer and the Temple of Concord, where the bodies of executed criminals were exposed. In Massinger's Actor iii. 2, Parthenius says to the Emperor, "'Twould relish more of policy to have them [the Senators] made away in private, than to have them drawn to the D. in public." (See GEMONIES.)

DELFT. One of the oldest towns in Holland, 8 m. N.W. of Rotterdam. It was a considerable trade centre, and gave its name to a species of earthenware. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, the Elder Palatine says sarcastically to his brother, "Why, sure you have no factors, Sir, in Delph, Leghorn, Aleppo, or the Venetian Isles That by their traffic can advance you thus." In his Plymouth ii. 1, Cable says he lost his voice by eating butter "when I lay among the Dutch ships at Delph." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii., the Capt. says, "Our Flemish corporal was lately choked at Delph with a flap-dragon." In Larum A. 3, Danila says of the reinforcements he is expecting, "From Aelft 2000 moe Follow the conduct of Emanuell." Later on, B. 2, he spells it Alft. Probably the author took D. to be D'Aelft. Fynes Moryson Itinerary i. 1, 47 (1593), says, "At Delph are abt. 300 brewers, and their beer for the goodness is called Delphs-English."

DELOS (Dn. = Delian). The smallest of the Cyclades, a group of islands in the Ægean Sea, lying between Rhénia and Myconus, 100 m. E. of the easternmost point of Argolis. It is a rock abt. 5 m. in circumference, but was one of the most sacred places in the Hellenic world. According to legend, it was pulled out of the sea by the trident of Poseidon and, after floating about for a time, was fixed in its place by Zeus, who anchored it with adamant chains; hence it was supposed to be immune from earthquakes. Here Leto, or Latona, found a resting-place, and brought forth Apollo and Artemis (Diana), to whom, especially the former, the island was dedicated. In the 2nd cent. B.C. it had an extensive trade, and was famous for its bronze. In Jonson's Neptune the poet describes Albion, the scene of the Masque, as "a D.; Such as, when fair Latona fell in travail, Great Neptune made emergent." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 12, 13, says, "The isle of D. whilom, men report, Amid the Ægean Sea long time did stray." Milton P. L. x. 296, says, "The aggregate soil Death. . . As with a trident smote and fixed as firm As D., floating once." In Fisher's Fumus iv. 3, Rollano says, "Nations 29 'gainst Troy built up A floating D. of 1000 ships." In T. Heywood's Mistress v., Apollo addresses Proserpine, who is identified in the Greek Mythology with Selene in heaven and Artemis on earth, "Welcome, fair sister; We two are twins of fair Latona born, And were together nursed in D. isle." Hence Dn. means belonging to Apollo. In Marlowe's Dido iii., when Æneas professes his love for her, Dido exclaims, "What more than Dn. music do I hear?" Apollo was the God of Music and the inventor of the Lyre. In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Spring says, "They [i.e. the Poets] shall invoke none but thee as Dn. k." In Lyly's Midas v. 3, a song ends, "Io Pæans let us sing To the glittering Dn. k." In prefatory verses to Zephyria (1594), the author speaks of "The sweet-tuned accents of your Dn. sonnetry Which to Apollo's violin ye sing." In Smith's Hector ii. 3, 326, Floramell says, "The Dn. lute is not more musical Than thy sweet voice." Dn. is also applied to Artemis or Diana. In Fisher's Fuinus iii. 3, Lantonus, rejoicing in the British victory, says, "Thou, fair Phœbus' sister, Nor Dn. dames nor the Ephesian towers Shall blazon more thy praise" than the Britons do; Caesar's fleet having been destroyed by the rising tide, which is under the influence of Diana, or Selene, the goddess of the Moon. Milton, P.L. ix. 387, calls Diana Delia; he says, "Eve, like a woodnymph light, Oreod or Dryad, or of Delia's train, Betook her to the groves, but Delia's self In gait surpassed." The author of Zephyria xxv. 9 says that Zephyria is matriculated "Mongst Dn. nymphs in Angels' University." In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Nana gives a list of the persons through whom the soul of Pythagoras passed in the course of its metempsychosis, and says that "with one Pyrrhus of D. it learned to go a-fishing." Pythagoras was born at Samos, and is known to have visited D. during his life; but I have not been able to identify this Pyrrhus. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight says that feeding up hens for the table with milk and corn was "a riot which the inhabitants of D. were first inventors of." Milton, P.L. v. 265, describes how a "pilot, from amidst the Cyclades, D. or Samos first appearing kens A cloudy spot." Samos is not, however, one of the Cyclades.

DELPHOS (Dn. = Delphian, Dc. = Delphic). The usual Elizabethan name for Delphi, taken from the accusative plural of the Latin. It was a town in Greece, in Phocis, lying in a great natural amphitheatre at the foot of Mt. Parnassus. It was the seat of the world-famous oracle of Apollo, strictly called Pytho, Delphi being the name of the town. The answers of the oracle were given through the medium of a priestess who sat upon a tripod over a chasm in the middle of the temple, from which vapours arose, which were supposed to inspire her. The oracles were usually in hexameter verse, and were often very ambiguous, so that they could easily be interpreted afterwards to suit the event. The temple was attacked in 480 B.C. by Xerxes, but the god defended his shrine by rolling huge crags from the top of Parnassus upon the Persians. A similar story was told of an attack by Brennus and his Gauls in 279. The temple, which had been despoiled by Nero, was magnificently restored by Hadrian; and in spite of the tradition that all the Greek oracles became silent after the birth of our Lord answers continued to be given until the reign of Theodosius, by whom the temple was finally closed. In W. T. ii. 1, 183, Leontes says, "I have despatched in post To sacred D., to Apollo's temple, Cleomenes and Dion." In ii. 3, 195 the envoys are reported to be "well arrived from D."; and in iii. 1, 2, Cleomenes describes it: "The climate's delicate, the air most sweet, Fertile the isle, the temple much surpassing The common praise it bears." In iii. 2, 127, the envoys, "having been both at D.," deliver the oracle they have obtained. In all this Shakespeare is simply following his authority, Greene's Dorastus and Fawnia, in which D. is called "an island," and the chronological impossibility of the embassy is disregarded. In Ford's Heart iii. 1, Armotes brings a casket to Technicus containing "the sum of what the oracle delivered when last he visited the prophetic temple at D." In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 2, the scene is in the temple of Apollo, who is addressed as "thou Dn. god"; and Brutus says "I shall shine as bright in Rome as Apollo himself in his temple at D." In Thracian ii. 1, Phaeander directs "Some post to D. to the oracle To know what shall ensue." In Marlowe's Faustus i., Cornelius promises Faust that if he studies Magic he shall "be renowned And more frequented for this mystery Than heretofore the Dn. oracle." In Chaucer's C. T. F. 1077, Aurelius, in his prayer to Apollo, says, "Thy temple in D. wol I barefoot seke." In Davenant's Love Hon. iv. 2, the Duke says, "We must to D. to untie these knots with an oracle." In Brome's Lovesick Ct. i. 2, Philargus says, "D. is but a den of jugglers which profanely abuse divinity and pretend a god their patron to authorize their delusions." In his City Wit iii. 4, Toby says to Sneakup, "You are more dark than D." In Marston's Parasitaster i. 2, Gonzago says, "Well-experienced age is the true D." In Greene's Alphonsus iii. 2, Medea appeals to her "who wert wont To utter forth Apollo's oracles At sacred D." In Seven Days vii., the Chorus says, "As true as the oracle at a place called D. That unknown fortunes and dark dreams did tell folks, So stand I here." Note the Browningsque rhyme "D." and "tell folks." Milton, in Nativ. Ode 178, says, "Apollo from his shrine Can no more divine, With hollow shriek the steep of D. leaving." In Tiberius 533, Germanicus says that, in consequence of the rise of Christianity, "Vocal Beotia in deep miseries And Dn. glory in obscureness lies." In Milton P. R. i. 458, our Lord says to Satan, "Henceforth oracles are ceased And thou no more with pomp and sacrifice Shalt be enquired at D. or elsewhere." In Massinger's Dowry v. 2, Charaloes speaks of "the fatal gold Which Brennus took from D., whose possession Brought with it ruin to himself and army." The Gauls were almost all destroyed in their retreat from D., and Brennus in his mortification committed suicide. In Nabbes' Bride iv. 1, Horten professes to have in his museum "a piece of D.' ruins."

In T. Heywood's Dialogues 6353, Apollo says, "D. is mine, Pharos, and Tenedos." In Lyly's Maid's Meta. iii. 1, Apollo, telling the story of the death of Hyacinthos, says, "Accursed be the time When I from D. took my journey down To see the games in noble Sparta town." Dn. or Dc. are usual epithets of Apollo; and are also used, in the sense of "inspired," of poetry and music, of which he was the patron. Barry, in Ram i. 3, refers to Apollo as "the Dc. God." In Shirley's Honor ii. 3, Alworth says, "Soul of my Muse! what active unknown fire Already doth thy Dc. wrath inspire!" Milton, in Epitaph on Shakespeare 12, says, "Each heart Hath from the leaves of thy unvalued book Those Dc. lines with deep impression took." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Spring says, "Touch thy lyre And fill my court with brightest Dc. fire." In Middleton's Family iv. 2, Gerardine says, "The Dn. archer, proud with Python's spoil, At Cupid's hands was forced to take the foil." After Apollo had killed the Python at Delphi his arrows were stolen from him by Eros (Cupid). The scene of Lyly's Midas is laid in part at D.

DELTA. The 4th letter of the Greek alphabet, which is shaped like a triangle. Hence the name is applied to the triangular dist. included between the extreme branches of the mouth of the Nile in Egypt. The adjective Deltic is used for Egyptian. See under Beltic, which in the passage there quoted I take to be a misprint for, Deltic. In Tourneur's Transformed Metamorphosed, D. is used to mean Ireland; and the Earl of Essex is called "D.'s hope, the Muses' wonder," the allusion being to his well-known Irish expedition.

DEMETIA. The country of the Dimetæ or Demetæ, a tribe of Britons living in Pembrokesh. and Carmarthensh. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 1, "Britæl, decked with the Dn. crown," comes to help Cassibelanus against the Romans.

DEMONICEACLEAR. See ANNIS A CLEAR.

DENIS (SAINT). An ancient town in France, 5 m. N. of Paris. St. D., or Dionysius, the patron saint of France, was archbp. of Paris, and perished in the Aurelian persecution about A.D. 272. He was said to have carried his head, after his execution, from Paris to St. D., where a chapel was erected over his tomb, replaced by a magnificent ch. built by Dagobert I in 638. The present Abbey Ch. dates from 1130. It was the usual place of burial for the French ks. Their tombs were desecrated and the Abbey partially destroyed by the National Convention in 1793; but it was subsequently restored with great splendour by Louis Philippe. The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. professes, "I was at Saynt Davys and at Saynt D." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 93, Elizabeth says that Clifton and Grey "Fought for our father, brother, and sister, At Dennis, Roan, Bullen, and at Callice."

DENIS (RUE SAINT). One of the oldest sts. in Paris, running N. from the Pont au Change to the Port de St. D. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner says, "Lae Rue St. Antoine, St. Honoré, and St. D. are large enough for the vista." Fynes Morison, in Itinerary i. 2, 188, says of the sts. of Paris "among them the fairest is that of St. Dennis."

DENMARK (De = Dane, Dh. = Danish). A kingdom of N. Europe, including the peninsula of Jutland and the group of islands adjacent to it at the entrance to the Baltic. On Zealand, the largest of these, is the capital, Copenhagen, and the old royal city and castle of Elsinore. The Des. were a Teutonic race, and we first hear of D. (in Beowulf) as an island kingdom, Jutland being then inhabited by a distinct race, the Jutes. Christianity came to D. in A.D. 823, but its progress was slow, and it was long before it was established throughout the country. During the 9th and 10th cents. the Des. made constant attacks on the E. coast of England, and in the beginning of the 11th they effected a permanent settlement, and from 1016 to 1043 a Dh. dynasty ruled the whole country. During the brilliant reign of Valdemar II (1202-1241) D. became an important factor in European politics. From 1397 to 1523 D., Sweden, and Norway were united under one crown. In 1490 a commercial treaty was made between England and D., by which the English agreed to pay the Sound dues on all vessels entering the Baltic. The Protestant Reformation was accepted in D. in the early part of the 16th cent., and in the religious wars of the 17th, Christian IV of D. was one of the principal champions of the Protestant cause.

1. Historical references. The scene of Hamlet is laid in D. It is based on Belleforest's Hystorie of Hamblet, while a more primitive version of the story is found in Saxo-Grammaticus. Hamlet was the son of Horvendille, who was K. of D. "long time before it received the faith of Jesus Christ." The supposed date is further indicated by the mention of Collere as the contemporary

K. of Norway. He was, according to Heylyn, the 4th K. of Norway, and 10 ks. intervened between him and Osmundus II circa A.D. 800. Shakespeare, however, deviates from his authority in making D. a Christian country, as witness the funeral obsequies of Ophelia, and the eschatological views indicated by the Ghost. The whole picture, indeed, is of a 16th cent. court: the young nobles go to Wittenberg for University training and to Paris to acquire the polish of men of the world; and the Court is in diplomatic relationship with England. The Fortinbras episodes have no counterpart in real history. There is a touch of verisimilitude in the statement of Polonius in i. 3, 28, that Hamlet can go no further in the way of his marriage than "the main voice of D. goes withall," for up to 1660 the monarchy was elective. The general impression given of the condition of D. is unfavourable; Marcellus, in i. 4, 90, opines that "Something is rotten in the state of D.," and Hamlet, in ii. 2, 252, thinks that it is one of the worst of the dungeons in the prison-house of the world; while Horatio, in v. 2, 352, boasts that he is "more an antique Roman than a De." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iv. 2, amongst those fighting on Arthur's side are "Islandians, Goths, Norwegians, Albans, Des." In Clyomon the hero is the son of the K. of D.; but the fact that Alexander the Gt. is one of the characters shows that the historical basis is wildly impossible. In Grim i. 1, Dunstan says, "Had I lived, the Des. had never Boasted their then beginning conquest of this land," i.e. England. In Edmond Ironside Canutus says, "All my Des. are braggadocios And I accursed to be the general Of such a stock." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 12, says, "The old Lea brags of the Dh. blood." The reference is to the defeat of the Des. by Alfred in A.D. 896. Brewer's Lovesick King is Canute; and the main action of the play is concerned with the defeat of the Des. by Alured or Alfred; of course, Alfred was not contemporary with Canute, and the whole story of Canute's infatuation for the Nun of Winchester is fabulous. Moreover, the Thornton of Newcastle who is represented as coming to the help of Alured lived in the 14th cent. In Lyly's Gallathea i. 1, Tityerus, speaking of Lincolnsh., says, "The land (was) oppressed by Des. who, instead of sacrifice, committed sacrilege." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 47, speaks of the Lion of Neustria (William the Conqueror) rending the usurped crown of England from "the Daniske tyrant's head." In Fair Em. iv. 2, an ambassador comes from the K. of D. to William the Conqueror to complain that he "Has stolen away his only daughter Blanche," and to demand her restoration. The story is taken from Wotton's Controversie of Cupid's Cautels (1578). In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, young Mortimer complains, "The haughty De. commands the narrow seas." In Ed. III iii. 1, John of France announces, "The stern Polonian and the warlike De. are become confederates with us." In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 358, the French K. orders the Des. to be sent for to help him against Henry. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Uribassa declares that Sigismund "hath brought from Christendom Sclavonians, Almain ruters, Muffes, and Des." In B. & F. Malta, Norandine, "a valiant, merry De.," is commander-in-chief of the galleys of Malta in their war against the Turks. In Kyd's Soliman i., Erastus speaks of "the big-boned De." who has come to the tournament. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Leslie says that Wallenstein has "sent the health-carousing De. Drunk with his own blood home." The reference is to the campaigns of Wallenstein against Christian IV of D. from 1624 to 1629. In Killigrew's

Parson iii. 5, Jolly tells of "the Dh. packet which they took from a foolish fellow who, presuming upon the law of nations, came upon an embassy to the K. without an order or pass from both Houses." Bacon, in Observ. on Libel (1592), says, "The Kingdom of D. hath had good times, especially by the good government of the late K., who maintained the profession of the Gospel; but yet greatly giveth place to the kingdom of England, in climate, wealth, fertility, and many other points both of honour and strength." There is record of a play entitled Evoradanus, Prince of D., registered in 1605.

2. Manners, Customs, and Appearance of the Des. Nash, in Pierce C. i., gives a long description of the Des. He satirizes their "unwieldy burlyboud soldiery"; their "flabberkin face" and sagging cheeks; their stuffed and beribboned clothes; and concludes, "They are an arrogant, ass-headed people, that naturally hate learning." A page or two later he says, "The Des. are bursten-bellied sots that are to be confuted with nothing but tankards or quart-pots." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 2, 4, says, "The Des. pass (if it be possible) their neighbour Saxons in the excess of their drinking." In Ham. i. 2, 125, the K. promises, "No jocund health that D. drinks to-day But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell"; and in i. 4, 8, when the promise is carried out and the boom of the cannon is heard, Hamlet deplores to Horatio the custom which enjoins it: "It is a custom More honoured in the breach than the observance. This heavy-headed revel E. and W. Makes us traduced and taxed of other nations; They clepe us drunkards, and with swinish phrase Soil our addition." In i. 2, 175, Hamlet sarcastically promises Horatio, "We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart." So, in Oth. ii. 3, 80, Iago says that in drinking "your De., your German, and your swag-bellied Hollander are nothing to your English. . . . Your Englishman drinks you with facility your De. dead-drunk." In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Caponi says that the Italians "drink more in 2 hours than the Dutchman or the De." in 24—an unusual accusation to make against the Italians. In Nash's Wilton K. i., Jack says, "With the De. and the Dutchman I will not encounter that with Danaus' daughters do nothing but fill bottomless tubs and will be drunk and snort in the midst of dinner." In Davenant's Platonic i. 1, Arnoldo says, "The cellars [are] so filled that they would make a Dh. army drunk." Jonson, in his Ode Allegorice, speaks of "The Des. that drench their cares in wine." In B. & F. Malta v. 1, Norandine, who is about to take the vows of knighthood, which included temperance, says, "I shall be a sweet De. . . . go up and down drinking small beer!" i.e. instead of more potent beverages. In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, a ballad is sung: "The Dutchman for a drunkard, The De. for golden locks, The Irishman for usquebaugh, The Frenchman for the pox." In B. & F. Custom iii. 3, Jaques nicknames the De. "goldyllocks." Dekker, in Hornbook, chap. i., speaks of "the Dh. sleeve sagging down like a Welch wallet." In Spenser F. Q. iv. 10, 31, Scudamour describes a lady wearing a crown "much like unto a Danish hood." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Giovanni says that a general need not fight, provided "he make a noise when he's o' horseback like a Dansk drummer." In Dekker's King's Entertainment (1603), we read, "To delight the Q. with her own country music, 9 trumpets and a kettle-drum did very sprightly and actively sound the Dh. march." James's Q. was Anne of D. In Ham. i. 4, 11, Hamlet says that at the royal banquets in D. "The kettle-drum and trumpet thus Bray out The triumph of his pledge." Cleaveland, in Fuscara, says, "Tuning his draughts with drowsy hums As Des. carouse by kettle-drums." The kettle-drum was introduced into England by Anne of D.

3. The Language of the Danes belongs to the Scandinavian group of the Teutonic languages. The people are called Des., or Danskers. In All's iv. 1, 78, Parolles prays, "If there be here German or De, Low Dutch, Italian or French, let him speak to me." In Ham. ii. 1, 7, Polonius says, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris."

4. Miscellaneous Allusions. Heylyn quotes from Du Bartas (p. 12), "From D. come amber, cordage, firs, and flax." Nash, in Prognostication, speaks of the "Danske crows" gathering on the sands against a storm. In Jonson's Volpone ii. 2, a song speaks of "the Dh. Gonswart." He was, from the context, a magician of some sort; but I cannot identify him further.

DENMARK HOUSE. The name given to Somerset House by James I on Shrove Tuesday, 1616, in honour of his Q., Anne of D., who had made it her palace. T. Heywood's Mistress was performed here in 1633. In Middleton's Tennis, D. H. is described as "A stately palace and majestic, Of late built up into a royal height Of state." See SOMERSET HOUSE.

DE'NSHIRE. See DEVONSHIRE.

DEPTFORD. Originally Depe-ford, from the ford over the Ravensborne, which here flows into the Thames. On the S. bank of the Thames, 4 m. E. of Lond., the seat of the Royal Dockyard founded by Henry VIII. Here The Golden Hind, the ship in which Drake circumnavigated the world, was long preserved, and its cabin used as a sort of refreshment room for excursionists. D. lay N. of the Old Kent Rd. along which the pilgrims went to Canterbury. In Chaucer C. T. A. 3906, the Host points out Greenwich and D. to the company: "Lo, Depeford and it is half way pryme; Lo, Grenewich ther many a shrewe is inne." In Fam. Vict. i. 1, Jockey brings word to prince Hal: "The town of Detford is risen with hue and cry after your man which has set upon and hath robbed a poor carrier." In Prodigal ii. 4, Lancelot, being at his house in Kent, says, "We'll ride to Lond.—or it shall not need; We'll cross to Detford-strand and take a boat." He then gives his cloak to his servant, saying, "I'll have a walk to Dedford." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 1, Dawbeny tells the K. of his victory over Warbeck's supporters at "D.-strand bidge," i.e. the bidge. over the Ravensbourne. Harman, in Caveat 24, tells of a notable haunt of prigs between Detforde and Rothered (Rotherhithe). In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B., Hobson goes to D., where he finds and relieves Tawniecoat. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. i. 2, Knowell says, "Go not about it; Drake's old ship at D. may sooner circle the world again." In Eastward iii. 3, Sir Petronel says, "We'll have our provided supper brought aboard Sir Francis Drake's ship that hath compassed the world." In Verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities on the Sights of Lond., Peacham mentions "Drake's ship at Detford." Marlowe was killed in a tavern brawl at D. at the age of 29.

DERBY. Usually pronounced and often spelt Darby; though this is not the local, but a S. pronunciation. The capital of the county of Derby, on the Derwent, 110 m. N. of Lond. It is a very ancient town, and is close to the site of the Roman station of Derventio. It was called Northworthige by the Saxons, and received its modern name, Deoraby, from the Danes. The Earldom of D. was in the Ferrers family from the reign of

Stephen till that of Henry III, when it was transferred to the powerful family of Lancaster. It was bestowed by Henry VII on Lord Thomas Stanley, brother of Sir William Stanley, who crowned Henry on the field of Bosworth, and still continues in the Stanley family. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Lancaster (Thomas, cousin to the K.) says, "4 earldoms have I besides Lancaster—D., Salisbury, Lincoln, Leicester." In Ed. III i. 1, the K. says, "D., be thou ambassador for us Unto the Earl of Hainault." This was Henry, Duke of Lancaster, whom John of Gaunt succeeded in the title. In R2 i. 3, 35, Bolingbroke announces himself as "Harry of Hereford, Lancaster, and D." In Acts I & II of R3, in the folios and quartos Thomas Stanley is proleptically called D.; in Acts III and IV he receives his proper name, Lord Stanley, though Shakespeare appears to have confused the 2 brothers, William and Thomas; in act V in the 1st folio he is again spoken of as D., and it is he who puts the crown on Henry's head. Both the Stanleys were present at Bosworth Field, and their betrayal of Richd. was the main cause of Henry's victory; though which of them actually crowned the new K. is not quite clear. Thomas was made Earl of D. in 1485; William was beheaded, ostensibly for complicity in Warbeck's rebellion, in 1495. In Ford's Warbeck ii. 2, when Sir William is being led to execution, he says, "My next suit is, my Lords, To be remembered to my noble brother D., my much-grieved brother." William, Earl of D. in the latter part of the 16th cent., is said to have written plays "for the common players."

In Jonson's New World the Factor speaks of "the witches bidding the devil to dinner at D." According to Bacon, Works i. 9, the whole county of D. was wild, uncivilized, and superstitious, and much given over to Popery. D. ale had a great reputation which has now passed to the liquor brewed at Burton-on-Trent. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 556, Sir Lionel says, "I have sent my daughter as far as Pimlico, to fetch a draught of D. ale." In Jonson's Gipsies the 3rd Gipsy says, "You have in draughts of D. drilled your men"; and again: "He then did for a full draught of D. call." In his Love's Welcome Philalethes speaks of "D.-shire, the region of ale." In Cobler of Canterbury (1590), the author says, "There must be admitted no compare between a cup of Darby ale and a dish of dirty water." D. was a great cock-fighting centre, and Cockpit Lane still remains to show where the sport was carried on. In Davenant's Wits i. 2, Palatine speaks of "3 motley cocks of the right D. strain." In B. & F. Thomas ii. 3, Sebastian says, "The cocking holds at D., and there will be Jack Wildoats and Will Purser."

DERBY HOUSE. A house near Baynard's Castle, Lond., on the site of the present Heralds' College, next to Peter's Hill on the N. side of Q. Victoria St. It was built by Thomas Stanley, Earl of D., who married Margaret, the mother of Henry VII. In 1552 it passed into the hands of Edward VI, and in 1555 Mary made it into the Heralds' College. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and rebuilt about 1669. The scene of R3 iv. 5 is located by the modern editors as "a room in Lord Stanley's house"; this would be D. H. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 2, Fungoso says, "If anybody ask for Sogliardo, they shall ha' him at the Herald's Office yonder by Paul's." D. H. is abt. 200 yards S. of the Cathedral.

DERBYSHIRE. One of the Midland counties of England. The N.W. part is one of the most rugged and picturesque parts of England and is known as the Peak, famous for its wonderful limestone caverns and its mineral springs. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 217, the K. gives amongst other counties, "Darbiesheire" to Sir Thomas Scroope. The people were regarded as wild, rustic, and superstitious. In Dekker's Northward iii. 2, Squirrel says, "I will discover it, not as a D. woman discovers her great teeth, in laughter." In Middleton's Chaste Maid ii. 1, the country girl mentions "Ellen, my poor cousin in D.," as having been seduced by Touchwood. In Brome's Antipodes i. 1, Blaze says, "He spends £500 a year now as merrily as any gentleman in D." In Jonson's Love's Welcome, performed at Welbeck, Accidence says, "Fetch the fiddles out of France To wonder at the hornpipes here Of Nottingham and D." The Peak was a great haunt of gipsies, as is emphasized in Jonson's Gipsies; Jackman sings: "From the famous Peak of D. And the Devil's Arse there hard by The Egyptians throng." This oddly named place was a deep chasm in the Peak. In his Devil i. 2, Pug, the imp, claims to be a countryman "of D. abt. the Peak"; his reason being that this place is there. Lead-mining was carried on in the Peak. In Underwit iii. 3, the Capt., answering the fool Engine according to his folly, says, "Yes, and the lead mines in Darbyshire hold still for the alum business." Hall, in Satires (1597) iii. 3, 11, says, "Two words for money, Darbyshirian-wise. That's one too many, is a naughty guise." I suppose the reference is to the 2 pronunciations, D. and Darbyshire.

DETFORD. See DEPTFORD.

DEUROLITUM. A Roman settlement in England, 15 m. N.E. of Lond.; identified probably with Romford in Essex. In Locrine iv. 3, Locrine tells of a secret cavern he has constructed in which to hide Estrild "Nigh D., by the pleasant Lee." Romford is, however, 10 m. E. of the Lee.

DEVA. See DEE.

DEVELING. An old form (Duveline, Divilin, Develin) of Dublin. Duveline occurs, e.g., in the French prose version of the Roman de Tristan (Anc. Textes Franç., vol. 1, pp. 90, 93); Devilling in Barbour's Bruce xv. 107; xvi. 213, 262; and in the 15th cent. manuscripts of The English Conquest of Ireland (a translation of the Expugnatio Hibernia of Giraldus Cambrensis) Develyn and Dyvelyn occur again and again. Instances might be indefinitely multiplied. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forabosco, pretending to be a magician, threatens the Clown: "Then will I convey thee stark naked to D. to beg a pair of brogs, to hide thy mountainous buttocks." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 3, Water-Camlet says that if his wife goes to Ireland "she will be heard from Hell Bree to Divilin," i.e. right across St. George's Channel; the play on the words is obvious.

DEVIL. The famous tavern No. 2 Fleet St., adjoining Temple Bar. It was close to St. Dunstan's Ch., and the original sign was "the D. and St. Dunstan," and represented the saint pulling the D.'s nose with his pincers. Here were held the meetings of Ben Jonson's Apollo Club (see APOLLO). The landlord's name in Jonson's time was Simon Wadloe, in whose honour Squire Western's favourite song, "Old Sir Simon the K.," was written or adapted. It was pulled down in 1787 to make room for Child's Bank. In Jonson's Memoranda he says, "The 1st speech in my Catiline, spoken by Sylla's ghost, was writ after I parted with my friend at the D. Tavern; I had drunk well that night and had brave notions." In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, in the list of Roman (Lond.) taverns given by Valerius, we have

"The usurer to the D. and the townsman to the Horn." Jonson's Staple iv. 1, is laid at "The D. Tavern. The Apollo." In ii. 1, Pennyboy Canter says, "Dine in Apollo with Pecunia at brave Duke Wadloe's . . . Simon the K. will bid us welcome." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i., Bloodhound says to Tim, "As you come by Temple Bar, make a step to the D." "To the D., father?" asks Tim; to which Sim replies, "My master means the sign of the D. And he cannot hurt you, fool; there's a saint holds him by the nose." In v. Tim says, "I was never sober since you sent me to the D. yesterday." In Shirley's Wedding ii. 1, Cardona bids Isaac "Run to the D. and bid the vintner make haste with the runlets of claret." In B. & F. Thomas iii. 1, Thomas says, "Say the d. were sick now of a caleuterie, taken by a surfeit of stinking souls at his nephew's at St. Dunstan's," where evidently the d. of the D. tavern is meant. In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, the Capt. says, "Go you before to the D. and I'll make haste after," to which Careless replies, "Agreed. We shall be sure of good wine there." Accordingly, the next scene but one is "at the D." In Underwit ii. 2, Thomas says, "They gave me some hope I might find" (Capt. Sackburie) "at the Divell, where indeed I fetched him out of the fire." In iv. 1, is a song with the lines, "The Still-yard's Reanish wine and Divell's white, Who doth not in them sometimes take delight?" In Cowley's Cutter i. 6, Worm says that Cutter was "Cromwell's agent for all the taverns between King's-St. and the D. at Temple Bar." Fuller, Church Hist. (1656) ii. 10, 15, says of the story of the D. and St. Dunstan, "None need doubt of the truth thereof, finding it in a sign painted in Fleet St. near Temple Bar."

DEVIL'S ARSE. A cavern near Castleton, in the Peak of Derbyshire; known as the 6th wonder of the Peak. In Champions iii., the Clown laments his magnanimous master "whom I lost in the D. a—o' Peak." In Jonson's Devil i. 2, Pug claims to be "of Derbyshire about the Peak"; Fitzdottrel asks, "That hole belonged to your ancestors?" "Yes," says Pug, "D. A., Sir." In Gipsies, Jack sings, "From the famous Peak of Darby And the D. A. there hard by." Later on Puppy asks him why the name was given, and he tells the story in a ballad. In Val. Welsh ii. 1, Morgan says, "I will make Cæsars with all her Romans run to the Tevils A—a-peak, I warrant her."

DEVONSHIRE. A county in S.W. England with coasts on the Bristol Channel and the English Channel. The capital is Exeter. In the S.-centre of the county is the great plateau of Dartmoor; the rest of the land is most fertile, and the coast scenery is amongst the finest in the island. It was usually pronounced De'nshire. In R3 iv. 4, 500, a messenger informs Richd., "Now in D. Sir Edward Courtney and the haughty prelate, Bp. of Exeter . . . are in arms." Sir E. was created Earl of Devon in 1485, and the title is still in his family. In Ford's Warbeck v. 1, Dalyell reports, "All the Cornish At Exeter were by the citizens Repulsed, encountered by the Earl of D." This was Sir E. Courtenay. In Nobody 206, the Duke of Cornwall proclaims, "All Cornwall's at my beck; D. our neighbour is one with us," and in Middleton's Queenborough, D. is one of the British Lords who oppose the Saxons under Hengist. D., like Cornwall, has rich mines of tin and copper; hence in Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon, expecting to gain the philosopher's stone, says, "I'll purchase D. and Cornwall And make them perfect Indies." Again, like Cornwall, D. is famous for its pies; in Davenant's

Wits iv., the elder Pallatine, shut up in a chest, says, "I am confined up like a salmon pie new sent from D. for a token." In Peele's Old Wives i. 1, when Madge offers to drive away the time with an old wives tale, Fantastic exclaims, "No better hay in D.!" i.e. nothing could be better. Devonshire tells of the exploits of one Richd. Pike of Tavistock, in the Earl of Essex's expedition to Cadiz in 1625. The date is given in i. 2 as 38 years after the Spanish Armada. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 12, says "Debon's share was that is D." Debon was one of the captains brought over by the legendary Brute. John Ford and Jasper Mayne were D. men. Robert Herrick was Vicar of Dean Prior in D. from 1629 to 1647. In Discontents in Devon (1647), he calls it "this dull D.;" in Epig. on Lusk he says, "In D. kersey Lusk, when he was dead, Would shrouded be and therewith buried."

DIANA'S CONDUIT. A fountain in Athens; possibly the fountain Callirhoe or Enneakrounos is meant, which was S. of the Ceramicus (the High St.), near the old Odeium. It was the only source of drinking-water in the city. Near to it was the Temple of Artemis Eucleia. In Davenant's Platonic ii. 4, Buonateste says, "In the High st. at Athens, just by the corner as you pass to D. C., Plato kept a wench."

DIANA'S TEMPLE. The T. of Artemis at Ephesus, the largest t. in the Greek world. It was built first in the time of Croesus and subsequently enlarged, but was burnt down by Herostratus on the night on which Alexander the Gt. was born. It was rebuilt on the same site. An account of its remains will be found in Wood's Discoveries at Ephesus. It was accounted one of the 7 wonders of the world. In Per. iii. 4, 13, Cerimon says to Thaisa, "D. T. is not distant far, Where you may abide till your date expire." Thaisa accordingly enters the t. and becomes High-Priestess of the Goddess. Act V, Sc. ii & iii take place in the t. In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, the Uncle of Onos tells how "Of late he did enquire at Ephesus for his age, but, the ch.-book being burnt with Dian's T., he lost his aim." The authors were thinking of the English parish registers. In Tiberius 1708, Sejanus speaks of "Asias immortal workmanship, Dianæ t." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 10, 30, mentions "that same famous t. of Diane Whose height all Ephesus did oversee. . . . One of the world's 7 wonders said to be." In Deloney's Newberie (1597) iii., Wolsey speaks of "Herostratus the shoemaker, that burned the T. of Diana, only to get himself a name."

In M. N. D. i. 1, 89, Theseus informs Hermia that she must either wed Demetrius or "on D. altar to protest For aye virginity." There was a T. of Artemis on the Acropolis at Athens between the Propylæa and the Parthenon. In Cor. v. 3, 67, Coriolanus speaks of Valeria as "chaste as the icicle That . . . hangs on Dian's t." The T. of Diana at Rome stood on the Aventine near the present ch. of St. Prisca. It was built by K. Servius Tullius as a common t. for the Latin League.

DICTE. A mountain in Crete S.E. of Gnosus, where it was said that Zeus was brought up and where his tomb was shown by the Cretans. Milton, P. L. x. 584, speaks of the age "ere yet Dictæan Jove was born."

DIEPPE (pronounced by the Elizabethans and often spelt DEEPE). A town in France on the English Channel, 125 m. N.W. of Paris. The ancient walls are still standing, and in the neighbourhood are the ruins of the Castle of Arques. In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, the date of which is in the reign of Henry VI, Lovell says to Lincoln,

"'Tis his Highness' will That presently your cousin ship for France With all his powers ; he would not for a million But they should land at D. within 4 days." In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 234, after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew has taken place, Guise orders Retes to post "to D. And spare not one that you suspect of heresy." In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron boasts "that none but I, and my renowned Sire, Be said to win the memorable fields Of Arques and D." The reference is to the battle of Arques in 1589, in which Henri IV defeated the Duke of Mayence. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 222, the Londoner goes to Paris by way of D., and rides thence on his Norman nag. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 261, young Gresham, sent by Hobson to France, says, "I'll ha' that I go for, or I'll make half the hot-houses in Deepe smoke for this trick." Nash, in Pierce B. 2, says, "You shall see a dapper Jack that hath been but once at Deepe wring his face round about and talk English through the teeth like Jaques Scabbed-Hams."

DIJON. A city of France, on the Ouche, 162 m. S.E. of Paris. It was the capital of the Duchy of Burgundy, and was surrounded by walls, the course of which is now marked by broad avenues. The Cathedral of St. Benigne dates from 1291: the castle was commenced by Louis XI in 1478 and finished in 1512 by Louis XII. The old ducal palace, rebuilt during the 18th cent., is used as a Museum and School of Arts. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy reminds the K. that Byron "chased away Viscount Tavannes' troops before D., And puts himself in, and there that was won." This was in 1594. The scene of Massinger's Dowry is laid in D. towards the end of the 15th cent.

DIMMINGS DALE (or DIMSDALE). There are 2 Dimsdales, one in Yorks. the other in Durham ; and there is a Dimon's or Demon's Dale in the valley of the Wye in Derbysh. Probably this last is intended in the following quotation from Thersites (A. P. i. 220), where Mater invokes "all other witches that walk in D. D."

DIMOTICUM. A city in Roumelia on the Maritza, 20 m. S. of Adrianople. Its citadel was used as a palace by the Sultans before the capture of Constantinople in 1453. After Bajazeth's deposition by Selim I in 1512 he set out for Dimoticum, but died on the way. In Selimus 1666, Baiazet says to Aga, "Aga and I will to D. And live in peace the remnant of our days."

DIPOLIS. In Chapman's Widow's Tears iv. 1, Lycus says, "I'll presently to D., where Lysander stays." Apparently some place in Cyprus is intended, and as Paphos on the W. coast was a double city, including Old and New Paphos, it may probably be the place so named. See PAPHOS.

DIRACHIUM. See DYRRHACHIUM.

DISTAFF LANE. A st. in Lond. running S. from Cannon St. to Old Fish St., between Old Change and Friday St. It was also called Maiden L., from a sign at its corner. According to Stow it was properly Distar L., and Cordwainers' Hall was on its N. side. It has been absorbed into Cannon St., where Cordwainers' Hall is now at No. 7. The name is preserved in D. L. running from Cannon St., between 6 and 8, to Knightrider St.: this was formerly Little D. L. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas sings, "Next in the trace, Comes Gambol in place ; And, to make my tale the shorter, My son Hercules, tane Out of D.-l., But an active man and a porter." The old story of Hercules being dressed in woman's clothes and exchanging his club for a d. no doubt suggested the line.

DITCHET FERRY. Possibly Datchett F. at Windsor is meant, where there would be a good deal of traffic between the Court and the other side of the Thames (see DATCHETT). Dekker, in News from Hell (1606), says of Charon's boat: "The gains of it are greater in a quarter than 10 Western barges get in a year ; D. F. comes nothing near it."

DIVELIN. See DEVELING.

DOCTORS' COMMONS. Formerly Mountjoy House, at the corner of St. Bennet's Hill and Knightrider St., Lond. It was purchased for the accommodation of the College of the Doctors of the Law in the early part of the reign of Elizabeth. These learned gentlemen had previously been housed in a small building in Paternoster Row, afterwards the Queen's Head Tavern. It included a dining-hall and library, a hall for the hearing of cases, and chambers for the doctors. 5 Courts sat here, viz. the Court of the Archers, the Prerogative Court (which dealt with Wills), the Court of Faculties and Dispensations, the Consistory Court of the Bp. of Lond., and the Court of the Admiralty. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, but at once rebuilt. It was finally cleared away in 1867, and Q. Victoria St. passes over what was its garden. In Dekker's Shoemaker's ii. 1, Sybil brings greetings to Rose from many of her Lond. friends, including "Mrs. Frigbottom by D. C."

DODONA. The seat of an ancient oracle of Zeus in Greece. The site is matter of dispute, but the most probable view is that it was on the E. frontier of Epirus, near the Pindus Range. One of the most notable objects in the precincts of the temple was a brazen cauldron, beside which stood a statue of a boy holding a brazen whip. When the wind blew the boy struck the cauldron with his whip and a loud booming noise was produced. In Nabbes' Hannibal ii., when Scipio arrives, Syphax says, "Let Dodonean brass be beaten deaf Whilst it proclaims his welcome." Tourneur, in Transformed Metamorphosed, says, "Let Dodon's grove be lavish in expence And scaffoldize her oaks for my defence ; Forgive me, God, for help doth not consist In Dodon grove nor a Dodonian fist." Milton, P. L. i. 518, speaks of the old Greek gods as ruling "or on the Delphian cliff Or in D." Dodonian is used as a stock epithet for the oak. Hall, in Satires iii. 1, 7, says, "Time was . . . Our hungry sires gaped for the falling mast Of the Dodonian oaks."

DOG. The sign of a tavern in Lond. : perhaps the Talbot in Ludgate St., afterwards known as the Sun, and, later still, as the Queen's Arms. Herrick, in Ode to Jonson, speaks of "those lyric feasts Made at the Sun, The Dog, the Triple Tun."

DOG'S DITCH. A contemptuous name for Houndsditch, Lond. This was originally the ditch or moat outside the city wall from Bishopsgate to Aldgate. Stow tells us that the ditch was a filthy receptacle for dead dogs and all kinds of rubbish, but that in his time it was covered over and enclosed by a mud wall. In the field belonging to the Priory of the Holy Trinity, after the dissolution of the monasteries, sellers of old clothes seem to have congregated. In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca says that Moroso is full "of more knavery and usury and foolery and brokery than D. D."

DOG'S HEAD IN THE POT. The sign of a Lond. shop, somewhere near the N. end of Lombard St. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 282, Tawnie Coat says, "Sure, this is the lane ; there's the Windmill ; there's the D. H. i. t. P." Such a sign is mentioned by Wynkyn de Worde in Cocke Lorell's Bote; a similar sign is, or was until recently, to be seen over an ironmonger's shop at the corner of Little Charlotte St. and Blackfriars Rd. Angelo, in B. & F. Captain iv. 4, alludes to this sign when he says, "They should be to be sold At the sign of the Whore's Head i' th' Pottage-pot." In their Cure ii. 2, Bobadilla says, "Cannot . . . the maids make pottage, except your dog's head be in the pot?"

DOGS, ISLE OF. The peninsula in the Thames between the Limehouse, Greenwich, and Blackwall Reaches, now occupied by the West India and Millwall Docks. The name is said to have been given to it because the K.'s hounds were formerly kept there. In Dekker's Eastward iv. 2, Sir Petronel is wrecked on the Thames and is informed, "You're i' the I. of D., I tell you." Most of the references are punning ones. In his Satiro iv. 1, 166, Tuca says to Horace (Jonson), "when the stagerites banished thee into the I. o. D., thou turn'st ban-dog (villainous Guy) and ever since bitest." In the Ret. Pernass v. 4, Ingenioso says, "Our voyage is to the Ile o. D., there where the blatant beast doth rule and reign, renting the credit of whom it please": the dogs being the critics. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Moll says of Trapdoor, "He hath been brought up in the I. o. D. and can both fawn like a spaniel and bite like a mastiff, as he finds occasion." In B. & F. Thierry iii. 2, Bawdber says, "Where could I wish myself now? In the I. o. D., so I might 'scape scratching." Nash wrote a play called the Isle of Dogs in 1598, for which he was imprisoned in the Fleet. In his Lenten, he says, "The strange turning of the I. o. D. from a comedy to a tragedy 2 summers past is a general rumour that hath filled all England, and such a heavy cross laid upon me as had well near confounded me."

DO-LITTLE LANE. Lond., running N. from Knight-rider St. to Carter Lane. It is now called Knight-rider Court, and is next to 47 Knight-rider St. It was so called because there were no shops in it. In Jonson's Christmas, Venus says of Cupid, "I had him by my 1st husband: he was a smith, forsooth, we dwelt in D.-l. L. then." In Jonson's Magnetic v. 4, Polish says of Alderman Parrot's widow, "She dwelt in D.-l.-l., a-top o' the hill there." In Middleton's Family v. 3, Dryfat says, "The wise woman in Pissing Alley nor she in D.-l. L. are more famous for good deeds than he."

DOLPHIN. A tavern in Lond. on the E. side of Bishopsgate St. Without, near the end of Houndsditch, where the Friends' Meeting House now stands. In Dekker's Northward iv. 3, Bellamont says, "Stay, yonder's the D. without Bishopsgate." Dekker, in Armourers, says, "O neither the Mermaid nor the D. nor he at Mile-end-green can when he list be in good temper, when he lacks his mistress (that is to say, Money)."

DOMINGO, SAN. A city on the S.E. coast of the island of Hayti, in the W. Indies. It was founded in 1502, and may claim to be the oldest European city in the New World. In Milkmaids i. 3, Ranoff says, "I saw the Adiantatho [i.e. Adalantado, or Governor] of D. mounted upon such another [jennet]." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 333, the Chorus tells how Drake and Carlisle set on fire "the towns of S. Anthony and S. Dominick." This was in the famous Island Voyage of 1585, when S. D. was ravaged. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 5, Cash says of Bobadil, who is smoking and has asked him for a match, "Would his match and he and pipe and all were at Sancto D."

DONCASTER. A town in W. Riding Yorks., on the Don, 162 m. N. of Lond. on the North Road. It was originally a Roman settlement. The scene of many of Robin Hood's exploits is in the neighbourhood. In the Lytell Geste of Robin Hood I, we are told how Robin was bled to death by the Prioress of Kyrkesley, incited by "Sir Roger of Donkestre." Henry of Lancaster stayed here for a time on his way from Ravenspur. In H. 4. A. v. 1, 42, Worcester reminds the K., "You swore to us, And you did swear that oath at D., That you did nothing purpose 'gains the State." In Greene's George i. 4, Bonfield tries to persuade Bettris to "love the lord of D.," Sir Gilbert Armstrong. In Dekker's Northward, Kate is the daughter of a D. innkeeper; and she declares (ii. 2), "We have notable valiant fellows about D." In Skelton's Magnificence fol. iv., Fancy says, "I set not by the world 2 Dauncaster cuttys," i.e. geldings. In a letter of Latimer's to Lord Cromwell (1538), he speaks of a famous image of the Virgin at D., which he calls a younger sister of the image at Walsingham. One of the Tales in Tarlton's News is of a painter of D., who, having painted an ugly figure of our Lord for the ch., changed it into the Devil by putting a pair of horns on it.

DONHAGUE (apparently THE HAGUE, or GRAVENHAGUE, is intended). The name is used for the sake of the pun, between H. and Hag. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown, in a punning list of towns in the Netherlands, says, "D. is full of witches." See HAGUE.

DONWISH. See DUNWICH.

DORCHESTER. The county town of Dorsetsh., on the site of the Roman Durnovaria. It stands on the Frome, 120 m. S.W. of Lond. The Roman amphitheatre at D. was used for dramatic performances in the 16th cent.

DORDOGNE. A department in S.W. France, E. of the mouth of the Garonne. Its capital, Perigueux, is abt. 260 m. S.W. of Paris. It has its name from the river D., which runs across it from E. to W. Peele, in Polyhymnia 176, speaks of "old Duke Aymon's glory, D.'s pride." The four sons of Aymon are the subject of a well-known mediæval romance.

DORDONA (apparently a mistake for DODONA, q.v.). In T. Heywood's S. Age iii., Juno speaks of the Erymanthean boar as devastating "the fertile plains of Thessaly," and he "in his course o'erturns the Dordan oaks." The more usual form of the legend places the hunting of the boar in Peloponnesus, but some variants make it in Thessaly.

DORIANS (Dc. = Doric, Dn. = Dorian). One of the chief branches of the Hellenic people. Their chief cities were Corinth, Syracuse, Agrigentum, Megara, and Byzantium; and Sparta was recognized as their leader against the Ionian branch with Athens at its head. They gave their name to the little dist. of Doris in Central Greece. In music the Greeks distinguished the Dn., Phrygian, Lydian, Mixo-Lydian, and Locrian modes; of these the Dn. was severe and grave, and opposed alike to the wildness of the Phrygian and the softness and effeminacy of the Lydian modes. In Middleton's Quarrel i. 1, Russell says, "most unpleasant shows to the beholder A Lydian ditty to a Dc. note." Milton, P. L. i. 550, speaks of the armies of Satan moving "In perfect phalanx to the Dn. mood Of flutes and soft recorders." Dc. is used in the sense of plain, simple, rustic. Milton, Lycidas 189, speaks of "warbling his Dc. lay." In P. R. iv. 257, he speaks of "various-measured verse, Æolian charms and Dn. lyric odes." Linche, in Diella xxii., speaks of "Thamiras, Reviving death with Dc. melodies." Thamiras, or Thamyris, was a Thracian musician. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 10, 6, speaks of "stately pillars framed after the Dcke. guize." The Dc. is the 1st of the 3 styles of Greek architecture, and is distinguished from the Ionic and Corinthian by the severely plain character of the capitals of its columns. The finest example is the Parthenon at Athens. Milton, P. L. i. 714, speaks of "Dck. pillars overlaid With golden architrave" in Pandemonium. Hall, in Satires v. 2, 35, says, "There findest thou some stately Dc. frame Or neat Ionic work."

DORNEY. A small vill. in Bucks. In Jonson's Gipsies, Christian o' D. is one of the maids from the neighbourhood of Windsor, who come in to dance country dances, the others being Prue o' the Park, Frances o' the Castle, and Long Meg of Eaton.

DORSETSHIRE. A county on the S.W. coast of England. It is traversed by Icknield St., which connects its capital, Dorchester, with Exeter. It contains abundant traces of the Roman occupation, including the amphitheatre near Dorchester railway station. It was afterwards a part of the kingdom of Wessex under the name of Dorsæta. Its chief harbour is Poole, on the estuary of the Frome. In 1484 Richmond attempted to land at Poole, but became alarmed and put back to Brittany. In R3 iv. 4, 524, a messenger informs Richd., "Richmond in D., sent out a boat Unto the shore . . . Hoisted sail, and made away for Brittany." This news is a little belated, for in 433 it is said that Richmond is on the W. coast with a puissant navy; and in 535 his landing at Milford Haven is announced, which took place in August 1485. The Marquess of Dorset, who is one of the characters in R3 and in T. Heywood's Ed. IV, was the son of Q. Elizabeth by her 1st marriage with Sir John Grey. He is present in i. 3, and is charged by Margaret with having been a stander-by when Edward her son "was stabbed with bloody daggers" (210) and is mocked for "his fire-new stamp of honour;" he was made Marquess of Dorset in 1475, and this scene takes place in 1478. His marriage with Cicely, the daughter of Lord Bonville, is referred to in H6 C. iv. 1, 56. In R3 ii. 1 he becomes reconciled to Buckingham at the request of K. Edward, and like the rest turns pale at the news of the death of Clarence. He is present with Q. Elizabeth in ii. 2. In iv. 1, the Q. and Stanley urge him to flee and take refuge with Richmond; and in iv. 2, Stanley announces that "the Marquess Dorset's fled beyond the seas To Richmond." In iv. 4, Richd. cajoles Elizabeth into summoning Dorset back from foreign soil; but before the end of the scene we are told he is in arms in Yorks. for Richmond. This was before he went to Brittany, as a matter of fact; and having fled thither in 1483 he was left behind in Paris when Richmond made his successful attack on Richd. In H8 iv. 1, 38 the Marquess of Dorset is mentioned as bearing the sceptre at the coronation of Anne Boleyn: this was Henry, 3rd Marquess, the father of Lady Jane Grey, afterwards Duke of Suffolk. His mother, the dowager Marchioness, was one of the god-mothers of the Princess Elizabeth (H8 v. 3, 170).

DORT (more properly DORDRECHT). A city of S. Holland on the Maas, 11 m. S.E. of Rotterdam. It was the former residence of the Counts of Holland. The independence of the United Provinces was declared at D. in 1572; and it was the Synod of D. in 1618 and 1619 that condemned the doctrines of Arminius and sentenced Barnavelt to death. In Barnavelt iv. 3, Orange says, "I have sent for Col. Veres from D." The Trial Scene iv. 5 took place at D.

DOTHAN. A town in Central Palestine, now Tell D., 10 m. N. of Samaria. It was here that the K. of Syria came with an army to capture Elisha as recorded II Kings vi. 12, and where the prophet showed his servant the vision of the hosts of Jehovah around the town. Milton, P. L. xi. 217, speaks of "D., covered with a camp of fire Against the Syrian k."

DOUAI (the Roman DUAGIUM). An ancient town in N. France, on the Scarpe, 149 m. N. of Paris. It belonged to the Counts of Flanders and then passed into the hands of Spain, who held it till 1667, when it was taken by Louis XIV, but it was not finally united to France till 1714. Philip II of Spain founded a university here in 1562; and in 1569 Cardinal Allen founded a college for English priests, from which issued in 1582 the translation of the Bible into English known as the D., or Rheims Bible. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Byron claims to have peopled "Artois, Douay, Picardy" with the triumphant issue of Victory. The reference is to his exploits in the wars of the League. In Marlowe's Massacre, p. 242, Henry says of the Duke of Guise, "Did he not draw a sort of English priests From Douay to the seminary at Rheims, To hatch forth treason 'gainst their natural Q.?" The college was temporarily removed to Rheims in 1578 on account of the disturbed state of the country. In Middleton's Chess iii. 1, the Fat Bp. (Antonio of Spalato) says, "Expect my books against you printed at Douay, Brussels, or Spalato." In Gascoigne's Government, Philomusus and Philotimus are sent to the University of D., where they make great profiting. In ii. 2, Phylautus describes it as "a proper city and well replenished with courteous people and fair women." In iii. 5, Gnomaticus says, "I do know very learned and faithful men there and herewithall it is but a little town and the University but lately erected."

DOUCHE. See DUTCH.

DOVE. A river rising in the Peak of Derbysh., and, after forming the boundary between Derbysh. and Staffs., falling into the Trent below Burton. The scenery of Dovedale is amongst the finest of its kind in England. Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 7, says, "The Peak [boasts of] her D., whose banks so fertile be."

DOVER. The chief of the Cinque Ports, on the English Channel, just W. of the S. Foreland in Kent; 72 m. S.E. of Lond. and about 25 from Calais. It is on the site of the ancient Roman Dubris. On the E. of the town is the castle, which contains a unique Romano-British ch. and the Roman Pharos. The keep and defences date from Norman times. The W. heights are also fortified, and the modern town lies in the valley between the E. and W. heights. It has always been the chief port of arrival and departure for the Continent, and in older times was regarded as the key to England. The white chalk cliffs command a splendid view of the Channel, and the one on the S.W. of the town is known as Shakespeare's cliff, and is generally supposed to be the scene of Gloucester's attempted suicide in Lear. In iv. 1, 76, Gloucester asks Edgar, "Dost thou know D.?" There is a cliff whose high and bending head Looks fearfully in the confined deep." In iv. 6, 11, Edgar describes it: "How fearful And dizzy 'tis to cast one's eyes so low; The crows and choughs that wing the midway air Show scarce so gross as beetles; half way down Hangs one that gathers samphire—dreadful trade! Methinks he seems no bigger than his head; The fishermen that walk upon the beach Appear like mice; and yon tall anchoring bark, Diminished to her cock; her cock, a buoy Almost too small for sight; the murmuring surge That on the unnumbered idle pebbles chafes Cannot be heard so high." Gerarde, Herbal 428, says, "Rock Sampier groweth on the rocky cliffs at D." Drayton, in Polyolb xviii. 763, speaks of the sea-gods robbing "D.'s neighbouring cleaves of Sam-pyre." Though the poet has somewhat exaggerated the height of the cliff, it is mere pedantry to question the identification on that ground. The actual height is about 350 ft. In Lear, the French K. and Cordelia land at D. In iii. 1, 36, Kent sends a gentleman to make his speed to D. to bring to Cordelia the report of Lear's condition. In iii. 6, 90, Gloucester bids Kent lay the K. in a litter "and drive toward D." In iii. 7, 18, Oswald reports that the K.'s knights "are gone with him toward D."; and in line 50 Gloucester admits, in answer to Regan, that he has sent Lear to D.; and, having torn out his eyes, Regan commands, "Go, thrust him out at gates and let him smell His way to D." In iv. 1, 44, Gloucester asks the old man to overtake him "hence a mile or twain I' the way toward D."; iv. 3, 4, and 7, and v. take place in the opposing camps at D., and iv. 6 is in the fields near D.

In K. J. v. 1, 31, the Bastard announces, "All Kent hath yielded; nothing there holds out But D. Castle." It was, in fact, Hubert de Burgh's determined defence of D. Castle against the Dauphin that proved the turning point in his enterprise and forced him to return to France. In H5 iii. prol. 4, the K. is described as embarking "at D. pier"; but this is a slip: the actual embarkation was at Southampton, and most editors accordingly correct the line and read "at Hampton pier." In H6 A. v. 1, 49, the K. directs Gloucester to see the French ambassadors "guarded And safely brought to D.; where inshipped Commit them to the fortune of the sea." In Peele's Ed. I. i. 1, the Q. Mother announces, "Lo! at last arrived in D. road Longshank, your k.": where road, of course, means roadstead. In Trouble. Reign (Haz., v. 203), a messenger brings word in regard to the French, "Thy land is theirs and not a foot holds out But D. Castle." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Lacy directs Askew to haste "to D." on the way to France. In Massinger's Madam iii. 2, Lacy says of Frugal, "I saw him take post to D. and, the wind Sitting so fair, by this he's safe at Calais." In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, the lady describes a trip to France: "The thing by her commanded is, to see D.'s dreadful cliff, passing in a poor water-house; the dangers of the merciless Channel 'twixt that and Calais, 5 long hours' sail." In Three Ladies ii., Simony says that Friar Austin, when he came to christianize England, "landed about Rye, Sandwich, or D." Bede, however, fixes his landing in the Isle of Thanet. In Jonson's Tub i. 2, Pan boasts that his ancestor To-Pan "came in with the conqueror, mad Julius Cæsar, who built D. Castle, and beat the first kettle-drum avore 'hun, here vrom D. on the march." It is true that Cæsar thought of landing at D., but he was deterred by the height of the cliffs, and actually landed between Walmer and Deal. Needless to say, he neither built D. Castle nor marched upon Lond. In Val. Welsh. ii. 1, Octavian says, "Great Julius Cæsar Suffered 3 base repulses from the cliffs Of chalky D." In Davenport's Matilda v. 3, news is brought that "Lewis the Dolphin with 600 sail is let in at D." He actually landed at Stonor: D. held out for John. In Wilson's Pedler 374, the Pedler describes a huge monster "From D. to Wayd [i.e. probably St. Nicholas at Wade, a vill. at the W. end of the Isle of Thanet, due N. of Dover, so that the monster would stretch the whole breadth of Kent] we esteem him to be larger in length."

In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 3, Pandolfo, looking into the magic mirror, cries, "I see D. Pier, a man now landing, attended by 2 porters, that seem to groan under the burden of 2 loads of paper." Ronca explains, "That's Coriutus Persicus." The allusion is to Coryat, the eccentric traveller and author of Coryat's Crudities. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611) on various curiosities to be seen in England, Peacham mentions "Cæsar's wine yet in D." A cask of wine was shown in the Castle which was said to have been brought there by Julius Cæsar. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iv. 1, 274, the shoemaker's wife says, "Thou shalt hire some friend to fire a tree upon the coast at D., as near the beacons as can be possible." A beacon was kept constantly ready at D. to signal the approach of an enemy from the sea. In Greene's Friar ii., Bacon boasts that he will build a brazen wall to ring "the English strand From D. to the market-place of Rye." In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Face speaks of his accomplice Doll as "our castle, our Cinque-port, our D. Pier, our what thou wilt." Nash, in his Prognostication, describes himself as "sitting upon D. cliffs to quaint myself with the art of Navigation." In Three Ladies ii., Lucre mentions D. as one of the resorts of foreign traders who "great rents upon little room do bestow." Archbp. Parker, writing to Sir William Cecil in 1563, laments that "D. Castle, Walmer and Deal Castles, Queenborough Castle, be forsaken and unregarded for any provision"; and in 1565 he urges that money should be spent on "the repairing and maintaining of D. haven."

In Piers B. iv. 131, the author recommends that all persons taking money out of England to Rome should forfeit it "who so fynt hym at D." The law at the time was "that no pilgrim should pass out of the realm to parts beyond the seas but only at D." In Chaucer's C. T. A. 4347, the Host twits the Cook: "Many a Jacke of D. hast thou sold That hath been twies hot and twies cold." It seems to mean a pie that has been cooked more than once; and hence an old, hashed-up story, a chestnut. An old jest-book was published in 1604 with the title A Jack of Dover. Presumably these stale pies were sold by the purveyors of refreshments to the travellers who passed through D.: a jack of D. would thus be the equivalent of the modern refreshment room sandwich. In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Mendwell relates how "Twixt Deal and D., one fishing for flounders drew a Spaniard's body up, slain in the late sea-fight." In Shirley's Honor iv. 2, Maslin anticipates more modern projects: "I'll build a bridge from D. cliff to Calais"; to which one of the countrymen replies, "This may be done; but I am of opinion We shall not live to see it." In Chivalry, Bowyer says of a sentinel in France, "The mongrel snorted, you might hear him to D." In Brome's Moor v. 1, Meanwell tells how he and Rashly pretended a quarrel at bowls upon Blackheath; took horse and "forecast to meet at D., and in one barque passed over into France." Nash, in Pierce G. 1, says, "A man standing upon Callis sands may see men walking on D. cliffs."

DOVERCOT (or DOVERCOURT). Vill. in Essex near Harwich. There was a famous cross in the ch. which was reputed to have spoken; a rumour was also spread, according to Foxe, Book of Martyrs ii. 302, that the door of the ch. could not be shut, and crowds were attracted to see the miracle. Fulke, in his Rejoinder x., says, "Who went a pilgrimage to the Roods of Boston, D., and Chester? Were they not Papists?" Bale, Image of Both Churches xiii., speaks of 3 poor young men of Suffolk who were hanged "for the rotten rood of D." This was probably for being concerned in the burning of it in 1533. In Grim i. 2, Forrest asks, "Have you not heard how the rood of D. did speak, confirming his [Dunstan's] opinion to be true?" In Ray's Proverbs, there is one "D., all speakers and no hearers"; and in an inscription at St. Peter's belfry, Shrewsbury, we have: "But when they clam, the harsh sound spoils the sport, And 'tis like women keeping D." Possibly, as Nares suggests, the phrase may have arisen from the noise made by the throng of pilgrims.

DOVER ROAD. The road from D. to Lond.; or it may mean the roadstead, or harbour, of D. In Histrio iii. 100, Mavortius says to his serving-men, "The Calliscormorants from D. R. Are not so chargeable as you to feed." The reference is to the soldiers who have served in France and return by the D. R. to England, begging their way and enforcing their demands doubtless by the strong hand.

DOWGATE. One of the old water-gates of the City of Lond., W. of Lond. Bdge., at the bottom of D. Hill. Stow thinks it was originally called Downe-gate, from the steepness of the hill; but it is more probably from the Celtic Dwr-gate or Water-gate. It gave its name to the D. ward, which was bounded by Swan Lane to the E. and D. Hill to the W., and extended N. not quite as far as Cannon St. From D. Wharf ran the ferry across to St. Saviour's Dock, which, according to legend, was managed in the 10th cent. by one John Overy, whose effigy is still to be seen in St. Saviour's Ch. He was a famous miser, and on one occasion feigned to be dead in order to cheat his men out of a day's meals. He had himself duly laid out, but when he heard the rejoicing of his servants over his death he rose from his bier in a rage, and one of them, thinking it was the devil, knocked his brains out with an oar. There is perhaps a reference to this story in Beguiled (Dods. ix. 235), where the Nurse says, "He does strut before her in a pair of Polonian legs, as if he were a gentleman usher to the grand Turk or to the Devil of D." In Dekker's Satiro. iii. 1, 243, Tuca says to Miniver, "My little Devil a D., I'll dam thee." There was an old Ballad called The Devil of D. and his son, on which a play was based, produced in 1623, but now lost. The steepness of D. Hill caused it to be flooded when there was heavy rain: Stow tells of a boy who was carried away by such a rush of water and drowned. In Jonson's Epigram to Inigo Marquis Would-be, he says, "Thy canvas giant at some channel aims, Or D. torrents falling into Thames; And straddling shows the boys' brown paper fleet Yearly set out there, to sail down the street." In More ii. 1, Harry the prentice praises "George Philpots at D." as the "best backwardsman in England." In Davenant's Wits iii. 1, Mrs. Snore taunts Queasey: "Remember thy first calling; thou set'st up with a peck of damsons and a new sieve; when thou brok'st at D. corner, 'cause the boys flung down thy ware." In the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we find "The Swan at D.; a tavern well-known." It was visited by Pepys, who describes it as "a poor house and ill-dressed, but very good fish and plenty." Robert Greene died at the house of a shoemaker in D. in 1592.

DOWNS. A famous roadstead off the E. coast of Kent between the N. and S. Forelands, so called because it lies opposite to the E. end of the N. Downs of Kent. In H6 B. iv. 1, 9, the Capt., after the sea-fight, says, "Whilst our pinnace anchors in the D., Here shall they [the prisoners] make their ransom on the sand."

DRAYTON BASSET. A vill. in Staffs., 9 m. S.E. of Lichfield. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 41, Howard says that the K. "is hunting here, at D. B."

DRESDEN. The capital of Saxony on the Elbe, 116 m. S. of Berlin. It contains a magnificent palace with a court adjoining called the Zwinger. In the picture gallery is the famous Sistine Madonna of Raffael. Its stables were the finest in the world: Fynes Moryson cannot praise them enough. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Wallenstein invites the Marquess Brandenburg and others to a personal meeting at D. This was in 1633, and his object was to secure for himself the kingdom of Bohemia.

DREUX. An ancient town in France (the Roman Durocasses) on the Blaise, 41 m. W. of Paris. In 1593 it was taken by Henri IV from the nobles of the League, after a determined resistance of 18 days, as the result of the battle of Ivry. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy says of Byron, "How served he at your famous siege of D.?" and proceeds to give a vivid description of the assault on the city. In v. 1, Byron says, "None but myself, that won the day at D.; A day of holy name and needs no night." Byron was in charge of the investment of the town, but it was Sully, if we may believe his own account (Memoirs v.), who must have the chief credit of taking the citadel.

DROPPE. In Wilson's Pedler 378, the Pedler tells of a huge monster: "He hath devoured all the old women in Affricke and now he hasteth into D. with all speed; merchant men can tell you that use there to traffic." I conjecture a misprint for Dieppe, q.v.

DRUM. The name of a tavern in Lond. There was a D. Alley on the N. side of Drury Lane, near Princes St., which may indicate its position. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, in the list of Roman (Lond.) taverns given by Valerius, we have "The gardener hies him to the Rose, to the D. the man of war."

DRURY LANE. A street in Lond. running from Broad St., Bloomsbury, to Wych St.; it debouches into Aldwych, in which the S. end of it has been absorbed. It took its name from D. Place, a mansion built by Sir Roger D., who died in 1495, which was afterwards called Craven House: it was taken down in 1800 and Astley's Olympic Pavilion built on its site. A portion of it became the Craven Head Tavern, but the new Aldwych has removed the last traces of it. The old name of the st. was Via de Aldwych, which has been happily preserved in the recent improvements; and part of it was called Prince's St. during the reign of James I. The Cockpit, or Phoenix, Theatre was on the E. side of the Lane, and its name was long preserved in Cockpit Pl., later known as Pitt Court. The present Theatre Royal was founded in 1663, and the Cockpit ceased to be used as a theatre. In St. Hilary's Tears (1642), the author speaks of "Covent Garden, Long-Acre, and D. L., where those doves of Venus [the wanton ladies] do build their nests." In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Knight, exhibiting a sheaf of letters from various women of bad character, says, "These from the nun-nery in D. L." In Broome's Covent G. iii. 1, Clotpoll asks, "Art not acquainted with my 2 poetical D.-L. writers, the cobler and the tapster?" References to D. L. are common in the 18th cent., and its reputation as a haunt of vice was well maintained. Glapthorne's Hollander was "acted at the Cock-pit in D. L."

DRUSIAN STREET. Probably the author means the road running through the arch of Drusus at Rome. The arch spans the Via Appia inside the Aurelian wall, at the extreme S. point of the city. In Tiberius 2662, Tiberius orders, "Watch well the sts., the D. sts.": where I think we should read st. in the 2nd case.

DUBLIN. The capital of Ireland, on the E. coast, on Dublin Bay. In Fair Women i. 100, Browne claims that he is no better known in Lond. than he is in Ireland, "chiefly in D., where are as great feasts as this we had to-day." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Flamineo says of the Dr., "He was once minded, because Ireland breeds no poison, to have prepared a deadly vapour in a Spaniard's fart, that should have poisoned all D." In the long list of toppers in Bacchus, "The 15th was one Maudlin Moonface, a merry gentlewoman of D.; with her she brought a glass full, nose high, of Aquavitzæ." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says, "Look what difference there is between a civil citizen of D. and a wild Irish Kerne." James Shirley was in D. from 1636 to 1640, and wrote half a dozen of his plays there, including the absurd St. Patrick. See also DEVELING.

DUCKING-POND. The sport of ducking or duck-hunting with dogs was a favourite one with the citizens of Lond. The principal D. Ps. were on Islington Green, in the Back Rd. near White Conduit House, and in East Lane; but the sport was also pursued at the Dog and Duck in Hertford St., Mayfair, at Jenny's Whim in Pimlico, at the Dog and Duck in Rotherhithe, near the present entrance to the Commercial Docks, at the Dog and Duck in St. George's Fields, Lambeth, and elsewhere. In Brome's Academy ii. 1, Camelion tells his wife, "I have a match to play at the d.-p."; and he makes many references in the play to his devotion to this sport. In his Damoiselle ii. 1, Amphilus says, "If I can but purchase him [a certain dog] and my own whelp prove right, I will be Duke of the D.-P."

DUCK LANE. A lane in Lond. running N. from Little Britain into W. Smithfield. It was rechristened Duke St. later, and is now included in Little Britain. Strype says in his edition of Stow's Survey of London (1720), "It is generally inhabited by Booksellers that sell second-hand books." But there were also publishers of new books there. Friar Bacon was printed "for W. Thackery at the Angel in D. L." Other booksellers in the Lane were J. Hardesty, J. Huntington, T. Jackson, and W. Whitewood. T. Heywood's Dialogues "are to be sold by Thomas Slater at the Swan in D.-l. 1637." In Brome's Covent G. ii., Mihiel says, "Go, borrow me a gown and some 4 or 5 law-books, for, I protest, mine are in D.-l.," i.e. sold to the booksellers there. Alexander Gill, in his rhymes on Ben Jonson's Magnetic Lady, says of that play, "From Buckler's Bury let it not be barred, But think not of D. L. or Paul's Churchyard": which shows that D. L. publishers were regarded as quite respectable. In Whetstone's Promos B. i. 5, the Merchant Tailors ask for a place to present their pageant; Phallax asks: "How say you to the end of D. Alley?" to which the Bedell objects, "There all the beggars in the town will be." In iv. 1, Gresco, a good substantial officer, orders his 2 blue-coated beards, "Search Ducke Alley, Cocke Lane, and Scouldes Corner" for idle vagabonds. In Davenant's Wits v., Mrs. Snore says to Thrift, "Remember the warrant thou sent'st for me into D. L., 'cause I called thy maid Trot."

DUKE HUMPHREY'S WALK. Applied to a part of St. Paul's Ch., Lond., on the S. side of the nave, where there was a monument supposed to be that of the good D. Humphrey of Gloucester; he was, however, buried at St. Albans, and the monument in question belonged to John Beauchamp, constable of Dover, who died in 1358. From the custom of fellows in want of a dinner betaking themselves to St. Paul's to see if they could meet with someone who would invite them arose the phrase "to dine with D. Humphrey": which meant to do without dinner. Dekker, in Hornbook, chap. iv., says, "All the diseased Horses in a tedious siege cannot shew so many fashions as are to be seen for nothing every day in D. Humfries walk." The point of the joke is that "fashions" was commonly used for "farcy," a disease of horses. See Shrew iii. 2, 53. Nash, in Pierce A. 3, says, "I retired me to St. Paul's, to seek my dinner with D. Humfrey." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. ii. 1, Jarvis says of Alexander and ancient Young, "Are they none of D. Humfrey's furies, do you think, that they devised this plot in Paul's to get a dinner?" In Mayne's Match iii. 3, Plotwell calls Seathrift "your penurious father who was wont to walk his dinner out in Paul's," and Timothy adds: "Yes, he was there as constant as D. Humphrey." This may be the explanation of the difficult passage in R3 iv. 4, 176, where his mother asks Richd., "What comfortable hour canst thou name That ever graced me in thy company?" To which he answers: "Faith, none but Humphrey hour, that called your Grace To breakfast once forth of my company." It is suggested that "Humphrey hour" means the hour of hunger; but the explanation may be questioned. See also under PAUL'S (St.).

DUKE'S PLACE. Lond., at the N. part of what is now Duke St., Aldgate. It was called after Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, beheaded 1572. It was the seat of a priory of the Holy Trinity, founded by Matilda, Q. of Henry Beauclerc; and in 1622 a new ch., dedicated to St. James, was built in the priory precinct, which became notorious for the celebration of irregular marriages. It was taken down in 1874, but St. James Pl. retains the name. In Reasons in a Hollow Tree, we are told of the funeral sermon preached over "an old man that died in the parish of St. James, near D. P., Aldgate," which held the record for brevity: "Ashes to ashes, dust to dust, Here's the hole, and in thou must."

DUKE'S THEATRE. A theatre in Portugal Row, Lincoln's Inn Fields, Lond., opened by Davenant in 1660: it was originally Lisle's Tennis Court. The company left it in 1671. Davenant's Playhouse deals with this theatre.

DULICHUIM. One of the Echinades, a group of islands in the Ionian Sea between Ithaca and the mainland of Acarnania. It is not certainly identified, but it formed part of the dominions of Odysseus (Ulysses). In T. Heywood's Iron Age v., Menelaus says, "I ever thought the son of Telamon Did better merit the Achillean arms Than the Dulichian k.," i.e. Ulysses.

DUNBAR. An ancient town in Scotland in Haddingtonshire, 29 m. E. of Edinburgh. In Bacchus, one of the toppers is "Alexander Addlehead, from Dun Baur, a Scot, who offered to his god a dozen of red herrings." In Greene's James IV v. 1, Sir Cuthbert brings word: "The K. of England hath besieged D. With mighty force." This is supposed to be just before the battle of Flodden, but it is quite imaginary. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 6, Grey says to Argyle, "D. can witness where we skirmished last." The reference is to a slight skirmish between the English and French on 31 March, 1560. Milton, in Son. to Cromwell 8, says that Cromwell pursued his work "while . . . D. field resounds thy praises loud." Cromwell defeated the Scots under Leslie at D. on 3 Sept., 1650.

DUNBOYNE. A vill. in Co. Meath, Ireland, 10 m. N.W. of Dublin. It gave its name to an Irish country-dance. In Jonson's Irish, Dermock says, "Tey muste eene come and daunsh in teyre mantles now; and show tee how teye can foot te fading and te fadow, and te phip a' D., I trowe."

DUNDALK. A spt. in Ireland, the capital of Co. Louth, on the Castleton, 50 m. N. of Dublin. Shane O'Neill besieged it in 1566, when, according to Stucley, it was defended by Stucley. In line 972, Gainsford says, "Brave Capt. Stukley, welcome to D."

DUNDEE. An ancient city of Scotland, in Forfarsh., at the mouth of the Tay some 8 m. from the open sea. It was originally walled, and was made a Royal Burgh by William the Lion. It was called the second Geneva, on account of the zeal of the inhabitants for the Reformation. In Sampson's Vow ii. 1, 67, Miles says, "Instead of nutmegs and ginger, I will send her the 3 bawbees I got at D."

DUNECASTRUM. A name invented by Greene, who in his Never too Late makes his pair of lovers fly from Caerbrack (Brancaster in Norfolk) to D. Probably he means Doncaster, q.v., though its Roman name was Danum.

DUNGHILFORD. Obviously a fictitious name. In Brome's M. Beggars v. 1, Randal says, "Were you ever at D., where I was born?"

DUNKIRK (i.e. DUNKERQUE; Du. DUYN KERCKE, or Ch. of the Dunes). A town in France on the Straits of Dover, 22 m. E. of Calais and 174 N. of Paris. As the name shows, it was originally a Flemish town; it was said to have been founded by St. Eloi. Lying on the boundary between the Spanish Provinces and France, and close to England, it was held from time to time by each of these powers. In 1558 the English were expelled from it by the French; and in 1559 it was handed over to the Spaniards. The French captured it again in 1646, but it was soon recovered by Spain. The French, under Turenne, took it in 1658, but at once, in virtue of an agreement between Mazarin and Cromwell, handed it over to the English, who held it till 1662, when Charles II sold it to Louis XIV. During the wars many privateers were fitted up there, and were known as Ds. or Ders. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 7, Hipolito says, "A harlot is like D., true to none: Swallows both English, Spanish, fulsome Dutch, Back-doored Italian; last of all, the French." In Massinger's New Way v. 1, Marrall charges Overreach with having ruined "An army of whole families who, yet alive, And but enrolled for soldiers, were able To take in D." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Ludovico says, "This villain would fight more desperately than 16 Dunkerkes." In his If it be 339, Barterville, beset by his creditors, says, "To raise this De. siege thus cast I about." In his Satiro. i. 2, 364, Tucca says to Horace, "I'll march through thy des. guts for shooting jests at me." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 2, the Bawd says, "Well, they may talk of D. or of Callis Enriched with foreign booties." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 336, a Spaniard brings word to Medina: "We have discovered riding along the coasts of France and Dunkerke an English navy." In Brome's Moor v. 1, the Host says to Winloss, "You have been 6 years gone, And all of them in prison, saving one In Dunkerk, as I ween." In B. & F. Beggars iii. 1, one of the Boors swears, "Devil a D.! What a rogue's this juggler!" A lost play entitled The Siege of D., with Alleyn the Pirate, is recorded by Henslowe 1603. There are many references to the privateers; and the name is applied also to sergeants and loose women. In Dekker's Northward i. 3, a servant reports, "Mr. Philip is taken prisoner."—"By the Ds.?" asks Bellamont.—"Worse," says the servant, "by catchpoles." In Nash's Lenten, ad fin., he prays for the Yarmouth fishermen: "God keep you from the Ders.!" In B. & F. Hon. Man v. 3, Montague, addressing La-Poof and his sailors, says, "Oh, ye dog-bolts, That fear no hell but D.!" In Shirley's Bird iv. 1, Bonamico, exhibiting his birds, says, "This was a rail, which being sent unto an English lady was ta'en at sea by Ders." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Sconce says, "The villainous Ders. at sea met with the herring-busses and made stockfish of them," i.e. thrashed them soundly. In Middleton's No Wit i. 1, Savourwit tells us that Lady Twilight, "crossing to Guernsey, was taken by the Ds." In Underwit iii. 3, Engine tells of a man who "went to sea in a Hollander and was taken by the De." Dekker, in News from Hell (1606), tells how the Devil, leaving Gravesend, "struck in among the Dunkerks, where he encountered such a number of all nations, with the dregs of all kingdoms' vices dropping upon them, that he had almost thought himself at home." In Massinger's Milan iii. 2, Julio says of Gracco, "He looks . . . as if he came from a close fight at sea under the hatches with a she-D.," i.e. a courtesan. In B. & F. Elder B. iv. 2, Andrew says, "They look ruefully . . . As if they had been quite shot through 'tween wind and water By a she-D." Dekker, in Bellman 164, speaking of certain swindlers, says, "When they have well-freighted, these Des. hoist sail and to sea they go." A D. cloak was used in the sense of a walking-stick or staff; just as was a Plymouth cloak. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Mixum asks, "What is a D. cloak?" And Pirke replies: "Behold this cane, this staff of office!"

DUNMOW. A town in Essex, 38 m. N.E. of Lond. There was an ancient priory there, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It was said that K. John having persecuted with his unlawful passion the daughter of Robert Fitzwater, the Castellan of Baynard's Castle (q.v.), she fled to the nunnery at Dunmow and was there poisoned by the K.'s order. In Downfall Huntington v. 1, Skelton records, "Matilda, shunning John's pursuit, became A nun at D. Abbey." The whole story is told in Davenport's Matilda v. 1 and 2. Burton, A. M. iii. 2, 3, says that for love "Kings will leave their crowns, as K. John for Matilda, the nun at D." D. is chiefly famous for the flitch of bacon which was on offer from the prior to "any pair that after a twelve-month of matrimony could make oath that they had never had a quarrel, and never regretted their marriage." It is recorded that it was successfully claimed 88 times between 1244 and 1772. In Piers C. xi. 276, we read, "Thie don hem to Done-mowe; bote the devel hem helpe To folwen for the flicche, feccheth thei hit nevere; Bote thei bothe be forswore, that bacon thei tyne." In Chaucer C. T. D. 218, the wife of Bath says of her husbands, "The bacoun was nat for hem, I trowe, That som men han in Essex at D." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Leatherhead says of Hero, "She will not be taken, After sack and fresh herring, with your D. bacon." In Tom Tylor (Anon. Plays ii. 295), Strife says of Tyler: "I will teach him to know The way to D.," i.e. how to live at peace with his wife; and on p. 316, Tailor says, "You may now go for bacon to D." In Sampson's Vow i. 1, 68, Ursula says to the newly-married couple, "If either of you repent your bargain within a twelve-month, then you shall fetch no bacon at Dunmowe."

DUNSINANE. One of the Sidlaw Hills in Scotland, 7 m. N.E. of Perth and 15 S.E. of Birnam Wood. It is over 1000 ft. high and commands an extensive view. On its summit are still to be seen the lines of circumvallation of a castle, which is said to have been the castle of Macbeth. In Mac. iv. 1, 93, the Apparition declares, "Macbeth shall never vanquished be until Great Birnam wood to high D. hill Shall come against him." Note that in this passage the accent is on the 2nd syllable. The whole of Act V takes place in D. Castle and its neighbourhood. In v. 2, 12, Caithness says of Macbeth: "Great D. he strongly fortifies." In v. 3, 2, Macbeth says, "Till Birnam wood remove to D. I cannot taint with fear"; and again, in line 60, "I will not be afraid of death and bane Till Birnam forest come to D." In v. 4, 9, he "keeps still in D." In v. 5, 45, he says, "And now a wood comes toward D."; and in v. 8, 30, vows, "I will not yield, Though Birnam wood be come to D."

DUNSMORE. A heath on the N.W. road between Coventry and Daventry, abt. 10 m. from each. In H6 C. v. 1, 3, Warwick, lying in Coventry, asks where the Earl of Oxford is, and is told "By this at D., marching hitherward." A full account of the situation will be found s.v. COVENTRY. Heylyn, s.v. PALESTINE, says, "Our citizens of Coventrie and Warwicke show the bones of the dun-cow of Dunsmeare heath, and the bones of I know not what giants, slain by Earl Guy." Drayton, in Polyolb. xiii. 311, describes D. as lying "Where those 2 mighty ways, the Watling and the Fosse, Our centre seem to cut."

DUNSTABLE. A town in S. Beds., at the intersection of Icknield and Watling Sts., 33 m. N.W. of Lond. One of the Elinor Crosses was erected here, but was pulled down by the Puritans. In H8 iv. 1, 27, a gentleman says, "The Archbp. of Canterbury Held a late court at D., 6 m. off From Amphill where the princess [Catharine of Arragon] lay; to which She was often cited by them but appeared not." Cranmer held his court in the priory of the Black Canons, founded by Henry I in 1131, and the divorce was pronounced in the Lady Chapel on May 23rd, 1533. In Oldcastle ii. 2, Murley says, "No Master I, but plain William Murley, the brewer of D." In Dekker's Northward i. 1, the Chamberlain says, "Your captains were wont to take their leave of their Lond. pole-cats at D.; the next morning, when they had broken their fast together, the wenches brought them to Hockley i' th' Hole; and so the one for Lond., the other for Westchester." In Jonson's Gipsies, when it was performed at Bever Castle, the lines were added: "Make it a jolly night, For 'tis a holy night, Spight of the Constable Or Dean of D." In Latimer's Sermon on Rom. xv. 4, he says, "There were some good walkers among them that walked in the k.'s highway ordinarily, uprightly, plain D. way." Fuller quotes as a Beds. proverb, "As plain as D. way," as descriptive of anything plain and simple without either welt or guard to adorn it. This proverb also occurs in the Cobler of Canterbury. The reference is to the long, straight stretches of Watling St. on both sides of D., particularly to the northwards, after its descent into the plain at D. itself. So Jonson, in his Intro. to Coryat's Crudities, says, "Here up the Alps, not so plain as to D., he's carried like a cripple." Nash, in Almond for a Parrot 19, speaks of "a good old d. doctor here in Lond." And Florio defines Carlona as "plainly, d. way, homely fashion." In Nash's Wilton, Jack says, "I was stepping to her with a D. tale made up my market. A holy requiem to their souls that think to woo women with riddles." In Phillip's Grisill 154, Politick Persuasion says, "I am plain D., I may say to you." This proverbial use of the name is found at least as late as Richardson's Clarissa (1748). In Wise Men i. 1, Proberio jestingly apostrophises Simplo, a plain, honest fellow, as "Thou D. breed." In Nabbes' C. Garden v. 6, Warrant says, "For Latin, I have less than the Dean of D." In Dekker's Northward i. 1, Greenshield says, "This honest knave is called Innocence; he dwelt at D. not long since." One of the characters in Trag. Richd. II is Symon Ignorance, the Baylie of D.: his mark is "a sheephook with a tar-box at end on 't." Keller thinks that there is some connection between this usage of D. and the word Dunce; but he is clearly wrong. A play on St. Catharine was performed by the boys of the monastery school at D. in 1110, the costumes being borrowed from the abbey of St. Albans.

DUNSTAN'S, SAINT. There were 2 churches dedicated to St. Dunstan in Lond. The best known was St. D. in the W., in Fleet St. on the N. side, between Fetter Lane and Chancery Lane. It was built in 1237; it escaped the Gt. Fire, and stood till 1831, when it was replaced by the present building. The projecting clock, or "Diall," was there in Shakespeare's time, but the 2 figures that struck the hours were not set up till 1667, though Scott, in the Fortunes of Nigel, makes Moniplies speak of "The two Iron Carles yonder, at the Kirk beside the Port, banging out sax o' the clock." The church ran lengthwise along the st., and at the E. and W. ends were a number of booksellers' shops. The 2nd quarto of Hamlet was "Printed by I. R. for N. D. and are to be sold at his shop under St. Dunstons Ch. in Fleet St. 1604." Another edition was "Printed by W. S. for John Smethwicke and are to be sold at his shop in St. D. Churchyard in Fleet-st., under the Diall." The Qq. of 1611 and 1636 were published at the same place. Smethwicke also published 3 Qq. of Romeo and Juliet, the 1st dated 1609. Other St. D. printers and booksellers were Thomas Marsh, the publisher of Stow's Chronicles; William Griffith, who issued the 1st (unauthorized) edition of Gorboduc; Richard Marriott, Matthias Walker, and John Browne. In Middleton's Five Gallants, Frippery has clients in St. D. parish (i. 1). Nearly opposite to the ch. at No. 2 Fleet St. was the Tavern of St. D. and the Devil, commonly known as The Devil Tavern (q.v.). In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Cuddy says, "The Devil in St. D. will as soon drink with this poor cur as with any Temple-Bar laundress that washes and wrings lawyers." In Jonson's Staple, prol., the author says, "What is it to his scene, to know If D. or the Phoenix best wine has?" In B. & F. Thomas iii. 1, Thomas speaks of the devil being "sick of a calenture, taken by a surfeit of stinking souls, at his nephew's at St. D." He means the Devil of the Devil Tavern, opposite the ch.

St. D. in the E. is on St. D. Hill, close to the corner of Gt. Tower St. It was reduced to bare walls by the Gt. Fire and restored by Wren, who modelled the tower on that of St. Nicholas at Newcastle-on-Tyne. It was rebuilt in 1817. In Fair Women i. 273, Browne asks Mrs. Drury where Mrs. Saunders lived. She answers: "Against St. D. Ch." Browne asks: "St. D. in Fleet st.?"—"No," says the lady, "near Billingsgate, St. D. in the E.; That's in the W."

DUNWICH. Spt. town in Suffolk, 28 m. N.E. of Ipswich. It was formerly the seat of the Bishopric of E. Anglia, and had several important buildings; but the encroachments of the sea have reduced it to insignificance. In Bale's Johan 272, Verity says of the K., "Great monuments are in Ipswich, D. and Bury which noteth him to be a man of notable mercy." John granted the town a charter of incorporation because of the assistance it had rendered him in the civil war. In Wilson's Pedler 276, the Pedler describes a huge monster as being "in breadth from Donwish to Porchmouth."

DURHAM. The capital of Co. Durham, 258 m. N. of Lond. It is the seat of a bishopric, and the Cathedral and castle stand magnificently on the heights overlooking the Wear. In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, Sir Roger says to Welford, "I knew a worshipful and a religious gentleman of your name in the bishopric of D." In Brome's Northern ii. 1, Fitchow says of Constance, "She is northern; her uncle sent for her to make her his child out of the bishopric of D." Fox, Bp. of D., is one of the characters in Ford's Warbeck. In iv. 3, Warwick says of the K., "His Fox of D. would not fail at last." He was Richd. Fox, one of Henry's trusted advisers, and was made bp., 1st of Exeter, then of Bath and Wells (1491), then of D. (1494), and finally of Winchester (1500). He founded Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and died in 1528.

DURHAM HOUSE. The Lond. house of the Bps. of D., built by Anthony de Beck, bp. in the reign of Edward I, and rebuilt by Thomas Hatfield in 1345. It stood on the S. side of the Strand, just W. of Ivy Bridge Lane, and was "high, stately, and supported by lofty marble pillars." Cuthbert Tunstall conveyed it to Henry VIII, and it remained in the hands of the Crown until Elizabeth bestowed it on Raleigh. James I built his New Exchange on the site of its stables; and in 1768 the brothers Adam bought the house itself and rebuilt upon its site the block of buildings known as the Adelphi (brothers): the names of the 4 brothers being perpetuated in John, Robert, James, and William Sts. D. St. preserves the ancient name. In More v. 1, when Sir Thos. is arrested, a warder asks, "From whence is he committed? Who can tell?" And is answered, "From D. H., I hear."

DUTCH. It was first used of all those who spoke some kind of German speech, including both High and Low Germans. After the beginning of the 17th cent., when the United Provinces had become independent, the word was gradually restricted in English to the inhabitants of the Netherlands, particularly those of Holland. Before that it is often synonymous with German. Hence Dland. is used for Germany. Fynes Moryson, in Itiner. (1605) iii. 2, 4, says of the Netherlands, "The people for language and manners hath great affinity with the Germans, both being called Dmen. by a common name." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1547) xv. 163, says, "In Denmark . . . their speech is Douche." Heylyn, Microcosmographie, p. 29, says, "D. [is spoken] though with different dialects in Germany, Belgium, Denmarke, Swethland, and Norway." In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 2, 125, Edward asks, "Good aunt, teach me so much D. to ask her pardon." To which the Empress responds, "Say so: Gnediges Frawlin, vergebet mirs." In i. 2, 23, Collen speaks of "the brave Duke of Saxon, Dland's greatest hope." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Tearcat says, "Ick bin dorick all Dlant. gereisen": i.e. "I have travelled through all Germany." Dekker, in Lanthorn 188, says that before the confusion of tongues "there was no Germaine to thunder out the high and rattling D." In Ado iii. 2, 33, Don Pedro speaks of Benedick as having a fancy to strange disguises "as to be a Dman. to-day, a Frenchman to-morrow." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Tristram says that Holdfast, the Cambridge student, has "spoiled his eyes with prying on small D. characters," i.e. German print. For distinction's sake High D. is used for what we should call German, and Low D. for Flemish. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon speaks of "a treatise penned by Adam on the Philosopher's stone, and in High D." Surly asks: "Did Adam write, Sir, in High D.?"—"He did," says Mammon, "which proves it was the primitive tongue." In Jack Drum v. 233, Sir Edward says, "M. Ellis, pray you let us hear your high D. song." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 2, Forobosco asks: "What language shall's conjure in? High-D., I think, that's full in the mouth." In Davenant's Albion iv. 1, Gondibert says, "He'll pray in no language but the High D." In Kyd's Cornelia i., Cicero says, "Neither could the flaxen-haired High D. Once dare to assault it," i.e. the Roman Empire: the reference being to the tribes of inland Germany. In Brome's Novella iv. 2, Horatio says of the disguised Fabritio, "There he stands, translated out of sober Italian into high D." In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 52, Brandenburg says to Prince Edward, "When you have drunk a dozen of these bowls So can your majesty with a full mouth Troll out high D." In Hercules iv. 1, 1890, Dromio, with audacious anachronism, for the scene is in ancient Thebes, asks, "What wilt thou give me, if I flout yonder slave now in high D.?" and then proceeds, "Hear you, mein Herr, ich bringe euch unndt heng euch selbes, I think I have dt. him!" In B. & F. Elder B. ii. 4, Andrew says that Eustace "speaks high D.," though he can't talk Greek, i.e. he is drunk. In All's iv. 1, 78, Parolles appeals to his captors: "If there be here German or Dane, Low D., Italian, or French, let him speak to me." German not being known to ordinary Englishmen, D. is used for any unintelligible speech; as in the modern phrase "double D." In Marlowe's Faustus iv., Wagner speaks a few words of Latin, and the Clown exclaims, "God forgive us, he speaks D. fustian": fustian, like bombast, being used for high-flown, inflated language. The D. or German pronunciation of English is the subject of frequent jest, and Dmen. are introduced for comic effect in many of the plays. In L. L. L. v. 2, 247, Katharine says to Longaville, "Veal, quoth the Dman. Is not veal a calf?" This somewhat obscure joke is explained by a passage in Dodypoll ii. 2, where the Dr. says, "Hans, fait and trot me be right glad to see you veale." To which Hans replies: "What, do you make a calf of me, M. Dr.?" In Haughton's Englishmen there is a Dman., Vandal, amongst the suitors who talks a kind of broken English, as thus (iv. 2): "Oh de skellum Frisco, ic weit niet waer ic be, ic go and hit my nose up dit post, and ic go and hit my nose up dander post. Oh, de villain! Well, waer ben ic now?" There is a D. Nurse in Middleton's Quarrel, who talks a similar kind of lingo. When asked whose child this is, she answers, "Dis gentleman's so he to me readen." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, the D. skipper says, "Ic heb veale gedrunck": on which Firk comments, "They may well be called butter-boxes, when they drink fat veal and thick beer too." There is a drunken Dman. (Hans) in Wealth, and a comic D. sea captain (Bumble) in Davenant's Plymouth.

Personal appearance, character, and dress of the Dutch. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says, "There is a saying when they commend nations; it goes: the Irishman for his hand . . . the Dman. for beard." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calipso, speaking of the charms of the women of different countries, mentions "the plump D. frow." In Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The thrifty Frenchman wears small waist, The D. his belly baosteth." In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor asks, "Are not Italian heads, Spanish shoulders, D. bellies, and French legs the only notions of your reformed English gentleman?" In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Tristram says that Holdfast has learned at Cambridge to prove by logic that "the moon's made of a Holland cheese; and the man in 't a swag-bellied D. burger." In M. W. W. iii. 5, 121, Falstaff speaks of himself in the buck-basket: "I was more than half stewed in grease, like a D. dish." In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Moschus says, "You shall have some will swallow A melting heir as glibly as your D. Will pills of butter." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 1, Frisco claims that he can speak perfect D.; but, he says, "I must have my mouth full of meat first." In Ford's Trial ii. 1, when Fulgoso says, "I know upon which side my bread is buttered," Guzman replies: "Buttered? D. again!" In Dekker's Westward iii. 4, Honeysuckle speaks of "a D. supper, butter and onions." In Marston's Insatiate iv., Zucco says, "The Dman. shall loathe salt-butter, before I re-love thee." In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Sconce speaks of "this D. blood of mine, Guilty of bacon-grease and potted butter." In Davenant's Plymouth ii. 1, Cable says that he has ruined his singing-voice "with eating butter when I lay among the D. ships at Delph." In Chaunticleers v., Welcome says you must bait a trap for "a D. mouse with butter or bacon." In Middleton's No Wit i. 3, Savourwit says, "A Dman. will work butter out of a thistle." Nash, in Pierce C. 3, speaks of a proverb as being "as hoary [i.e. mouldy] as D. butter." In B. & F. Malta iv. 2, Norandine, hearing the hoarse cries of Oriana from her tomb, says it is "The spirit of a Dman. choked with butter." Indeed, Butter-box was a common nickname for a Dman. In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, when Seawit says that Bumble is a Dman., Inland exclaims, "How 's a butter-box?" Deloney, in Gentle Craft i. 21, says, "We have not men enow, but we must entertain every butter-box." In Massinger's Renegado ii. 5, Grimaldi talks of "being trussed up at the mainyard By some Low Country butter-box."

The D. (and the Germans also) were heavy drinkers. Heylyn (s.v. BELGIUM) says that "they are much given to our English beer." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The Russ drinks quass; D., Lubeck beer." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Iniquity promises Pug that he shall go "to St. Kathern's to drink with the D. there": it was at St. Katharine's wharf that the D. boats mostly came in. In Wealth B. 4, Hance, a drunken Dman., says, "Gut naught ic mot watt, to sent Cafrin, to mi laman store": apparently he means "Good night! I must go to St. Katharine's to my countryman's [or my mistress'] door." In Davenant's Wits ii. 1, young Palatine says he has told Lady Ample, "She must die, and her velvet hood be sold to some D. brewer of Ratcliffe." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 3, Lodovico says, "We'll trouble your house, Matheo, but as Dmen. do in taverns, drink, be merry, and be gone." To which Orlando replies: "Indeed, if you be right Dmen., if you fall to drinking, you must be gone." In Barry's Ram ii. 1, Will Smallshanks says, "My brother swallows it with more ease than a Dman. does flap-dragons": a flap-dragon being a raisin or other small article steeped in spirits and then set on fire; to swallow it was a common feat with hard drinkers. In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says, "Your lordship shall ever find Amongst an hundred Dmen. fourscore drunkards." In v. 1, a ballad is sung, "The Dman. for a drunkard, The Dane for golden locks." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 2, Fustigo says, "Our drunken ship reeled like a Dman." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, Anaides says of the "accost" of Amorphus, "O 'tis too D., He reels too much." In Middleton's Trick to Catch v. 2, Witgood abjures, amongst other things that are the cause of youth's undoing, "D. flap-dragons." In Ed. III iii. 1, K. John speaks of "those ever bibbing Epicures, Those frothy Dmen., puffed with double beer, That drink and swill in every place they come." In Shirley's Pleasure v. 1, Bornwell proposes to "whirl in coaches to the D. magazine of sauce, the Steelyard, where deal and back-rag and what strange wines else shall flow into our room and drown Westphalias, tongues, and anchovies." The Steelyard was a well-known drinking house in Lond. In Tourneur's Revenger i. 3, Vendice speaks of "D. lust, fulsome lust, drunken procreation, which begets so many drunkards." In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro tells of a courtesan who "ended in the D. [way]; for to cool herself she kissed him drunk i' th' morning." In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Caponi says, "They [the Italians] drink more in 2 hours than the Dman. or the Dane in four-and-twenty." In Jack Drum v. 233, Sir Edward says, "M. Ellis, pray you let us hear your high D. song"; and Ellis responds with a drinking song, "Give us once a drink, for an the black bowl," etc. In Dekker's Shoemaker's ii. 3, Lacy enters disguised as a D. shoemaker, and sings, "Der was een bore van Gelderland, Frolick sie byen; He was als drunk he cold niet stand, Upsolce sie byen; Tap eens de canneken; Drincke, schone mannekin," i.e. "There was a boor from Gelderland, Jolly they be; He was so drunk he could not stand; That's what they be; Clink then the cannakin; Drink, pretty mannikin." In Marston's Insatiate v., Gonzago says, "When we were young, we could 'a drunk down a Dman." In Nash's Wilton K. 1, Jack says, "With the Dane and the Dman. I will not encounter; for they are simple honest men, that with Danaus' daughters do nothing but fill bottomless tubs and will be drunk and snort in the midst of dinner." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "The Dman. drinks his buttons off, the English doublet and all away." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I can be drunk with the D." In Ev. Wom. I. v. 1, Acutus says of Philautus, "He will drink down a Dman." Nash, in Pierce F. 1, says, "He is crafty drunk, as many of the Dmen. be that will never bargain but when they are drunk." In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 1, 115, Ophioneus advises: "Thou shalt drink with the Dman., cheat with the Englishman, brag with the Scot, and turn all this to religion." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 2, says, "Our Dmen. invite all comers with a pail and a dish, making barrels of their bellies." The phrase "to drink upsey freeze" apparently means to drink in D. or Frisian fashion, and we find sometimes "upsey D." in the same sense. In Jack Drum ii. 364, Sir Edward says, "Drink D., like gallants; let's drink upsey freeze." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 4, Subtle says, "I do not like the dulness of your eye; It hath a heavy cast, 'tis upsee D." In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 30, Alphonsus says, "Schinck bowls of Rheinpalz and the purest wine; We'll spend this evening lusty upsy D." In B. & F. Beggars iii. 1, one of the boors says, "Sit down, lads, and drink we upsey D." Dekker in Bellman, p. 26, says, "Teach me . . . how to take the German's upsy-freeze, the Danish rouse." In Seven Sins he speaks of "all the learned rules of drunkenness, as upsy freeze, crambo, Parmezant, etc."

The D. are represented as dull, phlegmatic, and too lazy to be jealous. In Goosecap i. 2, Fowle Wether says, "Would I might never excell a D. skipper in courtship, if I did not put distaste into my carriage of purpose." In Shirley's Ball iv. 3, Lucina speaks of the "phlegmatic D." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 3, the jealous Cor-vino says to his wife, "I'm a Dman., I; for if you thought me an Italian, You would be damned ere you did this." In Massinger's Milan iv. 3, Mariana, after giving some instances of the misbehaviour of the Duchess, says, "To a Dman. This were enough; but to a right Italian A hundred thousand witnesses." In B. & F. French Law iii. 1, Champernal says, "I am no Italian To lock her up; nor would I be a Dman. To have my wife my sovereign, to command me." At the same time the men were uxorious. In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Mrs. Mixum says, "If you will marry your daughter to the most complete man, let him be D. They are the rarest men at multiplication."

The D. women were good managers and capable in business, but not too precise in their morals, which was probably true of those whom our soldiers met in the camps in the Netherlands. In Webster's Law Case iii. 1, Ariosto says, "Your Dwomen. in the Low Countries take all and pay all, and do keep their husbands silly [i.e. ignorant] of their own estates." In Middleton's Trick to Catch iii. 3, Mrs. Florence is described as "a D. widow; that's an English drab." Marston has a play entitled The D. Courtesan: in i. 1, Frevile says of her, "I will shew thee a pretty nimble-eyed D. tanakin," i.e. a girl: a diminutive formed from Ann. In Armin's Moreclacke A. 4, Mary says to Tabitha, "He that shall marry thee is matched i' faith to a D. snaphaunce, you will strike fire with words." The "snaphaunce" is a musket with a flint-lock; and is used for an impulsive woman who goes off easily. It appears to have been of Dutch origin. In Lawyer i., Vaster says to his wife, "Be petulant, you whore, sprightly, frolic, as a D. tanakin." In iv., Thirsty says, "Now could I dance like a D. froe [woman]; my heels are as light as my head."

The D. are represented as mean in their treatment of their mercenaries, and brutally cruel in the hour of victory. The massacre of the English at Amboyna (q.v.) intensified this feeling. In Webster's A. & Virginia ii. 2, one of the Roman soldiers complains, "We dine to-day as Dmen. feed their soldiers," i.e. very meagrely. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 1, Alberto says, "I am apt for mischief, apt as a Dman. after a sea-fight, when his enemy kneels afore him." In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sconce cries, "As if there could be any mercy in a Dman. I" In Leaky Mother ii. 1, Grimes says, "The Capt. fell on like a tyrannical D. man-of-war that shows no mercy to the yielding enemy."

Holland was the home of some of the most pronounced sects of the Puritans, which especially flourished in Amsterdam, q.v. In Mayne's Match v. 6, Mrs. Scruple says of Salewit, "Surely I take this to be some D. elder." In Brome's Covent G. iii. 2, Lucie says that Mihil "carried himself as civilly for a gentleman that should not look like one o' th' fathers of the D. church at five-and-twenty." In Cartwright's Ordinary iii. 5, Sir Christopher says, "Kit's as hungry now as a besieged city, and as dry as a D. commentator." In Strode's Float, Isl. v. 7, Hilario says, "He never was at the University . . . And yet lectures as good divinity As commonly we find in most D. systems Or City-conventicles."

The D. dressed in baggy slops or breeches, short doublets, and large felt hats. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 2, the Tailor says to Moll, "You say you'll have the great D. slop, Mrs. Mary; your breeches then will take up a yard more." In his No Wit i. 3, the stage direction is: "Enter a little D. boy in great slops." In Dekker's Northward iii. 1, the tailor recommends "a short D. waist with a round Catherine wheel-fardingale." In Gascoigne's Steel Glass, epil. 31, he speaks of "Women masking in men's weeds With dkin. doublets and with jenkins jagged." In T. Heywood's Challenge iii., the Maid says, "Your D. cassock is a comely wear." To which Manhurst retorts: "It hath been, but now adays it grows shorter and shorter." In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Flamineo, speaking of Camillo, says, "Like a D. doublet, all his back Is shrunk into his breeches." In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Sconce says, "When this old cap was new, 'twas a D. felt." In his Wit ii. 1, Valentine says, "A haberdasher would have shaken his block-head as if he had been trying a D. felt out." In Underwit i. 1, Underwit orders "a Lond. D. felt without a band, with a feather in 't." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 140, speaks of "the D. hat" as an article of fashionable attire.

The Dutch were famous navigators; and their ships were not above making free-booting attacks on merchants in the North Sea. They were also largely engaged in fisheries, and there was considerable rivalry between them and the English. In Tw. N. iii. 2, 29, Fabian says to Sir Andrew, "You are now sailed into the North of my lady's opinion; where you will hang, like an icicle on a Dman.'s beard." There is probably a reference here to the Arctic expedition of the Dman., William Barendsz which set out in 1596 and had to spend the winter in the Arctic Circle. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Face tells how a Spaniard has come in "in 6 great slops Bigger than 3 D. hoys": the "hoys" being a D. vessel rigged like a sloop and built round in the bottom to accommodate as much merchandise as possible. Nash, in Saffron Walden F. 2, says, "'Tis an unconscionable gorbelled volume, bigger bulked than a D. hoy." In Davenant's Wits iii. 1, the Elder Palatine says, "If Morglay hear 't, he'll think me as dull as a D. mariner." In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Jaques describes how a lady's hood fell in the posset, "and there rid like a D. hoy." In Jonson's Augurs the Groom says to Notch, "Hey-day! what's this? a hog'shead of beer broke out of the King's buttery, or some D. hulk?" In Tuke's Five Hours i., Geraldo thinks the Spanish k. "should have more money than these D. swabbers." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton says, "She slips from one company to another, like a fat eel between a Dman.'s fingers." In Nabbes' Spring, Lent says, "I have 1000 herrings despite of the Dman.'s wasteful theft, let them rob the 4 seas never so often." Dekker, in Catchpol (1613), says that the drumsticks in the Masque "were the shin-bones of 2 D. free-booters." There was much trade between England and Holland, and the D. or Zealand dollar, a silver coin of the value of 3/-, was familiar. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Subtle promises Tribulation, "You shall . . . with a tincture make you as good D. dollars As any are in Holland." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 1, Sir Politick enters in his diary that he had "a discourse With a D. merchant 'bout region del stato." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Inland says, "These carrot-eating D. have filched already most of the bullion out of the land; they exhaust our gold and send us pickled herrings."

The D. were reputed to be excellent shoemakers. In Dekker's Shoemaker's, Lacy disguises himself as a D. shoemaker and takes service with Simon Eyre. In Greene's Quip, p. 246, Cloth-Breeches protests, "The drunken Dman., this shoemaker, abuseth our commonwealth; for our new upstart fools like no shoe so well as a Dman. maketh, when our Englishmen pass them far." In Beguiled, we are told of "a D. cobbler."

Miscellaneous references to articles produced in Holland. In the 17th cent. the cultivation of hops on an extensive scale was introduced into England by the example of the D. Ale was brewed from malt and could not be kept long; beer, brewed from malt and hops, kept much better. In Nabbes' Totenham iii. 2, Changelove says, "I love beer best. The planting of hops was a rare projection in the D." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo says of Puntarvolo, "His face is like a D. purse with the mouth downward, his beard the tassels." The purse was a bag with the mouth gathered up by a string ending in 2 tassels. The D. or Flanders mares were highly esteemed as coach-horses. In Tomkins' Albumazar iii. 5, Trinculo says, "I will go to this astrologer, and hire him to turn my 4 jades to 2 pair of D. mares." In Davenport's New Trick i. 1, Anne, receiving an offer of marriage from Lord Scales, anticipates, amongst other advantages of the match, "a caroach with 4, 4 great D. mares." In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Maria says, "Tell the Dman. That brought the mares, he must with all speed send me Another suit of horses." Windmills are still a characteristic feature in D. landscapes. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Banarus says, "I have a rare device to set D. windmills upon Newmarket Heath and Salisbury Plain, to drain the fens." D. tapestries were famous from the 14th cent. onwards; and in the reign of James I tapestry looms were set up at Mortlake and weavers imported from Holland. In Mayne's Match ii. 3, Aurelia compares Timothy to "a mute in the hangings." To which he replies: "Why, Lady, do you think me wrought in a loom? some D. piece weaved at Mortlake?" Heylyn says that the D. invented clocks; and Huyghens, who died at The Hague in 1695, laid down the theory of the pendulum as applied to clocks. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 1, Lady Heartwell says sarcastically to the gentlemen, "You are not daily mending, like D. watches." In Lawyer iii., Curfew asks Nice whether his watch is "French or D." The author of Old Meg, p. 12, disparages women "that like D. watches have larums in their mouths." In Ford's Trial ii. 1, Fulgoso, being challenged to fight with swords, says, "My weapon is a D. iron truncheon." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "Will you steal forth and taste of a D. bun?" In Ford's Queen iii., Pynto says, "The good man was made drunk at the Stillyard at a beaver of D. bread and Rhenish wine." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Urinal says that Sconce looks "like a dry D. pudding." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Jolly speaks of men "with horns as big as D. cows," i.e. manifest cuckolds. Taylor says that coaches were first introduced into England by a Dman., one William Boonen, in 1584.

The Flemish portrait-painters, especially Antonio Moro, Rubens, and Vandyke, were well known in England; these 3, indeed, resided in Lond. for some time. The D. genre pictures of drinking scenes and the like were also familiar. In Shirley's Pleasure i. 1, Bornwell reproaches his lady with her extravagance, which included "Pictures of this Italian master and that Dman." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham says, "I have got a D. painter to draw patterns" for her silks. In Dekker's Belman 87, he says, describing a drunken scene, "The whole room showed afar off like a D. piece of Drollery; a painter's prentice could not draw worse than they themselves made."

Miscellaneous references. In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Brachiano says, "An unbidden guest should travel as Dwomen go to church, bear their stools with them." In B. & F. Gentleman iii. 4, the Lady says, "What a style is this! methinks it goes like a Duchy lope-man," i.e. a D. runner, at full speed. In Dekker's Hornbook Proem, we have, "Sound an allarum and like a D. cryer make proclamation with the drum." The D. used a drum where in England the town-crier employed a bell. In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano speaks of one "looking as pitifully as Dmen., first made drunk, then carried to beheading." The D. made condemned criminals drunk before executing them; probably founding the practice on Proverbs xxxi. 6. In Marston's Insatiate ii. 1, Zucco says, "My wife is grown like a D. crest, always rampant." A lion rampant appears in the coats of arms of most of the D. provinces. Armin, in Ninnies, speaks of "a D. tannakin sliding to market on the ice." The canals in Holland are often frozen in winter and are used as highways by skaters.

References to individual Dutchmen. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune speaks of "This D. botcher wearing Munster's crown, John Leyden, born in Holland poor and base." He was the leader of the Anabaptists (1510-1536) who took Munster and reigned there for a short time. In Mayne's Match ii., Aurelia says, "Do ye think I'm the D. virgin that could live by the scent of flowers?" This was a certain Eve Fleigen, who was said to have lived for 14 years, from 1597 to 1611, without food; in the account of her life printed in 1611, under her portrait, it is said: "Exigui se oblectat floribus horti," i.e. "She delights herself in the flowers of a scanty garden." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), on the Sights of London, Peacham mentions, "The great long Dman." In B. & F. Pestle iii. 2, the Citizen says of Ralph, "I saw him wrestle with the great Dman. and hurl him." This was a huge German fencer who lived for a time in Lond., and is often referred to. An account of him is given s.v. GERMANY.

Reference should be made also to the articles on BELGIUM, FLANDERS, HOLLAND, LOW COUNTRIES, and NETHERLANDS.

DUTCH CHURCH. The ch. of Austin Friars, Lond., q.v. It was granted to the D. by Edward VI for their religious services. In Wapull's Tarrieth B. 4, Helpe says, "To sell a lease dear, whoever that will, At the French or D. ch. let him set up his bill. What an Englishman bids they will give as much more."

DUTCH HOUSE OF MEETING. Used for the Stillyard, q.v. In Dekker's Westward v. 2, Birdlime wishes to speak "with the gentlewomen here that drunk with your Worship at the D. house of meeting." See ii. 3, where the incident is described.

DUTCH WALK. See under EXCHANGE.

DYBELL. A cant name for prison. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 72, Hobs says, "My son's in D. here, in Caperdochy, i' the gaol."

DYRRHACHIUM (the Latin name for EPIDAMNUS, the modern DURAZZO). It lay on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea, in Illyricum, abt. 65 m. N. of the Acroceraunian promontory. About the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. it placed itself under the protection of Rome, in order to escape the inroads of the Illyrian pirates. It was the scene of the contest between Pompeius and Cæsar during the winter of 49-48 B.C., in which Cæsar was unable to dislodge his rival from his entrenchments, but ultimately succeeded in enticing him to Pharsalia, where the decisive battle was fought resulting in Cæsar's victory. The scene of Chapman's Cæsar ii (except sc. 1) and iii. is laid in and about D. In B. & F. False One i. 1, Achilles says of Pompey and his men, "They at Dirachium fought with success; but knew not to make use of Fortune's fair offer."

EAGLE AND CHILD. A bookseller's sign in Lond. T. Heywood's Love's Mistress was "Printed by Robert Raworth for John Crouch and are to be sold by Jasper Emery at the sign of the E. & C. in Paul's Churchyard. 1636." One of the quartos of Othello was "Printed by N. O. for Thomas Walkley and are to be sold at his shop at the E. & C. in Brittain's Burse. 1622."

EAMDEN. See EMDEN.

EAST. The countries to the E. of Europe, especially India and China. In Mac. iv. 3, 37, Macduff protests, "I would not be the villain that thou think'st For the whole space that's in the tyrant's grasp And the rich E. to boot." In A. & C. i. 5, 46, Alexas brings Cleopatra a message from Antony: "All the E., Say thou, shall call her mistress." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iii. 2, 1223, Oseas predicts, "From the E. shall rise A lamb of peace, the scourge of vanities," i.e. the Messiah. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 4, 23, speaks of "The wealth of the E. and pomp of Persian kings." Milton, P. L. ii. 3, tells how "the gorgeous E. . . Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold."

EAST ANGLES. The Angles who settled in the E. counties of Britain at the time of the English Conquest. In Merlin i. 2, 74, Artesia is the sister of "Warlike Ostorius, the E. Angle k." See also ANGLES.

EAST CHEAP. A st. in Lond. running E. from the junction of Cannon St. and Gracechurch St. to Gt. Tower St. The famous Boar's Head Tavern (q.v.) was at the W. end of E. C., just where the statue of K. William I now stands. In H4 A. i. 2, 145, Poinc tells the prince, "I have bespoke supper to-morrow night in E.c."; and in 176, Falstaff, as he goes, says, "Farewell; you shall find me in E.c." The scene of ii. 4 is the Boar's Head Tavern, E.c. In 14, the prince tells how he has won the hearts of the drawers that "when I am K. of England, I shall command all the good lads in E.c." In 485, Falstaff, impersonating the prince, and being asked, "Whence come you?" answers: "My noble lord, from E." In H4 B. ii. 1, 76, the Hostess, appealing to the Chief Justice against Falstaff, describes herself as "A poor widow of E.c." In ii. 2, 161, Bardolph informs the prince that he will find Falstaff "at the old place, my lord, in E.c.": ii. 4 takes place there. Pistol marries the hostess, and in H5 ii. 3, she describes Falstaff's death, which evidently takes place in the Boar's Head. In Fam. Vict., Haz. p. 326, Prince Hal says to his companions, after the robbery on Gad's Hill, "You know the old tavern in E.-ce.: There is good wine; besides, there is a pretty wench That can talk well"—doubtless Doll Tearsheet. Stow describes E.C. as "a flesh-market of butchers, there dwelling on both sides of the st.; it had sometime also cooks mixed among the butchers." He relates how in 1410, on the eve of St. John Baptist, there was a great disturbance, caused by the king's sons Thomas and John, for which the mayor and aldermen were called to account. This may have suggested to Shakespeare the choice of the Boar's Head as the scene of Prince Hal's revels. Lydgate, in Lickpenny, says, "Then I hied me into E. c.; One cries 'ribs and beef' and many a pie; Pewter pots they clattered on a heap; There was a harp, pipe, and minstrelsy." In Eastward iv. 1, Slitgut speaks of his master as "a poor butcher of E.c." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Carlo says of Puntarvolo, "I'll ha' him jointed, I'll pawn him in E.c. among the butchers." In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Eyre says to Firk, "Have not I ta'en you from selling tripes in E.c. and set you in my shop?" and in v. 4 he says to his men, "Beleaguer the shambles, beggar all E.c., serve me whole oxen in chargers." In T. Heywood's Prentices sc. iv., p. 82, Eustace cries, "O that I had with me as many good lads, honest prentices, from E.c., Canwick St., and Lond. Stone to end this battle." In Wager's Longer B. i, Moros says, "In S. Nicolas shambles there is enough [meat] or in E.ce. or at St. Katherins." Dekker, in Bellman, speaks of E.-ce. as a favourite haunt of foysts, or pickpockets. In Deloney's Craft ii. 8, Tom says, "I went into E.-Ce. . . Immediately the wenches . . . forsook the butchers' shops and inticed me into a tavern."

EASTERLINGS. The peoples living on the continent of Europe, East of the English Coast; in particular, the Low German tribes from the Elbe to the Rhine. In Bale's Johan (Farmer, p. 247), Pandulph says, "On the East side we have Esterlings, Danes and Norways." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 63, tells how Constantine "in battle vanquished Those spoifful Picts and swarming E."

EATON. See ETON.

EBOSIAN. See EBUSUS.

EBUSUS (the modern IVICA). The southernmost of the Balearic Islands, in the Mediterranean, 90 m. East of the Spanish coast. In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight, in a list of fish esteemed by the Romans, mentions "the salpa from E." The salpa is a kind of stock-fish. Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 32, says, "Circa Ebusum salpa, obscenus alibi, et qui nunquam percoqui possit, nisi ferula verberatus." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iv, Temperance mentions as articles of luxurious diet "Idumaeen palms candied with Ebosian sugar."

ECBATANA. A famous city in the centre of Media, abt. 300 m. N.-East of Babylon. It is commonly identified with the present Hamadan, and lies at the foot of Mt. Elwend at an elevation of 6000 ft. above the sea. It was used as their summer residence by the Persian, and later by the Parthian, kings. It is mentioned in Ezra vi. 2, under the name of Achmetha. There appears to have been another E. in Atropatene, at the site of the present Takht-i-Sulayman. Milton, P. L. xi. 393, describes Adam as beholding "Where The Persian in Ecbatan sat"; and in P. R. iii. 286, the Tempter points out to our Lord, "E. her structure vast there shows."

ECRON, or EKRON. See ACCARON.

EDEN. The name in Hebrew tradition of the garden in which the Lord God put the man whom he had formed (Gen. ii. 8). It is derived from the Sumerian name of the Plain of Babylonia, and was applied to the dist. round the sacred city of Eridu, at the head of the Persian Gulf. In R2 ii. 1, 42, the dying John of Gaunt speaks of England as "This other E., demi-paradise." In Machin's Dumb Knight iii., Mariana says to her brother, "O be thy days as fruitful in delights As E. in choice flowers." In Marston's Insatiate v., Rogero says of woman, "God in E.'s happy shade this same creature made." In Dekker's Babylon i. 1, the Cardinal asks, "Why were our gardens E. why our bowers Built like those in Paradise?" Jonson, in Forest xi., says that true love is "A form more fresh than are the E. bowers, And lasting as her flowers." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 12), Sir Anthony, speaking of England, says, "My country's an island, defended with streams such as from E. run." According to

Gen. ii. 10, 4 rivers took their origin in the Garden of E. Milton, P. L. iv. 131, describes the beauty of E.; in 210 he says, "E. stretched her line From Auran eastward to the royal towers Of great Seleucia, built by Grecian kings, Or where the sons of E. long before Dwelt in Teltassar" (see II Kings xix. 12). From 569 it appears that in Milton's conception there was a mtn. N. of E. From xii. 50 it is clear that Babylon was to the W. of E. The word is used figuratively in P. R. i. 7, where it is said that by his victory over the Tempter our Lord "E. raised in the waste wilderness."

EDINBURGH, or EDENBOROUGH. The capital of Scotland, on the S. side of the Firth of Forth in Mid-Lothian, 392 m. N. of Lond. In Greene's James IV i. 2, Andrew says, "I am one that knew your Honour in Edenborough." In Jonson's New World, the Printer says, "One of our greatest poets (I know not how good a one) went to E. on foot and came back." The reference is to Jonson's own visit to Scotland in 1618. In his lost poem entitled "E" he describes the city as "Edinburgh the heart of Scotland, Britaine's other eye." In Brome's Antipodes i. 6, the Dr. says that Peregrine's traveller's tales are "like the reports of those that beggingly have put out on returns from Edenburgh." The reference may again be to Ben Jonson's journey. Three of the scenes in Ford's Warbeck are laid in E. The scene of a large part of Sampson's Vow is laid in E. during the siege of Leith in 1560. In iii. 3, 4, Crosses says, "Monlucke, Bp. of Valens, Desires safe convoy by your honour's forces From the red Brayes to Edenborough Castle." The Castle overlooks Princes St., on the S. side of the city. The Penn. Pilg. of Taylor, the Water-Poet, was from Lond. to E. This work contains a brief description of the city and the author's adventures therein. Fynes Moryson, Itinerary i. iii. 5, was another visitor to the city during our period.

EDINGTON. A Scottish fortress taken by Surrey in the campaign against Perkin Warbeck in 1497. It is a hamlet with the ruins of an ancient fortalice, 2½ m. E. of Chirnside, Berwickshire. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, Surrey says, "Can they Look on the strength of Cundrestine defaced? The glory of Hedon-Hall devastated? that Of Edington cast down?"

EDMONDSBURY. See BURY ST. EDMUNDS.

EDMONTON. Vill. in Middlesex, 7 m. N. of Lond.; originally called Adelmeton. John Gilpin's adventures have immortalized the Bell Inn. Charles Lamb died and was buried here. In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton gives a list of villages in which the rebel troops are quartered: "Some here with us in Highgate, some at Finchley, Tot'nam, Enfield, E., Newington." The scenes of Drayton's Merry Devil and of Dekker's Edmonton are laid in this village. The former is based on the story that a certain Peter Fabell, who is buried in the ch., cheated the devil by his skill. He lived in the reign of Henry VII.

EDMONDSBURY, SAINT (see BURY ST. EDMUNDS). In K. J. iv. 3, 11, Salisbury says, "Lords, I will meet him [the Dauphin] at S. E.," and in v. 4, 18, Melun tells the English Lords, "He [the Dauphin] means to recompense the pains you take By cutting off your heads; thus hath he sworn Upon the altar at S. E." Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 280, asks, "What English hath not heard St. Edmund Bury's name?"

EDOM. The tribe living East and S. of the Dead Sea in Palestine. The Eites. showed great cruelty to the Jews at the time of the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar 597 B.C., and were thenceforward regarded by them with peculiar enmity. In Darius, p. 89, Zorobabel, referring to this, speaks of the "Temple which the Eites. burnt without fain." In Mariam i. 2, Alexandra says of Herod, "My curse pursue his breathless trunk and spirit, Base Eite., the damned Esau's heir!" The Eites. were descended from Esau; and Herod, according to one account, was of Idumean or Eite. descent. In Milton, P. R. ii. 423, the Tempter asks, "What raised Antipater the Eite., And his son Herod placed on Judah's throne, Thy throne, but gold, that got him puissant friends?" In his Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 21, amongst the enemies of Israel are "The tents of E., and the brood Of scornful Ishmael." In Hemings' Jewes Trag. 560, the defence of "the country of the Eites." against Titus is assigned to Eleazar. Eite. was used as a term of abuse by the Puritans. In Alimony iii. 4, Benhadad the Puritan assails the soldiers: "I proclaim you all Eites.; dragooners of Dagon; ding-dongs of Dathan."

EELY. See ELY.

EGEAN SEA. See ÆGEAN SEA.

EGER. A town in Bohemia, 91 m. W. of Prague. In the castle is still to be seen the room in which Wallenstein was murdered in 1634. E., or Egers, as it is called, is the scene of Glapthorne's Wallenstein. In v. 2, Leslie says, "Egers is grown proud, Dares with Vienna stand in competition."

EGYPT, or ÆGYPT (En. = Egyptian, Æ. = Ægypt, Æn. = Ægyptian). A country in N. Africa, W. of the Red Sea, stretching along the Nile from its mouth to the N. boundary of Nubia. The history of E. extends back to the time of Menes, some 4000 years B.C., and the country was ruled by a succession of dynasties, numbered from i. to xxvi., until 525 B.C., when it was annexed by Cambyses to the Persian Empire. Of its history up to this point the Elizabethans knew very little except what they had learned from Greek legends and from the Old Testament. In Massinger's Virgin i. 1, the K. of Macedonia speaks of "The Æn. Hercules, Sesostris, That had his chariot drawn by captive kings." The Greek legends of Sesostris gathered round the exploits of User-tesen III of the 12th Dynasty, who lived about 2500 B.C., but the details are mostly fabulous. In Tw. N. v. 1, 121, the D. says, "Why should I not, Like the En. thie at point of death, Kill what I love?" The allusion is to a story told in the Ethiopica of Heliodorus of how Thyamis, an En. pirate, killed Charicles, with whom he was in love, when he was in danger of being captured by his enemies.

Allusions to the sojourn of the Chosen People in E., as told in Genesis and Exodus, abound. Milton, P. L. xii. 157, relates how the patriarchs came "From Canaan to a land hereafter called E., divided by the r. Nile." In the following lines the history of Israel in E., the Plagues, and the Exodus are related. In P. R. iii. 379, the Tempter says, "Their fathers in the land of E. served"; and promises our Lord that he shall reign "From E. to Euphrates and beyond." In Bale's Promises iv., Pater Coelestis says, "The sons of Jacob into E. did their brother sell." When Falstaff, in H4 A. ii. 4, 520, says, "If to be fat is to be hated, then Pharaoh's lean kine are to be loved," he is referring to the story of Pharaoh's dream in Gen. xli. In Jonson's Epicoene iii. 2, Truewit speaks of "All E.'s 10 plagues." In Marlowe's Jew i., 2, Barabas prays, "The plagues of E. and the curse of heaven Influx upon them!" In Jonson's Alchemist v. 3, Ananias speaks of Subtle and his crew as "Worse than the grasshoppers or lice of E.": these being 2 of the plagues. In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iii., Ilford says to the usurers, "Good security, you En. grasshoppers!" In iii. 1, Ilford wishes Scarborow "as many good fortunes as there were grasshoppers in E." In Middleton's Chess, Ind., Loyola says, "I thought my disciples had covered the earth's face and made dark the land, like the En. grasshoppers." Milton, P. L. i. 339, says, "the potent rod Of Amram's son, in E.'s evil day, Waved round the coast, up-called a pitchy cloud Of locusts." In Middleton's Phænix ii. 2, the Capt. says, "The En. plague creeps over me already; I begin to be lousy." Dekker, in Bellman, speaks of "the idle drones of a country, the caterpillars of a Commonwealth, and the Æn. lice of a kingdom." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 59), Zariph says of the Christians, "The lice of E. shall devour them all." In Tw. N. iv. 2, 48, the Clown says to Malvolio in his dark room, "There is no darkness but ignorance; in which thou art more puzzled than the Ens. in their fog" (see Exodus x. 21). In Randolph's Muses i. 4, Mime says, "In me . . . self-love casts not her En. mists." In Andromana v. 2, Plangus leaves his mistress "hemmed in with a despair thicker than En. darkness." The last Plague was the destruction of the first-born. Milton, P. L. i. 488, tells how "Jehovah, when he passed From E. marching, equalled with one stroke Both her firstborn and all her bleating gods." In As ii. 5, 63, Jacques says, "I'll rail against all the firstborn of E." He means those who are heirs to great wealth, and is thinking of Psalms lxxviii. 52, translated in the Great Bible, "He smote all the first-born in E.; the most principal and mightiest in the dwellings of Ham." In Ado iii. 3, 142, "Pharaoh's soldiers in the reechy painting" were doubtless represented as being drowned in the Red Sea. In Bale's Promises vi., Pater Coelestis says, "Sesack, the K. of E., took away their treasure." This is the K. known as Shishak, or Sheshonk I, who reigned 945-924 B.C. (see I Kings xiv. 25). In Chivalry, Bowyer swears, "Not we [retreat] by the life of Pharo." In Jonson's Ev. Man I., Bobadil's favourite oath is "By the foot of Pharaoh." In P. L. iv. 171, Milton recalls how Asmodeus by the fishy fume was "sent from Media post to E." (see Tobit viii. 3). Milton, P. L. i. 721, speaks of the time "when E. with Assyria strove In wealth and luxury." These were the 2 rival empires of the East until the fall of Nineveh in 606 B.C. Cambises takes place partly in E., at the time of the successful attack of that K. on the country; and Cambises complains, "The Egyptians against us repunge as varlets slave and vile."

When Alexander the Gt. conquered the Persian Empire in 330 B.C. E. came under his sway, and the city of Alexandria is the memorial of the glory he won there. In Lyly's Campaspe iii. 4, Hephæstion stirs up Alexander to war by saying, "Behold all Persia swelling in the pride of their own power; and the Ens. dreaming in the soothsaying of their augurs and gaping over the smoke of their beasts' entrails." On the death of Alexander and the partition of his empire, E. fell to Ptolemy Lagos, and passed in succession from him to his descendants, who all bore the name Ptolemy, the last being Ptolemy XV. Their queens, who bore the name of Cleopatra or Berenice, were frequently associated with them in the throne. The Ptolemies were Greek by birth, not En., though they adopted many of the old En. court manners and customs. "Ptolemy, the most sacred K. of E., 1st of that name," appears in Chapman's Blind Beggar; he reigned 323-285 B.C. One of the queens in Jonson's Queens is "Fair-haired Berenice, E.'s fame": explained by Jonson in a note to be the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus and wife of Ptolemy Euergetes. She dedicated her hair to Venus on condition of her husband's safe return from an expedition into Asia, and, her vow having been fulfilled, her hair was taken up into the sky and became the constellation known as Coma Berenices—so at least the graceful legend ran. In Massinger's Believe i. 2, Flaminius, speaking about 190 B.C., charges the Carthaginians with having chosen "to pay homage and fealty to the En. Ptolemy, or indeed any, than bow unto the Roman." But the name which figures most largely of all the En. monarchs in the Elizabethan dramatists is Cleopatra VI, who, along with her brother Ptolemy XIV, succeeded to the throne in 51 B.C. She was then a girl of 17, her brother a boy of 10. In 48 B.C., Pothinos, an influential eunuch, persuaded Ptolemy to assume sole control, and Cleopatra was driven into exile. At this moment Pompeius came to E. as a fugitive after the defeat of Pharsalia, and was treacherously murdered by Ptolemy. Cæsar shortly afterwards arrived in E., and, after a narrow escape from destruction in Alexandria, restored Cleopatra along with her younger brother Ptolemy XV, and took her back with him to Rome as his mistress. She bore him a son, who was called Cæsarion. On Cæsar's death in 44 she returned to Alexandria. During the civil war which followed Antony was put in charge of the East: he summoned Cleopatra to appear before him at Tarsus, and she went to meet him there and succeeded in completely fascinating him and carrying him back to E. with her in 41. Antony returned to Rome after a time and married Octavia, the sister of Octavian. But the fascination of Cleopatra drew him back to E. In 36 he went against the Parthians and, summoning her to meet him at Antioch, he gave her the dominion over Phœnicia, Cyprus, Cilicia, and other districts in the East. He came back from Parthia defeated, but she met him and kept him from returning to Rome; and in 34 he revenged his defeat on the Parthians, and coming back to Alexandria he conferred the lordship of the whole of the East on her and her sons Cæsarion, Alexander, and Ptolemy. War was now declared on Antony by Octavian, and Cleopatra accompanied her lover to the battle of Actium, but her flight was the cause of his defeat, and together they went to E. closely followed by Octavian. Antony committed suicide, and the Q., after a vain attempt to charm the austere Octavian, followed his example. The death of Pompeius is an incident in Chapman's Cæsar v. 1, 244, etc. The earlier intrigue with Julius Cæsar is the subject of B. & F. False One, and, we may add incidentally, of Bernard Shaw's Cæsar and Cleopatra; and the later intrigue with Antony is treated in Shakespeare's A. & C., in Daniel's Cleopatra, and in Dryden's All for Love.

In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Cæsar speaks of Cornelius Gallus as "the first provost That ever let our Roman eagles fly On swarthy E." Gallus was sent by Cæsar to E. immediately after the battle of Actium to complete the defeat of Antony. In Massinger's Milan ii. 1, Tiberio speaks of the Duchess as "she that lately Rivalled Poppæa in her varied shapes, Or the En. Q." In Mariam i. 2, Alexandra says that if Antony had seen Mariamne "he would Have left the brown En. clean forsaken." The story of Cleopatra dissolving a costly pearl in vinegar for a toast to Antony impressed the popular imagination. In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Volpone promises to Celia "A rope of pearl; and each more orient Than that the brave En. Q. caroused." In Greene's Friar ix., Bacon promises the Emperor Frederick "wines richer than the Æn. courtesan Quaffed to Augustus' kingly counter-match." In Shirley's Venice iii. 4, Thomazo says, "Let the banquet be as rich as the Æn. Q. made for Marc Antony." In Marmion's Companion i. 1, Valeria says, "Could the Æn. Q. Rather endure the poignant stings of adders Than that of death which wounded Antony? And must I then survive you?" In Mason's Mulleasses 2063, Timoclea says, "The Æn. Q. Ne'er died more daring." In Mariam iv. 8, Mariam speaks of Cleopatra as "that face That to be Egypt's pride was born."

Milton, P. L. ix. 443, refers to the dalliance of the sapient king Solomon "with his fair Æn. spouse" (see I Kings iii. 1). The lady was probably the daughter of Pesebkhennu II, the last king of the XXI Dynasty. According to Matthew ii. 13, the Virgin Mary took our Lord to E. in his infancy to escape from the jurisdiction of Herod. In Candemas, p. 14, the Angel says to Joseph, "Take Mary with thee and in to Egypt flee." So, in York M. P. xviii. 79, Joseph says, "Unto Egypte wend we will." In Milton, P. R. ii. 76, the Virgin Mary tells how she was "enforced to fly Thence into E. till the murderous king Were dead." In A.D. 640 the Arabs took Alexandria, and thenceforward E. was under the rule of the Moslems. By the direction of the Caliph Omar the famous library was ransacked and all the books consumed by fire. Till 868 the viceroys were appointed by the Caliphs of Bagdad and Damascus; but they then asserted their independence, the most famous of the Sultans of E. being the chivalrous Saladin. In 1517 Selim, the Turkish Sultan, conquered the last independent ruler of E. and made it a part of the Ottoman Empire. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 20, the Soldan of E. is one of the suitors for the hand of Angelica. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Zenocrate is described as the daughter of "The mighty Soldan of Ægyptia." This was Farag, who was defeated by Tamburlaine in Syria; but Marlowe is in error in making Tamburlaine actually enter E. In Selimus, the Æn. Soldan Tonombey comes to assist Acomat in his fight against his brother Selim. This is supposed to be in 1512. In line 2418 Selim says, "Acomat brings with him that great Æn. bug, strong Tonombey, Usan-Cassano's son." This is not quite accurate: Tuman Bey was not descended from Usum-Cassanes, but was a slave who was elected Sultan of E. in 1516, 4 years after Selim's accession, and was defeated and put to death by him at Cairo in 1517; neither did he come to help Acomat. In Day's Travails, the Sultan Agmed I claims to be "emperor of Babilon, Catheria, Ægypt, Antioche."

The religion of ancient E. was a curious conglomerate of sun and star worship with the more primitive adoration of totem-animals. The supreme god was Ra, the sun-god, but he was supposed to be incarnated in the sacred Apis Bull; and other animals were worshipped in a similar way. There were also a number of semi-human deities, of whom Osiris, with his mother Isis, was the chief. Milton, P. L. i. 480, mentions "Osiris, Isis, Orus" as having "abused Fanatic E. and her priests to seek Their wandering gods disguised in brutish forms." In Brome's Concubine iii. 9, the K. says, "He's no son of mine That with less adoration dares look up On thy divinity than the Æns. Gave to the Sun itself." In Milkmaids i. 3, Ranolf says of Lord Callow: "I have lighted upon one of the Æn. idols; taught with some engine to put off his hat and screw his face a little; I cannot speak to it like a man." In the same scene Dorigene says, "We came but as the Æns. to adore the rising sun and to fall down before it." In Lyly's Midas

ii. 1, Sophronia says, "They honour Lust for a god as the Æns. did dogs." Milton, P. R. iii. 416, calls the gods which Israel worshipped "the deities of E.": he is thinking of the golden calf, and of the calves which Jeroboam set up at Bethel and Dan. The Æn. priests were credited with profound skill in sorcery; they were also thought to be expert in astrology and philosophy. This was due largely to the account of the priests who withstood Moses with enchantments. In Daniel's Cleopatra iv. 3, the chorus says, "Mysterious E., wonder-breeder, Strict religion's strange observer." In Lyly's Endymion iii. 1, Cynthia says, "If the soothsayers of E. can find remedy, I will procure it." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 155, Selinthus says, "No Æn. soothsayer Has truer inspiration than your small courtiers." Spenser, F. Q. v., prol. 8, speaks of "those æn. wisards old Which in starrede were wont have best insight." In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 3, Mirabel fears that, if he marries the learned Dillia, his 1st son must be Aristotle, his 2nd Solon, "And I must look Æn. god-fathers Which will be no small trouble." Burton, A. M. iii. 1, 2, 3, says, "Plato and Pythagoras left their country to see those wise Æn. priests."

The hieroglyphic inscriptions of E., being hitherto uninterpreted, were supposed to have a mystical significance. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Subtle says, "Was not all the knowledge of the Æns. writ in mystic symbols?" In Underwit ii. 2, Device says, "Your Hieroglyphick was the Egyptian wisdom." In Histrion B. 2, Chrisogonus says, "This time We call a year whose hieroglyphick was Amongst the Æns. figured in a snake Wreathed circular, the tail within his mouth." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Mæcenus says, "By that beast [the ass] the old Æns. Were wont to figure in their hieroglyphs Patience, frugality, and fortitude." This is pure imagination: the Æns. used the head and ears of an ass to symbolize a stupid and ignorant person, but it was not an ordinary hieroglyphic character. In Massinger's Guardian ii. 3, Mirtille gives Adorio a gem with the Rape of Proserpine engraved on it, from his mistress, and says, "She presents you this jewel in which, as by a true Æn. hieroglyphic, you may be instructed." The Æns. preserved the bodies of the dead by mummification. Hakluyt, in Voyages ii. 1, 201 (1599), says, "These dead bodies are the Mummie which the Physicians . . . make us to swallow." Mummy was often used as a medicine. Falstaff, in M. W. W. iii. 5, 18, says that if he had been drowned he would have been "a mtn. of Mummie." Sandys, in Travels 133, saw "The Mummies, lying in a place where many generations have had their sepulture, not far above Memphis." Bacon, in Sylva viii. 771, says that the mummies of Æ. have lasted "as is conceived, some of them 3000 years."

The Æns. were dark and swarthy in complexion, and were credited with being expert in lying and treachery. Probably, however, the speakers were thinking of the Gipsies, who were supposed to be Æns. In M. N. D. v. 1, 11, Theseus says, "The lover . . . Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of E." In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Quick-sands says, "Why think'st thou, fearful Beauty, has Heaven no part in Æ. Is not an Æthiopes face his workmanship As well as the fairest ladies'?" Dark women were regarded as repulsive in the reign of the blonde Elizabeth. In Tiberius 684, Sejanus says that a man who will climb must adapt himself to all circumstances: "Brag with the French, with the Æn. lie." The wealth of E. was proverbial, possibly from Hebrews xi. 26, where Moses is described as refusing

"the treasures of E." In Lyly's Endymion v. 3, Gyptes says, "I choose rather to live by the sight of Cynthia than by the possessing of all E." Barnes, in Parthenophil xlviii. 3, wishes "No diamonds the En. surges under."

E. is a rainless country, and depends altogether for its fertility upon the annual rising of the Nile. The mud or slime left by the falling of the river was the most precious possession of the land, and was rich in harvests with little need for cultivation. It was supposed to produce also serpents, crocodiles, and other venomous beasts by spontaneous generation. In H3 ii. 3, 92, the old lady speaks of a woman "who would not be a Q. For all the mud in E." In A. & C. ii. 5, 78, Cleopatra, in her wrath, prays: "Melt E. into Nile, and kindly creatures Turn all to serpents!" and in 94 she cries: "O I would thou didst, So half my E. were submerged and made A cistern for scaled snakes." In ii. 7, 30, Lepidus says, "Your serpent of E. is bred now of your mud by the operation of your sun; so is your crocodile." In Massinger's Renegado iii. 1, Mustapha apostrophises, "O land of crocodiles Made of accursed slime, accursed woman!" Bacon, in Sylva viii. 767, says that there is "little or no rain" in E.; and that "the water of Nilus is sweeter than other waters in taste" (see also under NILE). The crocodile was the best known of the animals of E. Many legends gathered round it: as that it wept in order to attract its prey; and that the dogs drank of the Nile at a run in order to avoid it. In Selimus 44r, Baiazet says, "Even as the great Æn. crocodile Wanting his prey, with artificial tears And fained complaints his subtil tongue doth file To entrap the silly wandering traveller, So playeth crafty Selimus with me." In Chettle's Hoffman i. 1, Hoffman says, "Thou couldst shed tears As doth the En. serpents near the Nile." In Lochrine iii., prol., Ate tells a story of "an Æn. crocodile" that was stung to death by an adder. Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 256, says, "Wine should be taken, as the dogs in E. drink water, by snatches." Lodge, in Ans. to Gosson 9 (Eliz. Pamph.), tells how "the dastardly ichneumon of E. Besmears herself with clay" as a protection against the bite of the asp. In Tiberius 2073, Drusus says, "Me thought I saw Martichora, The dreadful hideous Æn. beast, Faced as an hydra like some uncouth man Whose ears hang dragging down unto her feet . . . With lion's claws and scorpion's poisoned sting." This fabulous monster is described by Aristotle in Hist. Animal. ii. 1, p. 53, Ctesias being quoted as his authority; but he makes it an Indian, not an En., beast. The name is the Persian Mard-khora, i.e. man-eater. The Sacred Ibis (Ibis Religiosa) was indigenous to E., and was greatly valued because it kept the snakes down by killing them and eating their eggs. In Selimus 2523, Selim says, "The Æn. ibis hath expelled Those swarming armies of swift-winged snakes. . . . Those ibides met them in set array And eat them up like to a swarm of gnats." In 2539 he says, "I, like Æ.'s bird, Have rid that monster." Greene, in Pandosto 51, speaks of the "bird Ibys in E. which hateth serpents, yet feedeth on their eggs." In Middleton's Chess v. 3, the Black Knight, in a list of fish esteemed by the Romans, mentions the "golden-headed coracine out of E." This coracine is a Nile fish, Sparus Chromis. Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 32, says, "Coracinus in Ægypto principatum obtinet."

The palm-tree grows freely in E., and dates are one of its principal exports. In Nash's Summers, p. 70, Christmas says, "I must rig ship to E. for dates." In Lyly's Gallathea v. 2, Hæbe says, "The Æns. never cut their dates from the tree because they are so fresh and green."

The plant which produces the drug Nepenthes, some kind of opiate, is stated by Homer (Odys. iv. 228) to be from E. "where the rich glebe evermore Yields herbs in foison, some for virtue known, Some baneful." Milton, in Comus 676, speaks of "that Nepenthes which the wife of Thone In E. gave to Jove-born Helena." The wife of Thone was called Polydamna. Other drugs and spices were produced in E. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 1, 428, Remilia speaks of "The precious drugs that Æ.'s wealth affords." Barnes, in Parthenophil xvii. 17, says, "En. gums and odours Arabic I loathe." In Carliell's Deserv. Fav. 2855, the Hermite says, "I must attribute His sudden curing to a sovereign balm That an En. gave me." Some of the En. stones, especially Syenite and Diorite, are extremely hard. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, 147, Byron says, "Though he prove harder than En. marble, I'll make him malleable as th' Ophir gold." The art of hatching eggs by artificial heat was known to the Ens. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Surly says scornfully to Subtle, "That you should hatch gold in a furnace, Sir, As they do eggs in E.!" In Chapman's Rev. Hon. i. 1, 67, Selinthus says that Abrahen "has hatched more projects than the ovens In E. Chickens."

The Gipsies, as the name implies, were believed to have come from E., though they really were of Hindu origin. They first appeared in England about the beginning of the 16th cent., and quickly established a reputation for themselves as fortune-tellers and sorcerers; besides being shrewdly suspected of petty thefts. They are often called by the fuller name Ens. In A. & C. iv. 10, 38, Antony says of Cleopatra, "O this false soul of E. . . . this grave charm. . . . Like a right gipsy hath, at fast and loose, Beguiled me to the very heart of loss." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 309, says, "Thus, with the En., thou playest fast and loose." This was a common Gipsy trick, like the modern "pricking the garter." In Per. iii. 2, 84, Cerimon says, "I heard of an En. That had 9 hours lien dead, Who was by good appliance recovered." The original of this speech in Wilkins' novel, The Painful Adventures of Pericles, Prince of Tyre (1608) is: "I have read of some Ens. who, after 4 hours' death, have raised impoverished bodies to their former health." In Oth. iii. 4, 56, Othello says, "That handkerchief Did an En. to my mother give," and proceeds to relate its magical properties. In Middleton's Gipsy iii. 1, Sancho says, "If you ask whence we are, We are En. Spaniards." In his Widow iii. 3, Violetta says of Brandino, "Francisco is a child of E. to him," i.e. a mere gipsy. In Jonson's Gipsies, Jackman sings, "Thus the Ens. throng in clusters." Harman, in Caveat Intro., speaks of "the wretched, wily, wandering vagabonds, calling and naming themselves Egyptians." In Shirley's Sisters iii. 1, Giovanni says of the Chaldean fortune-tellers: "They do not come for money like your starch-faced Ens." The starch of Elizabethan days was yellow. In Middleton's Chess iii. 1, the Black Q.'s Pawn speaks of "a magical glass I bought of an En." In Brome's Moor iv. 5, the Inductor of the Masque comes in with a blackened face, and says he will devise a husband for Millisent "such as I shall draw, Being an Æn. prophet." Dekker, in Lanthorn viii., says of the Moon-men: "By a by-name they are called Gipsies, they call themselves Egyptians." In Whetstone's Promos ii. 7, "a Giptian" is led out with 5 other prisoners to execution.

EGYPT, RIVER OF. Used in the O. T. several times for the brook which divides E. from Syria. It is the Wady-el-Arish, which flows into the Mediterranean between Pelusium and Gaza. Milton, P. L. i. 421, calls it "the brook that parts E. from Syrian ground."

EISEL. In Ham. v. 1, 299, Hamlet says to Læertes, "Woo't drink up e. & eat a crocodile?" Some of the editors, remarking that in the Folio the word is printed with a capital initial and in italics as if it were a proper name, interpret it as meaning some river: either the Yssel in Holland, or by conjecture the Nile. Most, however, take it to mean vinegar.

ELBE. A r. in Germany, rising in Bohemia and flowing in a northerly direction into the North Sea at Cuxhaven, between Holstein and Bremen. Hamburg is at the head of the estuary, abt. 85 m. from the sea. Its total length is between 600 and 700 m. In H5 i. 2, 45, the Archbp. of Canterbury says, "Their own authors faithfully affirm That the land Salique is in Germany Between the floods of Sala and of E." (old edns. Elve). So in line 52, "Which Salique . . . 'twixt E. and Sala Is at this day in Germany called Meisen." This is almost verbatim from Holinshed. See SALA.

ELDEN, or ELDON-HOLE. One of the wonders of the Peak of Derbyshire. It is a natural chasm some 30 yards long by 15 wide, and of great depth, and lies abt. 4 m. W. of Castleton. In Jonson's Love's Welcome, Accidence includes amongst the wonders of the Peak "St. Anne of Buxton's boiling well, Or E., bottomless like Hell."

EL DORADO. The name given by the Elizabethans to Manoa, the chief city of Guiana, in S. America, because of its supposed wealth. Raleigh led an expedition to discover it in 1585. Milton, P. L. xi. 411, represents Adam as seeing in spirit "yet unspoiled Guiana, whose great city Geryon's sons [i.e. the Spaniards] Call E. D." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "I would see those inner parts of America, whether there be any such great city of Manoa, or Eldorado, in that golden empire."

ELEALE (now EL-AL). A vill. in the land of Moab, a little more than 1 m. N. of Heshbon. Milton, P. L. i. 411, says that Chemos was worshipped "in Hesebon . . . And E. to the Asphaltic pool."

ELEPHANT. An inn in the chief city of Illyria. In Tw. N. iii. 3, 39, Antonio says, "In the S. suburbs at the E. Is best to lodge"; and in iv. 3, 5, Sebastian complains that he could not find Antonio "at the E." There was an E. Alley on the N. side of Maid Lane, Southwark, leading to the East end of the Bankside, which possibly suggested the name to Shakespeare. The famous E. & Castle in Newington was not built till the middle of the 17th cent. There was an E. Inn in Fenchurch St.

ELEPHANTIS, or ELEPHANTINE. An island in the Nile, just opposite to Syene. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon says, "I will have . . . mine oval room Filled with such pictures as Tiberius took From E." The allusion is to Suetonius, Vit. Tiberii 43, "Cubicula plurifariam disposita tabellis ac sigillis lascivissimarum picturarum et figurarum adornavit librisque Elephantidis instruxit."

ELEUSIS. A town in Attica, standing on a height a little way from the sea abt. 12 m. N.W. of Athens, with which it was connected by the Sacred Way along which the great Eleusinian procession passed once a year to celebrate the Mysteries of Demeter. There was another E. in Boeotia, near Lake Copais. In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality mentions "Eleusinian plaice" amongst dainties for the table.

ELIENNIETH. A mtn. in Wales, mentioned by Jonson in his Wales. But as among the other "mnts." he mentions Talgarth, which is not a mtn., but a market town (in the N. of Brecknock), it would be waste of time to ask what he may have meant by E.

ELIS. The capital of the dist. of E., which lies on the W. coast of the Peloponnesus between Achaia and Messenia. In the time of Pausanias it was one of the most splendid and popular cities of Greece, and contained the largest gymnasium in the country. Some 25 m. S.E. of E. was Olympia, where the Olympic games were celebrated. These were originally under the control of Pisa, but passed at a very early date into the hands of the Eleans, who elected from among themselves the 10 Hellenodici, or Judges. In Nero i. 3, Nero boasts, "Not Bacchus . . . Struck amazed India with wonder As Nero's glories did the Greekish towns, E. and Pisa and the rich Mycenæ." The allusion is to Nero's visit to Greece in A.D. 67, when he contended in Music in the Olympic Games. In Chapman's Consp. Byron v. 1, Henri says to Byron, "In this dissension I may say of you As Fame says of the ancient Eleans That in the Olympian contentions They ever were the justest arbitrators, If none of them contended or were parties." In Andromana ii. 6, in the fictitious war between the Iberians and Argives, Plangus "with a winged speed Fell down to the Elean straits." Probably the mouth of the Gulf of Corinth is intended, if anything.

ELMO, SAINT. The fort at the extremity of the ridge separating the 2 harbours of Valetta on the N.E. coast of Malta. On it stands one of the most powerful light-houses in the Mediterranean. In B. & F. Malta i. 3, Valetta, the Grand-Master of the Knights of St. John, after whom the city was named, speaks of "That great marvellous slaughter of the Turks Before St. Elme, where 25,000 Fell, for 5000 of our Christians." The reference is to the repulse of the Turks from St. E. in 1565.

ELSINORE (Danish, HELSINGOR). Spt. on the N.E. of Zealand, on the narrowest part of the Sound, 22 m. N. of Copenhagen. Close by is the castle of Kronburg, built in 1574. It was the birth-place of Saxo Grammaticus. In Ham. i. 2, 174, Hamlet asks Horatio, "What is your affair in E.?" and in ii. 2, 278, he asks Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern, "What make you at E.?" In line 387, he welcomes the players "to E.," and again in 573. These passages fix the scene of the play, which is not elsewhere indicated. (See also HELSIN.)

ELTHAM. A vill. in Kent, 8 m. S.E. of Lond., at the foot of Shooter's Hill. There was a royal palace here which was much frequented by the Plantagenet kings, but was not used as a royal residence after the reign of Henry VIII, though it was visited by Elizabeth and James I. The great hall, built by Edward IV, still remains: a noble Gothic structure 100 ft. long, 36 broad, and 55 high. In H6 A. i. 1, 170, Exeter says, "To E. will I, where the young K. is," and in 176 Winchester adds: "The K. from E. I intend to steal." In iii. 1, 156, Gloucester says, "At E. Place I told your Majesty." In Chaucer, Legend of Good Women 497, Venus says to him, "Whan this book is made, yive it the queene, On my by-halfe, at E. or at Sheene." In Oldcastle, 2 of the scenes are laid in an ante-chamber in the Palace of E. In iii. 2, Acton says, "The k. is secure at E.;" in iii. 4, the K., in disguise, tells Sir John he comes "from the court at E.;" and in iv. 1, Sir John says he won his gold "in play of the keeper of E. Park." In Fair Women ii. 620, Browne says, "Crossing the field this morning here from E. [we] Chanced by the way to start a brace of hares." At Christmas 1515 the Story of Troylous and Pandour, by William Cornish, was played before the K. at E. by the children of the Chapel Royal. Jonson, in Epigram xcvi., says, "See you yond Motion? not the old fa-ding, Nor Capt. Pod, nor yet the E. thing"; and in Epicoene v. 1, Morose says, "I dwell in a windmill; the perpetual motion is here, and not at E." This was a machine supposed to be capable of perpetual motion which was exhibited at E. Palace by its inventor, Cornelius Drebbel, who came to England in 1610 and had apartments granted to him at E. Palace. It was a hollow glass globe representing the heavens, which was kept revolving round a small ball in the centre, representing the earth. In Vendenheym's Relation of the Journey of Lewis Frederick, Prince of Wirtemberg, to England, under date Tuesday, 1 May 1610, it is said: "His Excellency went to E. Park to see the perpetual motion; the inventor's name was Cornelius Trebel, a native of Alkmaar, a very fair and handsome man." Peacham, in his Sights of England (1611), mentions "the heavenly Motion of E."

ELVAS. The strongest fortress in Portugal, abt. 11 m. W. of Badajoz. It is the seat of a bp., and has an old cathedral. It is the scene of part of Shirley's Maid's Revenge.

ELY. An episcopal city in Cambridgesh., on the Ouse, 67 m. N.E. of Lond. A monastery was founded here by Q. Etheldreda about A.D. 670. In 1107 E. was made the seat of a bishopric by Henry I; and Henry VIII converted the conventual ch. into a cathedral. The transept dates from the reign of William Rufus: the nave and W. tower were built in 1174. The Bp. of E. in H5 i. 1 was John Fordham, who died 1425. The Bp. of E. appears as one of the Council in R3 iii. 4. In iv. 3, we are told that he has fled to Richmond; and in iv. 4, 468, Stanley says that Richmond has been stirred up by "Dorset, Buckingham, and E." to claim the Crown of England. This was John Morton, who was made Bp. of E. in 1478: he was committed in custody by Richd. to the D. of Buckingham, who confined him in what was known from this circumstance as the Bishop's Tower in Brecknock Castle; after Buckingham's disgrace he persuaded him to call in the Earl of Richmond. Henry VII made him Archbp. of Canterbury in 1486, and it was he who built the central tower of the cathedral there. In 1487 he became Lord Chancellor; in 1493 he was created a cardinal; and he died at the age of 91 in 1500. There is a Bp. of E. in Downfall Huntingdon, which is placed in the reign of John. In iii. 1, Fitzwater says to him, "E., thou wert the fox to Huntingdon." In More iii. 2, Fawkes, who has been arrested for a st. riot, says, "The fray was between the Bp.'s men of Eelie and Winchester." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iii. 1, the fiddler's boy, being asked what countryman he is, says, "Sir, born at E.; we all set up in Ela." The joke turns on the "E" or "La," the note to which the viol was tuned. In Greene's Frier v. 8, Ralph says, "I'll send to the Isle of Eely for 4 or 5 dozen of geese." E. was famous for goose-breeding. Drayton, in Polyolb. xxi., says there was "abundant store" of fish and fowl bred there.

ELY HOUSE. The Lond. residence of the Bps. of E. It was on the site of the present E. Place, which runs N. from Charterhouse St. near Holborn Viaduct. Originally the H. had a fine gate opening into Holborn, built in 1388. The death of John of Gaunt, described in R2 ii. 1, took place at E. H., which was often let by the Bps. to noblemen. In R3 iii. 4, 32, Richd. says to the Bp. of E., "When I was last in Holborn I saw good strawberries in your garden there; I do beseech you, send for some of them." Sir Christopher Hatton got a lease of it in 1576, and erected Hatton H. on part of the estate. Hatton Gardens mark the site. The Spanish ambassador Gondomar lodged at E. H., and during his residence in 1621 the last Mystery Play ever represented in England up till recent years was acted there. Lady Hatton held the house till 1646; and in 1633 the performers in Shirley's Masque, The Triumph of Peace, assembled at E. and Hatton H., and marched thence down Chancery Lane to the Banqueting House at Whitehall, where the Masque was presented. In 1772 the property was transferred to the Crown, and 37 Dover St., Piccadilly, was made over to the see of E. in its stead. All the buildings were then taken down except the ancient chapel of St. Etheldreda, which, after being used as a National School and as a Welsh Episcopalian Ch., was purchased in 1874 by the Lazarist Fathers and opened as a Catholic Chapel by Cardinal Manning in 1879.

ELYSIUM. The Elysian Plain was in Greek mythology the abode of the blessed dead. Homer places it in the W. near the Ocean stream; Hesiod and Pindar identify it with the blessed Isles. Later it was conceived as in the lower world. It is used by the Elizabethans as a synonym for Heaven: a region of perfect bliss. In Two Gent. ii. 7, 38, Julietta says, "There I'll rest as after much turmoil A blessed soul doth in E." In Tw. N. i. 2, 4, Viola says of her brother, supposed to be drowned, "My brother he is in E." In Cymb. v. 4, 97, Jupiter calls the Ghosts "poor shadows of E." In Marlowe's Faustus i. 3, the hero says, "This word damnation terrifies me not, For I confound Hell in E.; my ghost be with the old philosophers." In Marston's Malcontent v. 4, Mercury says, "Cyllenian Mercury calls 4 high-famed Genoan Dukes to come And make this presence thier E." In Span. Trag. iv. 1, the maid says of Horatio, "He sleeps in quiet in the Elysian fields." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Gaveston says, "The sight of Lond. to my exiled eyes Is as E. to a new-come soul." In Champions iii., George says, "How pleasant is this place! the farther that I go, The more elizium-like it doth appear." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. v. 2, Zabina speaks of "The blasted banks of Erebus Where shaking ghosts . . . Hover about the ugly ferryman To get a passage to Elisian [sic]"; and further on Tamburlaine says, "Hell and Elisian swarm with ghosts of men That I have sent from sundry foughten fields." In Ford's 'Tis Pity i. 3, Giovanni says, "I would not change This minute for E." In B. & F. Rule a Wife v. 4, Perez says to Estifania, "Hast ne'er a knife nor never a string to lead thee to E.?" In Jack Drum iii. 278, Katharine says to the supposed ghost of Pasquil, "Thrice sacred spirit, why dost thou forsake Elizeum pleasures?" In Massinger's Virgin iv. 3, Theophilus says to Dorothea: "Weigh the remembrance Of the Elysian joys thou mightst have tasted, Hadst thou not turned apostata to those gods That so reward their servants." In Suckling's Aglaura v. 1, the heroine says, "Our priests assure us an E.; and can that be E. where true lovers must not meet?" Milton, P.L. iii. 472, tells of Cleombrotus, "who, to enjoy Plato's E., leaped into the sea." He is said to have drowned himself after reading Plato's Phædon. Hence it is used metaphorically of any state of perfect bliss and happiness. In H5 iv. 1, 291, Henry says that the labouring man "all night sleeps in E." In H6 B. iii. 2, 399, Suffolk says he would breathe his soul into the body of the Q., "And then it lived in sweet E." In H6 C. i. 2, 30, Richd. of York says, "How sweet a thing it is to wear a crown, Within whose circuit is E." Hence for anything that is the object of supreme desire. In Venus 600, Adonis is called the E. of Venus: "Worse than Tantalus is her annoy To clip E. and to lack her joy."

EMATHIA. A dist. of Macedonia around Edessa. After the Roman Conquest it formed the 3rd district of Macedonia. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Anthony says, "We'll meet the enemy in Macedon; Æmathian fields shall change their flowery green, And dye proud Flora in a sadder hue." Milton speaks of Alexander as "the great En. conqueror" (Sonn. iii. 10). In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cassius says, "Egypt, E., Italy, and Spain Are full of dead men's bones by Cæsar slain." In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "Why died I not in those En. plains Where great Domitius fell by Cæsar's hand?" i.e. at the battle of Pharsalia in Macedonia. Milton, P. R. iii. 290, speaks of Seleucia, Nisibis, and other cities in the East as "Built by En. or by Parthian hands." Seleucia was built and Nisibis rebuilt by the Seleucid kings of Syria, who were descended from Seleucus Nicator, one of the generals of Alexander the Grt.

EMDEN. Near the mouth of the Ems, the capital of the principality of East Friesland. It is now decayed, but in the 16th cent. it was a famous port, and one of its princes, Count John, made a treaty in 1563 with Elizabeth. In the next year it was visited by an English fleet, which was received with much pomp. Its noble Rath-haus, built in 1573, remains as an evidence of its former greatness. In Marlowe's Faustus v., Faust says, "Of Wealth! Why, the Signiory of E. shall be mine." In Barnavelte iv. 3, amongst Sir John's letters is one from "grave Embden." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, the Burse at Rome is said to be "built after the manner of Frankford and Embden," with streets and pent-houses. Henslowe, in 1594, describes a play entitled The Merchant of Eamden.

EMIMS. A legendary race of giants who were supposed to have lived in Palestine, East of the Jordan, in what was afterwards the land of Moab. In Milton, S. A. 1080, Harapha says he is "of stock renowned As Og of Anak, and the E. old That Kiriathaim held." See Gen. xiv. 5.

EMMANUEL COLLEGE. University of Cambridge, founded by Sir Walter Mildmay in 1584. It stands at the S. corner of St. Andrew St. and Emmanuel St. In Middleton's Quiet Life ii. 1, Mrs. Knavesby, confessing her sins, says, "A handsome scholar, one of E. C., fell in love with me."

EMMAUS, or EMAX. A vill. in Judæa, 7 or 8 m. W. of Jerusalem. It was the scene of our Lord's manifestation of himself to 2 of his disciples recorded in Luke xxiv. 13. The vill. of Kolonieh is the most likely site; but the Onomasticon places it at E. Nicopolis, now Amwas, 20 m. from Jerusalem. In J. Heywood's Four PP. ii. 1, the Palmer says that in the course of his pilgrimages he went "round about to Amias." In York M. P. xl. 14, the 1st of the 2 disciples says he is going "To Emax, this castle beside us."

EMONY (i.e. HÆMONIA). The dist. in N. Greece lying S. of the Hæmus range: specially applied to Thessaly. In Kyd's Cornelia i., Chor, the poet, referring to the battle of Pharsalia, says, "War that hath sought the Ausonian fame to rear In warlike E." Spenser, in Astrophel 3, says of Sir Philip Sidney: "A gentle shepherd born in Arcady, About the grassy banks of Hæmony Did keep his sheep."

EMPEROR'S HEAD. The name of a tavern in Venice, mentioned in Chapman's May Day iii. 1, where Lodovico says, "I have housed the Capt. in the E. H. Tavern." The name was probably invented by Chapman for the occasion.

ENDFIELD. See ENFIELD.

ENEPEUS. See ENIPEUS.

ENFIELD. A vill. in Middlesex, 11 m. N. of Lond. The manor house was the residence for a time of the Princess (afterwards Q.) Elizabeth. N.W. of the town is E. Chase, the remains of an ancient forest which originally belonged to the citizens of Lond., but was ultimately enclosed in great part, the Chase itself becoming the property of the Crown. During the reign of James I it was stocked with deer, and the K. frequently hunted there. In Merry Devil, p. 245, Sir John says, "Neighbour Banks of Waltham and Goodman Smug, the honest smith of Edmonton, as I dwell betwixt you both at E., I know the taste of both your ale-houses." In Oldcastle iii. 2, "Highgate, Finchley, Tot'nam, E., Edmonton, etc., etc.," are mentioned as being the quarters of the rebels. In Dekker's Witch i. 2, we hear of one "Mr. Ranges that dwells by E." In ii. 1, Cuddy says, "No hunting counter! leave that to E. Chase men." In Merry Devil, p. 250, Mounchessey promises Millicent: "I will convey you hence unto a lodge I have in E. Chase." In Dekker's Northward iii. 2, Featherstone says, "His wife shall come and receive some small parcel of money in E. Chase at a keeper's that is her uncle." In a letter to Sir William Cecil, 1563, Bp. Grindall asks for "your warrant in Hatfield Park or E. Chase," i.e. for a doe. Dekker, in Jests, describes a class of swindlers called Reachers, who "walk together male and female and will have you a house to dwell at about Endfield, Brainford, or any place within 6, 7, or 8 m. of Lond." Drayton, in Polyolb. xvi. 259, speaks of E. as "A forest for her pride, though titled but a Chase." In Merry Devil, p. 243, Fabel says, "We'll first have Envil in such rings of mist As never rose from any dampish fen."

ENGLAND (E.=England, Eh.=English, Eman.=Englishman). The part of the Island of Great Britain S. of the Tweed and East of the Severn: excluding, that is, Scotland and Wales. The following plays deal more or less directly with English history:

I. The Legendary pre-Roman period.

Sackville's Ferrex and Porrex; Hughes' Misfortunes of Arthur; Anon. History of King Leir and his three Daughters; Shakespeare's King Lear; Anon. Nobody and Somebody (reign of Elidure); Anon. Birth of Merlin; Anon. Locrine.

II. Roman period from Julius Cæsar (or rather Claudius) to about A.D. 400.

Shakespeare's Cymbeline (reign of Claudius); Beaumont and Fletcher, Bonduca; Fisher's Fuirmus Troes; Anon. The Valiant Welshman (Caractacus); W. Rowley's Shoemaker a Gentleman.

III. Anglo-Saxon period (from 450 to 1066).

Middleton's Mayor of Queenborough (Hengist and Horsa); Anon. Knack to Know a Knave (Edgar); Anon. Edmund Ironside; Brewer's Lovesick King (Canute); Dekker's Old Fortunatus (Athelstan).

IV. Post-Conquest period (from 1066 onwards).

Anon. Fair Em (William I); Dekker's Satiromastix (William II); Anon. Look about You (Henry I); Anon. Fair Maid of Bristowe (Richard I); Bale's King Johan; Anon. Troublesome Reign of King

John; Shakespeare's King John; Munday and Chettle's Downfall of Huntington (John); Munday and Chettle's Death of Huntington (John); Davenport's King John and Matilda; Munday's John a Kent and John a Cumber; Greene's Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (Henry III); Chapman's Alphonsus of Germany (Henry III); Wentworth Smith's Hector of Germany (Henry III); Peele's Edward I; Anon. George a Greene (Edward I); Marlowe's Edward II; Anon. King Edward III; Anon. Tragedy of Richard II; Shakespeare's Richard II; Anon. Life and Death of Jack Straw (Richard II); Shakespeare's Henry IV (two parts); Anon. Famous Victories of Henry V; Shakespeare's Henry V; Anon. Sir John Oldcastle (Henry V); Day and Chettle's Blind Beggar of Bednall Green (Henry VI); Shakespeare's Henry VI (three parts); Anon. True Tragedy of Richard Duke of York (Henry VI); Contention of the Two Famous Houses of York and Lancaster (Henry VI); Anon. True Tragedy of Richard III (Edward IV and Richard III); T. Heywood's Edward IV (two parts); Shakespeare's Richard III; Ford's Perkin Warbeck (Henry VII); Shakespeare's Henry VIII; S. Rowley's When you See me, you Know Me (Henry VIII); Anon. Sir Thomas More (Henry VIII); Anon. Lord Cromwell (Henry VIII); Dekker's Sir Thomas Wyatt (Mary); T. Heywood's If you Know not Me (Elizabeth); Anon. Life and Death of Thomas Stukeley (Elizabeth); Peele's Battle of Alcazar (Elizabeth); Sampson's Vow-breaker (Elizabeth).

General references to geographical features and climate. In Mac. iii. 1, 31, Macbeth says, "Our bloody cousins are bestowed In E. and in Ireland." In iv. 3, 43, Malcolm says, "Here from gracious E. have I offer Of goodly thousands." In K. J. ii. 1, 26, Austria speaks of "E. hedged in with the main, That water-walled bulwark, still secure And confident from foreign purposes." In R. ii. 1, 61, Gaunt celebrates "E., bound in with the triumphant sea, Whose rocky shore beats back the envious siege Of watery Neptune." In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 2, 141, Byron describes E. as "the isle that, of the world admired, Is severed from the world." In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, Andrew speaks of Britain as "An island . . . Whose lovely waist proud Neptune circles round, Her craggy cliffs ambitiously threat heaven And strikes pale terror to the mariner. The inhabitants . . . Well skilled in science and all human arts; A government of peace and unity." In Err. iii. 2, 128, Dromio, in his geography of his cook-maid, says of E., "I looked for the chalky cliffs, but I could find no whiteness in them; but I guess it stood in her chin by the salt rheum that ran between France and it." In H. v. 2, 378, the French k. speaks of "the contending kingdoms Of France and E.; whose very shores look pale With envy of each other's happiness." For further references to the chalk cliffs of the S.E. coast, see s.v. ALBION. In H. iii. 5, 16, the Constable says of the Eh., "Is not their climate foggy, raw, and dull, On whom, as in despite, the sun looks pale, Killing their fruit with frowns?" In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Meercraft says to Fitzdottrel, "Now you perhaps fancy the smoke of E. rather?"

The patron saint of E. is St. George. He was a soldier, born in Cappadocia during the reign of Diocletian and martyred at Nicomedia on April 23rd, 303. Legend told of his slaying of a dragon somewhere in S. Palestine, where a ch. was dedicated to him at Lydda, where his relics were preserved. Our Australian Light

Horse, digging trenches in this neighbourhood in 1917, found a mosaic inscription in honour of "George the beloved of God," which is supposed to have been his tombstone. Richd. I invoked his aid in his 1st crusade; in 1222 the synod of Oxford made him a saint; and in the reign of Edward III he was formally adopted as the patron saint of E., and of the order of the Garter, instituted in 1348. The insignia of the Order include a collar of gold with an enamelled figure of St. George and the dragon as a pendant; a garter of dark-blue velvet edged with gold, worn below the left knee, with the motto: "Honi soit qui mal y pense"; an eight-pointed star, and a blue mantle. From the 1st year of the reign of Henry V his day (April 23rd) has been observed as a national festival; and by a curious coincidence it is also Shakespeare's birthday. The cross of St. George was our earliest national flag, and is a plain red cross, placed vertically and horizontally on a white ground. The figure of St. George slaying the dragon appears on some of our coins, especially the old half-crown and the modern gold coins. It was a popular ale-house sign in E. In L. L. L. v. 2, 620, Biron compares the face of Holofernes to "St. George's half-face [i.e. profile] in a brooch." In K. J. ii. 1, 288, the Bastard prays, "St. George that swinged the dragon, and e'er since Sits on his horse back at mine hostess' door, Teach us some fence!" In R. ii. 3, 84, Bolingbroke cries: "Mine innocency and St. George to thrive!" In H. iii. 1, 34, the K. says to his men, "Cry God for Harry, England, and St. George!" In H. A. i. 1, 154, Bedford says, "Bonfires in France forthwith I am to make, To keep our great St. George's feast withal." "God and St. George" is the Eh. battle-cry (see H. A. iv. 2, 55; H. C. ii. 1, 204, iv. 2, 29; R. v. 3, 270). "Eh. George" is one of the Seven Champions in Kirke's play, where he is said to be the son of the Earl of Coventry; doubtless because of his prominent place in the annual Coventry pageants. In Chapman's Usher i. 2, Strozio speaks of "The Eh. sign of great St. George." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., Edward says of Falconbridge, "Let this Phæton Look he sit surely, or, by E.'s George, I'll break his neck." In Sampson's Vow i. 2, 47, Clifton says, "Cry St. George and a fig for St. Dennis." Spenser, F. Q. i. 10, 61, identifies him with his red-cross knight, and says, "Thou St. George shalt called be, St. George of merry E., the sign of victory." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 1, Bobadil swears, "By St. George, I was the first man that entered the breach." Puttenham, Art of Poesie (1589) ii. (cancelled pages), says, "K. Edward III, first founder of the famous order of the Garter, gave this posie with it, Honi soit qui mal y pense." In H. A. iv. 1, 15, Talbot says to Falstaff, "I vowed, base knight, when I did meet thee next, To tear the Garter from thy craven's leg"; and in line 34, he says, "When first this order was ordained, my lords, Knights of the Garter were of noble birth, Valiant and virtuous, full of haughty courage, Such as were grown to credit by the wars; Not fearing death, nor shrinking for distress, But always resolute in most extremes." In H. B. iv. 1, 29, Suffolk says, "Look on my George! I am a gentleman." In R. iv. 4, 366, Richd. swears "by my George, my garter, and my crown." In Webster's White Devil iv. 2, Lodovico says, "The Eman. is knight of the honoured Garter, dedicated unto their saint, St. George." In Kirke's Champions i. 1, his father says to George, "England's red cross shall George, then St. George, wear." Later, James says to him, "Let thy white standard bear A bloody cross, to fill the world with fear." In T. Heywood's Fortune iv. 1, the boy says of an approaching ship, "She bears the Cross of E. and St. George." In Webster's Cuckold iii. 3, Rochfield reports that 3 Spanish men-of-war, "having spied the Eh. cross advance, Salute us with a piece to have us strike." In More iv. 2, More says, "To prevent in French wars E.'s loss Let german flags wave with our Eh. cross." In Trag. Richd. II i. 3, 177, Woodstock says of Arundel, "He did with fame advance the Eh. cross." In Greene's James IV v. 3, Douglas says, "O Eh. k. . . . The roseal cross is spread within thy field, A sign of peace, not of revenging war" (see also GEORGE, ST.).

The lion was first used as part of the armorial bearings of E. by Richd. I; at first he bore 2 lions passant guardant in pale or; but in 1194 he added the 3rd lion, as it now appears in the 1st and 4th quarters of the shield. Heylyn (s.v. BRITISH ILES) says, "The Armes of E. are Mars [i.e. gules] 3 lions passant guardant Sol [i.e. Or]. They are compounded of the lion of Aquitaine and the 2 lions of Normandy." In Chapman's Alphonsus v. 1, 439, Alexander says, "At last the Eh. lions fled." In H6 A. i. 5, 28, Talbot exclaims: "Hark, countrymen! Either renew the fight Or tear the lions out of E.'s coat." In Greene's James IV v. 3, Douglas says, "O Eh. k., thou bearest in thy crest The k. of beasts that harms not yielding ones." In Smith's Hector iv. 2, 986, Artoys says, "'Twas I that quartered with the Eh. lions The arms of France, in opening Edward's title." Artoys had suggested to Edward III his claim upon the Crown of France.

Historical allusions. In Ham. v. 2, 39, Hamlet tells how he wrote a letter as from the K. of Denmark, conjuring the K. of E. to do as he wished, "As E. was his faithful tributary." Shakespeare evidently dated the play during the Danish domination of E. in the beginning of the 11th cent. In H5 i. 2, 169, Westmoreland says, "Once the eagle E. being in prey, To her unguarded nest the weasel Scot Comes sneaking, and so sucks her princely eggs." In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, Romelio speaks of "the horrid powder-treason in E.": referring to the Gunpowder Plot of 1605.

Land tenure in England. In Webster's Cuckold iii. 1, Lessingham says, "The tenure by which land was held In villanage [is] quite extinct in E." Serfdom gradually died out in E. in the 14th cent., but the tenure of the Villein was perpetuated for a long time in the form of copyhold tenure.

Patriotic Praise of England. In K. J. v. 7, 117, the Bastard says, "Come the 3 corners of the world in arms And we shall shock them. Nought shall make us rue, If E. to itself do rest but true." In H6 C. iv. 1, 40, Hastings says, "Why, knows not Montague that of itself E. is safe, if true within itself?" In Trouble-Reign, ad fin., the Bastard says, "If E.'s peers and people join in one Nor Pope nor France nor Spain can do them wrong." In Wealth 292, Remedy says, "Consider Emen. how valiant they be and fierce; No land can do them harm but by falsehood and stealth. Remember what number of men, of artillery and good ordinance, Specially the grace of God, which is our chief furtherance." In R2 i. 3, 306, Bolingbroke says, "Then, E.'s ground, farewell! sweet soil, adieu! My mother and my nurse, that bears me yet! Where'er I wander, boast of this I can, Though banished, yet a true-born Emen!" In ii. 1, 40, Gaunt utters his famous panegyric: "This royal throne of kings, this sceptered isle, This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars, This other Eden, demi-paradise; This fortress, built by Nature for herself Against infection and the hand of war; This happy breed of men, this little world; This precious stone set in the silver sea Which serves it in the office of a wall Or as a moat defensive to a house Against the envy of less happier lands; This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this E., This nurse, this teeming womb of royal kings, This land of such dear souls, this dear, dear land, Dear for her reputation through the world." In H5 ii., chor. 15, we read: "O E., model to thy inward greatness, Like little body with a mighty heart, What might'st thou do, that honour would thee do, Were all thy children kind and natural?" In H6 B. i. 1, 128, York boasts, "I never read but E.'s kings have had Large sums of gold and dowrie with their wives." In H6 B. i. 1, 238, York speaks of "Fertile E.'s soil." In H6 B. iv. 8, 52, Clifford appeals to Cade and his followers: "Spare E., for it is your native coast." In H8 i. 3, 22, the Lord Chamberlain says, "An Eh. courtier may be wise And never see the Louvre." In Span. Trag. i., the K. of Spain says, "Portingale may deign to bear our yoke When it by little E. hath been yoked." In Cromwell iii. 3, Cromwell boasts, "No Court with E. may compare Neither for state nor civil government." In Dekker's Fortunatus v. 2, Fortune declares, "E. shall ne'er be poor, if E. strive Rather by virtue than by wealth to thrive." In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Bertoldo says, "Look on E., The empress of the European isles And unto whom alone ours [i.e. Sicily] yields precedence: When did she flourish so, as when she was The mistress of the ocean, her navies Putting a circle round about the world?" In Chapman's Consp. Byron iv. 1, Byron is quoted as having said to Elizabeth, "Your empire is so amply absolute That even your theatres show more comely rule, True noblesse, royalty, and happiness, Than others' courts; you make all state before Utterly obsolete; all to come, twice sod." Later he says, "Treason was never guide to Eh. conquests." In T. Heywood's Captives iii. 2, Ashburne says, "I tell thee, peasant, E.'s no brood for slaves." In S. Rowley's When you E. 4, Henry VIII, sending Brandon to tilt in the tournaments in France, commands him, "Bear thee like thyself, an Emen., dreadless of the proudest." In Lawyer v. 1, the Abbot says, "Oh, happy Emen., if your sore eyes Did not look squint on your felicities." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. iii., Mullisheg says, "These Eh. are in all things honourable, Nor can we tax their ways in anything, Unless we blame their virtues." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 31), Robert Sherley says, "'Tis the nature of our Eh. coast, Whate'er we do for honour, not to boast." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 208, Cullen says, "I know an Emen., Being flattered, is a lamb; threatened, a lion." In ii. 2, 68, Edward says, "We say in E. that he is a man That like a man dare meet his enemy." In Smith's Hector i. 1, 9, the Palsgrave says, "No martial tutor fits a prince But he that is a trueborn Emen." In iii. 2, 757, the Bastard says, "Of all nations in the world I hate To deal with Emen., they conquer so."

Especially are the English praised for their valour. In K. J. ii. 1, 274, John says, "I bring you witnesses, Twice 15,000 hearts of E.'s breed, To verify our title with our lives." In H5 i. 2, 111, Canterbury, speaking of the battle of Crecy, says, "O noble Eh., that could entertain With half their forces the full pride of France, And let another half stand laughing by." In H5 iii. 1, 17, Henry says, "On, on, you noblest Eh., Whose blood is fet from fathers of war-proof. . . . And you, good yeomen, Whose Limbs were made in E., show us here The mettle of your pasture." In iii. 6, 158, Henry says, "I thought upon one pair of Eh. legs Did march 3 Frenchmen." In H6 A. i. 2, 30, Alençon confesses,

"E. all Olivers and Rowlands bred During the time Edward III did reign. More truly now may this be verified, For none but Samsons and Goliases It sendeth forth to skirmish." In H6 A. iv. 7, 54, Lucy says, "Submission, Dauphin! 'tis a mere French word; We Eh. warriors know not what it means." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iv. 1, the Spanish Capt. admits, "These Emen., Nothing can daunt them: Even in misery They'll not regard their masters." In Kyd's Soliman i., Erastus speaks of "Eh. Archers, hardy men-at-arms, I-cleped Lions of the Western world." In Devonshire i. 1, Fernando says, "The world cannot boast more resolution than the Eh. hearts seasoned for action." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. iv., the D. of Florence confesses, "These bold Emen., I think, are all composed of spirit and fire: the element of earth hath no part in them." Per contra, the French estimate of the English is occasionally presented. In H5 iv. 2, 37, the Constable of France boasts, "Our approach shall so much dare the field That E. shall couch down in fear and yield." In Trouble. Reign (Haz., p. 238), Lewis asks, "Why are the Eh. peerless in compare? E. is E., yielding good and bad, And John of E. is as other Johns." The phrase "merry E." occurs as early as Cursor Mundi (14th cent.), where Brutus is called "first conqueror of Meri England." In H6 B. iv. 2, 9, Holland says, "It was never merry world in E. since gentlemen came in." In Peele's Ed. I, p. 24, the harper predicts "A Welchman shall be k. and govern merrie E." Spenser, F. Q. i. 10, 61, speaks of "St. George of merry E., the sign of victory." In Cartwright's Ordinary iv. 2, Moth says, "So did the Saxons Upon thylike plain of Sarum done to death The lords of merry E.": a curious misuse of the word for a professed antiquary like Moth, for these lords of merry E. were Britons and their murderers the Saxon ancestors of a part of the Eh. nation.

English characteristics. Heylyn (s.v. BRITISH LIES) says, "The Eh. are commonly of comely feature, gracious countenance, for the most part gray-eyed, pleasant, bountiful, courteous, and much resembling the Italians in habit and pronunciation. In matters of war they are both able to endure and resolute to undertake, the hardest enterprises; in peace, quiet and not quarrelsome; in advice or counsel, sound and speedy. Finally, they are active, hearty, and cheerful." Andrew Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) i., describes the Eman. as fond of new fashions, and prefixes to the chapter a woodcut of an Eman. naked, and with a pair of huge scissors in his hand, unable to decide what he will wear: he boasts that all men fear him and that he lacks nothing, and that he will have his own way. "Emen.," he adds, "are bold, strong, and mighty; the women be full of beauty and they be decked gaily. If they were true within themselves, they need not to fear, although all nations were set against them." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 285, says, "I perceive in E. the women and men are in love constant, to strangers courteous, and bountiful in hospitality." Again, on p. 297, he says, "An Eman. hath 3 qualities: he can suffer no partner in his love, no stranger to be his equal, nor to be dared by any." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings of the Eman., "Nothing so full of hazard dread, Nought lives above the centre, No fashion, health, no wine nor wench, On which he dare not venture." Just above Scævola speaks of "an Eman.—a strange people in the western islands—one that for variety in habit, humour, and gesture puts down all other nations whatsoever." In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 2, 113, Edward says that "Eh. courtship [i.e. courtliness of manner, chivalry] bears it from the world." I adopt Brereton's emendation—bears, for leaves. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says, "There's a saying: the Irishman for his hand, the Welshman for a leg, the Eman. for a face." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Fernando says of E., "I'll tell you what I found there: men as neat, As courtly as the French, but in condition Quite opposite. Put case that you, my lord, Could be more rare on horseback than you are, If there—as there are many—one excelled You in your art, as much as you do others, Yet will the Eh. think their own is nothing Compared with you, a stranger; in their habits They are not more fantastic than uncertain; In short, their fair abundance, manhood, beauty No nation can disparage but itself." In H4 B. i. 2, 241, Falstaff says, "It was alway yet the trick of our Eh. nation, if they have a good thing, to make it too common." In Merch. i. 2, 73, Portia, speaking of the young Baron of E., says, "He understands not me nor I him; he hath neither Latin, French, nor Italian; he is a proper man's picture, but alas! who can converse with a dumb show?" In Nash's Wilton i. 3, Jack says, "That which was [the Israelites'] curse, we Emen. count our chief blessedness: he is nobody that hath not travelled." Later on, i. 4, he says, "Our Emen. are the plainest dealing souls that ever God put life in. They are greedy of news and love to be fed in their humours and hear themselves flattered the best that may be." In Davenant's Rhodes A. 88, Villerius says, "The Eh. lion ever loves to change His walks, and in remoter forests range." In John Evangel. 356, Eugenio says, "The courtesy of E. is oft to kiss." In Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 2, 94, when Edward shocks his bride by kissing her, Alphonsus explains, "Prince Edward used his country fashion." Erasmus was struck with this custom, and not unpleasantly, when he visited Sir Thomas More. In Ham. v. 1, 170, the gravedigger explains that Hamlet has been sent to E., because his madness "will not be seen in him there; there the men are as mad as he." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says, "Your lordship shall ever find amongst an hundred Emen. fourscore and ten madmen." In Fletcher's Pilgrim iv. 3, the Master of the Mad-house says of the Eh., "They are mad everywhere, Sir." In Middleton's Gypsy i. 1, Roderigo says, "It's as rare to see a Spaniard a drunkard as an Eman. to pay his debts." In Dekker's Match me i. 1, Bilbo says, "'Tis some Eman. has stolen her, I hold my life, for most thieves and bravest coney-catchers are amongst them." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I can turn arrant thief with the Eh." In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 1, 116, Ophioneus says, "Thou shalt . . . cheat with the Eman., brag with the Scot, and turn all this to religion." The Eh. thieves had, however, the reputation of avoiding murder. In Massinger's Guardian v. 3, Alphonso says, "Imitating the courteous Eh. thieves, they have not done one murder." In B. & F. French Law iv. 5, a gentleman says, "We use you kindly In that, like Eh. thieves, we kill you not, But are contented with the spoil." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 1, Alphonso, deploring the practice of duelling, charges this sin upon "France, and in strange fashions her ape, E." In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Mrs. Mixum says, "I have tried some Emen., and they are meacocks verily; and cannot lawfully beget a child once in 7 years." In Milkmaids iii. 1, Raymond says, "I am not like your dull, cold Eman. That can attend his mistress a whole day . . . yet check his blood." In Marston's Malcontent v. 3, Malevole says that young married lords go to E., "because there are no brothel-houses there, nor courtezans. Your whore went down with the stewes, and your punk came up with the Puritans."

The position and character of the English women. In Jonson's Volpone i. 1, Volpone says, "I wonder at the desperate valour Of the bold Eh., that they dare let loose Their wives to all encounters." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calipso describes "The Eh. fair companion that learns something From every nation and will fly at all." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "In E. Where public houses are prohibited There are the bravest lasses." Heylyn (s.v. BRITISH ILES) says, "Our women questionless are the most choice work of nature, adorned with all beauteous perfection. As their beauty, so also their prerogatives are the greatest of any nation; neither so servilely submissive as the French, nor so jealously guarded as the Italian; but keeping so true a decorum that E., as it is termed the purgatory of servants and the hell of horses, so it is acknowledged the Paradise of women." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "We will permit our wives and daughters to go to the tavern with a friend, and suspect nothing to kiss coming and going. E. is a paradise for women and hell for horses." Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 312, says, "The ladies in E. as far excell all other countries in virtue as Venus doth all other women in beauty."

English fashions in dress. In Merch. i. 2, 79, Portia says of the young Eh. baron: "How oddly he is suited! I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany, and his behaviour everywhere." In T. Heywood's Lucrèce iii. 5, Valerius sings, after enumerating the fashions of many nations: "The Eman. is for them all, And for each fashion coasteth"; and again, after speaking of various kinds of cloth, "Oh, your Eman., he loves to deal in all things"; and again, "Of all felts that can be felt Give me your Eh. beaver." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 2, Lady Politick says, "What will the Italians say of me? The Eh. lady cannot dress herself." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forobosco says that the Man in the Moon is "An Eman. that stands there stark-naked, with a pair of shears in one hand and a great bundle of broadcloth in t'other, cutting out of new fashions." In Nash's Wilton H. 2, Jack says, "I being a youth of the Eh. cut ware my hair long, went apparelled in light colours, and imitated 4 or 5 sundry nations in my attire at once." In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor says, "Are not Italian heads, Spanish shoulders, Dutch bellies, and French legs the only notions of your reformed Eh. gentleman?" In Chapman's Bussy i. 1, Montsurry says that the Eh., when they travel, "Come home delivered of a fine French suit"; and Henri replies: "They much wrong their real worth In affectation of outlandish scum." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says of the Eh., "They hate a cut domestic, but imitate the French precisely gallants, wear their long Parisian breeches with 5 points at knees; then they have their doublets so short in the waist, they seem as 'twere begot upon their doublets by their cloaks." In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel says, "Other nations, especially the Eh., hold themselves no perfect gentlemen till frenchified." In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 1, the Neighbour says, "'Tis our Eh. manner to affect Strange things, and prize them at a greater rate Than home-made things of better consequence." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii. 1, the Widow says, "We have no other proof in use that we are Eh., if we do not zany them," i.e. the French. She has just ordered her ruff to be followed in the French fashion. In Trag. Richd. II iii. 2, 147, Woodstock exclaims, "Is 't possible that this fellow, that's all made of fashions, should be an Eman.?" Hall, in Satires iii. 1, 69, describes a fashionable man's dress: "A French head joined to neck Italian; Thy thighs from Germany and breast from Spain; An Eman. in none, a fool in all." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 106, says, "Be not like the Eman. which preferreth every strange fashion before the use of his country." Drayton, in Ep. to Reynolds (1627) 93, says, "The Eh. apes and very zanies be Of every thing that they do hear and see." In Mac. ii. 3, 16, the Porter says, "Here's an Eh. tailor come hither, for stealing out of a French hose." In Webster's Malfi iv. 2, amongst the madmen is "an Eh. tailor crazed i' the brain with the study of new fashions."

English love of eating, drinking, and smoking. In Mac. v. 3, 8, Macbeth exclaims, "Fly, false thanes, And mingle with the Eh. epicures." In R2 i. 3, 67, Bolingbroke says, "Lo, as at Eh. feasts, so I regret The daintiest last." In Fletcher's Pilgrim ii. 1, Alphonso says of the Porter, "He stinks of muscadell like an Eh. Christmas": Christmas being celebrated in E. with feasting and banqueting. Compare Jonson's Christmas, Nash's Summers, where Christmas is introduced ordering dainties for his festival, and Herrick's Cer. of Christmas in Hesperides. The staple of the feasts was "the old Eh. roast beef." In H5 iii. 7, 160, the Constable says of the Eh., "Give them great meals of beef and iron and steel, they will eat like wolves and fight like devils." In H6 A. i. 2, 9, Alençon says of the Eh., "They want their porridge and their fat bull-beeves; Either they must be dieted like mules And have their provender tied to their mouths Or piteous they will look, like drowned mice." In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Meager complains that he has had to "abstain flesh as if our Eh. beef Were all reserved for sacrifice." In Peele's Old Wives, p. 187, Sacrapant speaks of "A chine of Eh. beef, meat for a king and a king's followers." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 3, Carlo enumerates "the pith of an Eh. chine of beef" among the delicacies he has prepared for breakfast. In Stucley 842, Mackenner says, "These Eh. churls die if they lack their bed And bread and beer, porridge and powdered beef." In B. & F. Rule a Wife iii. 3, Cacafofo says he will "eat as I were in E., where the beef grows." In their Women Pleased iii. 2, Penurio can keep a secret if "wrapt up in beef, In good gross beef. The Eh. have that trick To keep intelligence." In their Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forobosco says, "Provide a great and spacious Eh. ox, And roast him whole with a pudding in his belly." In their Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo speaks of an Eh. cow as "a beast of quality." In Brome's Academy iv. 2, Galliard says, "You shall not Outface the French man with your great bull-beef And mustard Eh. looks." In Sampson's Vow v. 1, 132, Clifton says, "Give me the Eh. chine, and that feeds men, And they that feed well certainly will fight." Mead was originally the national drink; but beer came into common use, being introduced from Holland in the 16th cent., and the Eh. gained the reputation of being the hardest drinkers in the world. Boorde, in Dietary (1542), speaks of beer as a natural drink for Dutchmen, which "of late is much used in E. to the detriment of many Eh. men." In Cromwell ii. 2, Hodge says, "Would I could find my master Thomas in this Dutch town! He might put some Eh. beer into my belly." In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Petruccio says, "Such as eat store of beef may preserve their healths with that thin composition called small beer, as 'tis said they do in E." In B. & F. Beggars iii. 1, one of the Boors cries out, "Come, Eh. beer, hostess, Eh. beer by the barrel!" In Webster's Weakest i. 2. Bunch says, "Well fares E., where the poor man may have a pot of ale for a penny"; and in ii. 3, he rejoices the heart of Jacob by telling him, "There's a tun of Eh. stark beer, new come to Newkirk this day at 2 stivers a stoup." In Middleton's No Wit i. 3, Savourwit says, "He's a little steeped in Eh. beer." In B. & F. Pestle iv. 2, Pomponia says, "My father oft will tell me of a drink In E. found and nipitato called Which driveth all the sorrow from your hearts." Nash, Summers (Dodsley, viii. 60), says, "Never cup of nipitay in Lond. came near thy niggardly habitation." Nipitato was a kind of strong beer. In Oth. ii. 3, 78, Iago says that he learned his drinking song "in E., where indeed they are most potent in potting: your Dane, your German, and your swag-bellied Hollander are nothing to your Eman. He drinks you with facility your Dane dead-drunk; he sweats not to overthrow your Almain; he gives your Hollander a vomit ere the next pottle can be filled." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius, after enumerating all sorts of national drinks, sings, "The Eh. none of these can scape, But he with all makes merry." In B. & F. Beggars iv. 4, Higgen says the bowl must be "upsey-Eh., strong lusty Lond. beer." In their Pilgrim iii. 6, one of the Keepers says, "These Eh. are so malt-mad, there's no meddling with 'em." In their Captain iii. 2, Piso says of the Eh., "Not a leak at sea can suck more liquor. You shall have their children christened in mulled sack, and at 5 years old able to knock a Dane down." In their Malta ii. 1, Norandine says that Eh. cloth has "A twang of its own country that spoils all; A man shall ne'er be sober in it." In v. 1, he says, "Do they think to bind me to live chaste, sober, and temperately? They may as soon tie an Eman. to live so." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "Your Eh. outdrinks the Dutch. The Dutchman drinks his buttons off, the Eh. doublet and all away." In Lyly's Sapho iii. 2, Molus sings, "O! that's a roaring Eman. Who in deep healths does so excell From Dutch and French he bears the bell." In Dekker's Wonder i. 1, Nicoletto says, "I'll drink as hard yet as an Eman. And they are now best drinkers; they put down The Dutchmen clean." Tobacco-smoking, or the drinking of tobacco, as it was commonly called, was introduced into E. from America in the latter part of the 16th cent. and rapidly became popular, in spite of K. James's Counterblast. Baker, in Chron. Elizabeth 65, says, "Drake brings home with him Ralph Lane, who was the first that brought tobacco into E." Raleigh got his first tobacco from Lane, and his example had a good deal to do with making the practice of smoking fashionable. Harrison speaks of it as being "greatly taken up and used in E." in 1573. There are few comedies of Lond. life after 1585 that do not contain references to it. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift says, "It pleases the world (as I am her excellent tabacconist) to give me the style of Signior Whiffe." He professes to teach "the most gentlemanlike use of tobacco," including such varieties of smoking as "the Cuban ebullition, Euripus, and Whiff." In Noble Soldier ii. 1, Baltasar says the K. takes sin "as the Eh. snuff tobacco and scornfully blow the smoke in the eyes of heaven." In B. & F. Pestle i. 2, the Citizen's wife, coming on the stage among the young gallants, says, "Fie, this stinking tobacco kills me! Would there were none in E.!" Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "Germany hath not so many drunkards, E. tabacconists . . . as Italy alone hath jealous husbands." Poor adulterated tobacco was known as Eh. tobacco.

In B. & F. Wit Money iv. 5, Valentine says to Fountain and the rest that the taverns will allow them "but Eh. tobacco with half pipes."

The English Inns had a great reputation for comfort. Earle, in Microcos., says, "There is no place in the world where passengers may so freely command as in the Eh. inns, and are attended for themselves and their horses as well as if they were at home, and perhaps better." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 151, says, "The world affords not such inns as E. hath"; and proceeds to commend the service, the food, the music, and the reasonableness of the reckoning. "Lastly," he adds, "a man cannot more freely command at home in his own house than he may do in his inn." In H4 A. iii. 3, 94, Falstaff asks, "Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn?" The Eh. were fond of dancing, and had their own country dances, like the Roundel, the Trenchmore, the Morris, the Jig, and the Dump; but they also adopted from other nations dances like the Galliard, Lavolta, Pavin, etc. In B. & F. Princess i. 1, Riniero says that the people of Tidore "take as much delight in a baratto, a little scurvy boat, as the dancing Eh. in carrying a fair presence." In H5 iii. 5, 32, Bourbon says, "They [the Eh.] bid us to the Eh. dancing schools And teach lavoltas high and swift corantos." Fencing was also widely cultivated, and the combats on the stage were carried out with professional skill. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. iv. 1, Matheo says of Lodovico, "It's more rare to see him in a woman's company than for a Spaniard to go into E. and to challenge the Eh. fencers there." Swords and tilting staffs were made in E., though the former had not the same reputation as the Toledos. In Webster's White Devil v. 6, Flaminio inquires, "O, what blade is 't? a Toledo or an Eh. fox?" In B. & F. Friends i. 1, Marius says he has not spent his 5 years of travel "to bring home an Eh. tilting-staff." The Eh. are satirized for being fond of going to see strange monstrosities, such as were exhibited in fairs, etc. In Temp. ii. 2, 29, Trinculo says of Caliban, "Were I in E. now and had but this fish painted, not a holiday fool there but would give a piece of silver; when they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out 10 to see a dead Indian." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 2, the Clown advises Forobosco to go to E.: "you will never get so much [he says] as in E." In Merlin v. 2, 52, Edol says, "Take her hence And stake her carcase in the burning sun Till it be parched and dry, and then flay off Her wicked skin and stuff the pelt with straw To be shown up and down at Fairs and Markets; Two pence a piece to see so foul a monster Will be a fair monopoly and worth the begging." In Mayne's Match iii. 2, Timothy is "made up" as a sea-monster, and exhibited in Fish St., Lond.

English trade, manufactures, and commerce. The most important commercial product of E. was wool, which was manufactured into various kinds of cloth in the eastern counties, in Kendal, and in the W. country around Bath, and was exported in large quantities to the Continent. Lead and tin were mined in Cornwall, and coal in Newcastle. Eh. beer was also exported, especially to the Netherlands. In Merch. i. 3, 20, Shylock tells us that one of Antonio's ventures was "for E." In H6 C. i. 4, 123, York says to Margaret of Anjou, "Thy father bears the type of k. of Naples Yet not so wealthy as an Eh. yeoman." In Wealth 292, Remedy says, "Many other realms For our great wealth would dare not be bold To strive again E. or any right withhold." Trading establishments, known as Factories, were set up in the most important foreign ports. The Eh. House in Antwerp was the famous Hop van Lyere, granted to the Eh. merchants in 1558. In Cromwell ii. 3, one of the characters is "The governor of the Eh. Factory" in Antwerp. In Larum D. 3, the "Governor of the Eh. House" in Antwerp appears; in part v. 3, he says, "This is the sum Of all the wealth at this time may be found Within the Eh.-house." In Meas. i. 2, 34, the 1st gentleman says to Lucio, "I had as lief be a list of an Eh. kersey as be piled for a French velvet." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 2, Lodovico says of Candido, "Would it not be a good fit of mirth, to make a piece of Eh. cloth of him, and to stretch him on the tenters?" In Stucley 1874, the ship-master describes his lading as "packs of Eh. cloth." In B. & F. Malta ii. 1, Norandine says of Eh. cloth, "That's a good wear indeed." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 102, York says of Thomas of Woodstock, "Let others set in silk and gold (says he), A coat of Eh. frieze best pleaseth me." Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 17, speaks of the men of Cheshire as "Clad in warm Eh. cloth." Hentzner, in his Travels, says, "Everybody knows that Eh. cloth is much approved of for the goodness of the materials, and imported into all the kingdoms and provinces of Europe." Further details will be found under the names of the great Eh. trade-centres.

The chief coins circulating in E. during our period were the silver penny, deeply marked with a cross, so that it could be easily broken into halfpennies and farthings—hence comes the constantly recurring pun about bearing crosses; the groat and half-groat; the silver crown and half-crown, first coined by Edward VI; the testoon, or shilling, first coined by Henry VII; the gold noble, originally worth 6/8, but now raised to 10/-; the angel, worth 6/8; and the rial, or sovereign, named after Henry VIII, and half-rial, or half-sovereign. The mark was not a coin, but was a term used for money reckonings, and was of the value of 13/4. Foreign coins were also freely circulated, especially the French crown, the Dutch dollar, the portugio, and the Dutch doit (half a farthing). In Davenport's Nightcap i. 2, the Clown says, "If you dislike the penny, pray let me change it into Eh. half-pence." In Merch. ii. 7, 56, Morocco says, "They have in E. A coin that bears the image of an angel Stamped in gold." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 145, Alphonsus, referring to the million pounds said to have been paid by Richd., Earl of Cornwall, to the D. of Brunswick for the ransom of the Archbp. of Mentz, says, "The Eh. angels took their wings and fled." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 90, Arondel says, "A tun of high prized wines of France Is hardly worth a mark of Eh. money." In Ado ii. 3, 32, Benedick says that the woman he marries must be "noble or not I for an angel."

Natural products of England. The crocus, or saffron, was largely used both in medicine and cookery. It was prepared from the stigmas of Crocus Sativus. In B. & F. Prize i. 2, Livia says, "Selling (which is a sin unpardonable) Of counterfeit cods or musty Eh. crocus, Sooner finds me than that drawn fox Moroso." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 2, Lady Politick, wanting a poultice for Volpone, asks for "Some Eh. saffron, half a dram would serve." In W. T. iv. 2, 48, the Clown says, "I must have saffron to colour the warden pies." The bur is the prickly seed-vessel of the Burdock (Arctium Lappa) and of the Goose-grass (Gallium Aparine). In Day's Humour ii. 2, Octavio says, "I am like an Irish beggar and an Eh. burr, will stick close where I find a good nap." In As i. 3, 13, Rosalind says, "They are but burs, Cousin, thrown upon thee in holiday foolery; . . . our very petticoats will catch them." The Red Deer or Stag, the Fallow Deer, and the Roe Deer were all common in E. in Tudor times, though the first-named is now found only in Scotland and in the N. of E. In H6 A. iv. 2, 48, Talbot says, "If we be Eh. deer, be then in blood, Not rascal-like to fall down with a pinch." The Eh. breed of Mastiffs had a great reputation. In H5 iii. 7, 150, Rambures says, "That island of E. breeds very valiant creatures; their mastiffs are of unmatchable courage." In H6 A. i. 5, 25, Talbot says, "They called us for our fierceness Eh. dogs." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. ii. 1, Orlando, abusing Bellafront's father, calls him "an Eh. mastiff." In Webster's Malfi iv. 1, Bosola refers to "Eh. mastiffs that grow fierce with tying." In Massinger's Renegado i. 3, Francisco speaks of "Eh. mastiffs that increase their fierceness By being chained up." In Davenant's Favourite i. 1, Saladine says of Thorello, who has just returned to Italy from his travels, "He rides, and manages your Eh. mastiff, Sir." In Goosecap v., Momford says, "3 things there be that should your anger swage, An Eh. mastiff and a fine French page." In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel says the French "are lovers of short nags and Eh. mastives." In Chapman's Alphonsus v. 1, 475, Saxon says, "There let the Judas, on a Jewish gallows, Hang by the heels between 2 Eh. mastiffs." The Wolf was formerly plentiful in E.; Edgar tried to extirpate them by exacting an annual tribute of 300 skins from the kings of Wales, but it was not till the reign of Henry VII that the wolf became extinct S. of the Tweed. In Webster's White Devil iii. 2, Francisco refers to the "tribute of wolves paid in E." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 3, Sir Davy says to the catchpols, "Look to your prey, my true Eh. wolves." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, says, "An Eh. wolf, an Irish toad to see, Were as a chaste man nursed in Italy," i.e. there is no such thing.

Capital punishment was the penalty for many offences, and the gallows was a familiar object in the Eh. landscape. In Jerónimo (A. B. D., p. 470), the hero says to Balthasar, "Thou art full as tall as an Eh. gallows, upper beam and all." Gipsies wandered through the country, telling fortunes and stealing poultry. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says that his fellows are "no red-ochre rascals, umbered with soot and bacon, as the Eh. gipsies are, that sally out upon pullen, lie in ambuscade for a rope of onions" (see under EGYPTIANS). The religion of E. was Protestant, and the mass of the population were in hearty sympathy with the principles of the Reformation, and hated the Pope and the Jesuits with whole-hearted vigour. For proof, see under BABYLON and ROME. In B. & F. Chances iii. 1, Peter says, "The Pope's Bulls are broke loose too, and 'tis suspected They shall be baited in E." In their Pilgrim iv. 3, the Spanish parson addresses the Eh. madman as "Thou Eh. heretic!" In True Trag. iii. (Haz., p. 128), the Messenger says that Edward VI "brought the Eh. service first in use," i.e. the Book of Common Prayer.

English language, literature, and art. The language is called Eh., and sometimes "the King's Eh." In H5 v. 2, 103, the French Princess says, "I cannot speak your E."; and in 126 Henry says, "I am glad thou canst speak no better Eh." In 265 he begs her, "Break thy mind to me in broken Eh." In M. W. W. ii. 1, 142, the Page says of Nym, "Here's a fellow frights Eh. out of his wits." In ii. 3, 62, the Host says, "Mock-water, in our Eh. tongue, is valour." In iii. 1, 80, the Host says, "Let Caius and Evans keep their limbs whole and hack our Eh." In v. 5, 150, Falstaff says of Evans, "Have I lived to stand at the taunt of one that makes fritters of the Eh. tongue?"

In Merch. i. 2, 77, Portia swears that she has "a poor pennyworth in the Eh." In R2 i. 3, 160, the banished Mowbray complains, "The language I have learned these 40 years, My native Eh., now I must forego." In H4 A. iii. 1, 193, Mortimer laments, "My wife can speak no Eh." In Lupton's All for Money D 4, Sir Laurence Livingless, a Romish priest, says, "Had not they [St. Paul's Epistles] been, and the New Testament, in Eh., I had not lacked living." In Histrio ii., Gulch says of the prologue to the play, "Here's no new luxury or blandishment, But plenty of Old E.'s mother words." In Elements 24, the Messenger exhorts clerks to write "in our Englysshe tongue," because there are many, "As well of noble men as of mean estate, Which nothing but Englysshe can understand." He advises that Latin words should be translated into Eh., so that "All subtle science in Englysshe might be learned." In M. W. W. i. 4, 5, Quickly says, when Dr. Caius comes, "Here will be an old abusing of God's patience and the K.'s Eh." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 2, Frisco calls Delion "a clipper of the K.'s Eh." In Satiro iv. 3, 128, Tucca quotes Horace as saying of Sir Vaughan, "Thou clipst the K.'s Eh." The metaphor is taken from the clippers of the K.'s coin. Eh., or plain Eh., is used for the simple, straightforward meaning of anything. In M. W. W. i. 3, 54, Pistol says that Sir John "has translated Mrs. Ford's will out of honesty into Eh." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Littleworth says, "A man would think that creeping on one's knees Were Eh. to a lady." In B. & F. Prize iv. 3, Bianca says, "I speak good honest Eh. and good meaning." In Juggler 37, Dame Coy opines, "No tale can be told but that some Eh. may be picked thereof out." In Underwit v. 1, Courtwell says, "To love or to be loved is to be gulled; that's the plain Eh. of Cupid's Latin." In Wise Men vii. 2, Insatiato says, "This is a riddle, yet this Eh. I pick out of it, that you may have a husband." In Day's B. Beggar v., Strowd says, "It's an arrant lie, my lord, that's the plain Eh. of it." Nash, in Lenten (Harl. Misc., vol. ii, p. 316), says, "Many of you have read these stories, and could never pick out any such Eh." i.e. any such meaning. The verb "to Eh." means to translate into Eh. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker ii. 3, 77, Leodice says of her conduct, "Thus 'tis eh't.; I cannot be without his company."

Eh. players not infrequently visited Germany and France. In All's iv. 3, 298, Parolles says of Capt. Dumain, "He has led the drum before the Eh. tragedians." In the 16th cent. E. was really a musical nation; every man of education could sing his part at sight, and play the lute; and the names of Tye, Tallis, Gibbons, Morley, and many others stand high amongst those of the world's great composers. Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 151, says that in Eh. inns the traveller "shall be offered music, while he eats . . . and if he be solitary, the musicians will give him the good day with music in the morning." Milton, in Sonn. to Lawes, says that he "First taught our Eh. music how to span Words with just note and accent."

ENGLISH COLLEGE. An establishment for E. Romanists at Rome. In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 13, Ronca says, "Have at Rome! I see the Pope, his cardinals, and his mule, The E. C. and the Jesuits."

ENGLISH COLONY (used for VIRGINIA, q.v.). In Massinger's Madam iii. 3, Lacy says of the pretended Indians, "They have lived long In the E. c. and speak our language." In Eastward iii. 3, Seagull says of Virginia, "A whole country of E. is there, man; bred of those that were left there in '79. They have married with the Indians and make 'em bring forth as beautiful faces as any we have in England."

ENGLISH PALE. The dist. in Ireland over which E. control was established. It lay around Dublin, but its exact boundaries varied from time to time. The same name was given to the E. dist. round Calais. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1547) iii. 132, says, "Irland is divided in 2 parts, one is the Englysh p., and the other the wild Irysh." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Lancaster says, "The wild Oneyl with swarms of Irish kerns Lives uncontrolled within the E. p." In Stucley 934, Herbart speaks of a body of troops as "some company of the E. p." In Fair Women i. 106, Browne, speaking of Dublin, says that the people are "As civil in the E. p. as here." In S. Rowley's When You C. 3, the K. says, "Now in Ireland The Burkes rebel and makes hourly roads To burn the borders of the E. P." The reference is to the Irish rebellion of 1535.

ENIPEUS. One of the principal rivers of Thessaly, flowing from Mt. Othrys through the Pharsalian plain, into the Peneus. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5244, Io, describing the rivers of Thessaly, says, "Next poplar-shadowed E. glides." In Lyly's Woman in Moon iv. 1, Pandora invites Iphicles, "Meet me on Enepeus' sedgy banks." In Antonie ii. 610, Charmion says, "Frame there Pharsaly and discoloured streams Of deep E."

ENISPE. A town in Arcadia, mentioned by Homer in the Catalogue of the Greek ships. Its exact site is not known. In Shirley's Arcadia iii. 2, one of the Rebels says, "The new frisk we danced at E. to-day will serve rarely as the prologue."

ENNA. An ancient city in the centre of Sicily, 60 m. N.W. of Syracuse. 5 m. S. of the city was the lake and glade, with a grotto, supposed to lead down to the infernal regions, where Proserpina was carried off by Pluto. Milton, P. L. iv. 269, speaks of "that fair field of E., where Proserpin gathering flowers . . . by gloomy Dis Was gathered."

ENVIL. See ENFIELD.

ENYS. Identified by Pedler with the peninsula on which Pendennis Castle stands, on the W. side of the entrance to Falmouth Harbour. In Cornish M. P. i. 2592, Solomon gives to the Carpenter "An E. hag Arwennek," i.e. E. and Arwennek.

EPEIROS (EPIRUS). Dist. on W. coast of Greece between the Acro-Ceraunian Promontory and the Ambraciot Gulf. It now forms the S. part of Albania. It became a Roman Province, and Augustus founded its capital, Nicopolis, now Arta. At the break-up of the Greek Empire in A.D. 1204, Michael, of the house of Angeli, got possession of Durazzo and founded a strong principality in E., Aetolia, and Thessaly. The Elizabethans projected these Kings or Dukes of E. into the past; thus we find, in Machin's Dumb Knight i. 1, a D. of Epire appearing in the lists against the K. of Cyprus. In Massinger's Virgin i. 1, the "kings of Epire, Pontus, and Macedon" are taken prisoners by Diocletian. In his Emperor ii. 1, "Cleanthe, daughter to the k. of Epire," is one of the candidates for the hand of the Emperor Theodosius. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 126, the K. of E. comes to offer his services to Pompey at Dyrrachium. There was no such K. at this time. In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "History accuseth Nilo for selling of E." The reference appears to be to Milo (not Nilo), an officer of Perseus, K. of E., who after the battle of Pydna in 166 B.C. surrendered Bercæ to the Romans. In T. Heywood's Gold. Age i., Vesta commits the infant Jupiter to the care of "the K. of Epire's daughters." In Act II, "Jupiter and the Epyriens" conquer Lycaon. The commoner legend made Crete the home of the god's infancy. Milton, Son. to Vane 4, speaks of the time "when gowns, not arms, repelled the fierce Epirot and the African bold." Pyrrhus, K. of E., was a formidable enemy of the Romans 280-272 B.C. Burton, A. M. i. 2, 4, 7, says of the death of Prince Henry, "Scanderbeg's death was not so much lamented in E.;" for Scanderbeg, see s.v. ALBANIA. In Florio's Montaigne i. 1, he is called "Scanderbeg Prince of E." The scene of Massinger's Old Law and Shirley's Coronation is laid in E. Neither of these plays has any historical foundation.

EPHEREIAN (belonging to Ephyra, the old name of CORINTH, q.v.). In Mason's Mulleasses 1867, Timoclea says to Mulleasses, "Kings shall not come to Corinth where thou mayst, not with a common E. trull, Purchase a minute's pleasure; but with me. . . Spend years of sweet content."

EPHESUS (En. = Ephesian). A city near the W. coast of Asia Minor on the Cayster. It was famous for the great temple of Artemis (Diana), which was burnt down by Herostratus on the night of the birth of Alexander the Gt. and rebuilt with extraordinary magnificence. The inhabitants were notorious for their luxury, wealth, and devotion to the black arts. By the 15th cent. it had become a wretched village named Ayasaluk, and it so continues. Shakespeare makes E. the scene of the Comedy of Errors instead of the obscure Epidamnus, the scene of his original, the Menæchmi of Plautus. The supposed date is the 3rd cent. B.C. In i. 1, 17, the D. says, "If any born at E. be seen At any Syracusan marts and fairs; Again, if any Syracusian born Come to the bay of E., he dies": E. being an Ionian and Syracuse a Dorian city, this enmity is natural enough. In i. 2, 96, Antipholus of Syracuse says, "They say this town is full of cozenage, As, nimble jugglers that deceive the eye, Dark-working sorcerers that change the mind, Soul-killing witches that deform the body, Disguised cheaters, prating mountebanks." In Per., iii. 2 and 4 and v. 2 and 3 are laid at E., the last scene being in the temple of Diana, where Thais is High Priestess: the time is during the reign of Antiochus the Gt., in the early part of the 2nd cent. B.C. In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 1, Hannibal says, "Antiochus being already vanquished And fled to E." This was after the battle of Magnesia, 190 B.C. In Tiberius 2152, we are told that Germanicus went to Armenia by way of E. In Cartwright's Slave v. 1, Cratander says to Atossa, "The Ens. Shall know a goddess greater than their own, And you depose our magnified Diana." In Fisher's Fuinus iii. 3, Lantonus celebrates the praise of Diana, the goddess of the moon, and says, "Thou, fair Phœbus' sister [i.e. Diana], Nor Delian dames nor the En. towers Shall blazen more thy praise," i.e. neither Delos nor E., though famous seats of Diana's worship, shall praise her more than Britain. The burning of the temple is alluded to in B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, where the Uncle of Onos says, "He did enquire at E. for his age, But, the church-book being burnt with Dian's temple, He lost his aim." Jonson, in his Execration upon Vulcan, speaks of "your fireworks had at E." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. iv., the D. of Ferrara says, "Herostratus was so hated throughout E. they held it death to name him." In Davenport's Matilda iii. 2, John apostrophises the Q., "O ye cruel one, Crueller than the flame that turned to cinders The fair En. temple." Spenser, F. O. iv. 10, 30, speaks of "the famous temple of Diana Whose height all E. did oversee." In Jonson's Catiline i. 1, Catiline enumerates "En. pictures" among the articles of luxury bought by the Roman aristocrats. En. is used like Corinthian (q.v.), in the sense of a jolly boon companion. In M. W. W. iv. 5, 19, the Host calls to Falstaff, "Art thou there? It is thine Host, thine En., calls." In H4 B. ii. 2, 163, the Page describes Falstaff's companions as "Ens. of the old ch.," i.e. of the old heathen ch. before the founding of the Christian ch. there. In Middleton's Family i. 3, Mrs. Purge, a Puritan, says, "I cannot find that either plays or players were allowed in the prime ch. of E. by the elders." The allusion is to the primitive ch. of E. founded by St. Paul, who addressed the elders of E. at Miletus (Acts xx. 17). In Davenant's U. Lovers v. 4, Ascolm promises to set up a statue "in lasting gold, by old En. art designed." Probably he is thinking of Demetrius, the maker of silver shrines for Artemis (Acts xix. 24). In Gascoigne's Government ii. 1, Gnomaticus says, "St. Paul in the 6th chapter of his Epistle to the Ens. saith: Children, obey your parents in the Lord." In Juventus, p. 123, Good Counsel says, "St. Paul unto the Ens. giveth good exhortation, saying, Walk circumspectly, redeeming the time" (Eph. v. 15).

EPHRAIM. The 2nd son of Joseph, and the ancestor of the tribe of Ephraim, which was settled in the centre of Palestine and became the most powerful of the northern tribes, so that E. is often used for the name of the N. Kingdom. The Forest of E., where Absalom was killed, was East of the Jordan, near Mahanaim, but has not been definitely identified. In Peele's Bethsabe iii. 5, Joab says of Absalom, "This shady thicket of dark E. Shall ever lower on his cursed grave." Milton, S. A. 282, recalls "how ingrateful E. Had dealt with Jephtha." (see Judges xii. 1). In 988, Dalila predicts that she will be "Not less renowned than in Mt. E. Jael who . . . Smote Sisera sleeping." In Trans. Ps. lxxx. 9, he says, "In E.'s view and Benjamin's And in Manasseh's sight Awake thy strength."

EPIDAMIUM. The Ff. reading in Err. for the name of the birth-place of the twin brothers (i. 1, 42, etc.). No doubt Shakespeare wrote Epidamnus as W. W. does in his translation of the Menæchmi; but the name of the place was actually Epidamnus. The scene of the Menæchmi is laid there, but Shakespeare shifts it to Ephesus. It was a city on the coast of Illyricum on the Adriatic Sea. The Roman writers always call it Dyrhachium: it is now Durazzo.

EPIDAUROS. There were 3 ports of this name in ancient Greece, one abt. 100 m. N. of Epidamnus on the coast of Illyricum, now Ragusa Vecchio; a 2nd on the East coast of the Peloponnesus in Argolis; and a 3rd, E. Limera, on the east coast of Laconia. In the 2nd there was a famous temple of Asclepius or Æsculapius, and it was alleged that it produced a special breed of serpents, sacred to him, and endowed with extreme keenness of sight. In Jonson's Barthol. ii. 1, Overdo, in his disguise, says, "Fain would I meet the Linceus now, that eagle's eye, that piercing Epidaurian serpent, as my Quintus Horace calls him, that could discover a Justice of the Peace under this covering" (see Horace, Sat. i. 3, 27). In Randolph's Muses i. 4, Mime says, "We can spy forth The least of faults with eyes as sharp as eagles Or the Epidaurian serpent." Milton, P. L. ix. 507, says that Satan in the form of a serpent was lovelier than "the god in E." The Ff. in Err. i. 1, 95, read: "2 ships from far making amain to us, Of Corinth this, of E.

that." Most modern editors read "E," but it seems clear from v. 1, 349 that the right reading is Epidamnum; the Abbess says, "By men of Epidamnum he and I And the twin Dromio all were taken up."

EPIDAMNUS. See EPIROS.

EPPING. A mkt. town in Essex, at the N. extremity of Epping Forest, 16 m. N.-East of Lond. Londoners went out there for picnics, as they do still. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Holdfast declares that he is "Sir Gefferies son of E." In Nabbes' Bride iii. 1, Raven says, "I have a little country house near E.; Thither I would convey you." In Long Meg xiv., the story is told of Meg and some others going to make merry "at E. Mill."

EPSOM. In Surrey, 15 m. S.W. of Lond. Famous for its mineral springs containing magnesium sulphate, or E. salts. In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Sad speaks of people travelling to "the Es., Burbons, and the Spaws to cure those travelled diseases these Knights-errant have sought out for you," to wit, the venereal disease.

ERCOCO (now usually ARKKEKO). A port on the W. shore of the Red Sea, at the most N. point of Abyssinia. Milton, P. L. xi. 398, describes Adam viewing "The empire of Negus to his utmost port E.": Negus being the K. of Abyssinia.

EREBUS. A region of darkness supposed in the Greek mythology to lie between the earth and Hades. It is used vaguely by the Elizabethans for Hell. In Merch. v. 1, 87, Lorenzo says of the man that hath no music in himself: "The motions of his spirit are dull as night, And his affections dark as E." In H4 B. ii. 4, 171, Pistol says of Doll: "I'll see her damned first . . . With E. and tortures vile also." In J. C. ii. 1, 84, Brutus says of Conspiracy: "Not E. itself were dim enough To hide thee from prevention." In Marlowe, Tamb. A. v. 1, Zabina speaks of "A hell as hopeless and as full of fear As are the blasted banks of E." In Span. Trag. (A. B. D. iv., p. 507), the ghost prays, "Solicit Pluto, gentle Proserpine, To combat Acheron and E. In hell"—whatever that may mean! In B. & F. Thomas iv. 2, Launcelot, describing how he and his friends painted the town red, says, "Windows and signs we sent to E." In Barnes' Charter i. 5, Lucretia Borgia, about to murder her husband Gismond, appeals to "You grisly daughters of grim E. Which spit out vengeance from your viperous hairs," i.e. the Furies. In Milton's Comus 804, Comus says, "The wrath of Jove Speaks thunder and the chains of E. To some of Saturn's crew." In Peele's Alcazar ii., the presenter describes the shrieks of Abdilmunen's ghost as rousing "these nymphs of E.," i.e. the Furies. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, the 2nd Pyrgus, in true Pistol vein, exclaims, "Damned be thy guts unto K. Pluto's hell And princely E." In Lochrine i. 1, 244, Corineus says, "Wert thou as strong as mighty Hercules . . . Thou couldst not move the judge of E." Milton, P. L. ii. 883, describes the opening of the gates of Hell, "which on their hinges grate Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook Of E." Percy, in Cælia (1594) xix. 2, says, "Then quick, thou grisly man of E., Transport me hence unto Proserpina," i.e. Charon. The author of Zepheria (1594) v. 7, speaks of Passion "Christening the heavens and E. anew." In B. & F. Mad Lover i. 1, the Fool says, "The Iron Age [is] returned to E.": meaning that the war is over.

ERICINE (= Mt. Eryx in W. Sicily, 2 m. from the coast and 6 from Drepana; now MONTE S. GIULIANO). It rises, an isolated peak, from a low plain: on its summit was a temple to Venus, said to have been founded by Æneas; hence she is often called Venus Erycina. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 6209, Venus says to Cupid, "Here on the top of the Mount E. Ambush thyself, a place sacred to me." In his S. Age v., Juno says, "I met him [Jupiter] on the mtn. Erecine And took him for the young Hyppolitus." The context seems to require a mtn. in Bœotia, but I can find none of this name, unless it is a mistake for Mt. Helicon, on the borders of Bœotia and Attica. But in B. Age ii., Heywood seems to regard Eryx and E. as different; for Venus complains that Adonis has made her leave "Paphos, Gnidon, Eryx, Erecine, and Amathon." In Greene's Orlando iii. 3, 968, Orlando calls Venus "fair Erythea"; which seems to be a compound of Eryx and Thea (goddess). In his Orpharion (Wks. xx. 12), he describes Erycinus and the temple of Venus there. In B. & F. Woman Hater i. 1, the D. apostrophizes Venus as "Thou laughing Erecina." In Cowley's Riddle v., Aphron says, "Clariana Is pure and white as Erycina's doves." Marlowe, in Hero and Leander (Sest. II), says, "And them, like Mars and Erycine, display," alluding to the trick played by Vulcan on Mars and Venus.

ERIDANUS. The Greek name for the Padus or Po, the great river of N. Italy, q.v. In Nabbes' Hannibal v. 3, Hannibal, burned up by the poison he has taken, cries: "My heart! my heart! Quench it, E.! but it would dry Thy waters up." There is some appropriateness in making Hannibal speak of this river, which he had crossed when he invaded Italy.

ERLOND. See IRELAND.

ERUINES HILL. In Dodypoll iii. 4, Alberdure, in his mad fit, says to a peasant, "Thou art he that in the top of E. h. Danced with the moon and eat up all the stars." This hill probably existed only in the madman's imagination.

ERYMANTHUS. Range of mtns. on the N.W. boundary of Arcadia, in Greece. It was the haunt of the boar slain by Herakles. In Milton's Arcades 100, the song begins, "Nymphs and shepherds . . . Trip no more in twilight ranks, Though Erymanth your loss deplore." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, the mad Frederick cries, "Perhaps she [Diana] hunts to-day I' the woods of Merathon or E." According to another form of the legend, the forest haunted by the Boar was in Thessaly. So in T. Heywood's S. Age 132, the boar of "the Erymanthian forest Devasts the fertile plains of Thessaly." Barnes, in Parthenophil, Elegy xi. 7, asks: "Was it concluded . . . That underneath the Erymanthian Bear Beneath the Lycaonian axletree . . . should remain my fear?" Apparently he means the Gt. Bear; but he has probably mistaken the boar for a bear and then transferred him to the sky.

ERYTHREAN SEA (the RED SEA). The name is used by Herodotus: eruthros being Greek for red. Milton, in Ps. cxxxvi. 46, says, "The ruddy waves he cleft in twain Of the E. main."

ERYX. See ERICINE.

ESCURIAL. The famous monastery and palace of the Kings of Spain, built by Philip II in 1584 at the town of Escorial, 27 m. N.W. of Madrid. Its full title is El real Sitio de San Lorenzo el real del Escorial. It is a vast building of grey granite in the form of a rectangular parallelogram. The ground plan is in the shape of a gridiron, in memory of the martyrdom of St. Lawrence. In Noble Soldier iv. 2, the K. speaks of "our rich E." This would seem to indicate that the K. of Spain intended is Philip

II; though the story is quite imaginary. Hall, in Satires v. 2, 37, calls it "The vain bubble of Iberian pride That over-croweth all the world beside: Which, reared to raise the crazy monarch's fame, Strives for a court and for a college name." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "In the king's palace in E. the air is most temperate." Donne, Anatomy of World: Funeral Elegy (1611), says that no tomb would be worthy of his mistress, "Though every inch were 10 Es."

ESHTAOL. A town in the tribe of Dan, now Eshua. It lies 13 m. due W. of Jerusalem, close to Zorah, in a fertile basin. In Milton's S. A. 181, the chorus say to Samson, "We come, thy friends and neighbours not unknown, From E. and Zora's fruitful vale."

ESQUILINE. The largest of the 7 hills of Rome, lying on the East side of the city, S. of the Viminal. In Nash's Summers, Christmas says, "The Romans dedicated a temple to Ill Fortune in Esquilus, a mtn. of Rome." This was the Ara Ma^{la} Fortunæ mentioned by Cicero, De Nat. Deorum iii. 25. Its exact site has not been determined. In Fisher's Fuimus v. 1, Hylacus says to Cæsar, "Throw Palatine on Æsquiline, on both Heap Aventine, to raise one pyramid For a chair of estate; but shun the Senate-house." The E. was the plebeian quarter of Rome, and was regarded as a kind of slum area. The burial-place for slaves and malefactors was just outside the E. Gate or Porta Esquilina, and rubbish of all sorts was flung out there. Spenser, in Ruines of Rome iv., pictures Rome as lying on her back under her 7 hills, and says, "On her left hand [lay] the noisome E." In Histrion iii., Chrisogonus calls the plays of the time "Such rotten stuffs, More fit to fill the paunch of E. Than feed the hearing of judicious ears." In Tiberius 2661, Tiberius says, "Post, post away some to the Capitoll, Some to port E., mt. Pallatine." Hall, in Satires iv. 1, 58, says that Crispus murdered his guest, "And in thy dung-cart didst the carcass shrine, And deep entomb it in Port-e." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 9, 32, says that the back-door of the house of Temperance out of which the rubbish and offal of the kitchen were thrown "cleped was Port E." Cf. Hor. Ep. xvii. 58, and v. 100. Hence Port E. is used for the outlet of the bowel. In B. & F. Thomas iii. 1, Hylas asks the physicians, if a man has indigestion "Are we therefore to open the port vein [i.e. the Vena Porta] Or the port e.?" In their Prophetess iii. 1, when a suitor asks Geta, the ignorant Ædile, for piles, he answers: "Remove me those piles to Port E., Fitter the place, my friend."

ESSEX. A county on the East coast of England, N. of the estuary of the Thames. It gave their title to the Earls of E. The people were mostly engaged in agricultural pursuits, and their Lond. neighbours were never tired of laughing at their rusticity of manners and their alleged slowness of intelligence: they were nicknamed E. calves, also known, like the Cotswold sheep, as E. lions. E. cheese was well known and highly esteemed. The E. men, like their Kentish neighbours, were not indisposed to rebellion against the Government, and took an active part in Jack Straw's rising in 1381. The Earl of E. who appears in K. J. was Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Chief Justice of England, who died in 1213. In Trouble. Reign (Haz., p. 233), John says to him, "E., thou shalt be ruler of my realm." In H6 C. i. 1, 156, Northumberland says to Warwick, "'Tis not thy S. power Of E., Norfolk, Suffolk, nor of Kent, Can set the D. up in despite of me." The county gave his title to Walter Devereux, who was created Earl of E. in 1572. His son Robert succeeded to the title in 1576. He was the prime favourite of Elizabeth for many years, but was executed for high treason in 1601. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 1, Byron says, "The matchless Earl of E. . . . Had one horse likewise that the very hour He suffered death . . . died in his pasture." In v. 1, Byron says, "The Q. of England Told me that if the wilful Earl of E. Had used submission, and but asked her mercy, She would have given it, past resumption." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Mammon tells the disguised Doll that she is no longer to learn physic and surgery "for the constable's wife Of some odd hundred in E.; but come forth And taste the air of palaces." Nash, in Prognostication, says, "If the parson of Hornchurch in E. take not heed, there may hap to prove this year some cuckolds in his parish." Hornchurch is a vill. 19 m. S. of Chelmsford; the point of the joke is the perennial Elizabethan jest on the Horn, the symbol of a cuckold. In Killigrew's Parson iii. 5, Jolly asks the Capt., "Have you no friends in the close committee?" To which he replies: "Yes, yes, I'm an E. man," i.e. a simpleton, and therefore have many like me on the committee. In Middleton's Michaelmas i. 1, Cockstone says, "One Mr. Easy has good land in E.; He is yet fresh and wants the city powdering." Easy is made a butt for the jokes of the city men. In ii. 3, Quomodo says, "We shall have some E. logs yet to keep Christmas with": meaning that they will make money out of the E. clodpole. In Goosecap i. 1, Bullaker says of Sir Gyles, the fool of the play, "His chief house is in E." In Vox Borealis (1641), it is said of Sir J. Suckling, the Governor of Berwick, and his followers: "Away they did creep Like so many sheep, And he like an E. calf-a." In Eastward i. 2, Quicksilver says, "These women are like E. calves, you must wriggle 'em on by the tail still, or they will never drive orderly." In Dekker's Northward i. 3, Philip says, "The E. man loves a calf." In Alimony v. 5, Medler says, "You would wish that his puny baker-legs had more E.-growth in them," i.e. more calf. In Haughton's Englishmen i. 1, Frisco speaks of the paint dropping from a lady's face "like a piece of dry E. cheese toasted at the fire." In Elinor Rummyng v., we read of "a cantle of E. cheese full of maggots quick." Taylor, in Poems iii. 26 says, "I saw a rat upon an E. cheese." In Piers B. v. 93, Invidia says, "I wolde be gladder, bi God, that Gybbe had meschaunce, Than though I had this woke ywonne a weye of E. cheese." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Carrack speaks of the diet of sailors as "fulsome butter, E. cheese, dried stockfish." E. men took part in Jack Straw's rebellion in 1381. In Jack Straw i., Hob Carter says, "I have brought a company of E. men for my train." In Trag. Richd. II i. 3, 235, Cheney says, "The men of Kent and E. do rebel"; and in ii. 2, 186, Woodstock (Gloucester) says, "I'll to Plashy, brothers; If ye ride through E., call and see me." Plashy is in E. According to Old Meg, p. 1, E.-men were famous "for the Hey," i.e. a kind of country dance.

ESSEX HOUSE. A palace on the site of the Outer Temple, Lond., on the S. side of the Strand, at its East end, where E. St. and Devereux St. are now. Originally the town h. of the Bps. of Exeter, it passed successively through the hands of Lord Paget, the Earl of Leicester, and the Earl of E. It is the "stately place wherein doth lodge a noble peer, great England's glory and the world's wide wonder," of Spenser's Prothalamion. The last bit of the old h. disappeared in 1777. Swetnam was "Printed for Richard Meighen and are to be sold at his shops at St. Clements Ch. over-against E. H., and at Westminster Hall. 1620."

ESTOTILAND. The part of N. America between Baffin's Bay and Hudson's Bay. Milton, P. L. x. 686, points out that but for the inclination of the axis of the earth the heat of the sun "had forbid the snow From cold E."

ETHAM. A rock in which Samson took refuge from the Philistines. It has been probably identified with Beit Atab, near Zorah, abt. 10 m. S.W. of Jerusalem, where there is a cavern suitable for Samson's purpose. See Judges xv. 8. In Milton's S. A. 253, Samson describes how he was retired "Safe to the rock of E."

ETHIOPIA, or ÆTHIOPIA (Æ. = Æthiopia, Ep. = Ethiop, Ee. = Ethiope). Is used vaguely for the whole of Africa S. of Egypt and the Sahara desert. Heylyn divides it into Æ. Superior, which is practically Nubia and Abyssinia, and Æ. Inferior, which stretched from the Red Sea to the Atlantic and from the S. of Abyssinia to the Cape of Good Hope. Æ. Superior was under the sway of a series of monarchs, all called Prester John, and included 70 minor kingdoms. The point that most impressed the Elizabethans was the blackness of the Ens.' skins; and, as Elizabeth was a blond, to have a dark complexion and hair was regarded as a blemish in a woman, and to call one an Ep. was a distinct insult. In Locrine ii., prol. 7, Ate says, "When Perseus married fair Andromeda . . . Lo, proud Phineus with a band of men, Contrived of sunburnt ÆEns., By force of arms the bride he took from him." Andromeda was the daughter of Cepheus, K. of Æ.; and Phineus, his brother, tried to prevent her marriage to Perseus, but was turned to stone by the Gorgon's head. Ate is therefore inaccurate. In iv. 1, 31, Corineus boasts, "If all the coal-black ÆEns. Should dare to enter this our little world Soon should they rue." Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxvii. 15, says, "I mention Babel to my friends, Philistia full of scorn, And Tyre, with Ep.'s utmost ends; Lo, this man there was born." E. is one of the characters in Darius. In Hester (A. P. ii. 285), a proclamation is headed, "We Assuerus k. and high regent From India to En. plain." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Techelles says he has marched to Zanzibar, "where I viewed the En. Sea," i.e. the sea off the East coast of Africa. In Shirley's Pleasure iii. 1, Scent thinks it would be cooler to travel "through E." than to move amongst ladies. In Chapman's Blind Beggar, "Black Porus, the En. k." is one of the enemies of Ptolemy. The name was probably suggested by that of the Indian K. who was defeated by Alexander the Gt., but there is nothing historical in Chapman's play. Milton, P. L. iv. 282, uses "Ep. line" for the Equator; and says that Mt. Amara is "under the Ep. line." It is really about half way between the tropic of Cancer and the Equator. In Two Gent. ii. 6, 26, Proteus says, "Silvia Shows Julia but a swarthy Ee." In Ado v. 4, 38, Claudio will hold his mind to marry Leonato's niece "were she an Ee." In L. L. L. iv. 3, 118, Dumain apostrophizes his lady: "Thou for whom Jove would swear Juno but an Ee. were"; and in iv. 3, 268, the K., chaffing Biron about his dark lady, Rosalind, says, "Since her time . . . Ees. of their sweet complexion crack." In M. N. D. iii. 2, 257, Lysander cries to Hermia, "Away, you Ee.!" Bacon, in Sylva iv. 399, says, "The heat of the sun maketh men black in some countries, as in Æ. and Guiney." In Per. ii. 2, 20, Thaisa describes the device of the knight of Sparta as "a black Ee. reaching at the sun." In Rom. i. 5, 48, Romeo says of Juliet: "She hangs upon the cheek of night Like a rich jewel in an Ee.'s ear." The whiteness by contrast of the teeth of black folk is referred to in W. T. iv. 4, 375, "This hand as white as . . . En.'s tooth." In As iv. 3, 35, Rosalind speaks of Phebe's letter as "Ee. words, blacker in their effect Than in their countenance." In Abington iv. 1, Philip says, "The sky that was so fair 3 hours ago Is in 3 hours become an Ep." The proverb that it is lost labour to try to wash an Ee. white is often referred to; doubtless with an allusion to Jeremiah xiii. 23, "Can the En. change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" In Marston's Malcontent iv. 3, Jacomo complains, "I washed an Ee. who, for recompense, Sullied my name." In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Petruccio says, "I sweat for 't, so I did; but to no end: I washed an Ep." In Webster's White Devil v. 3, Zanche says of the 100,000 crowns she promises to Lodovico, "It is a dowry, Methinks, should make the sunburnt proverb false And wash the Ep. white": Zanche herself being a Moor. In Glapthorne's Privilege iv. 1, Trivulci says, "An Ep. cannot be washed white." In his Lady Mother i. 3, Bonville says, "There's that within renders her as foul as the deformed'st Ee." In v. 2, Thorowgood says, "I question thy wit that dares to hang this matchless diamond in the ear of Ee. Death." In Mariam v. 1, Herod speaks of "Æn. dowdy." In Day's Law Tricks v. 1, Horatio exclaims, "Midnight, thou Ee., Empress of black souls!" In Brome's Moor iii. 1, Quicksands asks, "Is not an Ee.'s face his [i.e. God's] workmanship, As well as the fairest ladie's?" Chaucer, C. T. I. 353, says of St. Jerome, "His flesh was blak as an Ethiopien for heete." Jonson, in Darkness, on the authority of Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 3, tells us that "The Æps. never dream." In Marston's Malcontent ii. 4, Maquerelle mentions "En. dates" among the ingredients of her cordial. In Nabbes' Bride v. 7, one of the treasures in Horten's museum is "the horn of an Æn. rhinoceros." In M. W. W. ii. 3, 28, the Host jocularly addresses Caius, "Is he dead, my Æn.?"

ETHIOPIAN OCEAN. Originally the part of the Indian Ocean washing the eastern shore of Africa, but transferred about the beginning of the 17th cent. to the S. Atlantic on the W. side of Africa. Milton apparently uses it in the former sense when, in P. L. ii. 641, he describes a fleet coming from Bengala or Ternata and Tidore, "Through the wide E. to the Cape." Heylyn, however (s.v. ÆTHIOPIA INFERIOR), says that "it hath on the East the Red Sea, on the W. the Æthiopian O."

ETON. A town in Bucks. on the left bank of the Thames, just opposite to Windsor. The famous college was founded by Henry VI in 1440. In M. W. W. iv. 4, 75, Page plans that "in that time shall Mr. Slender steal My Nan away and marry her at E." In iv. 5, 68, Bardolph complains that "so soon as I came beyond E." one of the Germans who had hired the Host's horses threw him off into a slough of mire. In iv. 6, 24, Fenton informs the Host of Page's plan that Nan is "to slip away with Slender and with him at E. Immediately to marry." In v. 5, 194, Slender says, "I came yonder at E. to marry Mrs. Anne Page, and she's a great lubberly boy." In Jonson's Gipsies, "Long Meg of Eaton" is one of the "good wenches of Windsor" who came in to dance. In Middleton's Chaste Maid iv. 1, Allwit says that Sir Walter has one son "Can make a verse and now's at E. College." Drayton, in Polyolb xv. 319, after speaking of Windsor, says, "Eaton is at hand to nurse that learned brood, To keep the Muses still near to this princely flood." Nicholas Udall was head master of E. from 1534 to 1541: in 1538 the E. boys acted before Thomas Cromwell, and the custom of performing both Latin and English plays was well established before 1560.

ETRURIA. Dist. on W. coast of Italy, N. of Latium: the modern Tuscany. The spelling Hettruria is often found, but is incorrect. Catiline fixed the headquarters of his forces at Fæsulæ in E., in 63 B.C., and he was defeated and killed early in the next year at Pistoria. Jonson, in Catiline iv. 2, makes Cicero say, "Their camp's in Italy, pitched in the jaws Here of Hettruria." In May's Agrippina iv. 335, Petronius speaks of the good old times when "Fabritius . . . in earthen pots Drunk small En. wine." Milton, P. L. i. 303, speaks of "Vallombrosa, where the En. shades High over-arched embower."

EUBIDES. The islands off the W. coast of Scotland, now called the Hebrides. Pliny, Nat. Hist. iv. 30, calls them the Hebudes, and says that they were 30 in number. Drayton, Polyolb. B. ix., speaks of "the scattered E." as being in the Albanian seas, near the Arrans.

EUBŒA. The largest island in the Ægean Sea, lying off the coasts of Attica, Bœotia, and Thessaly. From the latter it was separated by the Eubœic Sea. Like the neighbouring Bœotians, the inhabitants had the reputation of bucolic stupidity. In Marmion's Antiquary v., Bravo relates how Hercules seized Lychas by the heels and "shot him 3 furlongs length into the Euboick Sea." Milton, P. L. ii. 546, tells how Alcides threw Lichas from the top of Æta "Into the Euboic Sea." Lodge, in his Answer to Gosson, p. 8, says, "It is reported that the sheep of Eubœia want their gall. Men hope that Scholars should have wit, brought up in the University, but your sweet self, with the cattle of Eubœia, since you left your College, have lost your learning." The channel between E. and the mainland was called the Euripus, and was famous for its rapid and variable currents. In Selimus 2375, the Q. of Amasia, when summoned by Selim to yield, says, "First shall the overflowing Euripus Of swift E. stop his restless course." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 7, 54, calls Hippomenes, who won Atalanta by defeating her in a foot-race, "The En. young man." He really came from Onchestos, a city of Bœotia on the mainland adjoining E. In his Virgil's Gnat 586, he says of the Greeks returning from the siege of Troy: "Some on the rocks of Caphareus are thrown, Some on th' Euboick cliffs in pieces rent."

EUPHRATES. A river in Asia rising near Diadin and flowing in a S.E. direction to the Persian Gulf. Its total length is 1600 m. According to the Bible account, it had its source in the Garden of Eden. Babylon stood upon its banks. In A. & C. i. 2, 105, the Messenger says, "Labienus Hath with his Parthian force extended [i.e. taken possession of] Asia From E." The accent is on the 1st syllable, as it usually is in the 16th cent. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, Rodamant speaks of "that wealthy Paradise From whence floweth Gyhon and swift E." Constable, in Diana (1594) vii. 8, 5, says of Paradise: "This on the banks of E. did stand." In Nero iv. 4, Nimphidius says, "If we have any war, it's beyond Rhine and E.," which were practically the W. and Eastern boundaries of the Roman Empire at that time. In B. & F. Lover's Prog. iv. 4, Lisander exclaims, "Can all the winds of mischief from all quarters, E., Ganges, Tigris, Volga, Po, Paying at once their tribute to this ocean Make it swell higher?" In Greene's Orlando iv. 2, Orlando says, "Else would I set my mouth to Tygres streams And drink up overflowing E." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 4, Cæsar says of the flame of his ambition: "Nor E. nor sweet Tyber's stream Can quench or slack this fervent boiling heat." In Cyrus, D. 3, Dinon says, "Now are we at the banks of E.": the word is often used in this play, and always with the accent on the 1st syllable. In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar says, "Henceforth Tiber shall salute the seas, More, famed than Tiger or fair E." Milton, P. L. i. 419, makes "the bordering flood Of old E." the N. limit of the worship of Baalim and Ashtaroth. In P. L. xii. 114, Michael, who is in Eden, speaks of Abraham before his call as "on this side E. still residing," i.e. in Ur of the Chaldees. In P. R. iii. 272, the Tempter points out to our Lord the countries "As far as Indus east, E. west." In 384 he predicts that our Lord, if he will worship him, shall reign "From Egypt to E. and beyond." Milton always accents E. on the 2nd syllable. In Wilson's Pedler 1440, the Pedler speaks of "a tale of the Prophecy of Jeremy when God bad hide by the river E." (see Jeremiah xiii. 4).

EURIPUS. The channel between Eubœa (q.v.) and the mainland, on the East coast of Greece. It is remarkable for its rapid and frequently changing current. Hence it became the name for a gentlemanlike way of smoking tobacco, by holding it for some time in the lungs and then emitting it. In Locrine iv. 4, Humber says, "What Euphrates, what light-foot E., May now allay the fury of that heat Which, raging in my entrails, eats me up?" In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius says, "Why died I not in those Emathian plains Where great Domitius fell by Cæsar's hand, And swift E. down his bloody stream Bare shields and helms and trains of slaughtered men?" The reference is to the battle of Pharsalia, where Domitius Calvinus was slain. Pharsalia is 35 m. from the E., so that there is considerable poetic licence in the phrase. Possibly E. is a misprint for Enipeus, the river which flows past Pharsalia. Burton, A. M. iii. 4, 1, 1, says, "I will show you a sea full of shelves and rocks, sands, gulfs, euripes, and contrary tides." In Jonson's Hymenæi, Opinion says of the troubles of the married: "E. that . . . ebbs and flows 7 times in every day Toils not more turbulent or fierce than they." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Puntarvolo speaks of "the practice of the Cuban ebullition, E., and Whiff" in the smoking of tobacco.

EUROPE (Ea. = Europa, Ean. = European). The Western quarter of the Old World, from the Urals to the Atlantic. The name is due to the Greeks: they connected it with the legend of the abduction of Ea., the daughter of Agenor, or Phœnix, by Zeus, who took the form of a bull in order to effect his purpose. In Ado v. 4, 45, Claudio says to Benedict, "We'll tip thy horns with gold And all Ea. shall rejoice at thee As once Ea. did at lusty Jove." In M. W. W. v. 5, 3, Falstaff says, "Remember, Jove, thou wast a bull for thy Ea." In Temp. ii. 1, 124, Sebastian blames the K. "That would not bless our E. with thy daughter, But rather lose her to an African." In W. T. ii. 2, 3, Paulina says of Hermione: "No court in E. is too good for thee." In H4 A. iii. 3, 52, Falstaff says to Bardolph, "The sack thou hast drunk me would have bought me lights as good cheap at the dearest chandler's in E." In H4 B. ii. 2, 146, Falstaff signs himself, "Sir John with all E." In iv. 3, 24, he speaks of himself as "simply the most active fellow in E." In H5 ii. 4, 133, Exeter tells the Dauphin, "He'll make your Paris Louvre shake for it, Were it the mistress-court of mighty E." In iii. 7, 5, the Constable says of the horse of Orleans, "It is the best horse of E." In H6 A. i. 1, 156, Bedford says that the bloody deeds of his soldiers "shall make all E. quake." In H6 C. ii. 1, 71, Edward speaks of Clifford as "The flower of E. for his chivalry." In Cym. ii. 3, 149, Imogen protests she would not have lost her bracelet "for a revenue of any king's in E." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Sogliardo expresses his opinion that Shift is "the tallest man living within the walls of E." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes boasts that he will "make fair E., mounted on her bull, Alight, and wear a woeful mourning weed." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, Marsilius speaks of "Tanais, whose swift-declining floods Invirons rich Ea. to the N." In Good Wife v. 3, Arthur says, "The wealth of E. could not hire her tongue To be offensive." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur says, "To-day all E. rings with Arthur's praise." In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Bertoldo speaks of "England, The Empress of the Ean. isles." In his Madam iii. 3, Luke says to the supposed Indians, "You are learned Eans. and we worse Than ignorant Americans." In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 25, Medina speaks of the straits of Gibraltar which divide Africa "from our Christian E." Milton, P. L. x. 310, tells how Xerxes, "over Hellespont Bridging his way, E. with Asia joined." In Son. to Fairfax i., he addresses him: "Fairfax, whose name in arms through E. rings." In Son. to Skinner 12, he speaks of his work in defence of liberty: "my noble task, Of which all E. rings from side to side." Davies, in Nosce, says that the sun makes "the Ean. white." In Hymns of Astræa (1599) viii. 1, he apostrophizes "E. the earth's sweet Paradise!" In Mason's Mulleasses 667, Borgias says, "Should there depend all E. and the states Christened thereon, I'd sink them all," i.e. all Christendom.

EUROTAS (now the BASILIS-POTAMO). The only river of any size in Laconia. It rises on the borders of Arcadia, and flows S.-East into the Laconian Gulf, after a course of abt. 45 m. Sparta lay on its right bank, 25 m. from its mouth. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 4, 133, Pompey says, "But as the Spartans say the Paphian q., The flood E. passing, laid aside Her glass, her ceston, and her amorous graces, And in Lycurgus' favour armed her beauties With shield and javelin: so may Fortune now." The legend is taken from Plutarch, De Fortuna Romanorum 4. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 3, 31, compares Belphebe to "Diana by the sandy shore Of swift E." Artemis (Diana) was specially honoured in Arcadia and Sparta. Milton, Ode on Death of Fair Infant 25, speaks of "Young Hyacinth born on E. strand, Young Hyacinth the pride of Spartan land." He was the son of Amyclas of Laconia, and was accidentally killed by Apollo on the banks of the E. Davies, in Orchestra (1594) 71, says that Castor and Pollux "taught the Spartans dancing on the sands Of swift E."

EUXINE (the Greek name for the BLACK SEA). It was originally called Axeinos, or inhospitable, from the dangers which its navigation presented, but the name was changed to Euxeinos, or hospitable—either euphemistically, as the Greeks called the Furies the Eumenidæ, or gentle goddesses, or because by fuller acquaintance with it the sea lost its terrors. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Ortygius crowns Cosroe "Chief Lord of all the wide, vast E. sea." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Monsieur exclaims, "Not so the surges of the E. sea Swell, being enraged . . . As Fortune swings about the restless state Of virtue." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 12, 44, speaks of "The wondred Argo which in venturous peace First through the E. seas bore all the flower of Greece." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar boasts, "I displayed The Eagle on the Euxin Sea." The reference is to Cæsar's campaign against Pharnaces 47 B.C. In Fisher's Fuinis ii. 7, the Ghost of Camillus reminds Cæsar that "This nation led the Gauls In triumph thorough Greece to fix their tents Beside Euxinus' gulf." The reference is to the Gallic incursions of Brennus in 279 B.C., when, after being repulsed from Delphi, numbers of the Gauls settled near Byzantium. In Kyd's Cornelia iv., Cæsar enumerates amongst his conquests "The earth that the E. Sea Makes sometimes marsh." See also BLACK SEA.

EVENUS (the modern FIDHARO). R. of Ætolia, rising in Mt. Æta and flowing to the Gulf of Corinth. It was proverbial for the violence of its current. Here Hercules slew the centaur Nessus, who attacked him as he was carrying Deianeira over the stream. In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Nessus says, "This is E. flood, A dangerous current full of whirlpools deep And yet unsounded."

EXCELLENCE (Hrs) HEAD. A tavern in Hyde Park, Lond., more properly named the Maurice H., from the famous Prince Maurice of Orange, who died in 1625. In Shirley's Hyde Park iv. 3, Mrs. Carol asks, "Is the wine good?" and the milk-maid answers: "It comes from H. E. H."

EXCHANGE (C. = Change). The first E. in Lond. was in the st. running S. from the W. end of Cheapside, which still retains the name of Old Change. It was established for the receipt of bullion, the changing of foreign coin, and the distribution of new coinage. Later a 2nd E. was established in Lombard St. In 1566 Sir Thomas Gresham laid the 1st stone of a new E. in Cornhill, which was completed in the following year. It was a four-storied building with a bell-tower; the piazzas round it were supported by marble pillars, and were allocated to small shops, 100 in number. They were chiefly taken up by milliners, but all sorts of goods likely to attract fashionable ladies were sold there. In 1570 Elizabeth paid a state visit to the building and caused it to be proclaimed "The Royal E." Samuel Rolle says of it: "Was it not the great storehouse whence the nobility and gentry of England were furnished with most of those costly things wherewith they did adorn either their closets or themselves? Here, if anywhere, might a man have seen the glory of the world in a moment." Sidney, in Remedy for Love, calls it "Cornhill's Square E." It was destroyed by fire in 1838. It was rebuilt and opened by Q. Victoria in 1844. Another E. was built on the site of Durham House on the S. side of the Strand, where Coutts' Bank now stands, and opened by James I in 1609. He gave it the title of "Britain's Burse," but it is commonly spoken of as the New E. The upper story was occupied by milliners' shops, and it gradually came to rival The Royal or Old E. as a fashionable resort for ladies. The Exeter C. on the site of the old Exeter House on the N. side of the Strand was not built till the reign of William and Mary.

1. The Exchange as a place of business. In the Three Ladies (Haz., vi. 364), Diligence testifies that "Usury was seen at the E. very lately." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 1, Kately sends word to Lucar: "He shall ha' the grograns, at the rate I told him, And I will meet him on the E. anon." In iii. 2, he speaks of himself as "Lost i' my fame for ever, talk for th' E." In B. & F. Pestle, Ind., the Citizen speaks of a play entitled "The Life and Death of Sir Thomas Gresham, with the building of the Royal E." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 2, Laurentia bids Harvey "Go to th' E.; crave gold as you intend." In Mayne's Match i. 3, Warehouse asks his nephew, who is choosing his profession, "Which place prefer you? the Temple or E.?" i.e. Law or Commerce. In Field's Weathercock i. 2, Pouts says to Abraham, "Sirrah, I'll beat you with a pudding on the C." In Dekker's Hornbook vi., he says, "The Theater is your poet's Royal E., upon which their Muses (that are now turned to Merchants) meeting, barter away that light commodity of words for a lighter ware than words, Plaudities." Scene I of Good Wife takes place "upon the E." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 565, Staines says, "I dined this day in the E. amongst the merchants." In Tomkis' Albumazar iv. 2, Cricca says to Antonio, "The E. hath given you lost, And all your friends worn mourning 3 months past." S. R., in Letting of Humours Blood (1611) Sati., says, "Sometimes into the Reall E. he'll drop . . . And there his tongue runs byass on affairs, No talk but of commodities and wares." In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Trifle says, "I have writ to a merchant and I know it will be published on the E." In his Favourite iv., Thorello says, "After ev'ry raging storm Merchants and mariners flock to th' E. To hear what mischief's done at sea." The building of the E. by Gresham is the subject of the later part of T. Heywood's J. K. M. B. "It is," says a Lord, "the goodliest thing that I have seen; England affords none such." The Q. says, "Proclaim this place to be no longer called the Burse, but be it for ever called the Royal E." In Middleton's Five Gallants iv. 7, Mrs. Newcut says, "Upon 12 of the clock, and not the cloth laid yet! Must we needs keep E. time still?" Mrs. Newcut wants to be a fine lady now that her husband has made money. The meaning of the passage is explained by what Harrison says in his Description of England (1587): "The nobility, gentry, and students do ordinarily go to dinner at 11 before noon. The Merchants dine seldom before 12 at noon." E. time being from 11 to 12, the merchants could not dine before 12. In Middleton's Black Book (1604), p. 28, the devil says, "Being upon E. time, I crowded myself among merchants." In Marmion's Leaguer i. 5, Agurtes says, "Some design is now on foot and this is my E. time." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 2, Kitley asks, "What's o'clock?" and Cash replies: "E. time, Sir." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Featherstone defines Exchange time as "12 at noon." In Webster's Law Case i. 1, Leonora complains, "The E. bell makes us dine so late."

2. The Exchange as a place for shopping and a fashionable resort. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 1, Longfield says of Spendall the Mercer, who is badgering him to buy: "This fellow has an excellent tongue; sure he was brought up in the E." In Mayne's Match iii. 2, Plotwell speaks of "One Mrs. Holland, the great seamstress on the E." Jonson, in Underwoods ix., says, "Oh, what strange Variety of silks were on the E." In Penn. Parl. 36, it is predicted that "Sempsters in the E. shall become so conscionable that a man without offence may buy a falling band for 12 pence." In Shirley's Fair One iv. 2, Violetta says, "I want some trifles, the E. will furnish me." In Shirley's Hyde Park i. 2, Mrs. Carol begs Fairfield to heap insults on her: "The more the merrier, I'll take 't as kindly As if thou hadst given me the E."; and in iii. 2, she says to him, "Would I had art enough to draw your picture; It would show rarely at the E." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon i. 1, Chartley says, "I'll unto the E. to buy her some pretty novelty"; and in iii. 2, he says, "There are brave things to be bought in the City; Cheapside and the E. afford variety and rarity." In Jonson's Epicoene i. 1, Clerimont says of La-Foole: "He has a lodging in the Strand . . . to watch when ladies are gone to the china-houses or the E., that he may meet them there by chance, and give them presents, some 200 or 300 pounds worth of toys." In iv. 2, Lady Haughty tells Epicoene that when she is married she shall "go with us to Bedlam, to the china-houses, and to the E." In the Alchemist iv. 2, Subtle promises Dame Pliant that she shall have "6 mares To hurry her through Lond., to the E., Bethlem, the china-houses." In Barthol. i. 1, Littlewit, praising his wife's habit, says, "I challenge all Cheapside to show such another; Moorfields, Pimlico Path, or the E." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 1, Trimalchio announces, "I am to meet the Countess at th' E. within the hour." In Gamester iv., Mrs. Wilding says to Leonora, "You are sad still, Leonora; Remove these thoughts; come, I'll wait on you now To the E.: some toys may there strike off Their sad remembrance." In Shirley's Riches iii., Gettings swears "By our Royal C. which yields gentle ware." In Chaunticleers viii., when the tinker and the ballad-seller have persuaded Gum to hold their wares for them, he says, "Now do I look like one of the pillars of the E." on which goods were hung for display. In Killigrew's Parson iv. 7, Jolly says, "When the ribands and points come from the E., pray see the fiddlers have some." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Lady says, "Will you go with me, Nephew, to the E. I am to buy there some toys for the country." The subject of one of Heywood's plays is The Fair Maid of the E. In Nabbes' Totenham ii. 6, Franke promises Cicely, "The E. shall be thy wardrobe to supply Thy will with choice of dressings." In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 2, Lorece promises Vandona, "You shall go to the E. when you will, and have as much money as you please, to lay out." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Brisk talks of "an Italian cut-work band I wore, cost me 3 pounds in the E." There was a portico called the Dutch Walk. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iii. 1, the Widow makes an appointment to meet Randall "on the C. in the Dutch Walk." Scoloker, in preface to Daiphantus (1604), says, "His lineaments may be as Royal as the E. with ascending steps, promising new but costly devices and fashions." The women in charge of the shops seem to have been of doubtful reputation. In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 1, Oldcraft boasts that in his youth he could give "a true certificate Of all the maidenheads extant: how many lay 'Mongst chambermaids, how many 'mongst E. wenches, Though never many there, I must confess, They have a trick to utter ware so fast." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Mary speaks contemptuously of "E. wenches, Coming from eating pudding-pies on Sunday At Pimlico or Islington." In Greene's Quip (Harl. Misc., vol. II, p. 246), Clothbreeches defends them in comparison with the Frenchwomen: "Our English women of the E. are both better workwomen and will afford a better pennyworth." In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Mrs. Artless says of her daughter: "Ere I would make her a lady, she should be a New E. wench." In Dekker's Westward i. 2, Mrs. Honeysuckle talks of a girl being "as stale as an E. sempster or a court laundress."

3. The Exchange as a haunt of thieves and bad characters. In Awdley's Fraternity of Vagabonds, it is said of the Cheater or Fingerer: "Their trade is to walk in such places where as gentlemen and other worshipfull Citizens do resort, as at Paul's or at Christ's Hospital, and sometime at the Royal E." In Greene's Thieves Falling Out, Stephen says, "The gentleman Foist must, as the cat, watch for the mouse, and walk Paul's, Westminster, the E., and such common haunted places."

4. The Old and New Exchanges distinguished. In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Luke complains of being sent to buy things for the ladies "from the Old E." In iii. 1, Shavem says, "I know not what a coach is To hurry me to the Burse or old E.": the Burse being the new E. In B. & F. Wit S. W. v. 1, Gregory says of his promised wife: "I'll not change her for both the Es., New or the Old." In Davenant's Wits iv., Thwack promises, "You shall, if my projections thrive, Stable your horses in the New E. And graze them in the Old." In Barclay's Lost Lady iii. 1, Phillida, forgetting that she is a Thessalian of ancient times, says, "If they be divulged, we shall be defamed on the Es." In Webster's Law Case i. 1, Contardino says that the women "have a kind of E. among them too. Marry, unless it be to hear of news, I take it theirs is, like the New Burse, thinly furnished with tires and new fashions." I suspect "thinly" is wrong: it should be "mainly" or "finely" or something of the kind. Lust's Dominion was "to be sold by Robert Pollard at the sign of the Ben Jonson's Head on the back-side of the Old-E." Killigrew's Parson was "Printed by J. M. for Henry Herringman and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the Blew Anchor in the Lower Walk of the New E. 1663." In Brome's Antipodes i. 6, the Dr. says that foreign travel is not near so difficult as for some man in debt and unprotected to walk "from Charing Cross to th' Old E." Donne, Elegy

xv. (1609), asks, "Whether the Britain Burse did fill apace And likely were to give the E. disgrace." In Brome's Academy, the subtitle of which is The New Exchange, a school for courtly manners, dancing, and other elegant accomplishments is conducted at the New
E. In ii. 1, a letter is brought in, addressed to "Mrs.
Hannah Camelion at her shop or house in or near the New E." In Jonson's Magnetic iv. 6, Compass says,
"Stay you with us at his ch. Behind the Old E.," i.e.
St. Bartholomew's, E., q.v.

5. Local References. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv.
2, Moll, being surprised with Randall by the watch at the corner of Gracechurch St. and Cornhill, says to him, "Go you back through Cornhill; I'll run round about the C., by the ch. corner, down Cateaton St., and meet you at Bartholomew Lane End." In News Barthol. Fair, in the list of taverns we find "the Ship at the E." The Spanish Tragedy (1602) was printed by "T. Pavier at the sign of the Cat and Parrots near the E." Romeo and Juliet was "Printed by Thomas Creede for Cuthbert Busby and are to be sold at his shop near the E. 1599."
See also BURSE, BRITAIN'S BURSE.

EXCHEQUER. The department of State concerned with the collection and administration of the royal revenues in England. It was controlled from the time of Henry III by the Chancellor of the E., as permanent deputy of the Chancellor, and had its local habitation at Westminster. In Webster's Wyat viii., the Sheriff says to Homes, "Here is a hundred marks; Come to the E., you shall have the rest."

EXECUTION DOCK. On the left bank of the Thames, just below Wapping New Stairs. Here pirates were hanged. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 2, Bubble says to Staines, "O Master, have the grace of Wapping before your eyes, remember a high tide; give not your friends cause to wear their handkerchiefs." Taylor, in his Descriptions of Tyburn, says, "There's a kind of waterish Tree at Wapping Whereas sea-thieves or Pirates are caught napping." See also WAPPING.

EXETER. The county town of Devonsh., on the left bank of the Exe, 164 m. from Lond. It is on the site of the Roman Isca Dunoviorum. On the N. side of the city are the ruins of the old castle called Rougemont, which was dismantled during the Civil War. The cathedral was founded in 1049, and is remarkable for its richly decorated W. front. In R3 iv. 2, 106, Richard says, "When last I was at E. The Mayor in courtesy showed me the castle And called it Rougemont." In R2 ii. 1, 281, Northumberland enumerates among the adherents of Hereford "Rainold Lord Cobham, That late broke from the Duke of E." The real name of the runaway, as we learn from Holinshed, was Thomas (son of Richard, Earl of Arundel), and the D. of E. in question was John Holland, the son of Joan, the fair maid of Kent, and her 1st husband, Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent.

She afterwards became the wife of the Black Prince and mother of Richd. II, who was consequently the D. of E.'s half-brother. The D. of E. who appears in H5 and H6 was Thomas Beaufort, 3rd son of John of Gaunt, so called from his birthplace, the castle of Beaufort in Anjou. He was Lord Chancellor under Henry IV, who created him Earl of Dorset. In 1416 Henry V made him D. of E. In H5 ii. 2, 39, Henry commands: "Uncle of E., enlarge the man Committed yesterday"; and in
iii. 3, 51, he is ordered to "go and enter Harfleur;
there remain." But, in defiance of this, he is represented in later scenes as present at Agincourt, which he was not. In iii. 6, 6, Fluellen says, "The Duke of E. is as valiant as Agamemnon; and a man that I honour with my soul and my heart and my duty and my life and my living and my uttermost power." And in line 95, he tells the K. that "The D. of E. has very gallantly maintained the bridge." In v. 2, 83, he is made one of the commissioners to draw up the treaty with the French K.
He died in 1426, and therefore was not, as represented in H6 A. iii. 1, at the coronation of Henry VI in 1431.
The D. of E. in H6 C. was Henry Holland, created D. in 1443. He was faithful to the Lancastrian cause, and was wounded badly at Barnet. After the battle of Towton, in H6 C. ii. 5, 137, he urges the K. to flee, who replies: "Nay, take me with thee, good sweet E." He is with K. Henry when he is taken prisoner in iv. 8. He was kept in custody by Edward IV for a while, and was ultimately found dead in the sea between Dover and Calais in 1446; how he came there no one knows. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 135, the Keeper speaks of the "D. of E. found dead And naked, floating up and down the sea, 'Twixt Calice and our coast." The Marquise of E. is now in the elder branch of the Cecil family.
Thomas Cecil, eldest son of the famous Lord Burghley, was created Earl of E. 1605. The title was raised to Marquess in 1801. In R3 iv. 4, 503, "The haughty prelate, Bp. of E.," brother of Sir Edward Courtney, is reported as being in arms against Richd. This was Peter Courtney, who was the cousin, not the brother, of Sir
Edward. The Lond. house of the Bps. of E. was called
E. House, and lay on the S. side of the Strand on the site of Essex St. It passed at the Reformation into the hands of Lord Paget; then to the Earl of Leicester; and finally to the Earl of Essex, from whom it was called Essex House. It must not be confounded with the E. House on the N. side of the Strand, called after the 1st Earl of E., which was on the site of Burleigh St. and E. St., and was pulled down in 1676. In T. Heywood's Fortune iii.
4, 2 pirates are charged that they "have of late spoiled a ship of E." In Ford's Warbeck iv. 5, Astley says to the supporters of Warbeck, "E. is appointed for the rendezvous." In v. 1, Dalyell reports: "All the Cornish
At E. were by the citizens repulsed." This was in 1499.
There is evidence that plays were performed in E. by the members of the Trade Guilds as early as 1332. There was a regular playhouse there in the reign of Henry VIII.

EXETER COLLEGE, OXFORD. Founded by Walter de Stapledon, Bp. of E., in 1314. It stands on the East side of Turl St., above Lincoln and opposite to Jesus.
John Ford appears to have been entered at E. in 1601.

EZION GEBER. An ancient city in the S. of Edom at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood, in the disguise of a university scholar, says to Grace, "I'll read the dialect of the Alanits or E. G. which the people use 5 leagues beyond the sun-rising." It is hardly necessary to say that the gentleman is talking through his hat.

FAENZA (the ancient FAVENTIA). A city in N. Italy, 19 m. S.W. of Ravenna and 170 m. N. of Rome. F. surrendered to Caesar Borgia in 1501. In Barnes' Charter iii. 1, Astor asks, "What availeth it When, our State lost, the Faventines compounded That I should hold both life and liberty?" In iv. 5, Caraffa speaks of Astor and his brother as "Phaenza's hope."

FÆSULÆ. An important city of Etruria, on a hill 1000 ft. above the valley of the Arno, 3 m. N.E. of Florence; (now FIESOLE). Sulla made it a Colonia and settled a number of his veterans there; and it was chosen by Manlius as the headquarters of his army in the Catilinarian conspiracy, 63 B.C. In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline says, "Manlius at F. is by this time up With the old needy troops that followed Sylla"; v. 1 is laid in "Etruria, the country near F." Milton, P. L. i. 289, compares Satan's shield to the moon, "whose orb Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views At evening, from the top of Fesole." The reference is to Galileo, who spent the latter part of his life in or near Florence. Milton visited him in 1638-9, when he was a prisoner in the Inquisition.

FAITH'S (SAINT). A ch. in the crypt of old St. Paul's Cathedral, Lond., under the choir. Stow says that it served for the stationers and others dwelling in Paul's Churchyard, Paternoster Row, and the places near adjoining. It dates from the middle of the 13th cent. and was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iv. 3, the servant reports that Master Hammond is to be married "at St. F. Ch. under Paul's." In B. & F. Pestle v. 1, Humphrey, having lost his mistress Luce, says, "In the dark I'll wear out my shoe-soles In passion in St. F. Ch. under Paul's": where it is to be noted that "Paul's" rhymes with "soles." In S. Rowley's When You D. 2, the Cobbler says, "Though I sit as low as St. F., I can look as high as Paules."

FALCON. A booksellers' sign in London. (1) It was the sign of what is now No. 32 Fleet St. on the S. side. The name is retained in F. Court. A doubtful tradition asserts that Wynkyn de Worde printed at the sign of the F. The 1st edition of Gorboduc was "Imprinted at Lond. in Flete strete at the sign of the Faucon by William Griffith"; the same imprint is found in Harman's Caveat 1567, and Pickering's Horestes was printed there the same year. It was here that John Murray started his publishing business. (2) There was another F. in the Strand. Cockayne's Obstinate was "Printed by W. Godbid for Isaac Pridmore and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the F. beyond the New Exchange in the Strand. 1657."

FALCON. A tavern sign. There was a F. Tavern on the Bankside a little E. of Blackfriars Bdge., which is said to have been frequented by Shakespeare and the other playwrights of his time. Epps' cocoa factory now occupies its site. There was also a F. Inn in Stratford, just opposite New Place. Shakespeare's crest was "A falcon, his wings displayed argent, standing on a wreath of his colours, supporting a spear of gold steeled."

FALERNUM. The Falernus Ager was in N. Campania, in Italy, on the N. bank of the Volturnus. 'It was celebrated for the excellence of its wine. Nash, in Lenten (p. 304), speaks of "one right cup of that ancient wine of F." Milton, P. R. iv. 117, mentions "Their wines of Setia, Cales, and Falerne." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality promises Physander, "Shalt' drink no wine

But what Falernus or Calabrian Aulon Yield from their grapes." In Lælia iii. 1, 46, Stragalcus says, "Quin ego vini Falerni cantharum putem dulciorem." In May's Agrippina ii. 206, Crispinus says, "Let's . . . drown our cares in rich Falernian wine As ancient as Opimius' consulship." Opimius was consul 121 B.C., and that year was famous for the excellence of its vintage.

FALMOUTH. A spt. in Cornwall at the mouth of the Fal, 269 m. W. of Lond. It has a magnificent harbour, but until the reign of James I it was a mere fishing village. Jane of Navarre, the 2nd wife of Henry IV, landed here when she came over to marry the K. About 1613 Sir John Killigrew obtained the K.'s permission to build a new quay, and laid the foundation of the future prosperity of the town. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iii. 5, Bess says, "There's a prize Brought into F. road, a good tight vessel." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 162, calls it Flamouth, and says, "In her quiet bay a hundred ships may ride Yet not the tallest must be of the tall'st described."

FAMAGOSTA. The chief town of Cyprus, on the E. coast, some 5 m. from the site of the old capital Salamis. It was taken by the Turks after a long siege in 1571. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 2, Shadow says, "I am out of my wits to see our F. fools turn half a shop of wares into a suit of gay apparel." The scene of Ford's Lover's Melan. is laid at "F. in Cyprus," some time during the Persian period before the conquests of Alexander the Gt. Dekker, in Strange Horse-race (1613), describes Niggard as having in his pocket, to victual him for his voyage, "2 dried cobs of a red herring, reserved by a fishmonger at the siege of F." In Mason's Mulleasses 445, Eunuchus says, "I was a freeborn Christian's son in Cyprus When Famagusta by the Turk was sacked."

FANCHURCH. See FENCHURCH ST.

FANGRINGOSSE. Possibly Fangcross, a vill. in E. Riding, Yorks., is intended. In Wilson's Pedler 249, the Pedler offers for sale "as fine Jenuper as any is in F. wood."

FARARA. See FERRARA.

FARNHAM. There are several Farnhams in England, but the one intended in the passage following is perhaps F. Genevieve, a vill. in Suffolk, about 14 m. S.W. of Harling, where Strowd lived, or it may be a misprint for Barnham, which lies 6 miles to the West of Harling, on the Little Ouse, just over the border of Suffolk. In Day's B. Beggar ii., Sir Robert says to Strowd, "Strowd, Strowd, you think to have the land at Farnam."

FARNFIELD. Vill. in Notts., abt. 15 m. N. of Nottingham. In Downfall Huntington iii. 2, Robin says, "The nuns of F. . . . Gave napkins, shirts, and bands to him and me."

FARO. Apparently a misprint for FANO, a town about the centre of the E. coast of Italy. The names of the places mentioned in the following text (Ascoli, Foligno, Ancona, Sarnegaglia, Pesaro, Recanati) are all in that neighbourhood, and there is no Faro in those parts. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "Faro, for handsome women most extolled."

FARRINGTON. Two of the 26 wards of the City of Lond. are F. Within and F. Without. Originally they were 1 ward, which covered roughly the dist. between Holborn and Cheapside on the N., and the Thames on the S. from Friday St. to Temple Bar. The ward took its name from one W. Farindon, who bought the Aldermanry in 1281. The division was made in 1391, the boundary between the 2 wards being the Fleet Ditch, now covered by F. St. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellemont says, "Your conscionable greybeard of F. Within will keep himself to the ruins of one cast waiting woman an age."

FATIGAR. One of the kingdoms in N.E. Africa, subject to the Emperor of Abyssinia. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, the Emperor of both the Ethiopias is described as "also emperor of Goa, Carrares, F., etc." See under ADEA.

FAUBOURG. The suburb of a city, applied specially to certain suburbs of Paris, now included within the city, but formerly outside the walls. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner, in his comments on Paris, says, "I will pass into your fauxbourgs by Pont Rouge."

FAVENTINES. See FAENZA.

FAYAL. One of the Azores islands. Its capital, Horta, is the best port in the islands, and has a considerable trade in wines and fruit. The islands were colonized by the Portuguese early in the 15th cent., and, like the rest of the Portuguese dominions, were in the hands of Spain from 1580 to 1640; all were then returned to Portugal. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. ii., 2 and 4 are laid at F., which has been taken by the English from the Spaniards. In iii. 3, Capt. Goodlack brings word: "The general is in health, and F. won from the Spaniards." The Azores were the theatre of a large amount of naval warfare between England and Spain in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth. In The Earl of Essex' Ghost (1624), Essex says, "In the year 1597, my Spanish voyage towards the Terceras was intended for F. to assail the Adelantado there, and thither I shaped my course." The Terceras is another name for the Azores.

FEATHERS. A tavern in Lond., in Fleet St., near Shoe Lane. The sign was doubtless the Prince of Wales' F. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his catalogue of taverns, mentions the F. as the one to which the ladies hie: "To the F. ladies, you."

FEKENEL (i.e. Flock on the salt-water river). It is on the W. side of Falmouth Harbour, abt. 5 m. N. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. iii. 93, Pilate gives to the Gaoler, "F. ol yn tyen," i.e. "F. all entirely."

FENCHURCH STREET (originally FANCHURCH St.). Lond., running from the corner of Aldgate and Leadenhall St. to Gracechurch St., which it enters almost opposite to Lombard St. The name is derived from the fenny character of the ground, caused by the Langborne, which flowed through it. The church was St. Gabriel Fen Ch., which stood in the middle of the st.: it was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and never rebuilt. Other churches in the st. were St. Dionis Backchurch on the N. side, and St. Benet's Gracechurch at the S. side of the corner of F. and Gracechurch Sts. These have both been removed of late years. Famous taverns in the st. were the King's Head, the Mitre, and the Elephant. Ironmongers' Hall is on the N. side. In Good Wife iii. 3, Amminadab asks, "How many parsons are there?" And Ripkin answers: "The Parson of F., the Parson of Pancras." In Haughton's Englishmen iv. 1, Delion asks, "Wat be name dis st., and wish be de way to Croshe-friars?" Heigham answers: "Marry, this is F.-st., and the best way to Crutched-Friars is to follow your nose." To which Delion answers: "Vanshe st. ! How shance me come to Vanshe st.?" The 2nd title of T. Heywood's Fair Maid of the Exchange is "the pleasant humours of the Cripple of Fanchurch."

FENS, THE. The low-lying, marshy dists. in Lincs., Cambridgesh., and the neighbouring counties in the E. of England. In Brome's Sparagus iii. 3, Sam says, "The island of 2 acres here, more profitable than twice 10,000 in the Fens, till the drainers have done them." A great enterprise for the draining of the fens was undertaken in 1634 by the D. of Bedford, but it was not at first successful.

FERMO. The old Firmum Picenum, a city 4 m. from the Adriatic in Italy, 110 m. N.E. of Rome. In Barnes' Charter iv. 5, Guicchiardine, as chorus, tells how Cæsar Borgia betrayed "the Prince of F. at Sinigaglia." This was in 1499.

FERRARA. A city in N. Italy, 4 m. S. of the Po, 53 m. S.W. of Venice, and abt. 200 m. N. of Rome. It contains an ancient castle, the seat of its dukes, a cathedral dedicated to S. Paolo, and a university in which is preserved the tomb of Ariosto. The room is still to be seen in the hospital of Santa-Anna in which Tasso was confined for over 7 years. The Casa Guarini was the residence of the author of Il Pastor Fido. F. originally formed part of the Papal States, but was granted by the Pope to Borso, the head of the Este family, in 1450. In 1597 it was reclaimed by Clement VIII, but in the interval it was in the hands of the Estes. The court, during the 16th cent., was one of the most cultured and artistic in Italy. F. was known to Chaucer, who in C. T. E. 51, traces the course of the Po "to Emaleward, to Ferrare and Venyse." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio calls it "Civil F., Ariosto's town." In Gascoigne's Supposes iv. 6, Litio asks, "Have you not often heard of the falsehood of F.?" In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, Lucretia recalls how "the Marquess Mantoua Did in F. feast my lord and me." In T. Heywood's Maid of West B. iii., the chorus relates how Spencer, being shipwrecked, "Upon a chest gets hold and safe arrives I th' Marquis of Farara's country." In H8 iii. 2, 323, Surrey brings as a charge against Wolsey: "You sent a large commission To Gregory de Cassado to conclude Without the K.'s will or the state's allowance A league between his Highness and F." Wolsey's object was to get the help of F. in opposing the policy of the Emperor in 1527; the D. was Alphonso I. Wolsey's agent in Rome was Gregory de Cassalis: Shakespeare follows the mistake of Hall and Holinshed in calling him Cassado. The most famous of the Dukes of F. was Ercole or Hercules II, who reigned 1534 to 1559. The scene of Gascoigne's Supposes is laid in F. during the time of the "County Hercules." He also figures in Marston's Parasitaster (though there is nothing historical in the story) and is the Dux Ferrariæ mentioned in Lælia i. 4, 91. The hero of Shirley's Opportunity is a D. of F., who is a suitor for the hand of the Duchess of Urbino. In Mason's Mulleasses, a D. of F. joins the D. of Venice in an imaginary expedition against Florence. In B. & F. Custom iii. 2, Zabulon says that Hippolyta is the sister of "F.'s royal duke." In Jonson's Cynthia i. 1, Amorphus assures the company that the wine he offers them is derived authentically "from the D. of F.'s bottles." This is only one of the allusions to foreign courts and countries by which Amorphus tries to prove himself a much-travelled man. The scenes of Middleton's Phœnix, Shirley's Love's Cruelty and Imposture, and Nabbes' Unfortunate Mother are laid at F.

FESCENNIIUM. A small vill. in ancient Etruria, near Falerii, abt. 30 m. due N. of Rome. It is only remembered through the name "Fescennine verses," which was applied to extempore effusions sung at weddings and other rustic festivals, and marked by extreme licentiousness of language. They were supposed to have originated at F., though the authority for this is not very strong. Jonson, in Underwoods 243, says, "We dare not ask our wish in language Fescennine." In Cartwright's Ordinary v. 4, Rimewell says, "Mr. Hearsay told us that Mr. Meanwell was new married, and thought it good that we should gratify him and show ourselves to him in a Fescennine."

FESOLE. See FÆSULÆ.

FESSE. See FEZ.

FETTER LANE. Lond., running S. from Holborn into Fleet St., which it enters about half way between Ludgate Circus and Temple Bar. The town hostel of the Bps. of Norwich was here. It was originally Faiteres-L., or Faitur L., and according to Stow was so called from the Fawters, or idle people, lying there. It is called Viter L. in the 13th cent. It was the most Westerly st. consumed in the Gt. Fire. Jonson and Dryden both lived for a time in F.L.; and so did Lemuel Gulliver, who tells of a long lease he had "of the Black Bull in F.L." At No. 32 was the Moravian Meeting House, where John Wesley held the first Watchnight service in England. In the 17th cent. it would appear to have been a haunt of pawnbrokers. In Barry's Ram iii. 4, Throate says, "Beard, take thou these books, go both to the brokers in F.-L., lay them in pawn for a velvet jerkin and a double ruff." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 1, Fungoso says, "40 shillings more I can borrow on my gown in F. L."

FEVERSHAM. A town in Kent on a creek of the E. Swale, 47 m. E. of Lond. and 8 m. W. of Canterbury. The abbey was founded by Stephen, and he and his Q. were buried there. It was surrendered to Henry VIII in 1538, and granted by him to Sir Thomas Cheyney. In Fam. Vict. i. 1, Henry says to his companions after the robbery, "Now, whither shall we go?" And they reply: "Why, my Lord, you know our old hostess at F." To which he responds, "Our hostess at F., blood! what shall we there? We have a thousand pound about us, and we shall go to a petty ale-house?" The scene of Feverham is mostly laid there; and in i. 1, Franklin informs Arden: "The D. of Somerset Hath freely given to thee and to thy heirs All the lands of the Abbey of F." The hero of W. Rowley's Shoemaker is Crispine, the son of a British prince, who has apprenticed himself to a shoemaker at F. The story is fully told in Deloney's Craft i. 5. The name is now usually spelt Faversham.

FEWS. A Barony in Co. Armagh, some m. N. of Dundalk, which belonged to the O'Neils. It contains the Few mountains. In Stucley 892, O'Neale, at Dundalk, says, "Come, go back into the Fewes again"; and in 911, the Lieutenant speaks of "the North Gate [of Dundalk] that opens toward the Fewes."

FEZ, or FESSE. One of the most important cities in Morocco, with which it was incorporated in 1548. It lies 197 m. N.E. of Morocco and 85 m. from the Mediterranean. It was founded by Edris in 793, and soon became the greatest seat of learning in W. Africa. It had a university, a magnificent library, and 700 mosques. Its fine palace is said to have been built by Christian slaves. It has a large trade, and until quite recently had a monopoly of the manufacture of the Turkish national headdress, which takes its name from the city. The peculiar red dye used for the f. is obtained from a berry which grows there. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. iii. 1, the Kings of F., Morocco, and Barbary are found amongst the supporters of Bajazeth against Tamburlaine. After his victory over them Tamburlaine makes his friend Techelles K. of F. In Stucley 1424, Hotalla, the Portuguese ambassador, informs Philip of Spain, "Lately from the K. of F., Muly Mahomet, to my royal master Hath ambassage been sent to crave his aid Against Mullucco, brother to that K." Sebastian of Portugal went to Mahomet's assistance, but was killed in the battle of Alcasar in 1578. In Peele's Alcasar i., the Moor says, "Our enemies have encamped themselves not far From F." In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. v. 1, we are introduced to Mullisheg, "the amorous k. of F.," who falls in love with Bess, but magnanimously bestows her on her old lover, Spencer. In Lust's Dominion v. 1, the Q.-mother says, "Your deceased K. made war In Barbary, Won Tunis, conquered F., and, hand to hand, Slew great Abdela, K. of F." The deceased K. is apparently Philip I, but the story is imaginary, save for the general fact that in the early 15th cent. there was constant war between Spain and Morocco. In T. Heywood's Captives i. 1, when Mildeu wants to sell some young girls, Sarleboys asks, "What say you to Morocho, F., Algiers?" i.e. as markets for them. In Milton's P. L. xi. 403, Adam is shown in vision "The kingdoms of Almansor, F., and Sus." Almansor was Caliph of Bagdad 754-775. His dominion extended over N. Africa.

FICKETT'S FIELD. A piece of ground abt. 10 acres in extent, now known as Lincoln's Inn New Sq., in Lond. It belonged to the Priory of St. John of Jerusalem till the dissolution of the monasteries, and was also known as Templars F. In Oldcastle ii. 2, Acton says, "From Lond. issue out 40 odd thousands into Ficket F. Where we appoint our special randevous." "Where's that Ficket f.?" asks Murley. And Acton replies: "Behind saint Giles-in-the-f., near Holborn."

FIDES, TEMPLE OF. A famous temple on the Capitoline Hill at Rome. It was founded by Numa, and restored in the 1st Punic War. It was often used for meetings of the Senate, and was the scene of the session which preceded the murder of Tiberius Gracchus. In Tiberius 3197, the stage direction runs: "Enter Caligula and Macro from F. t."

FIELD OF BLOOD. A translation of the Hebrew Acedama. See Matthew xxvii. 6-8, and Acts i. 19. The traditional site is S. of Jerusalem, on the N.E. slope of the Hill of Evil Counsel, overlooking the valley of the Son of Hinnom. In York M. P. xxxii. 370, Pilate says, "The F. of B. look ye it call." In line 350, its owner says, "Calvary locus men calls it" a curious mistake.

FIENZA. In Massinger's Maid Hon. iii. 1, Gonzaga, at Sienna, says that the Duchess "at this instant is at F." Some of the editors read Pienza, which is probably right—Pienza being a town in Italy, 15 m. S.E. of Sienna. It was the birthplace of Pius II, and an immense palace was built there by his nephew, Pius III.

FIFE. A county on the E. coast of Scotland between the Firths of Forth and Tay. The palace of Falkland was the seat of the Macduffs, and the cross of Macduff may still be seen on the Ochil Hills. In Mac. i. 2, 48, Ross says that he has come "from F. Where the Norweyan banners flout the sky." In ii. 4, 36, after the murder of the K., Macduff says, "I'll to F." In iv. 1, 72, the witches bid Macbeth, "Beware the Thane of F.," i.e. Macduff; and consequently, in iv. 1, 150, Macbeth says, "The castle of Macduff I will surprise; Seize upon F." The next scene is laid at "F. Macduff's Castle," i.e. Falkland Castle. In v. 1, 47, Lady Macbeth soliloquises, "The Thane of F. had a wife; where is she now?" In H4 A. i. 1, 71, the K. says, "Of prisoners, Hotspur took Mordake, the Earl of F." This Murdoch was the son of the D. of Albany, Regent of Scotland; and was also Earl of Menteith, though Shakespeare follows Hollinshed's mistake in making them different persons, and in speaking of Murdoch as eldest son to the beaten Douglas.

FILL-POT LANE (now PHILPOT L.). In Lond., running S. from Fenchurch St. to East Cheap. It was named from Sir John Filpot, once Lord Mayor, who in 1378 equipped 1000 soldiers at his own expense and with them captured John Mercer, a notorious pirate, and 15 Spanish ships laden with great riches. He lived in the L. and was the owner thereof, says Stow. In Jonson's Christmas, Christmas sings, "Kit cobler it is, I'm a father of his, And he dwells in the l. called F."

FINCH LANE (more properly FINKE'S L.). In Lond., running from Cornhill to Threadneedle St., to the E. of the Royal Exchange. It was named in honour of Robert Finke, who built the ch. of St. Bennet Fink in Threadneedle St. Deloney, in Craft ii. 10, mentions "Anthony Now-Now, the firkin fidler of Finchlane." He is said to have got his nickname from his singing of Dowland's lovely air, "Now, O now, we needs must part."

FINCHLEY. A vill. in Middlesex on one of the main approaches to Lond. from the N.W., 8 m. N. from the Post Office. It is mentioned by Acton in Oldcastle iii. 2, as one of the villages where his army of rebels is quartered: "Some here with us in Hygate, some at F."

FINISTERRE, CAPE. In N.W. Spain. In Eastward iii. 3, Seagul says, "When I come to C. Finister, there's a forth-right wind continually wafts us till we come to Virginia." Chaucer's Shipman (C. T. A. 407), "knew well alle the havenes as they were, From Gootland to the C. of Fynstere."

FINSBURY. A dist. in Lond., N. of Cripplegate and Moorgate. The name is still preserved in F. Circus, F. Pavement, etc. It was during the Elizabethan times an open field, and was a favourite walk for the citizens and their wives. In H4 A. iii. 1, 257, Hotspur chaffs his wife for saying "in good sooth": "Thou giv'st such saracenet surety for thy oaths As if thou never walk'st further than F. . . . leave 'in sooth' To velvet-guards and Sunday-citizens." In Goosecap iii. 1, Sir Gyles says, "I love day-light and run after it into F. Fields in the evening to see the windmills go." In Stucley 610, Blurt is described as "Sir Bailif of F."; and in 615 he says that Jack Dudley is "in F. Jail for hurting a man behind the windmills last Saturday" (see WINDMILL). In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress says, "Our orders are such as the most envious Justice at F. shall not exclaim on." Duels were often fought there. In K. K. K. (Dods. vi. 591), Honesty says, "Bad-minded men stand in F. Fields near Lond. and there be shot to death." In Shirley's Wedding iv. 1, Landby says, "Rawbone has challenged Master Lodam; the place F."

The Fields were specially used for the practice of archery. Marks, both rovers and butts, were set up there, to the number of 160, and were distinguished by names such as "Dunstan's Darling," "Lee's Leopard," "Mildmay's Rose," and the like. No obstructions were permitted that would obscure the archers' sight of the marks. The Ayme for Finsburie Archers, published in 1594, gives a list of the marks with their names and distances, which were reckoned as so many score, i.e. of yards. Some of the marks were in the shape of a Turk. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 1, Hodge says, "If I stay I pray God I may be turned to a Turk and set in F. for boys to shoot at." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Stephen asks, "Because I dwell at Hogsden, shall I keep company with none but the archers of F.?" In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Young Palatine professes his conversion from his wild courses: "This deboshed whinyard I will reclaim to comely bow and arrows and shoot with haberdashers at F., and be thought the grandchild of Adam Bell." In Penn. Parl. 31, it is enacted "that there shall great contentions fall between soldiers and archers; for some shall maintain that a Turk can be hit at 12 score pricks (i.e. 240 yards) in F. Fields, ergo the bow and shafts won Bullen" (see BOULOGNE). In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Quarulous says to Overdo, "Nay, Sir, stand not you fixed here, like a stake in F., to be shot at." In Davenant's Playhouse i. 1, the Poet speaks of "that famous duel which in the fields of F. was fought whilom at Rovers with long bow and arrows; it began at day-break and ended at sun-setting." The Fields were naturally a haunt of beggars. In Middleton's Hubbard, p. 99, a wounded soldier goes begging there on Sunday: "and I saw the tweering Constable of F. making towards me."

The Fields were also used for the drilling of the City Train-bands; and these citizen-soldiers came in for a good deal of fashionable ridicule till in the Civil War they proved their mettle. In Shirley's Fair One v. 1, Fowler speaks of "a spruce Capt. that never saw service beyond F. or the Artillery Garden." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meercraft advises Gilthead to get his son "his posture book and 's leaden men To set upon a table 'gainst his mistress Chance to come by, that he may draw her in, And show her F. battles." In Shirley's Honoraria iv. 3, Fulbank boasts, "I was knocked down thrice and lost my beard At taking of a fort in F." In his Riches ii., the Soldier says to the Courtier, "Some fellows have beaten you into belief that they have seen the wars, that perhaps mustered at Mile-end or F." In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Sad says, "You have missed that man of war, that knight of F." In Brome's Couple i. 1, Wat says, "He would ha' so beaten you, as never was citizen beaten since the great battle of F.-Field." In Nabbes' Bride ii. 6, one of the Blades, having been beaten by Theophilus, says, "There is more valour in some than what's only shown in a F. muster." In T. Heywood's Hogsden iv. 2, Luce's Father says, "When I was young, I had my wards and foins and quarter-blows, Tuttle, F., I knew them all." The City Hounds were kept in F. Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1647), says that, rather than dine at a superior's table, "any noble spirit had rather dine with my Lord Mayor's hounds in F. Fields." The scene of Jonson's Tub is F. Hundred; and 4 of the characters, a knot of clowns, dub themselves "the Council of F."

FISH STREET, NEW (now called FISH ST. HILL). In Lond., running S. from East Cheap to Lower Thames St. It was the main thoroughfare to Lond. Bdge. before the new approach by K. William St. was made. Here the Monument was erected in memory of the Gt. Fire of 1666, and over against it was the Black Bull Inn, which stood on the site of the Lond. house of Edward the Black Prince. At the S. end of the Hill is the Ch. of St. Magnus. In H6 B. iv. 8, 1, Cade cries to his rabble, "Up F. St. ! Down St. Magnus corner ! Kill and knock down ! Throw them into Thames !" In Middleton's No Wit ii. 1, Weatherwise, the Astrologer, says, "Sol in Pisces! The sun's in N. F. St." In his Black Book (1604), p. 17, he says, "There was an house upon F.-st.-hill burnt to the ground once." In News Barthol. Fair, in the list of taverns, we have "Kings Head in N. F.-st. where roysters do range." In Prodigal ii. 4, Lancelot says to Oliver, "Let's meet at the King's Head in F. St." The site of the tavern is marked by King's Head Court, near the Monument.

FISH STREET, OLD. Lond., which used to run W. from Bread St. to Old Change. The E. end of it disappeared to make room for Q. Victoria St., and the W. end was absorbed in Knighttrider St. The Ch. of St. Nicholas on the S. side of Knighttrider St. used to be in O. F. St. It was the original fish-market of Lond., and is mentioned in the Statute 8, Edward I, as Eldefisstrate. There were many taverns in it, at which fish-dinners were served with good wine to wash them down. Curiosities from the sea, such as huge or strange fish and alleged mermaids, were exhibited in the st. In Chaucer's C. T. C. 564, the Pardoner warns the company to keep them from wine, "And namely fro the white wyn of Lepe That is to selle in Fysshstrete or in Chepe." In Penn. Parl. 41, it is enacted that "salmon shall be better sold in F.-st. than the beer shall be at Billingsgate." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Littlewit, explaining his puppet-show, says, "I make . . . Hero a wench o' the Bankside who, going over one morning to O. F.-St., Leander spies her land at Trig Stairs." Later on, Leatherhead says, "Hero o' the Bankside Is come over into F.-st. to eat some fresh herring." In Brome's City Wit i. 1, Josina sends Bridget "to Mrs. Parmisan the cheesemonger's wife in o. F.-st." In Davenant's Rutland, p. 215, the Parisian says, "Oh, the goodly landskip of O. F. St. which, had it not the ill luck to be crooked, was narrow enough to have been your founder's perspective," i.e. telescope. In Mayne's Match iii. 2, Timothy is disguised and exhibited as a sea-monster, "Just like a salmon upon a stall in F.-st."; and in iii. 3, he complains, "Within this fortnight I had been converted into some pike; you might ha' cheapened me in F.-st." In Temp. ii. 2, 20, Trinculo says, "Were I in England now, as once I was, and had but this fish [Caliban] painted, not a holiday fool there but would give a piece of silver." Doubtless he would have exhibited him in F.-st. In B. & F. Wife ii. 1, Tony tells, "There was a drunken sailor that got a mermaid with child; the infant monster is brought up in F.-st." In the list of taverns in News Barthol. Fair, we find "the Bores Head in O. F.-st."; and "O. F.-st. at the Swan." Tokens of both these taverns may be seen in the Beaufoy collection. In the dedication of Day's Humour to Signior Nobody, he says, "Till I meet you next at your great Castle in F. St. I'll neither taste of your bounty nor be drunk to your health." Evidently there was an Inn in F.-st. with the popular sign of a man with a head and legs, but no body. In Middleton's Inner Temple 22, Fasting Day says, "F. St. loves me e'en but from teeth outward," i.e. because on fast days more fish was sold. T. Heywood's Traveller was "Printed by Robert Raworth dwelling in O. F.-st. near St. Mary Maudlins Ch. 1633." This ch. was near to Dolittle Lane. In Jonson's Christmas, when Gambol announces, "Here's one out of Friday st. would come in," Christmas replies, "By no means, nor out of neither of the F.-sts. admit not a man; they are not Christmas creatures; fish and fasting days! Foh!" Gambol consequently gives orders, "Nobody out o' Friday St., nor the 2 F. sts., there, do you hear?" In B. & F. Prize v. 2, Jacques says that if Maria, the shrew, is thrown into the sea

she would spoil all the fishing: "the 2 F. sts. would sing a woeful misereri." Dekker, in Bellman, speaks of "both Fishstreetes" as haunts of foysts, or pickpockets. FLAMINIAN WAY (the VIA FLAMINIA). One of the great Roman roads in Italy, leading from Rome to Ariminum. It was constructed by C. Flaminius in 220 B.C., and restored by Augustus 27 B.C. Like the Appian Way, it was lined with sepulchral monuments for some distance out of the city. Thomas May, in lines on Massinger's Actor 9, describes the funeral of Paris, the actor: "his ashes laid in the F. W., where people strowed His grave with flowers."

FLANDERS, or FLAUNDERS (Fg. = Fleming, Fh. = Flemish). A country in the Netherlands, including the provinces of E. and W. F., now part of Belgium; Dutch F., which became part of the United Provinces; and some of the departments in N. France. In 1384 F. went to the Dukes of Burgundy by the marriage of the Countess Marguerite to Philip the Bold; and in 1477, by the marriage of its heiress Mary to the Archduke Maximilian, it was transferred to the house of Hapsburg. It remained part of the Austrian dominions until the abdication of Charles V (1556), when it passed to the Spanish branch of the Hapsburgs. By the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713 it reverted to Austria. By the settlement of Vienna in 1815 the Spanish Netherlands were united with Holland, but in 1830 Belgium was separated from Holland and made into a separate kingdom. The manufactures of F. in the time of Elizabeth included, as Heylyn tells us, "linens, scarlet worsted, saies, silk velvets, and the like stuff." It also exported butter, cheese, and other agricultural produce. Its breed of heavy horses was especially valued in England for the drawing of carriages, which in those days of bad roads needed strong animals. It had a very considerable trade with England. In the reign of Henry II a large number of Flemings came over and settled in England, and a further immigration took place in the reign of Edward III. The English cloth manufacture was much benefited by these expert artificers, but they were regarded with much jealousy by the working classes, who thought that they were taking the bread out of their mouths. Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 2, 4, says that owing to the commercial importance of Bruges "F. gave the name to all Netherland." In many of the quotations following Fg. must not be interpreted too narrowly.

Sir Thopas, the hero of Chaucer's Tale, was "yborn in Flaunders al biyonde the see at Poperyng": which is a town in W. F. close to the French border. The scene of the Pardoner's Tale is laid in "Flaunders." In the Shipman's Tale, the absence of the merchant in F., where he had business in Bruges, gave Dan John his opportunity. In the prol. to C. T., we are told that the Squire "hadde been somtyme in chyvachie in Flaunders, in Artoys, and Picardie": probably in the expedition which was sent to assist the citizens of Ghent against the French K. in 1383 under Spenser, the warlike Bp. of Norwich. In World Child, p. 170, Manhood says, "Manhood mighty am I named in every country . . . for gentle Artois, Florence, F., and France and also Gascoigne, all have I conquered as a knight." Hycke, p. 88, names F. as one of the countries that he has visited. In Wealth 426, Ill Will says, "By war in F. there is wealth." In Chivalry, which apparently is placed in the reign of St. Louis of France, there is a D. of F. amongst the characters. In H6 C. iv. 5, 21, Hastings advises Edward to go to Lynn and "ship from thence to F." This was in 1470, after Warwick's defection. In Day's B. Beggar i., Beaufort says to Gloster, "Thou wilt abuse her As once thou didst the Earl of F. wife." The reference is to Jaqueline, the wife of John of Brabant, whom Gloster had persuaded to leave her husband and marry him. In B. & F. Rule a Wife i. 1, Clara says, "Capt., I hear you're marching down to F. To serve the Catholic K." The scene is in Valladolid, and the reference to the wars in F. between Philip II of Spain and the United Provinces.

The Flemings in England. In Chaucer, C. T. B. 4586, we are told: "Certes, he Jacke Straw and his meynee Ne made never shoutes half so shrille Whan that they wolden any Fleming kill." In Lickpenny, Lydgate tells how, outside Westminster Hall, "Fgs. began on me for to cry Master, what will ye open or buy? Fine felt hats or spectacles to read?" In Three Ladies ii., Mercator says, "De Frenchman and Fgs. in dis country be many." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. v., when someone calls "Fancy!" Fancy, not wishing to answer, says, "It was a Fg. hight Hansy."

Character and appearance of the Flemings. Heylyn says, "They are much given to our English beer." In M. W. W. ii. 1, 23, Mrs. Page calls Falstaff "this Fh. drunkard." In Wealth 400, Wit says, "Such drunken Fgs. your company still mar." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "Frenchmen love to be bold, Fgs. to be drunk." In Fulwell's Like, Haz., iii. 325, Tossplot has a train of "Fh. servants that will quaff and carouse and therein spend their gain." In Ford's Warbeck i. 1, Dawbeny says that Warbeck is only fit "to be a swabber to the Fh. After a drunken surfeit." In Webster's Weakest ii. 3, Bunch says, "This F. is too thrifty a country, for here the women heel their husbands' hose themselves." In Dekker's Babylon 262, Fidell says, "The Capt. swears, Fg.-like, by 20,000 devils." In Davenant's Plymouth v. 1, Inland desires to embrace Bumble "in a F. hug, embracing coarsely, like 2 lofty youngers of the Hague." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Subtle says of Surly, "He does look too fat to be a Spaniard." And Face replies: "Perhaps some Fg. or some Hollander got him in D'Alva's time." In Nabbes' Microcosmus v., Tasting says, "I have converted more butter into kitchen stuff than would have victualled a Fh. garrison." In Nabbes' Spring, Christmas says, "Though thou be fat as a Fg., I'll have Lent choke thee." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 2, Cob opines that fasting-days "are of a Fh. breed, for they ravin up more butter than all the days of the week beside." In M. W. W. ii. 2, 316, Ford says, "I will rather trust a Fg. with my butter than my wife with herself." In Boorde's Intro. of Knowledge 147, the F. man says, "Buttermouth Fg. men do me call." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 2, Viola says, "I long to have my patient husband eat up a whole porcupine to the intent the bristling quills may stick about his lips like a Fh. mustachio, and be shot at me."

Flemish occupations and industries. The Fh. were much occupied in fishery in the North Sea, and the word "hoy," meaning a small sloop-rigged vessel, was borrowed from them. In B. & F. Gentleman iii. 1, Clerimont speaks of "Some lean commander of an angry blockhouse To keep the Fh. eel-boats from invasion." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 4, young Mortimer says, "Here in the river rides a Fh. hoy; Let's all aboard." Dekker, in Hornbook Proem, speaks of men "driven, like a Fh. hoy in foul weather, to slip into our school." In B. & F. Prize v. 2, Jaques says that if Maria is thrown into the sea, "she would make god Neptune as weary of the Fh. Channel as ever boy was of the school."

Textiles and other articles of clothing were the staple of the manufacturing industry. In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto says, "I would put on the ruff . . . And cuffs of F." In Brief Concept of English Policy (1581), the author complains that Englishmen will not be contented with kersie, "but it must be of F. dye." In Davenant's Platonic ii. 1, Sciolto speaks of "A corslet edged with F. purl": purl being a fringe made of twisted gold or silver wire. In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Gabriel describes one of the Drs. as "He that affects gay clothes and F. laces." The Merchant, in prol. to Chaucer's C. T. A. 272, had "Upon his heed a Flaundryss bevere hat." In Davenant's Favourite iv. 1, a lady says, "She's needs compare her F. peak to mine." The peak was a part of a lady's headdress projecting over the forehead. In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo mentions, "A cloak of Genoa velvet With Fh. buttons." In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto speaks of "A cloak of Genoa set With Brabant buttons." There are still 5 button-factories in Brussels. In Juventus B. 4, Hypocrisy says, "If I had not been, Thou haddest not been worth a F. pin." In Life of Thomas Parr (1635), it is stated: "There was no starch used in England till a F. woman, one Mrs. Dinghen Vanden Plasse, brought in the use of starch 1564." Swords were made in F., but they were regarded as much inferior to the Spanish, or Toledo, swords. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 1, Bobadil, examining the sword which Stephen has bought, says, "This a Toledo, pish! A Fg. by heaven! I'll buy them for a guilden a-piece." F. mares were specially valued as carriage-horses in England. They are of a heavy and powerful breed, and are now imported for use in lorries and brewers' carts. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 2, Valentine says to Lady Heartwell, "What though you have a coach lined through with velvet And 4 fair F. mares?" In Shirley's Fair One iii. 5, Brains wishes that he had "a caroch and 6 F. mares." In his Gamester iii. 3, Hazard says of the knight: "He will talk you nothing but postillions, Embroideries for his coach, and F. mares." In B. & F. Scornful i. 2, the Traveller has "a F. mare that leaped" to the sun. In Massinger's Madam ii. 2, Anne demands from her suitor "my caroch, Drawn by 6 F. mares." In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 1, Oldcraft says, "At first snap she's a Countess, drawn with 6 mares through Fleet St., and a coachman sitting bareheaded to their F. buttocks." In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Mother Sawyer affirms that city wives are the true witches: "Those by enchantment can turn ploughs and teams To F. mares and coaches." In Ford's Trial iii. 1, Benatzi cries, "F. mares! Stately!" In Marlowe's Jew iii. 4, Ithamore says, "Here's a drench to poison a whole stable of F. mares." In Lawyer v., Nice says, "He has sold his caroch with 4 F. mares."

In Davenant's Love Hon. iv. 2, Vasco says, "If I command thee to cut off these ladies' heads, thou'lt do it with the dexterity of a Fg." Taylor tells of the skill of the Fh. executioners and the training they had to undergo. In Chaucer, C. T. B. 4357, Roger says, "Sooth play quaad play, as the Flemyngh saith," i.e. "A true jest is an evil jest." In H. 349, we read: "The Flemyngh seith and lerne it if thee leste, That lital janglyng causeth muchel rest," i.e. "Least said, soonest mended." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 271, John says, "If I do not make a F. reckoning of it—and that is, as I have heard mad wags say, receive it here and revel it away in another place—let me be spit out of the room of good fellowship." In B. & F. Cure ii. 1, Pachico tells of "the miraculous maid in F. who lived 3 years without any other sustenance than the smell of a rose." See s.v. BRABANT.

The Fh. language was a dialect of Low German. In Webster's Weakest there is a Fg., Jacob, who speaks a sort of mixture of Fh. and English, thus: "Come floux, be-tall gelt, Lodowick gelt! Ware been de France crown f de rix daler f de Anglis skelling f Lik dore, see de creet, de chalke; eane, twea, dree, viar guildern for brant ween," i.e. "Look sharp, pay money, Lodovic money! Where are the French crowns, the rix dollars, the English shillings? Look there; see the chalk, the score: one, two, three, four guilders for brandy." See also s.v. DUTCH, HOLLAND, LOW COUNTRIES, NETHERLANDS.

FLEET BRIDGE. One of the 4 bds. across the Fleet Ditch, Lond. It connected Ludgate Hill with F. St. There was a bds. at this point as early as the reign of Richd. I. A stone bds. was built in 1431 by the Mayor, John Wels, which had a stone coping with iron pikes and provision for lights on the S. side. This was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and replaced by a stone structure of the same width as the st. and high enough to allow barges to get under it. After the Ditch had been covered in to the N. of F. St., the S. coping was left. The bds. was finally taken down in 1765. In Barry's Ram iii., Shortshanks' wife has gone "down toward F. B."; Thomas says later that she went in by the Greyhound (q.v.), and so struck into Bridewell. Beard, on the contrary, thinks she went along Shoe Lane. In Mayne's Match i. 4, Newcut asks, "Didst look to hear such language beyond Ludgate?" and Bright answers, "I thought all wit had ended at F. B., but wit that goes by the score; that may extend, if 't be a courtier's wit, into Cheapside." The idea is that wit was to be found amongst the lawyers in the Temple, W. of F. B., and courtiers (who went on tick with the citizens), and did not extend into the city. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Sogliardo says, "There's a new motion of the city of Nineveh with Jonas and the whale to be seen at F.-b." In Chauticleers v., Welcome says of Bung: "He has tricks enou' to furnish all the tapsters between Charing Cross and F. B.," i.e. in the Strand and F. St. F. St. was amply supplied with taverns: for a list, see under FLEET ST.

FLEET DITCH. The Fleet was a stream rising in the Hampstead and Highgate Hills, N. of Lond., and flowing through Kentish Town, Camden Town, and St. Pancras to Battle Bds.; thence to Holborn Bds., and so into the Thames at Blackfriars. Above Holborn it was known as the Hole-bourn; and it was also called the River of Wells, from the many wells or springs that fed it, like Clerkenwell, Skinnersonwell, Fagswell, Todswell, Loderswell, and Radswell. Near Holborn it was called Turnmill Brook, from the mills on its banks. In the 13th cent. it was easily navigable up to Holborn Bds., and was 20 ft. in breadth. Already in 1356 we find that it was choked up by the filth that was constantly thrown into it from the tanneries and lay-stalls on its banks. In the 16th cent. it had become a common sewer and was called F. D. In 1652 it is reported quite impassable for boats on account of the garbage thrown in from the butchers' shops and cook-shops. The Gt. Fire cleared off all the crazy buildings on the d.-side, and it was widened to 40 ft. and the channel deepened so that barges could once more go up to Holborn. Bds. spanned it at the bottom of Ludgate Hill—the F. Bds.—at Bridewell, at F. Lane, and at Holborn. But it soon reverted to its old filthiness, and in 1733 it was covered in from Holborn to F. Bds. and the F. Market was established over its course. In 1766 the rest of the d. was covered in from F. Bds. to Blackfriars. It now flows under Farringdon St. and New Bridge St., and empties itself into the low-level sewer, though provision is made for diverting it, if necessary, into the Thames. In Jonson's Famous Voyage there is an amusing account of how Sir Ralph Shelton and Sir Christopher Heyden rowed up the D. from Bridewell to Holborn, in which the filthy condition of it is described with malodorous minuteness. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 2, Jarvis speaks of "one of my aunts (videlicet bawds), a widow by F.-d." In Davenant's Wits i. 2, Thwack says, "I have a strong mind to re-edify The decays of F.-D.; from whence I hear The roaring vestals late are fled through heat Of persecution." In Davenant's Plymouth v. 1, Cable speaks of "the distressed daughters of old Eve, that lie wind-bound about F.-D." In Epilogue to Ev. Man O., Jonson calls it "our city's torrent, bent to infect The hallowed bowels of the silver Thames." In B. & F. Pestle, the Prologue proposes as the subject of a play in honour of the City: "The Life and Death of fat Drake, or the Repairing of F.-privies."

FLEET LANE. A st. in Lond. running W. from Old Bailey, a little S. of the prison, to the F. Ditch (now Farringdon St.). It was chiefly occupied by taverns and cook-shops, and was the boundary of the F. liberties northward. John Felton was lodging in F. Lane before he set out for Portsmouth to murder the D. of Buckingham, and one of the witnesses at his trial was Elizabeth Josselyn, who kept a circulating library in F. L. In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Anne reviles the cooks hired by Holdfast, "Fie on them! They smell of F.-l. and Pie-corner." Jonson, in Famous Voyage, speaks of the banks of the F. Ditch, "on whose banks Your F.-l. Furies and hot cooks do dwell." Tourneur's Revenger was "Printed by G. Eldand and are to be sold at his house in F.-L. at the sign of the Printer's Press. 1607."

FLEET PRISON. This famous prison lay on the E. side of the F. Ditch, Lond., a little N. of the junction of Ludgate Hill and F. St. The site is supposed by Mr. Roach Smith to have been originally a Roman amphitheatre. The 1st mention of its use as a p. occurs in the reign of Richd. I, when Nathanael de Leveland was appointed to keep the K.'s gaol of F. Bds. The prisoners were taken by boat along the F. Ditch and entered by a water-gate. It was long used as the p. of the Star Chamber and Chancery Courts, but when the former was abolished in 1642 it was made a p. for debtors, bankrupts, and persons guilty of contempt of court. The chief officer was named the Warden of the F. The original p. was burnt down by Wat Tyler's rabble and rebuilt. It was again burnt down in the Gt. Fire, and once more by the Gordon rioters. It was re-erected on the E. side of Farringdon St., which runs along the course of the F. Ditch, now entirely covered in; it was finally abolished in 1846, and its site is now occupied partly by the London, Chatham and Dover Railway and partly by the Farringdon St. Memorial Hall. Prisoners were allowed to live anywhere within the liberties of the F., which were bounded by Ludgate Hill, Old Bailey, F. Lane, and F. Ditch. In the p. and the Liberties marriages were permitted to be celebrated by members of the clergy who lived there. No questions were asked and no formalities insisted on. These F. marriages were abolished in 1774. Among the notable prisoners who have been confined in the F. may be mentioned the poet Surrey, Bp. Hooper, and many of the Marian martyrs: Wycherley; William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; Prynne, and Lilburne. In H4 B. v. 4, 98, the Chief Justice commands, "Go, carry Sir John Falstaff to the F.; Take all his company along with him." In Skelton's Colin Clout 1158, we have: "Take him, Warden of the F., Set him fast by the feet." In Look about iii., the K. says, "Warden of the F., Take you the charge of Gloster." In Fam. Vict. (Hazlitt, 336), the Judge says to Prince Henry, "I commit you to the F. until we have spoken with your father." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 1, Gaveston says of the Bp. of Coventry: "He shall to prison and there die in bolts." To which the K. replies: "Ay, to the Tower, the F., or where thou wilt." In Eastward ii. 2, Quicksilver says to Sir Petronel, whose creditors have laid to arrest him, "Let 'em take their choice; either the K.'s Bench, or the F., or which of the 2 Counters they like best." Jonson, in Famous Voyage, tells of the "outries of the damned in the Fleet." Bradford, in his paraphrase of Ps. lxxix., says, "How miserably they handle Thy bondservants, the prisons of the K.'s Bench, Marshalsea, F., Newgate, and in many other places doth to all the world cry out." In Massinger's Madam iv. 3, Hoist says, "I'll be removed to the F. and drink and drab there In spite of your teeth." In Shirley's C. Maid ii. 2, Hornet says, "I see my chattels seized and I am already marching to the F." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 1, Moll sings, "She lay with one of the navy, Her husband lying i' the F." In Field's Amends iv. 1, there is a reference to the F. marriages. Bold tries to persuade Lady Brightwell to yield to his unlawful passion, and says, "Newness of the trick, if nothing else, might stir ye." To which she replies: "'Tis a stale one, and was done in the F. 10 years ago."

FLEET STREET. Lond., running W. from the bottom of Ludgate Hill to Temple Bar, the site of which is now marked by the Griffin. It was originally a mere path along the river bank: its existence as a road dates from the 12th cent., when the Knights Templars took up their abode on the river side and built the Temple Ch. It took its name from the F. river, which it crossed at its E. end. At first it extended up what is now Ludgate Hill, as far as Old Bailey. In Elizabethan times the lawyers occupied the Temple, which they had held since the middle of the 14th cent. At the W. end of the st. was Temple Bar, which came into existence some time about the end of the 13th cent. At the other end was Ludgate, which stood just W. of St. Martin's at the end of Old Bailey. Just west of Shoe Lane stood The Conduit, originally erected in 1388 and rebuilt with great magnificence in 1478: it had a stone tower with St. Christopher on the top and angels lower down, and a chime of bells worked by "an Engine placed in the tower." Starting from Ludgate on the N. side of the st., and going W., Shakespeare would pass in succession the Belle Savage Inn, The Rose Inn, F. Bdge., Shoe Lane, Peterborough Court, Fetter Lane, St. Dunstan's Ch., and Chancery Lane; turning back and going E. on the S. side, the great gate of the Temple, the Queen's Head, the Hand, the Falcon, the Star and Ram, from which Ram Alley got its name, the entrance to the White Friars, the Bolt-in-Tun, the Boar's Head, the Cock and Key, Hanging Sword Alley, Salisbury House, St. Bride's Ch., and F. Bdge., with a view, down the stream, of Bridewell on the W. and Blackfriars on the E. bank; while, looking N., he would see on the E. bank the frowning pile of the F. Prison. The Inns of Court, and the great houses of the nobles stretching along the Strand, made F. St. a fashionable suburb. In Mayne's Match i. 4, Bright and Newcut, the Templars, cannot conceive that wit can extend further E. than F. Bdge. In Shirley's Love Maze iii. 3, Lady Bird's steward "lies in F. St." In B. & F. Wit S. W. i. 1, Oldcraft says of his niece: "at first snap she's a Countess drawn with 6 mares through F. St." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 1, Downright avers, "If I swallow this, I'll ne'er draw my sword in the sight of F. St. again." The lawyers, or Templars, were familiar figures in the st. In Stucley 152, Newton tells old Stucley, whose son is in the Temple, "Th' other day I saw him come up F.-st. with the Lord Windsor and Lord Aburganny." In Mayne's Match i. 3, Plotwell greets Bright and Newcut, the Templars, "What, my F.-st. friends?" In Dekker's Northward i. 2, Doll says, "I'm as melancholy now as F.-st. in a long vacation." There was quarrelling enough, but much of it was done for effect. In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Featherhead says, "Your husband is as tame as a fray in F.-st. when there are nobody to part them." The lawyers were not, however, reckoned as quite equal in gentility to men of title. Dekker, in Hornbook vi., says, "By sitting on the stage, if you be a knight, you may happily get you a Mistress; if a mere F.-st. Gentleman, a wife." Here is the premonition of the "bad baronet" of later fiction.

There were many taverns in F. St. In Nobody 1139, Nobody tells how, "coming through Fst., there at a tavern door 2 swaggerers were fighting." In Massinger's Trick to Catch iv. 5, Audrey sings, "Let the usurer cram him, in interest that excel, There's pits enough to damn him before he comes to hell; In Holborn some, in F. st. some": where I suppose she means taverns and houses of ill-fame. In Stucley 564, Sparing demands £30 from Stucley "for tavern suppers and for quarts of wine at the Greyhound in F. St." In Barry's Ram iii., Thomas says that Will's wife "went in by the Greyhound and so struck into Bridewell." I fail to find this tavern in Bell's monograph on F. St., but it is clear from the Ram Alley passage that it was close to the F. Bdge. on the S. side of the st. In Barry's Ram ii., Throat says, "Meet me straight at the Mitre-door in F. st." This famous inn occupied the site of Hoare's Bank on the S. side of the st., near Mitre Court, but it is not the same as the present Mitre in Mitre Court. In 1603 the jury presented the Mitre, because it had a back door into Ram Alley by which persons wanted by the police could convey themselves into the sanctuary of Whitefriars. Its balcony was burnt in the Gt. Fire. In a volume of poems by Richard Jackson, published 1625 or thereabout, the first is entitled Shakespeare's Rime which he made at the Myter in Flete Strete. It was Dr. Johnson's favourite tavern. In T. Heywood's Witches ii., Generous praises the wine he drank "at the Myter in F.-st." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 3, the Capt. asks, "How shall we keep our word with Saunder Bloodhound in F. st. after dinner at the Fountain?" This was the building next to Inner Temple Gate, now No. 17. The upper part was a chamber belonging to the Crown, and it was successively known as the Hand, the K.'s Arms, and the Prince's Arms; and later as the Fountain. The building has been happily preserved and in part excellently restored. Other F. St. taverns were the Devil, opposite to St. Dunstan's; the King's Head at the corner of Chancery L.; the Boar's Head by Whitefriars St.; the Bolt-in-Tun just W. of it; the Horn, now Anderton's Hotel; the Cock, of Tennysonian fame, near the corner of Chancery Lane; the Rainbow on the opposite side, and many more.

Tobacconists' shops speedily sprang up in F. St., or, at all events, tobacco was added to the commodities sold in other shops. The St. Dunstan's Register tells of several shopkeepers who were summoned for selling tobacco without licence, or annoying the judges with the smell of the weed, or keeping open at unlawful hours. Dekker's Lanthorn tells how rogues lie in wait for the Gull, "to note in what tobacco-shop in F.-st. he takes a pipe of smoke in the afternoon." Other businesses were carried on in F. St. It was the headquarters of the "cappers," or hat-makers, from the 13th cent. onward. In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, Eyre speaks of "the courageous cordwainers; the flower of St. Martin's, the mad knaves of Bedlam, F. St., Tower St., and White-chapel." Deloney, in Craft ii. 5, tells the story of "Peachey, the famous shoemaker of F.-st. . . as good a shoemaker as any is in F.-st." Akin to the cordwainers were the saddlers, one of whom had a sign of a man on horseback over his shop; in Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Dauphine says he saw Morose sitting over a cross-beam of the roof, "like him on the saddler's horse in F. St." In Stucley 363, Spring introduces us to "Sharp, the cutler of F.-st." S. R., in Letting of Humours Blood (1611), speaks of "Rapiers and daggers . . . As good as any F. St. hath in shop." The printers and booksellers, who in the kind of Journalism have now taken possession of the st., entered it in 1500 in the person of Caxton's partner, Wynkyn de Worde. His sign was the Sun, opposite Shoe Lane. The Ordinarye of crysten men was "Emprynted in the Cyte of Lond. in the Flete stret in the syne of the sonne by Wynken de Worde the yere of our lorde Mccccii." William de Machlinia had a press even earlier than de Worde, "by Flete-brigge." Richard Pynson came in 1503 to the George, next St. Dunstan's Churchyard, and was succeeded there by Robert Redman. Thomas Berthelet had the sign of the Lucretia Romana in F. St., near to the conduit. Other printers of the 16th cent. were John Wayland at the Blue Garland; John Butler at the St. John Evangelist; and Robert Copeland at the Rose Garland. Richard Tottel, publisher of the famous Miscellany, was at the Hand and Star, between the 2 gates of the Temple, now No. 7. Darius was "Imprinted at London in Fleete-street beneath the Conduite at the sign of S. John Evangelist MDLXV." The 2nd quarto of Hamlet was "Printed by I. R. for N. L. and are to be sold at his shop under St. Dunstan's Ch. in F. St. 1604." Another edition was "Printed by W. S. for John Smethwicke and are to be sold at his shop in St. Dunstan's Churchyard in F.-st., under the Diall." Other St. Dunstan's printers were William Griffith, Richard Marriott, Matthias Walker, and John Browne. The 1st quarto of Midsummer Night's Dream was sold at the shop of Thomas Fisher, "at the Signe of the White Hart in Fleete-streete. 1600." John Hodgets published many plays of Dekker, Day, Webster, and Heywood at the sign of the Flower-de-Luce at the corner of Fetter Lane and F. St. Henry Wykes published at the Black Elephant, Lawrence Andrew at the Golden Cross, Thomas at the King's Arms (No. 17), Anthony Clarke at the White Hart, and Richard Bankes next the White Hart. Phillip's Grissil was "Imprinted at London in Fleete-street beneath the Conduit at the signe of St. John Evangelist by Thomas Colwell."

A disreputable business in irregular marriages was carried on within the liberties of the F. Prison (q.v.). In Barry's Ram iv., Thomas Smallshanks says to his friends, "Hurry the wench to F.-street; there my father and I will this morning be married"; and in the next scene one of them says to Thomas, "Away with her to F.-st.; go, the curate stays for you."

F. St. was a usual place for the exhibition of puppet-plays, or "motions" as they were called. In Middleton's Trick to Catch i. 4, Dampit speaks of "motions of F.-St., visions of Holborn." In Jonson's Volpone v. 2, the 1st Merchant says of the trick that has been played on Sir Politick: "Twere a rare motion to be seen in F.-st." See also under F. BDGE. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst other curiosities "The F.-st. mandrakes." In Webster's Wyat, sc. xii, Arundel says, "Wyat is marched down F. St., after him!" In 1554 Wyat attacked Lond. and marched up F. St. as far as Ludgate, which was closed against him; and in the mêlée that followed he was taken prisoner. In Brome's Moor iv. 5, Quicksands says of the Inductor of the Masque: "He made the speeches last year before my Lord Marquess of F. Conduit."

FLEGETON. See PHLEGETHON.

FLEMING. See FLANDERS.

FLEUR-DE-LYS. See FLOWER-DE-LUCE.

FLINT. Capital of Flintsh., N. Wales. It lies on the S. side of the estuary of the Dee, 197 m. N.W. of Lond. The ruins of the castle stand on a rocky eminence N.E. of the town. It was built by Henry II, and dismantled in 1647 by order of Parliament. In R2 iii. 2, 209, Richd. says, "Go to F. Castle; there I'll pine away." The next scene, in which Richd. surrenders to Bolingbroke, is laid in "Wales; before F. Castle."

FLINTSHIRE. The most N. county in Wales. In Jonson's Wales, Evan, being insulted by Jenkin, says, "I am angry and hungry too, if you mark me; I could eat his Flintseer face now."

FLODDEN. A vill. in Northumberland, just S. of the Tweed, 50 m. N.W. of Newcastle. Here was fought the battle of F. Field, Sept. 9, 1513, in which the Scots were defeated by the Earl of Surrey, and the K., James IV, slain. A stone pillar still marks the spot where he fell. The full title of one of Greene's Plays is The Scottish History of James IV, slain at Flodden. Deloney, in Newberte ii., quotes a ballad, "At F. Field the Scots came in, Which made our Englishmen fain, At Bramstonegreene this battle was seen; There was K. Jamie slain."

FLORENCE (Fe. = Florentine); the Roman FLORENTIA and Italian FIRENZE. The capital of Tuscany, on the Arno, 125 m. N. of Rome. It was founded as a colony for Sulla's veterans in the early part of the 1st cent. B.C. Its greatness as a commercial centre began in the 10th cent. A.D. In the 13th cent., and the first quarter of the 14th, it attained the highest point of its greatness, in spite of the quarrels between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines which continually disturbed its peace. To this period belong the Duomo of Santa Maria del Fiore with its campanile and baptistry, the Ch. of Santa Maria Novella, the poems of Dante, and the art of Cimabue and Giotto. A terrible outbreak of the Black Death in 1348 was the occasion of Boccaccio's Decamerone. In the latter part of the 14th cent. the Medici family first appears on the stage, where it was destined for 300 years to act the leading part. In 1434 Cosimo the Elder was recalled from banishment, and finally destroyed the ascendancy of the Albizzi, who for about 50 years had held the chief power in the city. Piero the Gouty succeeded him in 1464, and was followed by his son Lorenzo, known as the Magnificent. After the murder of his brother Giuliano in 1478 he held undivided authority in F., and carried on the enlightened policy of his grandfather by encouraging art and literature, until his Court became the centre of the Renaissance movement. His son Pietro succeeded him in 1492, but was expelled by the citizens for his betrayal of Leghorn and Pisa to the French K., Charles VIII. From 1494 to 1512 F. retained its liberty, but through the influence of the Popes Leo X and Clement VII, both members of the Medicean family, the Medici were reinstated: the successive dukes being Alessandro (1529); Cosimo I (1537), who was created Grand D. of Tuscany by Pope Pius V in 1567; Francesco I (1574), whose intrigue with Bianca Capella horrified Europe; Ferdinand I (1587), who paid much attention to his navy and did good service against the Turks; Cosimo II (1609); Ferdinand II (1627); Cosimo III (1670); and Giovan Gastone (1723), at whose death in 1737 the family became extinct, the Grand-Dukedom passing to the D. of Lorraine, husband of Maria Theresa, who was shortly elected Emperor. In 1859 the last of the Hapsburgs was expelled, and in the following year Tuscany was united to N. Italy under the House of Savoy. In 1865 F. became the capital of the new Kingdom of Italy, and continued so until the seat of Government was transferred to Rome in 1870. The chief buildings beside the Duomo are the Palazzo Vecchio, the Churches of Santa Croce and San Lorenzo, and the Uffizi, Pitti, and Riccardi palaces. The names of Savonarola, Machiavelli, Galileo, and Guicciardini lend lustre to the fame of F. F. was one of the wealthiest cities in Europe, and her bankers supplied most of its monarchs with funds; and she had world-famed manufactures of woollen cloth, jewellery and goldsmith's work, and rich brocades. Her university, which includes the famous Accademia della Crusca, was founded in 1348.

In All's iii. 1, 3, 5, 6, and iv. 1-4 are laid in F., or in the camp of the Fes. The Fes. and Senoys are by the ears (i. 2). But whether there is any historical reference—the story is taken from Boccaccio—is quite uncertain. Bertram goes to F. as a volunteer, and is appointed General of the Horse by the Duke. Middleton's Women Beware tells the story of Bianca Capella's flight from Venice, and her subsequent intrigue with Francesco I. Shirley's Traitor deals with the life of Lorenzino de Medici, who murdered D. Alessandro in 1529: though he was not killed as in the play, but survived his victim 11 years. In Barnes' Charter, there are references to the attack made on F. by Charles VIII of France in 1494. In ii. 1, Charles says, "Hence was it that we did capitulate So strictly with the crafty Fe. Whom we well knew favoured Alphonso's part." In Chapman's Consp. Byron i. 1, 200, K. Henry speaks of his marriage "with the Great D.'s niece." This was Marie de Medici, niece of the Grand Duke Ferdinand I.

Many other plays have their scene in F., but the alleged historical details are mostly imaginary. B. & F.'s Women Pleased concludes with the marriage of the Duchess of Florence to the D. of Sienna: this is unhistorical. In their Fair Maid I., one of the characters is the Grand D. of F., and another is the Admiral of F. who has rescued the fleet of Genoa from the Venetian galleys, and is ordered to attack the Turks at sea. In iii. 2, the D. speaks of the sad example "At Rome between the Ursins and Colonnas, Nay, here at home in F. 'twixt the Neri And the Bianchi." The Orsini-Colonna troubles at Rome and the Neri-Bianchi struggles at F. occurred about the middle of the 14th cent., 200 years before there was any Grand D. of Florence. The Great Duke of Florence, in Massinger's play of that name, is called Cosimo—presumably Cosimo I—and he has a nephew Giovanni, but the plot is taken from an old English story and has no historical foundation. In Mason's Mulleasses, an expedition against F. is undertaken by the Dukes of Ferrara and Venice, in order to win the hand of the D.'s daughter. The D. is called Borgia, and is obviously intended for Cæsar Borgia. The supposed date must be about 1500, for Borgia is addressed, in line 1809, as Valentine, and Borgia was made D. of Valentinois in 1499. But he was never D. of F. In K. K. Hon. Man, "Medesa, D. of F.," is clearly meant for "Medici," but which of them is not clear. In Dekker's Wonder, the D. of F. has a son Piero and a daughter Fiametta, who marries the Prince of Pisa. In iii. 1, Torrenti's brother tells of having led forth "a fleet Of gallant youthful Fes., all vowed To rescue Rhodes from Turkish slavery." This must have been after 1522, when the Turks took Rhodes. A D. of F. is one of the personages in Shirley's Master. Piso, the son of a usurping D. of F., occurs in Sharpsham's Fleire. The actors in T. Heywood's Maid of West find their way at last to the court of the D. of F. The scene of Cockayne's Trapolin is laid at F. during the reign of an imaginary D. Lavinio. In Shirley's Bird, a fictitious Rolliardo, Prince of F., is suitor for the hand of Eugenia, daughter of the Earl of Mantua. A Palatine of F. is mentioned in Suckling's Brenmoralt. The original location of Jonson's Ev. Man I. was F., but he changed it in the later editions to Lond. T. Heywood's Maidenhead takes place in part at F.

In Ford's Trial, the scene of which is at Genoa in the 16th cent., reference is made in i. 1 to "the Turkish pirates in the service Of the Great D. of F." In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Antonelli brings word to Lodovico: "The Pope on F.'s deathbed At the earnest suit of the Gt. D. of F. Hath signed your pardon." The D. is Francesco I; the Pope, Gregory XIII, who died 1585. In Marlowe's Faustus vii., the Pope shows a dish which "was sent me from the Cardinal of F." If the Pope be Adrian VI (1522-3), the Cardinal will be Giulio de Medici, who became Pope in 1523 under the name of Clement VII. In B. & F. Wife ii. 1, Tony says, "There was a fish taken, A monstrous fish, with a sword by his side, a long sword, A pike in 's neck, and a gun in 's nose, a huge gun, And letters of mart in his mouth, from the D. of F." Cleanthes responds: "This is a monstrous lie": and Tony admits it. If anything is meant, it may be an allusion to hostilities between Florence and Naples. Henslowe mentions a play (Cosmo de Medici), now lost, as produced 1590-7. In World Child i. 170, Manhood says, "Mighty am I named in every country; F., Flanders, and France, and also Gascoigne, all have I conquered as a knight." Probably he is thinking of the French defeat of the Fes. by Charles VIII. Claudio, in Much Ado, is "a Fe.," Lucutio, in Shrew i. 1, 14, is "Vincentio's son, brought up in F." Michael Cassio, in Oth. i. 1, 20, is a Fe. In All's v. 3, 158, Diana says, "I am a wretched Fe. Derived from the ancient Capilet." The Capulets, however, belonged to Verona, not F. In Oth. i. 3, 44, it is stated that "Marcus Luccicos," evidently one of the Venetian generals, "is now in F." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Mammon says that Doll has "such a forehead as yet the Medici of F. boast." Galileo was born at Pisa, but died at F., and was buried in Santa Croce. In Webster's Malfi ii. 4, the Cardinal refers to "that fantastic glass Invented by Galileo the Fe." The allusion to the telescope is an anachronism, as it was not invented till 1609, some time after the supposed date of the play, which is definitely stated in ii. 3 to be 1504, though there is a subsequent reference (Act iii.) to the battle of Pavia (1525). In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Thomas reports a news item "from F.": "They write was found in Galileo's study A burning glass . . . to fire any fleet that's out at sea." Nicolo Machiavelli, the author of The Prince, was born in F. in 1469 and died there in 1527: he was buried in Santa Croce. In Marston's Ant. Rev. B. iv. 1, Antonio speaks of "that Fe. Deep, deep-discerning, sound-brained Machevell." Dante was born in F. in 1265, but was banished, and died in Ravenna in 1321. Chaucer, C. T. D. 1125, speaks of "the wise poete of F. That highte Dant." The Chorus in Barnes' Charter is spoken by the Fe. historian Francis Guicciardini (1482-1540). In Cromwell i. 3, Bagot says, "This is the lodging of Master Friskibull, A liberal merchant and a Fe." This was Francesco Frescobaldi, the story of whose treatment by Cromwell is related in Foxe's Book of Martyrs. In Greene's Friar ix. 112, Vandermaast includes F. amongst the universities to which he has given the non-plus. In Dallington's Method for Travel (1598), F. is said to be the place where the best Italian is spoken. In Mucedorus i. 1, 46, Anselmo suggests that Mucedorus should disguise himself "like a Fe. or mountebank," i.e. a travelling physician.

The Fes. were credited with the finest manners in Italy. In Oth. iii. 1, 43, Cassio says of Iago: "I never knew A Fe. more kind and honest": he does not mean that Iago was a Fe., for in v. 1, 89, Iago calls Roderigo "my dear countryman"—and Roderigo, according to ii. 1, 312, is "this poor trash of Venice"—but that he has never met even a Fe. kinder than Iago. In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, Laura says, "You Fes. insinuate with great subtlety in human natures": where human means humane, cultured. In K. K. Hon. Man E. 3, Lelio says, "Fear not, my Lord, the Fes. are men That honour right." In Noble Soldier v. 3, Malatesta says, "Just is your indignation, high and noble, And the brave heat of a true Fe." In Davenant's Platonic v. 2, Fredoline says, "You are a Fe.: one of the subtle tribe That think your neighbours have no brains." F. gave its name to the Florin, which was first coined there in 1252: it was a gold coin, with a lily on one side and a figure of St. John the Baptist on the other. In Marlowe's Jew ii. 3, Barabas says, "I learned in F. how to kiss my hand, Heave up my shoulders when they called me dog." In iv. 1, he tells of debts owing to him in F. In Middleton's Changeling iii. 4, Beatrice says, "Look you, Sir, here's 3000 golden florens." In Davenant's Siege v., Florello will not give up Bartolina "for the wealth of F." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Lady Cressingham has sent designs for silks to the factors "at F. and Ragusa, where these stuffs are woven." In Marston's What you i. 1, Randolpho speaks of "a Fe. cloth-of-silver jerkin." In Jonson's New Inn i. 2, Tipto advises Lord Beaufort to wear "the Naples hat With the Rome hatband, and the Fe. agat." The passage is repeated almost verbatim in B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1. In Greene's Quip (Harl. Misc., vol. II, p. 220), we are told of "costly breeches who had girt unto them a rapier and dagger gilt, point pendente, as quaintly as if some curious Fe. had trickt them up." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 2, the surgeon exhibits "a narcotic medicament, made of iris of F." This is the Fe. Lily (Iris Florentina). Fe. was also the name for a kind of meat-pie, baked in a plate or basin, with a cover of paste. In Hake's Newe Pauls Churchyard D. iii., we read of "custards, tarts, and fes. the banquet to amend." In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater speaks of "F. From whence we have the art of working custards Which we call Fes." In Dekker's If it be 281, Rush talks of "pie, custard, fe., and tart." In T. Heywood's Witches iii., "Custard, Flawn, Fes." form part of the bill of fare for the wedding feast. In B. & F. Woman Hater v. 1, Lazarillo speaks of "custards, tarts, and fes." Duelling was rare in F. In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Cleremont, speaking of duels, says there have been only 3 in Venice in as many years; "In F. they are rarer."

FLORES. The westernmost island in the Azores, q.v. Taylor, Wks. i. 131, says, "Our ship did ride at anchor at the isle of F. One of the isles of the Azores." It was "At F. in the Azores" that Sir Richard Greville lay before the famous fight described in Tennyson's Revenge.

FLORIDA. Originally meant the whole E. coast of N. America as far N. as Newfoundland. The Spaniards made several attempts to possess themselves of it, and the French had no better luck. So the name came to be used contemptuously of a kind of imaginary El Dorado; it was even travestied into Stolidia and Sordida; affairs of gallantry were called adventures of F.; and houses of ill-fame were called Terra F. The English Colonization of Virginia cut off the N. part of it, and the name became restricted to the Peninsula, which, with brief intervals, remained in the possession of Spain until it was ceded to the United States in 1819. It was first discovered by the Spaniards in 1513. An interesting description of it is found in Robert Tomson's account of his travels in 1556-1558. In Sir John Hawkins' Second Voyage to the West Indies 1564-5, he tells how the people smoked a kind of herb, dried, "with a cane and an earthen cup in the end"; how there are unicorns and lions and tigers there, to say nothing of a serpent "with 3 heads and 4 feet." Drayton, in Polyolb. ix. 320, tells how Madock discovered America "Ere any ear had heard the sound of F." In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says he has visited "Gunie, F., and Brasiles." In Armin's Moreclacke, there is a song: "Have o'er the sea to F." In Deloney's Craft ii. 5, Stukeley and Strangewidge say, "When they would be seeking us in Fleet-st. we would be seeking out the coast of F." In Marmion's Leaguer iv. 1, Pandar says of the Leaguer, which was a well-known house of ill-fame, "It has the credit to be styled the Terra F."

FLOWER-DE-LUCE, or FLEUR-DE-LIS. The old armorial bearing of the Kings of France, thought by some to represent an iris, by others a lance-head. It was also borne by the Kings of England until the Peace of Amiens (1802) in token of their claim to the throne of France. It was a popular sign both for taverns and booksellers' shops. There was a Flower-de-Luce tavern at the corner of Shoe Lane and Fleet St. which once belonged to Sir John Walworth, who built the Conduit opposite to it. In Poverty (Lost Plays 336), Misrule says, "Let us go straight to the Fleur-de-Lys; there shall ye find a man will play at dice with you for an hundred pound." In Middleton's Mad World iv. 3, Folly-Wit, disguised as a courtesan, says to Gumwater, "I bind you to meet me to-morrow at the Flower-de-Luce yonder between 9 and 10." There was another tavern of the same name in Fleet St. at the corner of Fetter Lane, the name of which is preserved in Fleur-de-Lis Court, which then ran into Fleet St. under what was afterwards Peele's Hotel. There was another in Turnmill or Turnbull St. In Middleton's Quiet Life iii. 2, Margarita says to Franklin, "Ma fille conversera avec vous à la Fleur-de-lis on Turnbull st." A 4th was found in Lombard St. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 145, Jane Shore orders, "See my trunks be conveyed forth to Mrs. Blages, an Inn in Lombard St., the Flower-de-Luce." There was also a Flower-de-Luce Tavern at Feversham. In Feversham iv. 3, Ales says, "Get you to Feversham to the Flowre de Luce And rest yourselves." The 1st Quarto of M. W. W. was "Printed by T. C. for Arthur Johnson, and are to be sold at his shop in Powles Church-yard at the sign of the Flower de Leuse and the Crown."

FLUSHING (or VLISSINGEN). Spt. in Holland on the S. of the island of Walcheren on the N. side of the estuary of the W. Schelde. It was one of the cautionary towns handed over to Q. Elizabeth in 1585 as security for the men and money sent to help the Dutch. It was the usual landing-place of the volunteers who went from England to assist the Dutch in the 16th cent. In Feversham v. 4, Will, one of the murderers, says, "Therefore must I go aboard some hoy And so to F." The Epilogue tells how he was afterwards "burnt in F. on a stage." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift claims to have seen "F., Brill, and the Hague . . . in my Lord of Leicester's time," i.e. in 1585. In his Underwoods lxii., he says of the Lond. Trainbands: "He that but saw thy curious captain's drill Would think no more of F. or the Brill." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram says of the pander, bawd, and whore: "They lived by F., by Sloys, and the Groyne"; the double entendre is obvious. In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, the Clown says, with the same wretched pun, "In F. there is good riding, but not without danger, for many at a high tide have been like to have been cast away in the road." Greene, Quip (p. 247), says of the Walloon and the Dutchman: "Let them be launching to F., for they shall be no triers of my controversy." In Massinger's New Way iv. 1, Greedy says, "I will not have you feed like the hangman of F., alone, while I am here." No one, of course, would eat with the executioner. In a letter from Mont to Bullinger (1572), he says, "In F. alone, a very small town, there have been hung some Spanish persons of rank, who were taken prisoners at sea." Davis, in Mirum in Modum (1602), says, "Since our English were Flusheniz'd [i.e. infected with the vices of F.] Against good manners and good men they kicke, As beasts they were."

FLYING HORSE. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Lond. It was no doubt a representation of Pegasus. Davenant's Britannia was "Printed by John Haviland for Thomas Walkley and are to be sold at his shop at the F. H. near York House. 1637." Agrippina was published at the same place in 1639.

FOLIGNO. A town in central Italy, in a winding valley in the Apennines, 76 m. N. of Rome. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "F., full of sug'ry streets among the Apennine": where sug'ry seems to mean sticky, muddy.

FONTAINEBLEAU. A town in France in the midst of the forest of F., 37 m. S. of Paris. The forest covers 40,000 acres. Louis VII had a residence here, and the chapel which he built was dedicated by our Thomas à Becket. Francis I founded the present palace, which was restored and augmented, first by Louis XIV, and then by Napoleon I and Louis Philippe. The palace has 6 courtyards, and the gardens are magnificently laid out. In B. & F. Lover's Prog. i. 2, Dorilaus tells how he has been set upon by bandits "Twixt this [Paris] and F., in the wild forest." The meeting between Henri IV and Biron on June 13th, 1602, took place at F., and is described in Chapman's Trag. Byron iii. 2.

FONTAINE FRANÇOISE. Vill. in France, on the boundary between Burgundy and Franche-Comté, abt. 4 m. N.E. of Dijon. Here, in 1595, Biron won a great victory over the Spanish troops who were fighting for the League. In Chapman's Consp. Byron ii. 1, Savoy relates, "A league from F. F. . . he pashed them all Flat as the earth, and there was that field won." In v. 1, 146, Byron says, "None but I at F. F. burst The heart-strings of the Leaguers."

FONTARABIA (now FUENTERRABIA). A frontier fortress on the coast of Spain, on the Bay of Biscay, 20 m. S.W. of Bayonne. It is abt. 35 m. N.W. of Roncesvalles, where Agramonte, the Saracen, defeated the Paladins of Charlemagne, though Charlemagne was not killed there, as Milton seems to suggest. Milton, P. L. i. 587, speaks of the troops sent from Africa, "When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell By F."

FORLI (a town in Italy, the ancient FORUM LIVII). It lies at the foot of the Apennines, 38 m. S.E. of Bologna. In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio characterizes it as "odd-humoured Forly."

FORRES. A town in Elginsh., Scotland, 160 m. N. of Edinburgh. The castle, the ruins of which are still to be seen, was the occasional residence of the early kings of Scotland. In Mac. i. 3, 39, Banquo asks Macbeth, "How far is 't called to F.?" The next scene is in the palace of F., where Duncan welcomes Macbeth. The whole of Act III, except Scene 5, is laid there; and it is clear that "the blasted heath" was in its neighbourhood.

FORTUNATE ISLES. Fabulous islands supposed to lie somewhere in the Western Ocean. They were the home of the blessed dead, and in them the golden age had returned. Some writers identified them with the Canaries. The idea is derived from the Greek and Latin writers. In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Astutio speaks of "3 crops in a year in the F. I." In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudocheus speaks of those who are more fortunate "Than those that live in the Iles F." In Shirley's Gamester iii. 3, Wilding says, "I swell with imaginations like a tall ship bound for the F. I." Jonson uses it to mean England. In Ev. Man O. Ind., Mitis asks, "What's his scene?" Cordatus answers: "Marry, Insula Fortunata, Sir." "O," says Mitis, "the F. Island." So, in the Penates, Mercury hails the K. and Q.: "Hail, K. and Q. of the Islands Called truly F."

FORTUNE TAVERN. A tavern in Lond. I have not been able to locate it exactly. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his song of the taverns, says, "The fool to the F. hie."

FORTUNE THEATRE. A theatre in Lond., erected by Henslowe and Alleyn between Golding (now Golden) Lane and White Cross St., at the point now indicated by Playhouse Yard. The contract for the building with Peter Street is still preserved. It was 80 ft. square and cost £520. It was opened by the Admiral's men in November or December 1600, destroyed by fire in 1621, and rebuilt 2 years later in the more usual round form, with a figure of F. over the door. It was finally dismantled by the Puritans in 1649, and pulled down in 1662. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Moll says, "One of them is a nip; I took him once in the two-penny gallery at the F." In Tomkis' Albumazar ii. 1, Trincalo says, "Then will I confound her with compliments drawn from the plays I see at the F. and Red Bull." In Field's Amends ii. 1, Lord Fee-simple says, "Faith, I have a great mind to see Long Meg and the Ship at the F." Long Meg was performed first in 1594, and evidently retained its popularity; of The Ship nothing is known. In iii. 4, the Drawer says, "All the gentlemen went to see a play at the F. and are not come in yet, and she believes they sup with the players." In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 1, Tucca says to Histrio (the actor), "You grow rich, do you? and purchase, you twopenny tear-mouth? you have F. and the good year on your side, you stinkard?" The above references are to the original theatre. Jonson, in his Execration upon Vulcan, refers to its destruction. "F., for being a whore, Scaped not his justice any jot the more; He burnt that idol of the Revels too." In Randolph's Muses i. 1, Mrs. Flowerdew, the Puritan, imprecating vengeance on the theatres, prays that "The F. [may be] whipt for a blind whore." In T. Heywood's Traveller iv. 6, Reignald says, "I'll rather stand here like a statue in the fore-front of your house, for ever, like the picture of Dame F. before the F. playhouse." In Vox Borealis (1641), we read of "a lamentable tragedy, acted by the prelacy against the poor players of the F. play-house." The players had staged a play, The Cardinal's Conspiracy, and were arrested for introducing altars, images, and crucifixes on the stage. Middleton's R. G. was "acted on the F.-stage"; and in the prologue the poet predicts "A Roaring Girl Shall fill with laughter our vast Theater." Melton, in The Astrologaster, speaks of men going "to the F. in Golding Lane, to see the tragedy of Doctor Faustus."

FORUM. Is the 1st element in the names of a large number of towns in the Roman Empire (Forli, Frejus, etc.), just as in England we have Market-Rasen, Market-Drayton, Market-Bosworth, etc. In Rome itself there were many Fora. In the following passage it seems that the F. Augusti at Rome is intended. It lay N.E. of the F. Romanum, on the site marked by the 3 surviving pillars of the Temple of Mars Ultor in the Via Bonella. In Richards' Messallina ii. 805, Messallina says, "He must not live at F.; Though it be near at hand, 'tis too far off." The scene of Chapman's Cæsar i. 2 is "The F. before the Temple of Castor and Pollux," q.v.

FORUM ROMANUM. See MARKET-PLACE.

FOSSE. One of the ancient military roads built by the Romans in Britain. It began at Totness, and ran N. through Exeter, Bath, Leicester, Newark, and Lincoln to Barton-on-Humber. Drayton, in Polyolb. xiii. 312, describes it with some poetical licence as running "from Michaels utmost mt. To Cathnesse."

FOSTER LANE. St. in Lond., running N. from Cheapside to Gresham St. past the General Post Office. It was originally Fauster L., and got its name from the Ch. of St. Vaast, or Vedastus, which was built there early in the 16th cent. on the site of an older ch. It was partially destroyed in the Gt. Fire, and was taken down and rebuilt in 1694, with a particularly fine spire. Here John Manningham heard a sermon on 19 Dec. 1602, by "one Clappam, a black fellow with a sour look but a good spirit." At the Cheapside corner was the Dagger Tavern, noted for its pies. F.L. was chiefly occupied by goldsmiths and jewellers, and there were also some booksellers' shops. The W. side was almost all cleared away for the Post Office, and many houses on the E. side to make room for the Goldsmiths' Hall. One edition of Skelton's Colin Clout, about 1550, was "Imprynted at Lond. by Jhon Wallye dwelling in F. l." John Evangel. was

"Imprynted at Lond. in F. L. by John Waley." Youth was "Imprynted by John Waley dwelling in F. L."

FOUNTAIN. In As iv. 1, 155, Rosalind says, "I will weep for nothing like Diana in the f." The reference is probably to the Cross in Cheapside. Stow says, "On the E. side of the same Cross was then [1595] set up a curiously wrought tabernacle of grey marble and in the same an image alabaster of Diana, and water conveyed from the Thames trilling from her naked breast for a time, but now [1603] decayed." As the date of the play was 1600, the allusion would be well understood by the audience. For reference to Fountain Tavern, see under FLEET ST.

FOX. The sign of a bookseller's shop in St. Paul's Churchyard. The 1604 quarto of H4 A. was "Printed by Valentine Simmes for Matthew Law and are to be solde at his shop in Paules Churchyard at the signe of the Fox. 1604." The 1605 quarto of R3 was "Printed by Thomas Creede and are to be solde by Mathew Lawe dwelling in Paules Churchyard at the signe of the Foxe neare St. Austin's gate. 1605." Yarrington's Two Tragedies was published at the same place by Lawe, 1601.

FOY, or FOWEY. Spt. in Cornwall near the mouth of the Fowey, abt. 15 m. W. of Plymouth. It furnished 47 ships to the fleet of Edward III in his French wars, the largest number of any port in England: its services against the Spanish Armada are recorded in a painting in the church. It has a good harbour, well defended. One of the ships in the great navy met by Hycke-Scorner (p. 88) on its way to Ireland was "the Anne of Foye." There is no doubt here a reference to the fact that it was in the Anne of Fowey that Edgecombe sailed to Ireland to settle the affairs of the Geraldines in 1488. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 4, Spencer says to Bess, "I have a house in F., a tavern called the Windmill: that I freely give thee." Bess answers: "I'll not fail to visit F. in Cornwall": ii. 1, 3; iii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5; iv. 2 are laid at F., in the Windmill Tavern or its neighbourhood. Nicholas, who slew John Dory in the ballad (see under PARIS), was the son of a widow near F.

FOY'S (SAINT). Ch. at Milan. Probably S. Fedele's is meant. It is an elegant ch. built for the Jesuits by St. Carlo from the designs of Pellegrini. In connection with it is the repository of Public Archives. It is now the most fashionable ch. in Milan. In Jonson's Case v. 1, Christofero says, "At the old priory behind St. F., That was the place of our appointment, sure." The scene is laid in Milan.

FRAMLINGHAM. A town in Suffolk on the Ore, 87 m. N.E. of Lond. The castle, the ruins of which are still to be seen, was built by Redwald, K. of the East Angles, at the end of the 6th cent. It belonged in succession to the Bigods, the Mowbrays, and the Howards. It was sold in 1635 to Sir Robert Hitcham, who settled it on Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. Here Mary found shelter, on the death of Edward VI, until the succession was settled. In Webster's Wyat ii., Wyat says to Q. Mary, "Come, let us straight from hence from F." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. i., Dodds speaks to Q. Mary of the time "when We made first head with you at Fromagham": this spelling represents the local pronunciation (cf. Birmingham and Bromicham). F. is the scene of Prince Edward's love-making in Greene's Friar. In iv. 33, the K. says, "He posted down from the Court To Suffolk side, to merry F., To sport himself amongst my fallow deer." In x. 159, Margaret says, "I will straight to stately F. And in the abbey there be shorn a nun."

There was no abbey at F., but there was a Hall of the Guild of the B. V. Mary, where a mansion called the Guildhall now stands.

FRANCE (Fn. = Frenchman, Fd. = Frenchified, Fh. = French, Fen. = Frenchmen). The country on the W. coast of Europe, stretching from the English Channel to the Pyrenees, and from the Atlantic to the Rhine and the Alps. It first appears in history as Gallia, Englished Gaul, when in the 1st cent. B.C. it was conquered by Julius Cæsar. The inhabitants were of Celtic stock, but they soon adopted Latin as their speech, and modern Fh. is thus one of the Romance languages. For 400 years Gaul remained a part of the Roman Empire, and was Christianized throughout by about A.D. 250. During the 5th cent. the German tribes began to settle in various parts of Gaul; notably the Visigoths in the S. and the Franks in the N.E. By the beginning of the 6th cent. the Franks had established their ascendancy, and henceforth the land is properly called F., and the people and language Fh. Clovis, who died in 511, may be regarded as the founder of modern F. His line, the Merovingians, held supreme power till 687, when Pepin of Heristal, the Mayor of the Palace, became practically master of F.: his grandson, Pepin the Short, dethroned Childeric, and was crowned K. in 754. His son was the famous Charlemagne, who reigned 771-814. In 843 his great empire was divided and F. fell to Charles the Bold. His descendants, however, failed to hold their own, and in 987 Hugh Capet was elected K. and the Caroling line definitely came to an end. The conquest of England by D. William of Normandy brought that country into close connection with F., and ultimately led to the wars of the reigns of Edward III. and of Henry V. and VI. which form the chief interest of many of our historical plays. Finally, about the middle of the 15th cent., the English were driven from F., of which their kings had held large provinces for over 350 years, and only Calais was left to them, and this last fragment was lost in the reign of Q. Mary. The Kings of France during our period were Francis I (1515), Henri II (1547), Francis II (1559), Charles IX (1560), Henri III (1574). During the later years of his reign the country was thrown into 2 hostile camps, and the Wars of the League resulted in the establishment of the Bourbon line of kings in the person of Henri IV of Navarre (1589). He was succeeded by Louis XIII in 1614, Louis XIV (1643), and Louis XV (1715).

Geography and climate. In Err. iii. 2, 124, Dromio finds F. in the forehead of the kitchen-maid, and recognizes it by the "salt rheum that ran between" it and her chin, England. In Greene's Orlando i. 3, 402, a soldier speaks of the wealth of Charlemagne drawn from his mines "found in the mountains of Transalpine F.": the mines are mythical, and Transalpine F. means merely that F. is N. of the Alps. In H5 v. 2, 37, Burgundy celebrates "this best garden of the world, Our fertile F." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Fernando, speaking of F., says, "To give the country due, It is on earth a paradise." Heylyn (s.v. FRANCE) says "The soil is extraordinary fruitful."

Historical allusions. F. is often used for the Gaul of Roman times. In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 4, Sempronius says, "I marvel of what mettle was the Fn. who, when he should have stabbed Marius, they say he was astonished with his looks." The story is that a Gaul was sent into the prison to kill Marius, who had been captured by Sulla in the 1st Civil War 88 B.C., but he was so daunted by his appearance that he flung down his sword, crying, "I cannot kill Caius Marius." Lodge, in Wounds of Civil War, has a version of the same story, and makes the Gaul talk broken English! In Chapman's Cæsar i. 1, 28, Cato reproaches Cæsar with having recruited his army from the scum of "Britain, Belgia, F., and Germany." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 3, Antony says, "Cæsar oft hath sacrificed in F. Millions of souls." In Kyd's Cornelia, Cicero calls the Gauls "the fierce and fiery-humoured Fh." In Tiberius 1799, Vonones says, "Spain must find horses, F. an enemy, Because that Brennus scaled the Capitol." In Nero v. 1, Tigellinus calls Julius Vindex "that giddy Fn."; and later the Messenger says, "Vindex is up and with him F. in arms." In B. & F. Prophetess ii. 3, Diocles says to Niger, "For thy news Be thou in F. pro-consul." In Jonson's Volpone iv. 2, Mosca says to the Advocate, "Mercury sit upon your thundering tongue Or the Fh. Hercules, and make your language As conquering as his club." This was Hercules Gallicus, celebrated by Lucian. His statue had chains leading from his tongue to the ears of his auditors.

France after the departure of the Romans. In Hester (A. P. ii. 265), Ambition says, "If war should chance either with Scotland or F., this gear would not go right": an unusually daring anachronism. B. & F. Thierry tells the story of Brunhild and her 2 grandsons, Theodobert II of Austrasia and Theodorik II of Burgundy, about A.D. 600. In L. L. L. iv. 1, Rosalind quotes a proverb: "that was a man when K. Pepin of F. was a little boy." In Leary, the husband of Cordelia is the K. of F. According to Holinshed his name was Aganippus, and "he was one of the 12 kings that ruled Gallia in those days." B. & F. Brother is concerned with Rollo, D. of Normandy, and his murder of his brother Otto. It is unhistorical. Heming's Fatal Contract deals with Fredegonda of Neustria and the later Meroving times. A princess of F. is one of the characters in L. L. L. As the supposed date is about 1427, this lady may be presumed to be the daughter of Charles VII. The scene of As You Like It is laid in F., but Lodge's Rosalynde, on which it is based, refers to no particular historical period. The scene of All's Well is for the most part in F., and the K. of F. plays an important part in it. The story was written by Boccaccio in 1356. Acts II & III of King John take place in F., and relate the story of the meeting between John and Philip Augustus of F., and the arrangement for the marriage of Louis the Dauphin to Blanche of Castile in 1200. The capture of Arthur belongs to 1202, and the visit of Pandulph to England fell in 1213. Act V deals with the invasion of England by Louis the Dauphin in 1216. Acts III, IV, & V of H5 tell the story of the campaign which led up to the battle of Agincourt in 1415, the conclusion of the Treaty of Troyes, and the marriage of Henry and Katharine of F. in 1420. The Fh. K. is Charles VI, le Bien Aimé. In H6 A., we have the story of the wars in F. from 1422 to the death of Joan of Arc in 1431, and the marriage of Henry with Margaret of Anjou in 1445. The Fh. K. is Charles VII, le Victorieux. H6 C. iii. 3 is laid in F., and describes the embassy of Warwick to demand the hand of the Lady Bona in 1470. The K. is Louis XI. In Ford's Warbeck i. 1, K. Henry complains of the support given to Lambert Simnel by "Charles of F." This was Charles VIII. Massinger's Parl. Love is placed in the reign of this same K. (1483-1498). In Barnes' Charter, one of the incidents is the war between Charles VIII and Pope Alexander VI in 1494. Chapman and Shirley's Chabot tells the story of Philippe de Chabot, Admiral of F., who fell from power in 1541 but was restored by Francis I in 1542. The details are, however, freely modified. Chapman's Bussy and Byron plays have to do with almost contemporary Fh. history. Bussy D'Ambois belongs to the reign of Henri III (1574-1589) and Byron to that of Henri IV (1589-1610). Marlowe's Massacre is concerned with the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572. Other plays whose scene is laid in F. are B. & F. Brother, Thierry, French Law., Elder B., Wild Goose, Gentleman, Hon. Man, and Lover's Prog.; Webster's Weakest; Massinger's Dowry, Unnatural Combat; Tourneur's Atheist; and Chivalry, which belongs to the reign of a K. Lewis, who has a son Philip: this would seem to point to Louis IX (St. Louis), but all the details are unhistorical. In May's Heir iv. 2, Euphues boasts that his ancestors "have been props of the Sicilian crown . . . 'Gainst the hot Fh. and Neapolitans." In Sec. Maid. 2372, the Tyrant says, "I'll doom thee with a death beyond the Fn.'s extremest tortures." The reference is to the frightful tortures inflicted on Ravallac, the murderer of Henri IV, in 1610, the year before this play was licensed. In Sampson's Vow ii. 3, 6, Mortique speaks of Mary Q. of Scots as "the dowager of F." As a matter of fact, she was Q. of F. at this time (August 1560), as her husband, Francis II, did not die till December of that year. In B. & F. Prize iii. 2, Maria wants new tapestries "of the civil wars of F." i.e. the wars of the League. Milton, in Son. to Skinner 8, advises him to cease worrying about "what the Swede intend and what the Fh." The allusion is to the 30 Years' War.

The Peers of F. were 12 famous Paladins in the Court of Charlemagne, of whom Oliver and Orlando, or Roland, are the best known. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xviii., Magnificence mentions "Charlemagne that maintained the Nobles of Fraunce" amongst the world's great heroes. Dekker, in Armourers, says, "Deceit hath more followers than the 12 peers of F." They were Englished into Douzepers. In York M. P. xxvi. 8, we have "Nowdir with duke nor dugepers." In Spenser's F. Q. iii. 10, 31, Braggadochio is described as "Big looking like a doughty Doucepere." Hence "Peer of F." is used humorously for an old-fashioned, punctilious person. In B. & F. Scornful i. 2, young Loveless addresses his steward Savil, "'Tis well said, my old Peer of F."

The patron Saint of F. was St. Denis. Some traditions identified him with Dionysius the Areopagite of Acts xvii. 34, who was supposed to have been the 1st Apostle of F., but he really was an archbp. of Paris who was martyred in A.D. 272. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, we have "George for brave England stands, Denis for brave F." In H5 v. 2, 220, Henry says to Katharine, "Shall not thou and I between St. Denis and St. George compound a boy, half F., half English?" In H6 A. i. 6, 28, Charles says, "No longer on St. Denis will we cry; But Joan la Pucelle shall be F.'s saint." In Club Law iv. 6, Puff appeals, "Nay, for St. Dennis, good Fn.!" In Sampson's Vow i. 2, 48, Clifton says, "Cry St. George and a fig for St. Dennis!"

The two chief orders of Knighthood in F. were the Order of St. Michael founded by Louis XI., and the Order of the Holy Ghost instituted by Henri III in 1578. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 4, 99, Byron is described as "Charles Constant of Byron, knight of both the orders." In Webster's White Devil iv. 2, Lodovico points out amongst the ambassadors "The Fn. there, Knight of the Holy Ghost."

The Fh. lilies, Flowers-de-luce, or Fleurs-de-lys, were borne in the ancient royal arms of F. They were added to the coat-of-arms of the English kings in the time of Edward III as a sign of his claim to the throne of F., and were retained by our sovereigns until 1802. In H6 B. v. 1. 11, York boasts that his hand shall hold a sceptre "On which I'll toss the flower-de-luce of F." In H6 A. i. 1, 80, the Messenger says to the English lords, "Cropped are the Flower-de-luces in your arms." Minot, in Poems iv. 25 (1352), says, "Then the rich Fleure de lice Won there ful little prise; Fast he fled for ferde." Sidney, in Astrophel lxxv., says of Edward IV: "He made the Fleure-de-luce so fraid." In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, Denis reads a prophecy: "The Fleur de lys and Harp must join Before the riddle you untwine," i.e. the champions of F. and Wales must unite. In Smith's Hector iv. 2, 986, Artoys says, "'Twas I that quartered with the English Lions The arms of F., in opening Edward's title." It was Artoys who suggested to Edward III his title to the Crown of F.

French national character. Heylyn (s.v. FRANCE) says of the Fh.: "As now, so in Caesar's time, they were noted for overmuch precipitation in all affairs, both martial and civil; entering an action like thunder and ending it like smoke. The Fh. is said to be like a flea, quickly skipping into a country, and as soon leaping out of it. This Fh. nation is endued chiefly with Phrygian wisdom; whence it is said that the Italian is wise beforehand, the German in the action, the Fh. after it is done. They are very litigious. They are great scoffers, yea, even in matters of religion. The women are witty, but apish, wanton, and incontinent. Their chief exercises are Tennis and Dancing." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542) xxvii., describes the Fn. as delighting in gorgeous apparel and having a new fashion every day; "they have no great fantasy to Englishmen; they do love singing and dancing and musical instruments; and they be high-minded and stately people." In H5 iv. prol. 18, we read: "The confident and over-lusty Fh. Do the low-rated English play at dice." In Merch. i. 2, 60, Portia says of the Fh. Lord, Le Bon: "God made him, therefore let him pass for a man. He! why, he hath a horse better than the Neapolitan's; a better bad habit of frowning than the Count Palatine; he is every man in no man; if a throstle sing, he falls straight a capering; he will fence with his own shadow; if I should marry him, I should marry 20 husbands." In Davenant's Wits v., Ample says, "My ancestors were of the fiery Fh. And taught me love, hot eagerness, and haste." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdline says, "Fen. love to be bold." In Shirley's Courtier iv. 1, Volterre says, "I'll prefer the Fh.; whom, though a surly Don calls an impertinent people, giddy triflers, yet in my esteem they merit highly; they are active, even in discourse." In Kyd's Soliman i., Erastus characterizes the Fh. knight as "the sudden Fn." In Davenant's Albovine iii. 1, we are told of a "Fh. skirmish where the onset is hot and fiery, but the retreat cold and tame." In his Cr. Brother ii. 1, Foreste says, "The Fh. have fiery nimble spirits; but they are all useless made By forward and affectate violence. Their valour is to attempt, not to perform. 'Tis a giddy nation and never serious but in trifles." Rabelais, Gargantua i. 48, says, "The Fh. are worth nothing but at the first push. Then they are more fierce than devils. But if they linger a little, and be wearied with delays, they will prove more faint and remiss than women." In Devonshire iv. 1, Manuel says the Fh. are "all fire, the soul of compliment, courtship, and fine language; witty and active; lovers of fair ladies, short nags, and English mastives; proud, fantastic, yet such a pride and such fantasticness it becomes them." In B. & F. Elder B v. 2, Miramont says, "Let us be right Fen.; violent to charge, But, when our follies are repelled by reason, 'Tis fit that we retreat and ne'er come on more." In All's iii. 3, 291, Parolles describes F. as "a dog-hole" and, later, "a stable; we that dwell in 't jades." In iv. 5, 42, the Clown says that the devil's "fisnomy is more hotter in F." than in England. In H6 A. iii. 2, 68, Talbot exclaims, "Base muleteers of F. ! Like peasant foot-boys do they keep the walls And dare not take up arms like gentlemen." In iv. 1, 138, the K. says, "Remember where we are : In F., among a fickle wavering nation." In iv. 6, 48, young Talbot exclaims, "If young Talbot fly . . . like me to the peasant boys of F. To be shame's scorn and subject of mischance." In iv. 7, 54, Lucy says, "Submission, Dauphin ! 'Tis a mere Fh. word." In H6 A. i. 2, 23, the Dauphin denounces his own troops as "Dogs ! cowards ! bastards !" In K. J. v. 2, 130, the Bastard describes the Fh. as thrilling and shaking, "Even at the crying of your nation's crow, Thinking his voice an armed Englishman." Nash, in Pierce C. i, says, "The Fn. is wholly compact of deceivable courtship, and for the most part loves none but himself and his pleasure." In Tiberius 684, Sejanus, advising the ambitious man to be all things to all men, bids him "Brag with the Fh., with the Egyptians lie." In H5 iii. 6, 156, Henry boasts that he thought "upon one pair of English legs Did march 3 Fen.," and excuses his arrogant tone by saying, "Forgive me, God, That I do brag thus. This your air of F. Hath blown that vice in me": the next scene in the Fh. camp exhibits the bragging temper of the Fh. leaders. In Greene's James IV iii. 2, the Surveyor says, "For all your Fh. brags I will do my duty." In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 111, Grey says there is "Nothing but circumvention in the Fh." And Clifton adds : "By my Hollidam, jugglers, Constant in nothing but inconstancy, That's the Fh. merchandise." In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 130, Fleire says, "O, y' are of a Fh. humour, Sir, as inconstant as impatient." In H6 A. i. 1, 25, Exeter asks, "Shall we think the subtle-witted Fh. Conjurers and sorcerers, that, afraid of him [Henry V], By magic verses have contrived his end?" In K. J. iii. 1, 322, Elinor exclaims : "O foul revolt of Fh. inconstancy !" In Ford's Heart ii. 3, Orgilus, with bold anachronism, professes, "I'll tear my veil of politic Fh. off." In Jonson's Volpone ii. 1, Sir Politick says, "Ay, ay, your Mamaluchi. Faith, they had A hand in a Fh. plot or two."

In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 2, Mirable says, "You talk of F. : a slight unseasoned country, Abundance of gross food which makes us blockheads." In Nash's Wilton, Jack asks, "What is there in F. to be learned more than in England, but falsehood in fellowship, perfect slovenry, to love no man but for my pleasure, to swear 'Ah ! par la mort Dieu' when a man's hams are scabbed." In Goosecap i. 1, Bullaker says of Rudesby : "He will come into the presence, like a Fn., in foul boots." In H5 iv. 5, we have various Fh. oaths, as "O diable," "O Seigneur," "Mort de ma Vie." Modern humorists have made fun of their Sacré bleu, Ventre bleu, Mort bleu, etc. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 1, 115, Ophioneus says, "Thou shalt . . . drink with the Dutchman, swear with the Fn. . . and turn all this to religion."

In Jonson's Magnetic iii. 4, Compass speaks of "F., that garden of humanity, The very seedplot of all courtesies." In his Devil iii. 1, Fitzdottrel instructs Pug, "Remember kissing of your hand and answering with the Fh. time, in flexure of your body." (I am disposed to suggest as an emendation, "the Fh. turn and flexure.") In Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Macilente says, "His seniors smile and salute in Fh. with some new compliment." In Ham., Laertes goes to F. to learn good manners and courtesy. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. i. 12, Bellafront says, "There's a Fh. curtsy for you." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Fernando says, "The Fh. are passing courtly, ripe of wit, Kind, but extreme dissemblers." In Webster's Malfi i. 1, Antonio, asked how he liked the Fh. court, replies : "I admire it ; In seeking to reduce both state and people To a fixed order, their judicious K. Begins at home." In B. & F. Princess i. 1, Piniero speaks of the Fh. as excelling "in courtship." In their Friends i. 1, Marius says, "I have not spent my 5 years' travels to bring home a Fh. compliment." In Chester M.P., Noah's Flood 100, Noah's wife says to him, "For all thy frankish fare I will not do after thy read," i.e. for all your elaborate courtesies. In Brome's Academy i. 1, Erasmus relates that Matchill "sent his son, a little lad, into F. to be bred there." In B. & F. French Law i. 2, Dinant says, "I am a Fn., And for the greater part we are born courtiers." In R3 i. 3, 49, Richd. says, "Because I cannot flatter and speak fair, Smile in men's faces, smooth, deceive, and cog, Duck with Fh. nods and apish courtesy, I must be held a rancorous enemy." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, Mercury appears as a Fn. and makes an exaggerated bow to the company ; and Crites comments, "The Fh. quirk this, Sir." In Shirley's Pleasure iii. 2, Frederick says, "This language should be Fh. by the motions of your heads and the mirth of your faces." In B. & F. Thomas i. 2, Sebastian says, "No more of your Fh. shrugs, I advise you." In Ford's Sacrifice i. 1, Fernando says, "You shall have A Fn. ducking lower than your knee At the instant mocking your very shoe-ties." In Webster's Cuckold v. 1, Woodroff says, "Carry it Like a Fh. quarrel and cut each other's throats With cringes and embraces." In Shirley's Courtier i. 1, Volterre says, "I have brought from F. the nice amorous cringe that so enchants the ladies." In Jonson's Case ii. 3, Aurelia says, "She should make Fh. court'sies so most low That every touch should turn her over backward." In Middleton's Five Gallants iv. 6, Pursesnet asks, "Where's comely nurture ? the Italian kiss Or the Fh. cringe with the Polonian waist ? Are all forgot ?" In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, when Jolly tries to embrace the Capt., who has just returned from his travels, the Capt. "stands in a Fh. posture and slides from his old way of embracing." In Brome's Sparagus iv. 9, Money-lacke says, "Look that you congy in the new Fh. bum-trick." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. i. 1, Fastidious Brisk is introduced as "the fresh Fd. courtier." In Goosecap i. 1, it is asked : "Can ye not know a man from a marmoset in these Fd. days of ours ?" In Trag. Richd. II i. 2, 70, Nimble knows not what title to give to Trissilian, "unless you'll be Frenchfyd and let me lay the Mounser to your charge." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, Amorphus says, "Your Fd. fool is your only fool, lady ; I do yield to this honourable monsieur in all civil and humane courtesy."

In M. W. W. i. 3, 93, Falstaff says to Bardolph and the rest, "Falstaff will learn the humour of the age, Fh. thrift, you rogues ; myself and skirted page." In Davenant's Rutland iii. 218, the Parisian says, "We, your poor Fh. frogs, are fain to sing to a salad." In Fam. Vict., p. 362, the Capt. says, "But give the Fn. a radish root And he will live with it all the days of his life." In M. W. W. iii. 3, 182, Caius says, "Tis no de fashion of F. ; it is not jealous in F." Per contra, in Greene's Orlando ii. 1, Sacrepant says, "Than the Fh. no nation under heaven Is sooner toucht with sting of jealousy." This passage, however, stands quite alone: the Italians are usually spoken of as intensely jealous, but this fault is never attributed to the Fh.

In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bilioso says, "You shall ever find . . . amongst an hundred Fen. 40 hot-shots," i.e. men of loose morals in sexual matters. In Cromwell iii. 3, Cromwell says, "Lust dwells in F., in Italy, and Spain, From the poor peasant to the Prince's train." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 7, Corvino speaks of "some young Fn. Knew every quirk within lust's labyrinth And were professed critic in lechery." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 1, Calisto, being asked "Are these Fen. such gallants?" replies: "Gallant and active; what we call immodest with them is styled bold courtship; they dare fight under a velvet ensign at 14." In Shirley's Ball iv. 2, Frisk says, "Dere is no love like de Fh. love; love is hot and de Fh. is hot." But in Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Mrs. Mixum says, "Your Fh. is with a woman as with an enemy, soon beaten off."

The diseases resulting from sexual excess were very commonly called "Fh." In H5 v. 1, 87, Pistol laments: "My Nell is dead i' the spital Of malady of F." The word "Syphilis" is derived from the name of the shepherd in the poem of Fracastoro (1530), entitled Syphilis sive Morbus Gallicus. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Carlo exclaims, "The Fh. pox! our pox; 'sblood, we have 'em in as good form as they, man, what?" In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico, after enumerating the excellences of other nations, concludes, "The Fn., what a pox hath he?" In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, we have a verse, "The Dutchman for a drunkard, The Dane for golden locks, The Irishman for usquebaugh, The Fn. for the pox." In Jack Drum ii. 180, John complains, "De fine wench take de Fh. crown and give me de Fh. poc." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. v., Catharina asks, "Bawd, are the Fh. chillblains in your heels That you can come no faster?" In Eastward v. 4, Quicksilver sings, "Shun usurers, bawds, dice, and drabs, Avoid them as you would Fh. scabs." In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano uses the comparison, "As common as lice in Ireland or scabs in F." In his Hon. Wh. A. i. 6, Hippolito says to Bellafront, "In the end you show [your lover] a Fh. trick, and so you leave him that a coach may run between his legs for breadth." In i. 8, Bellafront calls the Bawd "the letcher's Fh. disease." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Mathea says, if she speaks Fh., "They'll say the Fh. et cætera infected me." In B. & F. Wild Goose i. 1, De Gard says, "They cannot rub off their Fh. itches." In their Double Mar. i. 2, Villo says that the Court ladies will help Castruccio "to the Fh. cringe; they are excellent surgeons that way." In Chapman's Widow's Tears v. 1, the Governor will give "old and withered widows to Surgeons Hall to be stamped for salve for the Fh. measles." In Three Lords (Haz., vi. 499), Simplicity says to Fraud, "The Fh. canker consume ye!" Greene, in Thieves Falling Out (1592), speaks of "men diseased of the Fh. marbles," a corruption of the Fr. morilles. In Tourneur's Revenger i. 1, Vendice threatens, "If I meet her, I'll, like the Fh. mole, heave up hair and all." Cooke, in Greene's Quoque, p. 560, says, "May the Fh. cannibal eat into thy flesh And pick thy bones." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iv. 3, the Camel-driver says, "I hear whole lordships are spent upon a fleshly device, yet the buyer had nothing but Fh. repentance and the curse of Chirurgery for his money." In T. Heywood's Royal King iii., the Capt. speaks of one infected with this disease as having "all his body stung with the Fh. fly." In Webster's A. & Virginia iii. 2, a Lictor says, "Your Fh. fly Applied to the nape of the neck for the Fh. rheum Is not so sore a drawer as a lictor." In Nabbes' Tottenham iii. 1, James says, "I had rather a Fh. consumption should wear my hair off than a round cap," i.e. a citizen's cap. In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, Lazarillo says, "The commodities which are sent out of the Low Countries and put in mother Cornelius' dry-fats are most common in F.": Mother Cornelius' tubs were the common remedy for this disease.

In M. W. W. iii. 3, 57, Falstaff says of Mrs. Ford: "Let the Court of F. show me such another." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 4, Calipso, enumerating the different kinds of women she has seen, speaks of "The lusty girl of F., the sober German." In B. & F. Span. Cur. i. 1, Leandro, discussing the beauties of different nations, says, "Some prefer the Fh. For their concealed dressings." In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano says, "Many Frenchwomen coming out of the Isle of Wight [sc. to Winchester] there were many punks in the town."

French fashions in dress. In H8 i. 3, 14, the Lord Chamberlain laments the spells of F. that have juggled the English visitors to the Field of the Cloth of Gold into strange mysteries: "Their clothes are after such a pagan cut, too, That sure they've worn out Christendom." Benedict, in Ado iii. 2, 33, is "a Dutchman to-day, a Fn. to-morrow." In Ham. i. 3, 73, Polonius speaks of the careful and suitable dress of the Fh.: "For the apparel oft proclaims the man; And they in F. of the best rank and station Are most select and generous, chief in that." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The thrifty Fn. wears small waist": where the pun should be noted; and later, speaking of hats, he sings, "The Fh. inconstant ever." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Volpone says, "I will have thee Attired like some sprightly dame of F." In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor says, "I will not read F. to you; it is unnecessary; all the Fh. fashions are here already." In Chapman's Bussy i. 1, Montsurry says that the English, when they travel, "Come home, delivered of a fine Fh. suit." In Skelton's Magnificence, fol. xi., Courtly Abusion describes his fine clothes as "this new-found jet from out of Fraunce." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "She's in that Fh. gown, Scotch falls, Scotch bum, and Italian head-tire you sent her." In Davenant's Platonic v. 7, Gridonell says, "I dreamt of Fh. gowns and fine Italian tyes."

Special articles of attire specified as French. Cloak.—The Fh. cloak was short, reaching barely to the waist. Puttenham, in Art of Poesie (1589) iii. 24, tells of a "pleasant old courtier wearing after the new guise a Fh. cloke, scarce reaching to the waist." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, Wild says, "They will swear we went into F. only to have our cloaks cut shorter." Codpiece point.—A lace for fastening the front of the breeches. In Dekker's Match me ii., Bilbo asks, "Do you want any Fh. cod-piece points?" Doublet.—A garment fitting closely to the body, sometimes with, sometimes without sleeves: it was often slashed to show the coloured lining. Occasionally it was thickly padded as a protection against sword-cuts and thrusts. In B. & F. Beggars iv. 4, Higgen says, "That ape had paid it. What dainty tricks in his Fh. doublet with his bastard bullions!" In Nash's Wilton, Jack says, "I knew I should be cut like a Fh. summer doublet." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 5, the fantastical Gull is described as wearing "a Fh. doublet." Davies, in Epigram xxii. says, "He wears . . . long cloke and Fh. doublet." In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, the Tutor mentions, as a just ground of quarrel, if one has said "Your doublet was not exactly Fd." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 555, Spendall says, "Shame light on him that thinks his safety lieth in a Fh. doublet!" Fall.—A collar falling flat over the upper part of the doublet, as distinguished from the projecting ruff. In Eastward i. 2, Poldavy enters "with a fair gown, a Scotch farthingale, and a Fh. fall in his arms." In Machin's Dumb Knight i., amongst articles of women's apparel are mentioned "The Fh. fall, the loose-bodied gown, the pin in the hair." Farthingale.—A woman's petticoat stiffened out with whalebone hoops or wires, not unlike the modern crinoline. In Jonson's Vision, Phantasie says, "Say the Fh. verdingale and the Fh. hood were here to dispute." Greene, in Defence of Conny Catching, says, "Blest be the Fh. sleeves and breech verdingales." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. i., Gresham invokes "a pox of all Fh. farthingales!" Galosh.—The galosh was a shoe with a wooden sole and an upper of leather. It did not come to mean an overshoe till the beginning of the 18th cent. In Fatal Mar. p. 426 (Bullen), Jacomo says, "He proves like your Fh. galoshes that promise fair to the feet, yet twice a day leave a man in the dirt." W. M., in Wandering Jew (1649) 16, says, "By his slashed doublet, high galoshes, and Italian purled band [he should be] a Fn." Garter.—A band worn round the leg to keep up the stockings. It was not concealed, as at present, by the trousers, and its tying and adornments were carefully attended to. In Jonson's Ev. Man O., Ind., Asper exclaims, "That a rook by wearing the Switzer's knot on his Fh. garters should affect a humour! O, it is more than most ridiculous!" Gloves.—Coverings for the hands, made of supple leather. In Brief Conceit of English Policy (1581), it is complained that "No man can be contented with any other gloves than be made in F. or Spain; nor cloth but Fh. or Fryseadowne." Hat.—A covering for the head usually made of felt, and adorned with a showy hat-band and often a brooch or plume. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Brisk says, "I had on a gold cable hat-band which I wore about a murrey Fh. hat I had." In Stubbes' Anat. Abuses (1583), he says, "There is a new fashion of wearing their hats sprung up amongst them, which they father upon the Fen., namely, to wear them without bands." Greene, in verses against the Women of Sicilia in Part II of Mamillia, speaks of "Hats from Fraunce thick pearled for pride and plumed like a peacock." Hood.—A woman's headdress with the front band depressed over the brows and raised in folds over the temples. It could thus be pulled down over the face as a disguise. It was very fashionable during the 16th cent., but gradually went out of fashion during the 2nd quarter of the 17th. It is sometimes used for a fashionable woman. In Roister ii. 3, Tibet predicts, "We shall go in our Fh. hoods every day": if their mistress marries a wealthy husband. In J. Heywood's Pardoner (Haz., i. 203), the Pardoner says, "Here is of our Lady a relic full good Her bongrace which she wore with her Fh. hood." Latimer, in his last sermon before Edward VI (1550), represents a fashionable lady calling out, "Give me my Fh. hood!" In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 4, Margaret says, "Art thou acquainted with never a farthingale-maker nor a Fh.-hood-maker? How shall I look in a hood, I wonder?" In v. 1, Eyre refers to her Fh. hood jestingly, "Lady Madgy, thou hadst never covered thy Saracen's Head with this Fh. flap but for my journeyman." In Jonson's Alchemist v. 1, Lovewit says, "They speak Of coaches and gallants; one in a Fh. hood Went in, they tell me." In Prodigal iii. 1, Civet says, "I mean to maintain my wife in her Fh. hood and her coach."

In B. & F. Brother i. 1, Grandpree says, "Lechery shall rise . . . And Bawdry in a Fh. hood plead before her." In their Woman Hater iv. 1, Gondarino says to the old Gentlewoman, "I will . . . whisper in thine ear and make thee understand through thy Fh. hood." In Mar-mion's Leaguer ii. 3, Millescent says, "Let me marry with a pedant and have no other dowry than an old cast Fh. hood." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, the waiting maid exclaims, at the sight of her mistress, "A Fh. hood, too! Now, 'tis out of Fashion! a fool's cap would show better." The date is 1632. In Ford's Queen ii. 780, Mopsa says, "The Shaparoons have ever took place of the best Fh.-hoods in the parish." Hose.—The term included the whole covering of the nether man, both breeches and stockings: these were sometimes distinguished as upper and nether hose, or stocks. The Fh. hose were particularly full and baggy. In Middleton's Hubbard, we read of a dandy "metamorphosed into the shape of a Fh. puppet [whose] breeches were full as deep as the middle of winter on the road-way between Lond. and Winchester, and so large and wide withal that I think within a twelvemonth he might very well put all his lands in them." In H5 iii. 7, 56, the Dauphin says, "You rode like a kern of Ireland, your Fh. hose off, and in your strait strossers." In Mac. ii. 3, 16, the Porter says, "Here's an English tailor come hither for stealing out of a Fh. hose." The quantity of material required would give him a better opportunity. In Rom. ii. 4, 47, Mercutio says to Romeo, as he comes in fashionably dressed, as a man in love, "Signior Romeo, bon jour! There's a Fh. salutation to your Fh. slop." The slop is the same as the hose. In Merch. i. 2, 80, Portia's English suitor got his round hose in F. In H8 i. 3, 41, Lovell speaks of them as "short blistered breeches": where blistered means swollen out. In Trag. Richd. II ii. 3, 91, Chesney mentions "Fh. hose" amongst the foreign fashions affected by Richd. and his favourites. Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit, p. 140, mentions "Fh. hose" as an article of fashionable apparel. In Shirley's Love Maze v. 5, Thorney describes his master's get-up: "A long Italian cloke came down to his elbows, a Spanish ruff, and long Fh. stockings." Mask.—The mask was made of silk, and used to conceal the face in masquerades or when the wearer wished not to be recognized. Cut-work was an elaborate embroidery with scalloped edges. In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Fitzdottrel warns Pug, "Let in no lace-woman nor bawd that brings Fh. masks and cut-works." Petticoat.—A woman's skirt. In his Alchemist v. 2, Face asks, "Where be the Fh. petticoats And girdles and hangers?" Pickadel.—A collar fashionable in the 17th cent., with a broad border of lacework. It is sometimes used humorously for the hangman's halter. In B. & F. Pilgrim ii. 2, the Outlaw, fixing the halter on Pedro's neck, says, "This is a coarse wearing . . . but patience is as good as a Fh. pickadel." Taylor, Works 34, 1, speaks of "One that at the gallows made her will Late choked with the hangman's pickadill." Ruff.—A stiff circular outstanding collar, fashionable in the 15th and 16th centuries. In Middleton's Mad World i. 1, Follywit says, "I'll down to my grandsire like a lord; a Fh. ruff, a thin beard, and a strong perfume will do it." Standing Collar.—A ruff, as contrasted with a falling band. In Dekker's Hornbook i., he says that in Adam's time there were no "Fh. standing collars." Wires.—Used to stiffen out ruffs and farthingales. In Eastward v. 1, Mrs. Touchstone laments to see her mother "without Fh. wires or anything, indeed, that's fit for a lady."

French tailors were the most fashionable. In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Truewit advises Clerimont, if he wishes to succeed in love, "Have your learned council about you every morning, your Fh. tailor, barber, linener, etc." In Shirley's Pleasure iv. 2, Littleworth says, "Your Fh. tailor has made you a perfect gentleman." In B. & F. Rule a Wife iv. 3, Juan says that Perez is "as mad as a Fh. tailor that has nothing in his head but ends of fustians." In Massinger's Renegado iii. 1, Donusa says, "Get me some Fh. tailor To new-create you." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni, after describing in detail the dress of a fashionable Englishman, says, "All this magazine of device is furnished by your Fh. tayler." In Devonshire iii. 4, when Buzzano announces that he has rare news from F., Henrico sarcastically asks, "Have they banished their tailors and tire-women?" In Brome's Damoiselle ii. 1, Valentine says, "This morning the Fh. tailor brought a gown home, of the fashion, for my wife." In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Ariosto says, "Tailors in F., they grow to great abominable purchase and become great officers."

French national customs and practices. In H5 v. 2, 283, Katharine informs Henry that "it is not a fashion for the maids in F. to kiss before they are married." As we learn from Erasmus's account of his visit to Sir Thomas More, it was customary in England for young ladies to be kissed by visitors to the house. Puttenham, in Art of Poesie iii. 24, 292, says, "With us the women give their mouth to be kissed" (cf. Chapman's Alphonsus ii. 2). In Webster's Malfi ii. 1, the Duchess says, "I have heard you say that the Fh. courtiers Wear their hats on 'fore the king." In B. & F. French Law i. 1, Cleremont says, "These private duels . . . had their first original from the Fh."; and in i. 2, he says, "I think there is no nation under heaven That cut their enemies' throats with compliment, And such fine tricks, as we do." In iv. 4, he warns the duellists, "You must first talk; It is a main point of the Fh. method." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Seawit, speaking of a proposed duel, says, "If they should fight it out after the Fh. way, where the seconds must encounter too, how will you find an opposite?" In his U. Lovers iv. 4, Altophil says, "Your rapier-miracles Are chronicled by the hot-fencing Fh." In Nabbes' Unfort. Mother iii. 2, Amanda speaks of a physician "that hath proved more men mortal than Fh. duels."

French Dances. In Shirley's Fair One ii. 1, the Tutor says, "Dancing o' the Fh. cut in the leg is most fashionable, believe it, pupil, a genteel carriage." In his Courtier ii. 2, Volterre says, "Your Fh. glide away like rivers, without a noise, and turning with meanders out-move you." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "Germany hath not so many drunkards . . . F. dancers, Holland mariners, as Italy alone hath jealous husbands." In iii. 2, 3, he records: "Nothing so familiar in F. as for citizens' wives and maids to dance a round in the sts., and often for want of better instruments to make good music of their own voices and dance after it." In Poverty (Lost Plays), 334, Misrule asks, "Will ye have a Fh. round?" the Round being a circular dance. In Brome's Academy iii. 2, Camelion says, "I saw last night your new Fh. dance of 3, What call you it?"—"O," says Strigood, "the Tresboun," i.e. the très bon (very good), with a pun on the Latin tres, three. A well-known Fh. dance was the Brawl, a dance resembling a cotillion. Cotgrave describes it as a dance wherein many (men and women) holding by the hands, sometimes in a ring, and otherwhiles at length, move altogether. In L. L. L. iii. 1, 9, Moth asks, "Master, will you win your love with a Fh.

brawl?"—"How meanest thou?" says Armado, "brawling in Fh.?"—"No," replies Moth, "my complete master; but to jig off a tune at the tongue's end, canary to it with your feet, etc." The pun is too obvious for the Elizabethans to resist. In Day's Humour ii. 2, Octavio declares, "Love's nothing but an Italian dump or a Fh. brawl." In Shirley's Pleasure iii. 2, Celestina says, "You excel [your horse] only in dancing of the brawls because the horse was not taught the Fh. way." In Jack Drum v. 128, Sir Edward inquires, "Have you ne'er a page can entertain This pleasing time with some Fh. brawl or song?" In Massinger's Picture ii. 2, Ladislaus says, "Let the maskers enter; by the preparation 'tis a Fh. brawl, an apish imitation of what you really perform in battle."

Music and Musicians. In H8 i. 3, 41, Lovell thinks that "a Fh. song and a fiddle has no fellow for winning the complaisance of the ladies." In Marlowe's Jew iv. 6, Barabas enters "disguised as a Fh. musician with a lute, and a nosegay in his hat." In Marston's What you ii. 1, Laverdure urges, "Sing! Give it the Fh. jerk, quick, spart, lightly!" In Richards' Messallina iv. 1898, Saufellus speaks of making a wooden Cupid wag "Like the apish head of a Fh. fiddler when he firks with his fingers." In Dekker's If it be 288, Brisco has collected a band in which are "Jews' trumps and Fh. kitts," i.e. small fiddles. In Jonson's Love's Welcome, Accidence says, "Fetch the fiddles out of F. To wonder at the hornpipes here." Fynes Moryson, in Itin. iii. 3, 136, says of the Fh.: "They use much mirth and singing, in which art they take great delight."

Occupations and trades. Acrobats.—In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 1, Truewit warns Morose that after he is married, his wife will run away "with the Fn. that walks upon ropes." In Middleton's Women beware iii. 3, Sordido says, "Never went Fn. righter upon ropes Than she on Florentine rushes." Hairdressers.—In Greene's Quip (Harl. Misc., vol. II, p. 230), the Barber asks his customer, "Will you be fd. with a lovelock down to your shoulders?" In Glapthorne's Wit iv. 1, Valentine says, "'Tis a peruke; I saw it at the Fn.'s in the Strand the other day." Evidently some well-known Fh. hairdresser is intended. In Middleton's Blurt ii. 2, Imperia says, "Flaxen hair and short, too: O, that's the Fh. cut." Hall, in Satires iii. 7, 33, says of a fop: "His hair, Fn.-like, stares on his frighted head, One lock amazonlike dishevelled." Cooks and food.—In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 2, Centaure exhorts Epicoene, "Let him allow you your Fh. cook and 4 grooms." In Massinger's Madam i. 1, Lady Frugal protests, "I'll have none Shall touch what I eat . . . But Fen. and Italians; they wear satin And dish no meat but in silver." In Harrison's Descr. of England (1587), he says that the cooks of the nobility "are for the most part musical-headed Fen. and strangers." In Ford's Fancies iv. 2, Romano says, "I keep nor house nor entertainments Fh. cooks composed." In Nabbes' Bride i. 2, we are introduced to "Monsieur Kickshaw, the Fh. cook." Fynes Moryson, in Itiner. iii. 3, 134, says, "The Fh. are . . . said to excel others in boiled meats, sauces, and made dishes, vulgarly called Quelques chosés; . . . and the Fh. alone delight in mortified [i.e. gaméy, half-putrid] meats." In Dekker's Westward i. 2, Mrs. Honeysuckle says, "He never loves any wench till she be as stale as Fen. eat their wildfowl." In Davenant's Platonic v. 6, Gridonell speaks of "a Fh. pie, some kickshaw made of several strange bits." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii., Bots says, "We have stewed meat for your Fn." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 2, the Capt.

says, "I hate your Fh. pottage that looks as the cook-maid had more hand in it than the cook." Later in the same scene he says, "This shook together by an English cook (for your Fh. seasoning spoils many a woman) and there's a dish for a k." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Tasting talks of "a Fh. troop of pulpatoons [i.e. delicacies], mackaroons, kickshaws, grand and excellent." In Sampson's Vow v. 1, 125, Grey says, "Large stomachs and empty sallet-dishes Are the Fn.'s viands." Falconers.—In Ham. ii. 2, 450, Hamlet says, "We'll e'en to it like Fh. falconers, fly at anything we see." The English then regarded the French as lacking in the true sporting spirit, and ready to fly their hawks at any sort of bird that might turn up: Punch furnishes many illustrations of the same joke at the Fn.'s expense, such as representing him as firing at a sitting bird or shooting (infandum dictu!) a fox. In Wilson's Pedler 396, the Mother says of the Pedler: "He knoweth no more than the Faukenor of F." i.e. he flies at any thing, talks any nonsense that comes into his head. Horsemen.—In Ham. iv. 7, 82, the K. says, "I've seen myself and served against the Fh. And they can well on horseback." He goes on to tell of the great skill of one Lamond, or Lamound, in this particular. This may refer to Pietro Monte, the instructor of Louis VII's Master of the Horse. In Webster's White Devil ii. 4, the lawyer says of the Fh. ambassador: "O my sprightly Fn.! He's an admirable tilter . . . an excellent horseman." In iv. 2, Lodovico says, "Now, my lord, I have a rare Fh. rider." In his Malfi i. 1, Ferdinand says, "You have excellent riders in F." In B. & F. Cupid ii. 6, Leontius asks, "Is the rough Fh. horse brought to the door? They say he's a high goer." In Massinger's Old Law iii. 2, Eugenia says, "The great Fh. rider will be here at 10 With his curvetting horse." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Mayberry says, "Away then with a Fh. gallop and to her!" In Milkmaids i. 3, Ranoff says, "As your Fn., in Christendom I do not know a ranker rider." i.e. a more impetuous, reckless rider. Dentists and Physicians.—In Underwit iv. 5, Sir Richd., when his wife complains of toothache, says, "I'll send for the Fh. tooth-drawer in the morning." In Shirley's Bird ii. 1, he scoffs at the lords: "This perfumes his breath, t'other marshalls his fine Fh. teeth." In Ret. Pernass ii. 1, Theodore says, "It is requisite that the Fh. physicians be learned and careful, your English velvetcap is malignant and envious." In Dekker's Wonder ii. 1, Angelo, disguised as a doctor, says, "I know the garb of the French mountebanks whose apish gesture myself shall practise." In Chettle's Hoffman ii., Lorrique enters disguised "like a Fh. doctor." Priests.—In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Oldcraft says, "He can marry and bury, yet ne'er a hair on his face, like a Fh. vicar." Valets and waiting-maids.—In Dekker's Edmonton iv. 1, Mother Sawyer says that women of fashion are witches who can turn "ploughs and teams to Flanders mares And coachmen and huge trains of servitors To a Fh. butterfly." In Eastward i. 1, Touchstone says, "Thou wilt swear faster than a Fh. footboy." In the Puritan i. 4, Pyeboard says of Sir Godfray: "The devil himself is Fh. lackey to him." In Dekker's Hornbook v., he advises the Gull to have "your Fh. lackey carrying your cloke and running before you." In Goosecap v., Momford says, "3 things there be that should thine anger swage, An English mastiff and a fine Fh. page." He omits to mention the 3rd!

Actors and dramatists. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 4, Fernando says, "There is a way Which the Italians and the Fen. use, That is, on a word given, or some slight plot, The actors will extempore fashion out Scenes neat and witty." In Span. Trag. v. 1, Lorenzo says, "I have seen the like [i.e. the performance of a new play at an hour's notice] in Paris, 'mongst the Fh. tragedians." In Davenant's Playhouse i. 1, the Player says, "The Fh. convey their arguments [i.e. plots of their plays] too much in dialogue, their speeches are too long." In Dekker's Northward iv. 1, Bellamont decides to have his tragedy of Astyanax "presented to the Fh. court by Fh. gallants"; and the Capt. swears, "Your Fn. will do a tragedy enterlude pogy well." In Hercules, prol. 45, the speaker excuses Plautus for having altered the Amphitruo in translating it from the Greek by saying, "Besides, Fh. and Italians do the same." In Ret. Pernass i. 2, Judicio says of the dramatist John Marston: "He thinks he is a ruffian in his style Withouten bands or garters ornament; He quaffs a cup of Fn.'s Helicon, Then royster-doyster in his oily terms Cuts, thrusts, and foins at whomsoever he meets." The harlequin was a stock character in the Fh. light comedy. In Marston's Malcontent iii. 1, Bianca says, "All your empiricks could never do the like cure upon the gout the rack did in England or your Scotch boot. The Fh. Harlequin will instruct you."

Trade and Commerce. The Fh. crown was well known in England. It was a gold coin with a crown on the obverse, issued by Philip of Valois in 1339, and known to the Fh. as the Ecu, worth from 4 to 5 shillings. The pun on the other meaning of the word, the crown of the head, is very common. In H4 B. iii. 2, 236, Bullcalf offers Bardolph "4 Harry ten shillings in Fh. crowns" to be excused from service. In H6 B. iv. 2, 166, Cade says that in Henry V's time "boys went to span-counter for Fh. crowns": the idea being that Henry's victories in F. had made them as common as pennies. In H5 iv. 1, 242, the K. says, "Indeed, the Fh. may lay 20 French crowns to 1, they will beat us; for they bear them on their shoulders; but it is no English treason to cut Fh. crowns, and to-morrow the K. himself will be a clipper." Clipping or cutting the coin of the realm was a capital offence. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Carlo says, "You should give him a Fh. crown for it; the boy would find 2 better figures in that." The figures are the shield and the crown surmounting it on the coin. In Ret. Pernass i. 1, Ingenioso says, "The world shall hardly give me a cracked crown, although it gives other poets Fh. crowns." In Haughton's Englishmen ii. 2, Pizarro tips the Post generously, and he exclaims, "What! a Fh. crown? sure he knows not what he does." In Marlowe's Faustus iv., Wagner gives the Clown some Fh. crowns; and he says, "Mass, but for the name of Fh. crowns, a man were as good have as many English counters." The allusion is to the depreciation in the value of Fh. money in England in 1595 owing to the large sums which had been received from F. in trade, and in payment of loans by Henri IV. In B. & F. Thomas i. 2, Sebastian says to Launcelot, "Tell me plainly lest I crack your Fh. crown." In Marlowe's Massacre i. 1, Guise says, "From Spain the stately Catholics Send Indian gold to coin me Fh. écus." In Jack Drum ii. 177, John says, "Me send a Fh. crown to fetch a fine wench, de fine wench take de Fh. crown and give me de Fh. poc." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, Monsieur says, "A Fh. crown would plentifully serve To buy both to anything." In Dekker's If it be 298, the Bravo says punningly, "We turn away cracked Fh. crowns every day." One of the results of the "Frerich disease" was baldness, and many puns are made on this subject. In Meas. i. 2, 52, Lucio says, "I have purchased as many diseases under her roof as come to—" The 2nd Gentleman interposes: "To 3000 dolours a year." The 1st adds: "Ay, and more"; and Lucio concludes: "A Fh. crown more." In M. N. D. i. 2, 97, Bottom says, "I will discharge it in your Fh.-crown-coloured beard": and Quince retorts, "Some of your Fh. crowns have no hair at all." In L. L. L. iii. 1, 142, Costard says, "Remuneration! Why, it is a fairer name than Fh. crowns," i.e. it has not the same unpleasant connotation. In All's ii. 2, 23, the Clown says his answer is "as fit as your Fh. crown for your taffeta punk": it being, with its unsavoury innuendo, a suitable fee for such a woman.

The chief articles imported from France were wines and textiles, especially silk and velvet. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "The Fh. affects the Orleans grape." In Davenant's Wits iv., Thwack says, "Our Fh. and Deal wines are poisoned so with brimstone by the Hollanders that they will only serve for medicine." In Massinger's Great Duke ii. 2, Petruchio speaks of the wines drunk by the northern nations of Europe as "Fh. trash, made of rotten grapes And dregs and lees of Spain, with Welsh metheglin." In Hester (A.P. ii. 270), Hardy-dardy says, "He that would drink wine and hath never a vine Must send or go to F." In Chaunticleers xiii., Welcome complains that men would rather "be drunk like the Fn. with claret than with their own native beer." In Trag. Richd. II i. 1, 89, Arondel claims to have captured so much wine from the Fh. "As that a tun of high-prized wines of F. Is hardly worth a mark of English money." In Webster's Weakest i. 2, Bunch says, "This F. . . is a goodly country, but it breeds no ale-herbs; good water . . . and de vine blanket [i.e. vin blanquette, one of the Gascony wines], and de vine coverlid, dat is vine claret for great out-rich cobs." In Meas. i. 2, 35, the 1st gentleman says to Lucio, "I has as lief be a list of an English kersey as to be piled as thou art piled for a Fh. velvet." The manufacture of velvet was introduced from Italy into F., and was greatly encouraged by Francis I, Henri II, and Henri IV. Its chief seat was, and is still, at Lyons. The joke, such as it is, depends on the double meaning of "Piled": (1) stripped of hair as the result of the Fh. disease; (2) covered with a short furry pile, like velvet. A particular shade of dark brown was known as Fh. russet. In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Knight says, "Take these letters, burn 'em to Fh. russet." Watches of good quality were made in F. In Lawyer iii., Curfew asks, "How speaks your watch? Who made it, Fh. or Dutch?"

Various articles are spoken of as French. Almanacs originally contained astronomical information, but in the 16th and 17th cents. began to be mostly taken up with astrological predictions both of public events and of the weather. In Jonson's Fortun. Isl., Johphiel says that Zoroastres "is confuting a Fh. almanac." Beds.—In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Jolly says, "'Tis such a sight to see great Fh. beds full of found children, dozens in a bed." Beans.—The Fh. bean is Phaseolus Vulgaris: it has a very fragrant smell in blossom. In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Face says that Druggier's tobacco smells "like conserve of roses or Fh. beans." In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Judas speaks of "Fh. beans, where the fruits are ripened, like the people, in old tubs." The reference is to the treatment of the Fh. disease by medicated baths. Chariots.—Dekker, in his Dream (1620), speaks of "Dames who each day in Fh. chariots sat Glistering like angels." Cock.—Gallus means both a Gaul and a cock; and from the time of the rebellion of Julius Vindex in the reign of Nero, when it was said that the Emperor would be waked by the crowing of the Gallus, the name has been applied to the Fh. In K. J. v. 2, 130, the Bastard describes the Fh. as thrilling and shaking, "Even at the crying of your nation's crow, Thinking his voice an armed Englishman." Curtal.—A bob-tailed horse. In Brome's Northern iii. 2, Squelch says, "If ever I marry, let me be cropt and slit worse than a Fh. curtal." Dolls.—In the Rates of customs for 1538 there is a duty on Puppets or Babies for children of 6s. 8d. the gross, which shows that they were imported from abroad. In Jonson's Epicoene iii. 2, Epicoene says to Morose, "Did you think you had married one of the Fh. puppets with the eyes turned with a wire?" Organs.—The great organ-builders of the 16th and 17th cents. were Englishmen and Germans. The Fh. builders were inferior to them in tone. In Lady Mother ii. 1, Suckett says to Timothy, "Do not squeak like a Fh. organ-pipe." Pears.—In All's i. 1, 175, Parolles says, "Your old virginity is like one of our Fh. withered pears, it looks ill, it eats drily." The scene of the play is laid in F. Petronels and Calivers.—The petronel was a large pistol which was fired with the butt resting against the chest: chiefly used by horse-soldiers. The caliver was a kind of musket. In B. & F. Cure ii. 2, Lucio asks, "What do you call this gun? a dag?" And Clara answers: "I'll give 't thee; a Fh. petronel." In Cuckqueans iv. 3, Oliver says, "I can help you to a couple Fh. keelevers." Playing Cards arranged in the four suits of clubs, diamonds, spades, and hearts were invented in F. in the 14th cent. In J. Florio's Second Frutes (1591), p. 69, one of the interlocutors asks, "What! Be these Fh. cards?" and is answered, "Yea, Sir, do you not see they have clubbs, spades, dyamonds, and hearts?" Purls.—Cords of twisted gold or silver for embroidery. In Goosecap ii. 1, Sir Gyles "will work you Fh. purls from an Angel to four Angels a yard." Rabbits.—In Killigrew's Parson v. 4, Careless says, "His head and belly look as blue and lank as Fh. rabbits." Rapiers.—The rapier was a light fencing sword, and was often used along with the poniard or dagger. The K., in Ham. v. 2, 156, bets 6 Barbary horses against "6 Fh. rapiers and poniards" on Hamlet's success in the fencing match. The Fd. dandy, in Middleton's Hubburt, wore "a glorious rapier and hangers all bossed with pillars of gold." In Meas. iv. 3, 15, Pompey speaks of "Master Starve-Lackey, the rapier and dagger man." In Nabbes' Bride iv. 4, Raven, being beaten in a fight, cries: "Pox on these Fh. blades! No point!" Stick.—A walking-staff. In Jonson's Devil iv. 1, Fitzdottrel, striking Pug, says, "I must walk with the Fh. stick like an old verger for you." Wolves.—In Middleton's No Wit iv. 1, Savourwit says, "Were it to challenge all the wolves in F., I'd be your half in 't."

The French language is one of the Romance languages derived from the Latin. It was held in some contempt by the English common people, although it was a mark of a man of fashion to be able to garnish his speech with a few tags of French. In a woman a knowledge of Fh. was regarded with some suspicion, as an indication of questionable morality. Chaucer, C. T. A. 126, says that the Prioress spoke Fh. "after the scole of Stratford-atte-Bowe, For Fh. of Parys was to hire unknowe." No passage has suffered more from erroneous quotation. Heylyn (s.v. FRANCE) says, "The language of the Fh. is amorous. A smooth language truly it is, the people leaving out in their pronunciation many of their consonants." The English Lord, in Merch. i. 2, 75, "hath neither Latin, Fh., nor Italian." The Duchess of York, in R2 v. 3, 124, protests, "The chopping Fh. we do not understand." In H5 v. 2, the K. speaks slightly of his own knowledge of Fh., "which I am sure will hang upon my tongue like a new-married wife about her husband's neck, hardly to be shook off." "By mine honour," he goes on, "in true English, I love thee." This is all historically absurd: Henry no doubt spoke Fh. as easily as English. In H6 B. iv. 2, 176, Cade decides that Lord Say is a traitor because he can speak Fh. Pistol, in H5 iv. 4, does not understand Fh., and has to get a boy to interpret between himself and Monsieur le Fer. In Jonson's Cynthia iii. 3, Amoroso tells Asotus, "Your pedant should provide you some parcels of Fh. to commence with, if you would be exotic and exquisite." In Haughton's Englishmen i. 1, Frisco says, "Pigs and Fen. speak one language, awee, awee." In B. & F. Brother ii. 2, the Cook says, "I'll make you pigs speak Fh. at table," i.e. cry, "Wee, wee," quasi "Oui." In Shirley's Pleasure iii. 2, Kickshaw says to Celestina, "You speak abominable Fh. And make a curtsy like a dairymaid." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "Your Fh. is a thing easily gotten, and when you have it, as hard to shake it off as 'twere your mother tongue." In Davenant's Platonic iii. 3, Jasper says, "Fh. is the smoothest and most prosperous language for courtship," i.e. courtly use. In Goosecap iv. 1, Sir Gyles observes, "In Fraunce they speak Fh. as well as their mother-tongue." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, the gentlewoman gives as proof of the Knight's learning, "He can speak the Fh. and the Italian." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Justiniano says to the bawd, Mrs. Birdlime, "You may speak Fh.; most of your kinds can understand Fh." In Webster's Law Case i. 2, Romelio forbids his wife to have anything to do "with a hackney-coachman, if he can speak Fh.": the inference being that he is a procurer in that case. Specimens of English as spoken by Frenchmen may be found in M. W. W. (Caius), Henry V (the Princess), Ret. Pernass. (Theodore), Three Ladies, Three Lords, Triumphs Love, Dekker's Fortunatus, Wonder of a Kingdom (Angelo), Club Law, Marius and Sulla (Pedro), Dr. Dodypoll, Anything for Quiet Life (Margarita), Sun's Darling, Jack Drum (Mons. John), Shirley's Ball (Le Frisk), and many others. The chief mark of this Fh.-English is the substitution of "d" or "t" for "th," and the pronunciation of "i" as "ee."

Law French is the Norman-Fh. in which the old laws of England were written. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 2, Kastrel says, "It goes like law-Fh. And that, they say, is the courtliest language." In Tomkis' Albumazar ii. 2, Trincalo says, "He'll boil me in a caldron Of barbarous law-Fh." In Stucley 297, Stucley says, "This law-Fh. Is worse than buttered mackerel, full of bones." In Davenant's Playhouse i. 1, the Player says, "Burlesque and travestie: These are hard words, and may be Fh., but not law-Fh."

Pedlar's French means thieves' slang: it has nothing to do with Fh., which is used merely in the sense of an unintelligible language. In Massinger's Virgin ii. 1, Spungius says, "We were speaking in pedlar's Fh." In B. & F. Friends i. 2, Bellario speaks of himself as one "that, instead of pedlar's Fh., gives him plain language for his money." A book was published in 1592 entitled, The Groundworke of Conny-Catching; the manner of their Pedlers-French and the meanes to understand the same. In Nash's Summers (Haz., viii. 69), we read of "Beggars that profess the pedlar's Fh." In Love and Fortune iv. 1, Lentulo says, "And you can speak any pedlar's Fh., tell me what I say." In Middleton's Family v. 3, Club says, "I like that law well; there's no quiddits nor pedlar's Fh. in it." In Underwit ii. 2, his mistress says to Courtwell, who has been quoting his poetry to her, "Out upon 't! Pedlar's Fh. is a Christian language to this." Dekker, in Lan-thorn, speaking of thieves, says, "For that cause was this language (which some call Pedlers Fh.) invented, that they might freely utter their minds to one another, yet avoid the danger." He gives several examples of this curious lingo. In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Jack Dapper says, "I'll give a school-master half-a-crown a week and teach me this pedlar's Fh." Several examples are quoted in this scene, of which one may be given here: "A gage of ben rom-bouse In a bousing ken of Rom-vile Is benar than a caster, Peck, pennam, lap, or poplar, Which we mill in deuse a vile. O I wud lib all the light-mans, O I would lib all the darkmans By the salomon, under the ruffmans, By the salomon, in the hartmans, And scour the queer cramp ring, And couch till a palliard docked my dell, So my bousy nab might skew rom-bouse well. Avast, to the pad let us bing": which is, being interpreted, "A quart-pot of good wine in an alehouse of Lond. is better than a cloak, meat, bread, butter-milk, or porridge, which we steal in the country. O I would lie all the day, O I would lie all the night, by the mass under the bushes, by the mass in the stocks, and wear fetters, and lie till a scoundrel lay with my wench, so my drunken head might quaff wine well. Avast, to the highway let us hence." A Pedlar's Fh. is used for a beggar. In Histrio iv. 1, Mavortius laments the degeneracy of the times, "When every Pedlar's-Fh. is termed Monsigneur."

FRANCELIA. The imaginary scene of Suckling's Goblins.

FRANCHE COMTÉ. A province in France, E. of Burgundy and W. of the Jura. Originally a fief of the Duke of Burgundy, it passed to Spain in 1493, and remained a Spanish province till 1674, when it was, for the second time and definitely, conquered by Louis XIV. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iii. 1, Brun says, "Your truest friends advise you for your latest hope To make retreat into the F. C." There he would be out of the jurisdiction of the French K. In Consp. Byron i. 1, 41, Rochette complains that the Infanta Isabella, who married the Archduke of Austria, "Had the F.-C. and Low Provinces."

FRANCKOLIN. A name for Tarragona, a city in N.E. Spain, at the mouth of the FrancoLi. Baltazar Gracian (1584-1658), a Spanish prose writer of the Gongorist School, was rector of the Jesuit College at Tarragona. In Cockayne's Trapolin v. 3, the hero says, "You take me for a doctor—Gracian of F., I warrant you—or a fool in a play, you're so saucy with me."

FRANKFURT. A city on the right bank of the Main abt. 20 m. E. of its confluence with the Rhine. It was the most ancient of the 4 free cities of the German Confederation and the meeting-place of the Diet. In the Guildhall, or Remer, are the Wahlzimmer, where the emperors were elected, and the Kaisersaal, where they held their public dinner after election. The Golden Bull of 1356 is still preserved in the archives. It was a great commercial and banking centre, and its 2 fairs at Easter and in August or September were thronged by tens of thousands of traders from all over Europe. In Merch. iii. 1, 89, Shylock laments the loss of his diamond which "cost me 2000 ducats in Frankfort." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Cesario, coming into the inn where Forbosco is entertaining the company, cries: "How now? a Frankford mart here?" Marlowe's Jew iv. 1, has debts owing in F. In Cromwell ii. 1, Cromwell, in Antwerp, inquires of the Post, "You go so far as Frankford, do you not?" In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 295, the Burse at Rome is said to be built "after the manner of Frankford and Embden; with sts. and pent-houses where the merchants meet." The meeting for the election of the Emperor, in Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, is held in "The Hall of Electors at F."

FRANKFURT. A city on the Oder in Germany, 50 m. E. of Berlin: it was the seat of a university which was founded in 1506. In Greene's Friar iv. 114, Vandermaast mentions F. as one of a long list of universities where he has given the scholars the non-plus.

FREE-TOWN, or VILLAFRANCA. A town in Italy, on the Tanaro, 10 m. S.W. of Verona. It has a fine old castle. In Rom. i. 1, 109, the Prince of Verona says to old Montague, "Come you this afternoon To old F.-t., our common judgement-place." Shakespeare got the name from Arthur Brookes' Romeus and Juliet 1937, but Brookes makes F.-t. the castle of the Capulets: "Our castle called Freetowne."

FRENCH CHURCH. Ch. of St. Anthony's Hospital in Threadneedle St., Lond., granted to the French Protestant refugees by Edward VI. It was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt, but the building of the New Royal Exchange required an approach in Threadneedle St., and it was pulled down. See under ST. ANTHONY'S HOSPITAL. In Mayne's Match iv. 5, Baneswright says to Warehouse, "You must be married, Sir, at the F. Ch; I have bespoken the priest, one that will join you I' the right Geneva form without a licence." In Wapull's Tarrieth, B. 4, Helpe says, "To sell a lease dear, whoever that will, At the F. or Dutch ch. let him set up his bill; What an Englishman bids they will give as much more."

FRESSINGFIELD. Vill. in Suffolk, some 5 m. S. of Harleston. It has a fine old Norman ch. The heroine of Greene's Friar is Margaret, the Fair Maid of F., the Keeper's daughter, with whom Prince Edward falls in love. The whole story is fictitious. Scenes 8, 10, and 14 are laid at F.

FRIAR, THE. A Lond. house-sign near the Stocks Market, q.v. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 282, Tawnie-Coat says, "Sure this is the lane; there's the Windmill; there's the Dog's Head in the Pot; and here's the Fryer."

FRIARS, THE. An abbreviated name for Blackfriars, q.v. Friar, formerly F., St., running from Carter Lane to Ireland Yard, preserves the name. In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Subtle mocks Face as "an Honest, plain, livery-three-pound-thrum, that kept Your master's worship's house here in the Friers": it is in this house that the scene of the play is laid; in iv. 1, Mammon says of Doll: "This nook here of the Friers is no climate For her to live obscurely in." Lord Cobham had his house in the F., and writes to Mellersh in 1605 to let him know if his house at the F. is seized. In Killigrew's Parson v. 1, the Capt. says, "There's a new play at the Fryers to-day," i.e. the Blackfriars Playhouse.

FRIARS' BRIDGE. A b. at Greenwich by the Convent of the Grey Friars, founded by Edward IV, and finally suppressed by Elizabeth. In Oldcastle iii. 4, the K. (Henry V) orders Butler, "Go down by Greenwich and command a boat, At the F. B. attend my coming down." The b. was over a small brook flowing into the Thames.

FRIBURGUM (i.e. FRIBOURG). The capital of the canton of the same name in Switzerland, lying on the Saane,

22 m. E. of the S. end of Lake Neuchâtel. In Bacchus, the 20th guest was "one Tom Tospot; he came from F., an Helvetian."

FRIDAY STREET. Lond., running S. from Cheapside to Cannon St., between Old Change and Bread St. It gained its name from the fishmongers who sold fish there for consumption on Friday, the fast day in the Roman Catholic Ch. At the Cheapside corner was the Nag's Head Inn. The White Horse was at the end of the st. on the W. side. St. Matthew's Ch. stood on the W. side, but has now been pulled down. In Jonson's Christmas, Gambol announces: "Here's one o' F.-st. would come in." Christmas answers: "By no means, nor out of either of the Fish sts. admit not a man; they are not Christmas creatures; fish and fasting days! foh!" Gambol consequently announces: "No body out o' F. st. nor the 2 Fish sts. there, do you hear?" In Nabbes' Spring, Shrovetide calls Lent "This lean thingut starveling, begot by a Spaniard, and nursed at the lower end of F. st." One of Thos. Weelkes' Ayres (1608) begins: "The Ape, the Monkey, and Baboon did meet, And breaking of their fast in F. st. Two of them sware together, etc." In Peele's Jests (1627), we read that "George was invited to supper one night at the White Horse in F. St."

FRIEDLAND. A town in Bohemia, at the junction of the Wittich and the Rasnitz, 68 m. N.E. of Prague. The castle, built in 1014, stands on a hill at the S. end of the town. Wallenstein was D. of F. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 1, Leslie says, "These court Parasites and the Emperor's weak distrusts Puts this disgrace on Fridland," i.e. Wallenstein.

FRIESLAND. The most N. of the provinces of Holland. It is sometimes called W. F. to distinguish it from E. F. in Hanover. Hycke, p. 88, names Freslonde as one in the long list of countries he has visited. In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. v. 1, Arthur says, "The Scots and Picts and Orcades we wan, The Danes and Goths and F. men." In Chaucer, Rom. Rose 1093, we read of a jewel "worth all the gold in Rome and Fryse." Fryse is not in the original French, and is added merely to rhyme with wyse. In Barnavelte iv. 5, Sir John is described as "Advocate of Holland and W. F." The name suggested that it was a particularly cold country, quasi Freeze-land. In Brewer's Lovesick King ii., Canute says of Cartesmunda: "She is colder than Freezeland snow, and yet she burns me." In Dekker's Dream (1620), "The Muffe, the Scythian, and the Freeze-land-boore" are mentioned as inhabitants of very cold countries. F. produced a breed of horses that were small but nuggety, and Markham says they could "make a good career." In Kyd's Soliman i., Basilisco says, "The grass grew, else had my F. horse perished." Hall, in Satires v. 4, 13, scoffs at the farmer's son who "hires a Frieze-land trotter, half yard deep, To drag his tumbrel through the staring Cheap." In Glapthorne's Hollander iv. 1, Urinal says, "Alas, poor gentlewoman, would they have thee covered with a Frisland horse, a Dutch stallion?" In Rabelais' Gargantua i. 12, the Hero says, "I will bestow upon you this Frizeland horse."

FROGMORE. Vill. close to Windsor Castle on the road to Staines. In M. W. W. ii. 3, 78, the Host first instructs Shallow, Page, and Slender, "Go you through the town to F." Then he says to Caius, "Go about the fields with me through F." In iii. 1, Evans is waiting for Caius in a field near F.; and at line 33, Simple cries: "There comes my master, Master Shallow, and another gentleman from F., over the stile."

FROMAGHAM. See FRAMLINGHAM.

FRONTIGNAC. A small town on the Gulf of Lyons, close to Montpellier, in S. France. It is famous for its muscatel wine and raisins. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Young Palatine says, "Nothing could please your haughty palate but The muscatelli and Frontiniac grape." In Alimony i. 2, Timon speaks of the poet's pericranium "deeply steeped in Frontiniac."

FRUITERERS' HALL. In Worcester Place, which ran S. from Upper Thames St. The Mystery of F. in Lond. was incorporated in 1606 with a master, wardens, and assistants, and it was their custom to present the Lord Mayor every year with 12 bushels of apples. In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Folly calls Autumn "This apple-john Kent and warden of F. H."

FULBOURN. Vill. in Cambridgesh., 5 m. E. of Cambridge. In Mankind (Farmer, Anon. Plays, p. 23), Now-a-days says, "I shall spare Master Wood of F."

FULDEN, or FOULDEN. A vill. in Berwicksh., 4 m. N.E. of Berwick. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, Surrey says, "Can they Look on . . . the pile of F. O'erthrown . . . And yet not peep abroad?"

FULHAM. A vill. in Middlesex, abt. 6 m. W. of St. Paul's, on the N. bank of the Thames, opposite to Putney. The palace of the Bps. of Lond. has been there since the reign of Henry VII, and stands on the banks of the river a little W. of the village. It is now practically a suburb of Lond. In J. Heywood's Weather (Farmer, p. 100), Merry Report says, "I have been . . . at F., at Faleborne, and at Fenlow." In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Mayberry says, "He [Featherstone] has land between F. and Lond." In Westward iii. 4, Monopoly says, "Here's an honest gentleman was born at F." In Cromwell i. 1, Hodge, of Putney, speaks of "goodman Car of F.; O, he knows the stars." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 1, Sir Lionel says, "To-morrow I remove into the Strand, There for this quarter dwell, the next at F." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Carlo says of Shift, "He keeps high men and low men. He! he has a fair living at Fullam." The joke depends on the fact that a kind of dice used for cheating was called Fullam. So, in M. W. W. i. 3, 94, Pistol says, "Let vultures gripe thy guts; For gourd and fullam hold, and high and low Beguile the rich and poor." In Nobody i. 337, Sicophant asks, "Give me some bales of dice. What are these?" And Somebody replies: "These are called high fulloms, those low fulloms." In N.E.D. it is stated that F. was "once a noted haunt of gamblers," and that this may be the reason for the use of fullam for a false die. It is also suggested as an alternative that fullam, or fullom = full one, i.e. a loaded die.

FULLER'S RENTS (more properly FULWOOD'S RENTS). A court in Lond., opposite the end of Chancery Lane, leading from Holborn into Gray's Inn Walks. It was chiefly occupied by taverns and ale-houses, and had the privileges of sanctuary for debtors and other fugitives from justice. In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless, having got hold of some money, says, "I need no more insconsing now in the forts of F.-R. and Milford-lane, whose walls are daily battered with the curses of bawling creditors." In his Damoiselle i. 2, Bumpsey reproaches Dryground with his poverty, which makes him "live confined in Milford Lane or F.R. or who knows where."

FURLY = FORLI. The old Forum Livii, a city in N. Italy, near Ravenna, 170 m. N. of Rome. Cæsar Borgia besieged Catharine Sforza in F., and took it in 1499. The story of the siege forms the subject of iv. 4 in Barnes' Charter.

FURNIVAL'S INN. An Inn of Court in Lond., formerly an Inn of Chancery, and afterwards attached to Lincoln's Inn. It stood on the N. side of Holborn between Leather Lane and Brooke St., where F. I. Buildings now are. The Society ceased to exist in 1817, and the whole I. was rebuilt in 1818. Shirley's Bird was "Printed by B. Alsop and T. Fawcett for William Cooke, and are to be sold at his shop near F. I. Gate in Holborne. 1633."

GABII. A town in Latium, 12 m. from Rome on the road to Præneste. Its site is marked by the ruins of a mediaeval fortress called Castiglione. It was an important place in the early days of Rome, but in the time of the Empire it is described by Horace as deserted: Lebedus, he says, is "desertior Gabiis" (Ep. i. 11, 7); and Juvenal speaks of it as an insignificant village. In Sat. x. 100, he says, "Would you rather don the state-robe of this wretch now being dragged along, or be a municipal magnate of Fidenæ or G., delivering judgments on weights and measures?" (Leeper's trans.). This last passage is imitated in Nero iv. 1, where Nero says, "Would I had rather in poor G. Or Ulubrae a ragged magistrate, Sat as a judge of measures and of corn, Than the adored monarch of the world."

GAD. The 7th son of Jacob, from whom the tribe of Gad was descended. It occupied the fertile lands to the east of the Jordan. In Marston's Insatiate i. 1, we read: "Thou Jew of the tribe of Gad, that sure, were there none here but thou and I, wouldst teach me the art of breathing."

GADES. The old name of Cadiz, known to the Elizabethans as Cales, q.v. It was looked upon as the W. extremity of the world by the ancients. In the old Timon i. 4, Pseudocheus says, "At G. I washed away Non ultra writ with Hercules' own hand." G. was a day's journey from the Pillars of Hercules. In Fisher's Fuinus iv. 4, Cæsar says, "From Ganges to Hesperian G. Our name doth sound." In T. Heywood's B. Age v., Hercules says, "Here stand our pillars with non ultra insculpt Which we must rear beyond the Pyrene Hills At G. in Spain." In Tourneur's Atheist iii. 1, D'Amville says of Montferrers and Charlemont that they were so great and good "that on These 2 Herculean pillars where their arms Are placed there may be writ Non ultra." Milton, P. R. iv. 77, describes embassies coming to Rome "From Gallia, G., and the British west." In S. A. 716, the Chorus describes Dalila as sailing up "Like a stately ship of Tarsus, bound for the isles Of Javan or Gadire," i.e. G. The women of G. had a reputation in antiquity for lascivious dances. Martial has many references to them, and Juvenal (xi. 160) warns his guests not to expect at his banquet to be entertained by Gaditanean girls dancing their fandangos. In Massinger's Actor iii. 2, Stephanos says to Domitilla, "Sit down with this, And the next action, like a Gaditane strumpet, I shall look to see you tumble." Hall, in Satires iv. 1, says, "He tells a merchant tidings of a prize . . . Worth little less than . . . G. spoils." The reference is to the taking of Cadiz in 1596.

GADIRE. A form of Gades, q.v.

GADLIBRIENS. An imaginary tribe near the Antipodes. In Brome's Antipodes iv. 10, Peregrine says, "Mandivell writes of people Near the Antipodes, called G.: Where on the wedding night the husband hires Another man to couple with the bride."

GADSHILL. A hill on the road from Lond. to Rochester, 2½ m. from Rochester and abt. 27 from Lond. It was a well-known resort of footpads and highwaymen. In H4 A. i. 2, 139, Poins says, "My lads, to-morrow morning by 4 o'clock, early at G.! There are pilgrims going to Canterbury with rich offerings and traders riding to Lond. with fat purses. If you will go, I will stuff your purses full of crowns." The scene of ii. 2, where the robbery takes place, is "the road by G." In

iii. 3, 43, Falstaff recalls how Bardolph ran "up G. in the night" to catch his horse. In H4 B. i. 2, 170, the Chief Justice says to Falstaff, "Your day's service at Shrewsbury hath a little gilded over your night's exploit on G." In ii. 4, 333, Prince Hal says to Falstaff, "You knew me, as you did when you ran away by G." There is record in the Lansdowne MSS. of an actual robbery perpetrated on G. in 1590 by 2 thieves called Custall and Manwaring. They had good horses, and one of them wore a "vizard grey beard." The date of H4 is 1596. In Oldcastle iv. 1, the parson-highwayman gives a list of the places in Kent which, as he humorously says, "pay him tythe." G. is one of them. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Sogliardo says of Shift: "He has been the only Bidstand that ever kept Newmarket, Salisbury Plain, Hockley i' the Hole, G. He has done 500 robberies in his time, more or less." In Dekker's Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says of a certain lady of bad repute: "She lies, as the way lies over G., very dangerous." In Clavell's Recantation (1634), he says, "I oft have seen Gadd's Hill and those red tops of mtns. where good people lose their ill-kept purses." In Fam. Vict., p. 329, Dericke says to the thief, "I know thee for a taking fellow Upon Gad's Hill in Kent."

GÆTULIA. A dist. in N.W. Africa, lying S. of Mauretania, between it and the desert. It stretched from the S. of the Syrtis to the Atlantic. In Marlowe's Dido iii. 1, Iarbas says, "Am I not k. of rich G.?" In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says that Juba, K. of Mauretania, was "Backed with Numidian and Getulian horse." In Kyd's Cornelia iii., the Chorus laments that Romans "run, like exiled us, From fertile Italy to proudest Spain Or poorest Getuly." In Lyly's Midas iii. 1, Midas says, "I call to mind my usurping in Getulia." His conscience was needlessly active, for he was never there.

GAINSBOROUGH. A town in Lincs. on the Trent, 15 m. N.W. of Lincoln and 35 m. N.E. of Nottingham. The Trent is navigable as far as G., which is an important river-port. In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 12, the men of Nottingham petition the Q. to have the Trent made navigable from Nottingham "to G."

GALALE. See GALILEE.

GALATIA. A province in the centre of Asia Minor, so called from the Galli who settled there in the 3rd century B.C. In Lyly's Midas iv. 1, Midas fears lest "the petty kings of Mysia, Pisidia, and G." should find out that he has asses' ears. G. was not known by that name till long after the time of Midas.

GALICIA. A province in N.W. Spain. The shrine of St. James at Santiago di Compostella was a great resort of pilgrims in the Middle Ages. Like the rest of Spain, it produces nuts. In Piers C. v. 124, the author, denouncing pilgrimages, would have it provided "that non go to Galys bote it be for evere." The pilgrim, in C. viii. 166, had "shilles [shelles] of Galys" as proof that he had been there. Chaucer's Wife of Bath (C. T. A. 466) had been "in Galice at Seint Jame." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 3, Usumcasanes says to Tamburlaine, "We have subdued the S. Guallatia And all the land unto the coast of Spain." The context shows that S. Spain is meant. In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Bp. says of Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador: "That Gn. brain can work out wonders." In Coventry M. P. of Mary Magdalen 478, the Taverner says he has "wine of Gyldyr and of Galles," i.e. G. In Middleton's Gipsy ii. 1, Constanza says, "They that crack me shall find me as hard as a nut of G."

GALILEE. The most northerly of the 3 divisions of Palestine in the 1st cent. A.D., lying N. of Samaria and W. of the Sea of G. The word was also applied to a porch in front of a ch. In Barnes' Charter v. 5, Alexander offers Cæsar Borgia a phial of antidote against poison: "I bought it," he says, "of a Jew Born and brought up in Galily." In York M. P. xii. 136, the Prologue says, "Fro God in heaven is sent An angel is named Gabriell, To Nazareth in Galale." Milton, P. R. i. 135, represents the Almighty saying to Gabriel, "I sent thee to the Virgin pure In G." In iii. 233, the Tempter says to our Lord that he has yet "scarce viewed the Galilæan towns." In Lycidas 109, Peter is called "The pilot of the Galilæan lake," i.e. the Sea of G. or Gennesaret, lying E. of G. In Heming's Jewes Trag. 1959, Eleazar says, "Cæsar's son has conquered G. And now is marching to Jerusalem." The date is A.D. 67.

GALLES. See GALICIA.

GALLIA (Gl. = Gaul). The Latin name for what is now France. The form Gaul was used both for the country and its inhabitants. It is most properly used of the country and people during the Roman period. In Brandon's Octavia 117, Octavia says of Marcellus, confusing her husband with the great M. Marcellus, who won the Spolia Opima from the Gl. Viridomarus in 222 B.C., "His middle age the stoutest Gl. did fray." In Shirley's Honoria ii. 2, Honoria says, "Does he not look like mighty Julius now, when he returned triumphant from the Gl.?" In Jonson's Catiline iii. 3, Catiline says, "What the Gl. or Moor could not effect Nor emulous Carthage . . . Shall be the work of one, and that my might," i.e. the destruction of Rome. In B. & F. False One i. 1, Achilles says, "'Tis Labienus, Cæsar's lieutenant in the wars of Gl." He was one of Cæsar's most trusted officers in the Gallic Wars of 58-50 B.C., but on the outbreak of the Civil War he deserted to the Pompeians. In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 5, young Cato says, "No Gl. Would with such cruelty thy worth repay," when his father is about to kill himself. In Jonson's Poetaster iii. 2, Horace says, "Nor is't a labour fit for every pen To paint . . . The lances burst in G.'s slaughtered forces. Great Cæsar's wars cannot be fought in words." In Nero ii. 3, Scævinius says, "Shall we, whom neither The Median bow . . . Nor the fierce Gl. . . could Subdue, lay down our necks to tyrant's axe?" Milton, P. R. iv. 77, describes embassies coming to Rome "From G., Gades, and the British West." In Cymbeline, the date of which is the latter part of the 1st cent. A.D., we read in several passages of the Roman legions now in G., which are expected to invade Britain. See ii. 4, 18; iii. 5, 24; iii. 7, 4; iv. 2, 333; and iv. 3, 24. In i. 6, 66, Iachimo tells of a Frenchman "that much loves a Gn. girl at home." In i. 6, 201, he says, "From G. I crossed the seas on purpose and on promise To see your Grace." Gl. is also used for the Galli who invaded Greece in the 3rd cent. B.C. and afterwards settled in Thrace and in Galatia. In Cæsar's Rev. iv. 2, Cassius speaks of "Those conquering Gl. that built their seats in Greece." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) i. 48, calls the Galatians "the Gaules, our ancient forefathers in Asia." G. is also used for mediæval and modern France. In H5 i. 2, 216, Canterbury says to the K., "You withal shall make all G. shake." In v. 1, 94, Pistol says that he will swear he got the bruises which Fluellen has given him "in the G. wars." In H6 A. iv. 7, 48, the Bastard says of the Talbotts: "Their life was England's glory, G.'s wonder." In v. 4, 139, Charles boasts, "I am possessed With more than half the Gn. territories." In H6 C. v. 3, 8, Edward speaks of "those powers that the q. Hath raised in G." Kyd, in Soliman i. 3, says, "In France I took the standard from the k., And give [i.e. assume] the flower of G. in my crest," i.e. the fleur-de-lys. In King Lear, Haz., p. 378, Mumford addresses the French army, "Show yourselves now to be right Gawles indeed, And be so bitter on your enemies That they may say you are as bitter as Gall." In M. W. W. iii. 1, 99, the Host says to Evans and Caius, "Peace, Isay, G. and Gl.," but Farmer amended "Gualia and Gl.," where Gualia means Wales. In Massinger's Guardian i. 2, Calypso mentions "Amadis de Gl.," and in Dekker's Satiromastix i. 2, 492, Tuca calls Horace "My sweet Amadis de Gle.": Amadis was the son of Perion of France, and one of the most famous of the paladins of the old chivalrous times. His romance was in Don Quixote's library.

GALLOGRECIA. Another name for Galatia, q.v. In Tiberius 525, Germanicus speaks of "The Gallogretians proud for to rebel." This was in A.D. 15.

GALLOON. In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, Denis reads a prophecy in which it is said that "a g. helmet" is necessary for the carrying out of the prediction; and James says, "Here is a helmet framed in Normandy, Which I have worn in all my travels since." I suppose that g. means made in Gaul; otherwise there is no relevance in James' remark. Possibly we should read "Gallian."

GALLOWAY. Originally included the whole of the Peninsula in S.W. Scotland between the Solway Firth and the Clyde; later restricted to Kirkcudbright and Wigtown. Until the 13th cent. it was ruled by its own princes in feudal dependence on the Kings of Scotland. The lordship was in the Douglas family till 1455, when it was forfeited to the Crown. The present Earldom was created in 1623, and remains in the Stewart family. In Dekker's Fortunatus, there is a G. at the court of Athelstane in Lond. who is described as a Scotch noble. In Peele's Ed. I. p. 28, Elinor addresses Baliol as "Brave John Baliol, lord of G. and K. of Scots." He had gained the title by his marriage with Devergoil, the daughter and heiress of Allan of G. G. was famous for a breed of small, strong horses, mostly used for riding. In H4 B. ii. 4, 205, when Doll suggests that he should be turned out, Pistol exclaims, "Thrust him down stairs! Know we not G. nags?" He means that Doll is like a G. nag, because anyone may ride her. In Trouble. Reign. p. 308, Philip relates how he escaped destruction in the Wash: "Myself upon a G. right free, well-paced, Outstript the floods." In Dekker's Hornbook v., he advises the Gallant to ride to the Ordinary "upon your g-nag, or your Spanish jennet." In Jonson's Barthol. iv. 3, Knockem addresses the north-country man as "my g. nag." Drayton, in Polyolb. iii. 28, speaks of "the rank-riding Scots [betting heavily] upon their Gs." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, 56, asks, "Sayst thou that this same horse shall win the prize Because his dam was swiftest Trunchefice, Or Runcevall his sire?" himself a G.?

GALLUS. A small river rising in N. Phrygia, and flowing into the Sangarius in Bithynia. Lyly, in Euphues England, p. 405, says, "It fareth with lovers as with those that drink of the river G. in Phrygia, whereof sipping moderately is a medicine, but swilling with excess it breedeth madness." Blount, Glossographia (1656), s.v., says it is "a river in Phrygia, the water whereof made men mad." See Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxi. 5.

GAMAGE. A coppice at Penshurst named after the Lady G., the 1st wife of Sir Robert Sidney. Jonson, in Ode to Penshurst, says, "Thy copse, too, named of G., thou hast there."

GAMALA. A fortress of great strength on the E. side of the Sea of Galilee, generally identified with the present El Hosan. It was besieged and taken by Vespasian in the Jewish war which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. In Heming's Jewes Trag. 590, Titus reports that the ammunition "is brought from Antioch, within a day's journey of G."

GAMARA, or AMARA. Mtn. in the middle of Abyssinia, where, according to Heylyn, there were 34 palaces, and a library containing, amongst other things, the pillars of Enoch and the whole works of Livy. Gondar now occupies the site. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, Carionil, who pretends to be the ambassador of Prester John of Abyssinia, says, "I in Garama live Magnificent for silken palaces." In iv. 2, he says, "I can make famous G. as pleasing to you As is your native country." Evidently Garama in the former passage is a misprint or slip for G. Heylyn (s.v. TURCOMANIA) says, "The Emperors of Habassia use to impure up all their younger children in the hill A." Milton, P. L. iv. 281, speaks of "Mt. A.," "where Abassin Kings their issue guard," "under the Ethiop line By Nilus head, enclosed with shining rock A whole day's journey high."

GANDIA. A fortified city on the E. coast of Spain, in the province of Valencia, 210 m. S.E. of Madrid. The eldest son of Pope Alexander VI was D. of G. He appears in Barnes' Charter as the D. of Candie, and his murder by his brother, Cæsar Borgia, is the subject of iii. 5.

GANGES. A river in India rising in the Himalayas and flowing into the Bay of Bengal at Calcutta after a course of 1540 m. through the N.W. Provinces. In Marlowe's Dido v. 1, Æneas, as he plans the building of Rome, prophesies: "From golden India G. will I fetch, Whose wealthy streams may wait upon her towers." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Cæsar records the fulfilment of this prophecy: "From G. to Hesperian Gades Our name doth sound." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. v. 1, Tamburlaine says of himself: "From the bounds of Afric to the banks Of G. shall his mighty arm extend." In B. & F. Lover's Prog. iv. 4, Lisander says, "Can all the winds of mischief from all quarters, Euphrates, G., etc., Make it [this ocean] swell higher?" In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says to Cleopatra, "Thy beauty shining like proud Phœbus' face When G. glittereth with his radiant beams." In the old Timon ii. 5, Pseudocheus, in the course of his travellers' tales, says, "In G. Iles I 30 rivers saw Filled with sweet nectar." In Chapman's D'Olive iii. 1, Vandome says, "The Persian k. Made the great river G. run distinctly In an innumerable sort of channels; By which means, of a fierce and dangerous flood, He turned it into many pleasing rivers." The story is taken from Petrarch's Secretum, p. 358. So, in T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1519, Earth prays that she might have "So many rivulets of tears as was by thee [Cyrus] Let into G.' drops, thereby to breed Dry waste unto that channel drowned his steed." The author's note is "K. Cyrus, because he had a steed, whom he much loved, drowned in the river G., to be revenged thereof caused so many currents to be cut, that he dried the channel." In May's Agrippina ii. 57, Otho says that if Poppæa lived "beyond The Indian G., Scythian Tanais," she would draw the Emperor thither. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 21, mentions "great G." amongst the largest rivers in the world. Milton, P. L. iii. 436, compares Satan to a culture who "flies toward the springs Of G. or Hydaspis' Indian streams." In ix. 82, he tells how Satan surveyed the world, including "the land where flows G. and Indus." Hall, in Quo Vadis, p. 37, says, "We can tell of those cheap dieted men that live about the head of the G., without meat, without mouths, feeding only upon air at their nostrils."

GARAMA (misprint for GAMARA, q.v.).

GARAMANTES. A general name for the Libyans inhabiting the E. oases in the great desert of Africa: in a narrower sense the name is used for the people of Phazania, now Fezzan. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1818, Samson says that, though Fame "Be fled unto the sun-burnt Garamanti," she will not find his equal in strength.

GARDEN. The G. in the following passage is probably Covent G., q.v. In Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "You must to the Pawn to buy lawn, to St. Martin's for lace, to the G., to the Glass-houses."

GARDEN ALLEY. There were many gardens in Lond., as, for example, those at Gray's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, the Temple, Covent G., Bear G., Paris G., etc. These were the natural hunting-grounds of women of bad character, and in their alleys they plied their trade. In Nobody 1891, Nobody says, "Somebody doth maintain a common strumpet in G.-allies and undid himself." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram says to Meg, "Mayst thou live till thou stinkest in G.-as." In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress, the President of the Twiball knights, is described as "Duke of Turnbull, Bloomsbury, and Rotten Row, Lord Paramount of all G.-as., Gun Alley, and Rosemary Lane."

GARDENER'S LANE. St. in Westminster, running from 26 King St. to Delahay St. In Jonson's Staple iii. 2, Mirth says, "My gossip Tattle knew what fine slips grew in G. L.," i.e. what illegitimate children were born there. The pun suggested the choice of this particular st.

GARGAPHIE. A fountain and valley in Bœotia, close to Platæa. It was here that Actæon was turned into a stag and devoured by his hounds for having seen Diana bathing. In Chaucer, C. T. A. 2626, he says, "Ther nas no tygre in the vale of Galgopheye So cruel on the hunte as is Arcite." Probably Chaucer was thinking of Gargaphia, though there are no tigers there. In Jonson's Cynthia, Ind., one of the actors says, "The scene [of the play is] G.: which I do vehemently suspect for some fustian country," i.e. imaginary. In i. 1, Cupid says, "Diana, in regard of some slanders breathed against her for her divine justice on Actæon, hath here in the vale of G. proclaimed a solemn revels."

GARGARUS (more properly GARGARA). One of the peaks of the Ida range in Phrygia. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xviii. 4835, Mercury says, "Phrygia is not far, for in our view Ida and G. are."

GARMA (may be intended for the capital of the Garamantes, q.v., or possibly a slip for Gamra, i.e. GAMARA, q.v.). In Bacchus, the 19th guest came from G. in Æthiopia, called Goody Goodale."

GARRAK RUEN. The high land near Mylor in S. Cornwall, overlooking the N. end of Falmouth harbour, still called Carrick Roads. In Cornish M. P. i. 2464, Solomon says to the Mason, "My a re thyurgh plu Vuthek Ha'n G. R. gans by thyr," i.e. "I will give you the parish of Vuthek And the G. R. with its land."

GARTER. An Inn in Windsor, on the right side of Thames St. coming up from the river, just before one reaches Peasod St. The sign was the G. of the most noble Order of the Knights of the G. There is no trace of the G. left, but it probably stood on the site of the White Hart. Mine Host of the G. plays a leading part in M. W. W., and scenes i. 3; ii. 2; iii. 5; iv. 3, 5, 6; v. 1, are laid in the G. Inn, where Falstaff had his lodging.

GASCONY = GASCOIGNE. A dist. in S.W. France between the Bay of Biscay, the Garonne, and the Pyrenees. It was named from the Basques or Vasques who occupied it when the Visigoths drove them out of N. Spain. It became part of the Dukedom of Aquitania, and was in the possession of the English Crown from 1152 till 1453. The people of G. had a reputation for exaggeration and boastfulness. The chief product of the country was wine. In World Child, p. 170, Manhood claims to have conquered "France and also G." The reference is to the French conquest of 1453. Hycke, p. 88, claims to have been in "Brytayne, Byske, and also in Gascoyne." In Barnes' Charter i. 5, Gascons are among the troops of Charles VIII in his invasion of Italy, 1494. In Middleton's R. G. v. 2, Fitzallard ironically congratulates Wengrave on his son's marriage with Moll Cutpurse: "Give you joy, Sir, of your son's Gaskoyne bride; you'll be a grandfather shortly to a fine crew of roaring sons and daughters." The reference is to Moll's gasconnading tone: she is the "roaring girl." In Piers C. i. 229, the taverners cry, "White wine of Oseye and of Gascoyne." In Webster's Weakest iv. 3, Sir Nicholas says, "I promised to bowl a match at Guynes for a wager, viz. 2 gallons of G. wine." In Nash's Wilton 145, Jack says that his friends "know a cup of neat G. wine from wine of Orleance." The G. wine was much stronger than that of Orleans. In Greene's Quip (p. 243), he says, "If the vintner hath a strong G. wine, he can allay it with a small Rochel wine." In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Pert says, "It is not comely to see us sons of war walk by the pleasant vines of G., as we believed the grapes forbidden fruit." Taylor, Works (iii. 65), says, "No Gascoygne, Orleance, or the chrystall Sherrant, Nor Rhenish from the Rhine would be apparant." In Yarrington's Two Trag. i. 1, the Neighbour says, "I had rather drink such beer as this as any Gascoine wine." The scene of H6 A. iv. 3 and 4 is laid in the plains of G.

GATE HOUSE. A prison near the W. end of Westminster Abbey, with 2 gates, one to the N., the other to the W. It was here that Raleigh wrote, the night before his execution, the lines, "Even such is time, etc." Here also was the birthplace of Lovelace's To Althea from Prison. It was built in the reign of Edward III and pulled down in 1776. Taylor, Works (i. 91), says, "The ocean that Suretyship sails in is the spacious Marshal-sea, sometimes she anchors at the K.'s Bench, sometimes at the gulph of the Gate-house." The Gate was used as a debtors' prison. In Ev. Wom. I. i. 1, Acutus speaks of the bankrupt husband of an extravagant wife "carried from the Gate-house to his grave."

GATH. One of the 5 cities of the Philistines, in the maritime plain on the S. coast of Syria, abt. 25 m. W. of Jerusalem. It was never taken by the Israelites, and remained a thorn in their side until the close of the monarchy. It was the home of the famous giant Goliath. It is probably the modern vill. of Dhikrih. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, David says, "The plains of G. and As-karon rejoice, And David's thoughts are spent in pensiveness" (cf. II Samuel i. 20). In iii. 1, he speaks of Achis, mighty K. of G." Milton, P. L. i. 465, mentions that Dagon was worshipped "in G. and Ascalon." In S. A. 266, Samson says that if Judah had been united "They had by this possessed the towers of G." In 981, Dalila predicts that she will be famous "In Ecron, Gaza, Asdod, and in G." In 1068, Harapha of G. is introduced: in 1078, he says, "I am of G., Men call me Harapha." In 1127, Samson predicts to him, "Thou oft shalt wish thyself at G. . . but shalt never see G. more."

GAUL. See GALLIA.

GAULTREE FOREST (spelt GUALTREE in the Ff.). The f. of Galtres lay N. of York, and covered about 100,000 acres. It was a Royal f. till 1670, when it was cut up and enclosed. H4 B. iv. 1, 2, and 3 are laid in G. F.

GAUNT. See GHEENT.

GAYTON. A vill. in Norfolk, 6 m. E. of King's Lynn. In Mankind 502, Now-a-days says, "I shall go to William Baker of Walton; to Richard Bolman of G."

GAZA. The modern Ghazze, a town in Palestine, 50 m. S.W. of Jerusalem. It was one of the 5 Philistine cities. It has always been an important frontier fortress. It still has a population of some 1800. G. is the scene of Milton's S. A. In 435, Manoah says, "This day the Philistines a popular feat Here celebrate in G." In 981, Dalila predicts that she will be famous "In Ecron, G., Asdod, and in Gath." In 1558, after Samson's death, the Messenger reports: "G. yet stands; but all her sons are fallen." In P. L. i. 466, Dagon is said to be honoured "In . . . Accaron and G.'s frontier bounds." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 1, the K. of Jerusalem brings, or professes to bring, 100,000 men "from Jerusalem, Judæa, G., and Scalonia's bounds."

GEBAL. A mountainous dist. in Palestine, S. of the Dead Sea, now called Jebel. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 25, says, "G. and Ammon there conspire And hateful Amalek."

GEHENNA. The valley of Hinnom, S. of Jerusalem, where the refuse of the city was thrown and kept constantly burning: hence it is used in the New Testament of Hell, "where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched." Dekker, in News from Hell, speaks of the Devil as "the M. Gunner of G., M. standing for Master."

GELDERLAND. A province of the Netherlands lying S.E. of the Zuyder Zee. At the rise of the United Provinces most of G. joined them, but one part, Spanish G., remained true to Spain. At the Treaty of Utrecht this dist. went to Prussia, but in 1814 it became part of the kingdom of Holland. It was the scene of various operations in the wars of the 16th and 17th cents., and it was at Zutphen, one of its towns, that Sir Philip Sidney was killed. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. v. 2, Bots says, "I ha' been tried in G. and scaped hardly there from being blown up at a breach." In Northward iv. 2, Capt. Jenkin says, "I think she has sent the poor fellow to G." In both passages the double entendre is the motive for mentioning the place. In Barnaveit iv. 5, a document is produced against Barnaveit signed "by the Governor of G. and Zutphen." G. was famous for its fat cattle. Heylyn (s.v.) says, "In 1570 there was a Guelderland bull killed at Antwerpe which weighed 3200 pounds."

GELDERN (= French GUELDRES). A town in the Rhenish Provinces, 27 m. N.W. of Dusseldorf. It was founded in 1097, and was the residence of the sovereigns of the circle of G. till 1343. It gave its name to a variety of Rhenish wine. In Coventry M. P. of Mary Magdalen 478, the Taverner says he has "wine of Gyldyr and of Galles."

GEMONIES. The Scalæ Gemoniæ, a stone staircase at the N.E. corner of the Forum at Rome, between the Carcer and the Temple of Concord, where the bodies of executed criminals were exposed. In Jonson's Sejanus iv. 5, Arrius says, "May I say it rains or it holds up, And not be thrown upon the G.?" In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Lamia says, "Domitian . . . Is so inclined to blood that no day passes In which some are not fastened to the hook, Or thrown down from the G." Burton, A. M. iii. 1, 2, 3, says, "As so many Sejani, they will come down to the Gemonian scales." In Scot. Presb. iii. 1, Liturgy defies all torments to make him recant, including "Cemonian stairs, Phalarian bulls": where Cemonian is a misprint for Gemonian.

GENEZARET, or GENNESARET. A very fertile plain on the W. side of the Sea of Galilee, toward the N. end. The sea of Galilee is often called from it the Lake of G. Milton, P. R. ii. 23, describes the disciples seeking for our Lord in "each town or city walled On this side the broad lake G."

GENEVA. In Switzerland, at the S.W. end of the Lake of G., at the point where the Rhone leaves the Lake. In 1499 it became practically independent of the empire, and under the leadership of Farel and John Calvin it accepted the reformed principles in religion. Calvin's dictatorship made it "the moral capital of the half of Christendom, and the great frontier fortress against the invasions of Rome" (Webster). During the Marian persecution in England many of the British Protestants emigrated to G., including John Knox, Coverdale, Whittingham, Bodley, Sampson, and Gilby. Here, in 1560, they published the G., or "Breeches," Bible, which was the popular version in England until long after the publication of the Authorized Version in 1611. Numbers of pamphlets on the extreme Puritan side were issued from the G. presses, and G. print came to stand for that type of literature. The G. hat, bands, and gown became the outward and visible signs of the Puritan profession. In True Trag. epilogue, it is said, in compliment to Elizabeth, "Ieneva, France, and Flanders hath set down The good she hath done since she came to the Crown." But there was little love lost between the players and the Puritans, and almost all the references to G. in the plays are scornful and sarcastic. In New Custom ii. 2, Perverse Doctrine says, "Since these Genevian doctors came so fast into this land, Since that time it was never merry with England." In Middleton's Witch i. 1, Almachildes says to Amoretta, when she will not kiss him, "Amsterdam swallow thee for a Puritan and G. cast thee up again." In Barry's Ram v., Small-shanks taunts Throate, "Wert not thou a Puritan and put in trust to gather relief for the distressed G., and didst thou not run away with all the money?" In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 2, the Clown says, "I'll provide myself with another movable [i.e. mistress] and we will most purely retire ourselves to G." In their Elder B. iv. 4, Andrew says of a song that he overhears: "This was never penned at G.; the note's too sprightly." In Barry's Ram iv., Smallshanks, exhibiting Face as a performing baboon, says, "What can you do for the Pope of Rome? Hark, he stirreth not, he moveth not, he waggeth not; what can you do for the town of G., sirrah?" [He holds up his hands instead of praying.] "Sure," says Constantia, "this baboon is a great Puritan." In Mayne's Match iv. 5, Baneswright says, "You must be married At the French Ch. [i.e. the ch. granted to the French Protestants in Lond.]; I have bespoken a priest; One that will join you in the right G. form Without a licence." In Gascoigne's Government, Philotimus becomes a preacher "of singular commendation" in G., whilst Philosarchus is whipped "openly three several days in the market of G. and banished the town with great infamy." In Cockayne's Trapolin iv. 1, Bulflesh says of a Puritan: "He is a fellow of strange opinions and hath sent his son to G. to hear Jack Calvin preach."

In Pilg. Pernass. iii. 1, Stupido says, "Buy two or three hundred of catechisms of Jeneva's print and I warrant you will have learning enough." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Tristram says, "He has already spoiled his eyes with prying on G. prints." In Massinger's Milan i. 1, Graccho says, "If you meet an officer preaching of sobriety, Unless he read it in G. print, Lay him by the heels." In B. & F. Chances iii. 1, Don John says to the Puritan landlady, "Now could I willingly, were 't not for abusing thy G. print there, venture my body with thee." In Merry Devil, p. 245, the Host says, "Smith, I see by thy eyes thou hast been reading a little G. print," i.e. the smith's eyes are bloodshot with drinking, as if he had been reading the small blackletter of the G. version. In Chapman's D'Oliver ii. 2, D'Oliver describes a Puritan weaver: "Purbblind he was with the G. print." In Webster's Malfi iv. 2, the 3rd madman says, "Greek is turned Turk: we are only to be saved by the Helvetian translation": which apparently means the G. Bible.

In Davenant's Wits i. 1, Palatine says, "I am a new man, Luce; thou shalt find me in a G. band that was reduced from an old Alderman's cuff." Earle, in his Microcosm. xxxiv., says of the She Precise Hypocrite: "She is a non-conformist in a close stomacher and a ruff of G. print": a jocular application of the familiar term. The Puritans wore small ruffs which are compared to the small type of the G. Bible. In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Trifle speaks of a Puritan as "Your little-ruffed G. man or Fleming." In Mayne's Match v. 1, Newcutt says that Salewit looks "like a G. weaver in black who left the loom and entered into the ministry for conscience' sake." In Davenant's Platonic iii. 3, Arnoldo says, "He's grown demurer than a G. bride." In Armin's More-clacke H 4, Tutch says, "Nurse shall sing a G. psalm." In Cuckqueans iv. 10, Olivell directs the intending travellers, "You shall carry in one of your pockets G. Psalms; in the other Lady Matins. If you be taken by Spaniards, you shall shew them your Lady Matins; if by the English, you shall produce them your G. Psalms." The Lake of G. is not specially rich in fish, but several species are found there, including the Carp (Cyprinus Carpio). In Davenant's Wits iv., Engine, in a list of delicacies, mentions "Your aged carp, bred i' the G. Lake."

GENOA (It., GENOVA). Often called Geane and Jeane in the 15th and 16th cents. A city in Italy on the Gulf of Genoa, 75 m. S.E. of Turin. The rapid rise of the hills on which it is built gives it a most impressive appearance from the sea. Its origin is lost in antiquity, and it is said to be older than Rome itself. In the 11th and 12th cents. G. became a formidable sea-power, and about A.D. 1020 drove the Saracens out of Corsica and Sardinia. Rivalry broke out between G. and Pisa in the 12th cent., which ended in the disastrous defeat of the Pisans in a sea-fight at Meloria in 1282. The next hundred years were spent in wars with Venice with varied success: Venice came off victorious in 1380 in the battle of Chioggia. From this blow G. never fully recovered. She had been governed since 1339 by a Doge elected for life, but internal feuds distracted her until, in 1396, she renounced her independence and received a governor nominated by Charles VI of France. In 1528, however, Andrea Doria threw off the French domination and established a biennial dogeship, which lasted down to the time of Napoleon. In 1815 it was united to the Sardinian kingdom: it is now part of the kingdom of Italy.

Historical allusions. In Ed. III iii. 4, Loraine ascribes the defeat of the French at Cressy to the flight of "the garrison of Genoves That came from Paris, weary with their march." The Genoese archers opened the attack, but the reply of the English bowmen drove them into flight. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. i. 1, Alberto relates how his son Cesario returned "from the rescue of the G. fleet, Almost surprised by the Venetian galleys"; and how "the brave dames of war-like G." all fell in love with him. The scene of Ford's Lady's Trial is laid at G., and one of the characters is "the gallant of gallants, G.'s Piero" (i. 1). The date is in the early part of the 16th cent., and G. is fighting along with Florence against the Turks. B. & F. Valour also takes place at G.: in i. 1, Alice speaks of Valentine's son, whom "You lost at sea among the G. galleys." In Marston's Malcontent, the scene of which is laid at G., the D. of G. is the chief character; but in his preface Marston asserts that he has willingly erred "in supposing a D. of G., and in taking names different from that city's families." In his Ant. Rev. A. iii. 1, Piero writes: "The just overthrow Andrugio took in the Venetian Gulf hath assured the Genowaias of the justice of his cause." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. iv. 2, the D. of Venice thanks Giovanni for having "suppressed the late insolent Genoese." In Dekker's Wonder i. 1, Lotti is banished for "dealing with the Genoway." The scene of Glapthorne's Privilege and of Day's Law Tricks is laid at G. In Webster's Law Case the scene is laid in Venice, but the great Genoese families of the Fieschi, the Grimaldi, and the Doria are mentioned as pillars of the State. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. iii. 1, Bobadil boasts that he was at "the taking in of Tortosa last year by the Genoways." This was in 1597, the year before the 1st production of the play: in the edition of 1606 the reading was altered to "the taking in of what do you call it." In Shrew iv. 4, 4, the Pedant says, "Signior Baptista may remember me, Near 20 years ago, in G." Hycke, p. 88, relates that he has been "in Gene and in Cowe."

Trade and Commerce of Genoa. It was in G. that Tubal heard, in Merch. iii. 1, 102, that Antonio had an argosy cast away coming from Tripolis. In Day's Law Tricks v. 80, we read of "a Gn. merchant that with much suit ransomed" the speaker from the Turk. In Davenant's Favourite iii., we find a prayer that "the Genovesse may be dismissed without a tax upon his goods." In Killigrew's Parson iv. 7, the Parson says, "'Tis she that married the G. merchant." G. was one of the most important banking cities in the world. The Bank of St. George, founded in 1407, was one of the most ancient and famous in Europe. In Massinger's Madam iv. 2, Luke, rejoicing in the prospect of his wealth, says, "G.'s bankers shall look pale with envy When I am mentioned." In Davenant's Distresses v. 1, Basilente says to Orgemon, "You have received by letters of exchange from G. enough to furnish your imagined quality." Howell, Travels 41 (1642), says, "When a Jew meeteth with a Genoway, he puts his fingers in his eyes, fearing to be over-reached by him." In Jonson's New Inn iii. 1, Pierce says, "Mas. Bartholomew Burst has broken thrice." To which Tipto rejoins, "Your better man, the Genoway proverb says." The Genoese had learned the value of a judicious bankruptcy. Rabelais, Pantagruel iv., prol., calls the Genoese "greedy curmudgeons"; and says that their daily greeting to one another was "Santa e guadagno"—"Health and gain to you." The best-known products of G. were articles of jewellery and filigree work, and cloth of all degrees of fineness. In Merch iii. 1, Tubal returns from searching for Jessica, and tells Shylock that she "spent in G. in one night fourscore ducats"; and that he saw a ring there that she had sold for a monkey. In Dekker's Fortunatus iv., the Chorus says, "In G. may you take this fugitive Where, having cozened many jewellers, To England back he comes." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 1, Sencer says, "I can read service and marry, Que genus et flexum, though I go in Genes fustian." In Jonson's New Inn ii. 2, Tipto suggests to Lord Beaufort to wear "the cloke of G. set With Brabant buttons." The passage is repeated almost verbatim in B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Young Palatine gives a list of table delicacies, which includes "The red-legged partridge of the G. hills" and "G. paste." The former is the so-called red-legged partridge of Europe (Caccabis Rufa), as distinguished from the grey or English partridge. G. paste was a sweetmeat made of quinces, spices, and sugar. Other Genoese products were G. lettuce and G. treacle. It will not be forgotten that Christopher Columbus was, as Capt. Smith (Virginia i. 1) puts it, "a Genoesian." In Cockayne's Trapolin ii. 3, Horatio speaks of "proud and stately G., Renowned by her sea-faring citizen, Colombo."

GENOVESTAN. Apparently means "from Geneva": possibly it might mean "from Genoa," but the first suggestion suits the context better. In King Lear, Haz., p. 378, Mumford addresses the French army, "Ye valiant race of G. Gawles."

GEORGE, SAINT. The patron saint of England, q.v. With or without his dragon he was a common sign for taverns and other houses. In K. J. ii. 1, 288, the Bastard says, "St. G. that swinged the dragon and e'er since Sits on his horse back at mine hostess' door Teach us some fence." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Carlo says of the knight Puntarvolo, "When he is mounted, he looks like the sign of the G." In Strophe's Float i. 1, Irato says, "How long shall I, like to a painted G., Advance my idle sword?" There were G. Inns in Lond. on the S.W. of Drury Lane; on the N. of Snow Hill, near Holborn Bdge.; on the W. side of W. Smith-field; on the W. side of Aldersgate St.; in Dogwell Court off Bouverie St., afterwards Bowyer's Publishing Office; in Lombard St.; and on the E. side near the S. end of the Borough High St., Southwark. The G. and Vulture—the Vulture doubtless a corrupted form of the Dragon—is in Castle Court, off G. Yard, and dates from Elizabethan times: Dickens has conferred on it a new lease of life. In Deloney's Craft i. 10, Mrs. Eyre says, "We'll dine at my cousin John Barker's in St. Clement's Lane, which is not far from the G. in Lombard-st. where the merchant-strangers lie." In Abington i. 2, Coomes says, "Now do I stand like the G. at Colebrook." This tavern is also mentioned in Deloney's

Craft ii. 11. In B. & F. Prize i. 3, Petronius says, "We shall have you look like St. G. at Kingston Running afoot back from the furious dragon That with her angry tail belabours him For being lazy." The merry Host of the G. at Waltham, named Blague, is one of the characters in the Merry Devil. In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Sad says, "I cannot amble nor ride like St. G. at Waltham." The same sign was used by the booksellers. The Ship of Folly was "Imprinted in the cyte of Lond. in Fletestrete at the sign of Seynt G. by Richd. Pynson. 1509." The 1660 edition of the Book of Merry Riddles was "Printed for John Stafford and W. S. and are to be sold at the G. near Fleetbridge." Pynson's shop was next to St. Dunstan's churchyard by the Chancery Lane corner. Sidney's Apology for Poetry was "Printed for Henry Olney and are to be sold at his shop in Paules Churchyard at the sign of the G. near to Cheap-gate. 1595."

GEORGE'S (SAINT) CHAPEL. The chapel of the Knights of the Garter at Windsor Castle. It was 1st built by Edward III, and afterwards re-erected by Edward IV. Drayton, in Polyolb. xv. 315, speaks of it as "The Garter's royal seat, from him who did advance That princely order first, our first that conquered France; The temple of St. G., whereas his honoured knights Upon his hallowed day observe their ancient rites." Hence the figure of St. G. was the badge of the Order. In R3 iv. 4, 366, Richd. says, "Now by my G., my garter, and my crown."

GEORGE'S (SAINT) FIELDS. A large open space on the Surrey side of the Thames between Southwark and Lambeth, named after the adjoining Ch. of St. George the Martyr. It is now completely built over, but St. G.'s Rd., running from the Elephant and Castle to Westminster Bdge. Rd., and St. G.'s Circus at the S. end of Blackfriars Rd. preserve the name. It was a favourite Sunday resort of Londoners, and was often used for large gatherings of people, such as the mustering of the Trainbands; and the welcome of distinguished visitors like Catherine of Aragon and Charles II. The notorious Dog and Duck Inn was here, on the site now occupied by the Bethlehem Hospital: the old sign, dated 1617, may still be seen, built into the wall of the Hospital garden. In H4 B. iii. 2, 208, Shallow says to Falstaff, "O, Sir John, do you remember since we lay all night in the windmill in St. G.'s Field?" The Windmill is marked in Fairthorne's Map of London, 1658, and was probably a tavern. In H6 B. v. 1, 46, York says to his soldiers, "Meet me to-morrow in St. G.'s Field, You shall have pay and every thing you wish." The passage in Contention, from which this is taken, says "St. Georges F." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 1, the K. says, "From their own battlements they may behold St. G.'s F. o'erspread with armed men." This was in 1497, when the K. assembled his forces there to meet the Cornish rebels who were at Blackheath. Harman, in Caveat c. xi., tells how a certain "counterfeit Crank went to the waterside and took a sculler and was set over the water into St. Gs. f." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 2, Luce's father says, "I'll have my sword; when I was young, like him, I had my wards and foins and quarter blows, And knew the way into St. G.'s F. Twice in a morning, Tuttle, Finsbury, I knew them all." These were all places where duels were frequently fought. In Chivalry C. i., Bowyer says, "Once I was fighting in St. G.'s F., and blind Cupid shot me right into the left heel, and ever since Dick Bowyer hath been lame." In Long Meg iv., there is an account of a duel fought in St. G.'s F. between

Meg and a Spanish Lord. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 120, Jane Shore is found by Brackenbury near the Marshalsea, and says she has come "To take the air here in St. G.'s F. and to visit some poor patients that cannot visit me."

GEORGE (SAINT) THE MARTYR. Ch. at the corner of Borough High St., Southwark, and Long Lane, on the E. side. The original ch. was of great antiquity, and belonged to the Abbey of Bermondsey. The prisoners who died in the Marshalsea prison were buried here, amongst them Bp. Bonner. In the Dirige of Bastarde Edmonde Boner (1569), we find: "My flesh is consumed, there is but skin and bone, In St. G. Churchyard my grave and I alone." The present ch. was built in 1734 on the site of the old one. In J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, the Palmer mentions "Saynt G. in Southwarke" as one of the saints whose shrines he had visited. Taylor, Works (ii. 37), says of someone: "He's in Southwark near St. G. his ch." There was also a ch. of St. G. in Botolph Lane, Billingsgate, not far from Eastcheap: it was destroyed in the Gt. Fire and rebuilt by Wren. Simon Read, the supposed original of Jonson's Alchemist, lived in the parish of St. G.'s Southwark.

GEORGE'S (SAINT) PORT. A harbour on the N.E. coast of Malta, a few miles N. of Valetta. In B. & F. Malta i. 3, Astorius says to Mountferrat, "You must prepare against To-morrow morning in the valley here Adjoining to St. G. P."

GEORGE'S PORT (SAINT). A gate on the S. of the city of Antwerp, near the Ch. of St. G. In Larum D. 2, Alva says, "St. G. P. and Kibdop we assign To Lord Romero."

GEORGIA. The dist. between the Black Sea and the Caspian, S. of the Caucasus. It boasts a long line of kings, extending over 2000 years. Tamburlaine invaded Georgia in 1386 and took the K., Bagrat V, prisoner: Bagrat having turned traitor after his submission, Tamburlaine ravaged the whole country in 1393; George VII having succeeded to the throne, Tamburlaine again conquered the country in 1403. In 1801 it was annexed to the Russian Empire. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. ii. 2, Meander speaks of "having passed Armenian deserts now, And pitched our tents under the Gn. hills."

GEPIDÆ. A Gothic tribe who, under their K., Ardaric, joined Attila in his invasion of Gaul, and then settled in Dacia. Their kingdom was ultimately destroyed by Justinian. In Davenant's Albovine ii. 1, Albovine says to his bride, "Thy father was great k. of the Girdes" [sic]. This was Cunemuedus, whom Albovine overthrew and killed, and of his skull made a drinking-cup. He married Rosamund, the daughter of Cunemuedus, and compelled her to drink from her father's skull: she, resenting the insult, plotted his death.

GERARDS HALL. An ancient merchant's house in Lond., on the S. side of Basing Lane off Bread St., Cheapside. In 1245 it belonged to John Gisors, Lord Mayor of Lond., and Stow thinks that G. H. is a corruption of Gisors' H., which hardly seems likely. It was chiefly remarkable for its fine Norman crypt, built of Caen stone. There was a legend that it was the home of a giant called Gerard, and a fir-pole, 40 ft. long, was preserved in the H., which was said to have been his walking-staff. The H. was destroyed in the Gt. Fire, but the crypt was not injured. For some time before it had been a tavern, and a new tavern was put up on the site. In 1852 it was removed to make way for the new Cannon St. Station. The stones of the crypt were numbered and presented to the Crystal Palace, where they were used in making the foundations of an engine-house. Taylor, Works (ii. 81), says, "Deliver this letter at G. H. to Christopher Guppie, a carrier." Deloney, in Reading, Intro., says that the western clothiers "would ever meet upon one day in Lond. at Jarrats H., surnamed the Giant, for that he surpassed all other men of that age, both in stature and strength." In Chap. 5, he tells how they entertained the K.'s sons "at our host Garrats, who hath a fair house and goodly rooms."

GERARIM (a misprint for GERAZIM; more properly GERIZIM). The mtn. in Palestine S. of Shechem, now Nablous, facing Mt. Ebal on the N. of the narrow valley. According to Deut. xxvii. 12, the Levites who were to pronounce the blessings of the Law after the Israelites came into the Promised Land were to stand on Mt. Gerizim, and those that pronounced the curses on Mt. Ebal. The author of Mariam reverses this arrangement, doubtless by a slip of memory. In Mariam iv. 8, Doris prays, "Hear Thou, that didst mt. G. command To be a place whereon with cause to curse; Stretch Thy revenging arm."

GERMAIN, SAINT. There are 2 old churches dedicated to St. G. in Paris: St. G. L'Auxerrois, between the Rue de Rivoli and the Pont Neuf, from the belfry of which the signal for the massacre of St. Bartholomew was given; and St. G.-des-Prés in the Boulevard St. G., originally connected with the Abbey of St. G. founded in the 6th cent. In Devonshire v. 1, Manuel confesses falsely that he has stabbed his father "near St. Gs. in Paris in a dark night." Probably St. G.-des-Prés is meant, as it would be a more lonely place.

GERMAINS (SAINT) = SAINT GERMAIN-EN-LAYE. A town in France, 14 m. W. of Paris. The French kings had an ancient royal residence there, which Francis I replaced by a fine palace. Louis XIV was born there, but transferred the Court to Versailles. James II of England resided there after his deposition. It is now used as a military prison. In B. & F. Wild Goose ii. 2, Lillia says, "You know Ismena, the fair gem of St.-G.?"

GERMANY (Ge. = Germanie, Gn. = German). The central part of Europe, lying between France and Belgium on the W.; Denmark on the N.; Poland and Hungary on the E.; and the Alps on the S. It was divided into High or Upper, and Low or Lower, G. According to Fynes Moryson, Upper G. included Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Athesis (the Tyrol), Rhetia (the Grisons), Vindelicia (round Augsburg and Ulm), Bavaria, Suevia, Helvetia (Switzerland), Alsatia, and the Rhine provinces as far N. as Metz: Lower G. included Franconia, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Saxony, Lusatia, Meissen, Thuringia, Marchia, Brunswick, Mecklenburg, Hesse, Julich, Cleves, Westphalia, East Friesland, Pomerania, and Borussia, or Prussia, i.e. East Prussia. The Netherlands (i.e. Belgium and Holland), as originally a part of the Empire, are sometimes included in Low G., but are more often distinguished from it. In More iii. 2, Erasmus of Rotterdam is called "Thou reverent G." The Gn. or Holy Roman Emperor had a titular authority over the whole country, but the actual government was in the hands of archdukes, dukes, marquesses, bishops, and other magnates. The Hanse towns, of which the chief were Lubeck, Hamburg, and Stoadé, were practically under the control of their own league, and there were 60 Free Imperial cities which recognized the authority of the Emperor, but were really independent.

High and Low German distinguished. In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy says there are 8 days in the week in the Low Countries: "How dost thou think they rise in High G., Italy, and those remoter places?" In Barnes' Charter iv. 3, the Physician has studied "in France, in Spain, and higher G." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, Bonavide asks, "What of the women of high G.?" In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Floradin says that he has "Travelled High Ge. and low Ge." Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge (1542), distinguishes between Base Almayne and High Almayne, which is S. of Metz: the Gn. says, "I am a High Almayne, sturdy and stout, I labour but little in the world about; I am a yonker; a feather I will wear . . . My raiment is woven much like a sack." Low G. is sometimes used for Hell. Dekker, in News from Hell, speaks of the devil as "our Lansquenight of Lowe-Germanie."

General Allusions. In Lear iv. 7, 90, the Gentleman says, "They say Edgar is with the Earl of Kent in G." In All's iv. 1, 78, Parolles begs, "If there be here Gn. or Dane, low Dutch, Italian, or French, let him speak to me." In M. W. W. iv. 3, 1, Bardolph brings word to the Host of the Garter: "Sir, the Gns. desire to have 3 of your horses; the D. himself will be to-morrow at Court and they are going to meet him." The Host knows nothing of this D., and it appears that these Gns. (who can speak English) have had the run of the inn for a week. In iv. 5, we are told that the 3 cozen Gns. have run off with the horses: Evans brings word that they have already cozened all the hosts around of horses and money; and Caius affords the further information: "It is a-tell me dat you make grand preparations for a d. de Jamany; by my trot dere is no d. dat de Court is know to come." It is hard to see why this incident should have been brought in, unless there was some allusion that the Q. and Court would understand. Now Frederick, D. of Würtemberg and Count Mompelgard, visited Windsor in 1592, and passed through Maidenhead, Brentford, and Reading. He had from Sir William Herbert permission to take post-horses on his journey without any payment. In the quarto of 1602, Evans says, "There is 3 sorts of cosen garmombles, is cosen all the Hosts of Maidenhead and Readings." In the Folio this is altered to "3 Cosen-Jermans." Garmombles seems to be a perversion of Mompelgard, the 2nd title of the D. of Würtemberg. The date of M. W. W. is probably 1599, but the D. had been in constant correspondence with Q. Elizabeth, and his visit would not have been forgotten in 7 years.

Allusions to German History. Milton, P. R. iv. 78, describes embassies coming to Rome: "Gns. and Scythians and Sarmatians." In Chapman's Cæsar i. 1, 28, Cato speaks of Cæsar's army as the scum of G. In Tiberius 260, the Emperor speaks of Germanicus as "Roome's shining beacon in rude G." In Nero v. 1, Tigellinus says, "Spain's revolted, Portingale hath joined; As much suspected is of G." The reference is to the revolt of Galba in Spain and of Verginius Rufus in Upper G. in A.D. 68, which led to the deposition of Nero. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortune says, "This sometime was a Gn. Emperor, Henry V, who, being first deposed, Was after thrust into a dungeon, And thus in silver chains shall rot to death." Probably Henry IV is meant: he was excommunicated by Paschal II, and taken prisoner by his revolting son, Conrad. He died heartbroken in 1106. In K. J. i. 1, 100, Robert tells how his father "was once dispatched in an embassy To G., there with the Emperor To treat of high affairs." This may have been in connection with the homage done by Richd. I to the Emperor Henry VI, when the latter invested Richd. with the kingdom of Arles. In H5 i. 2, the Archbp. of Canterbury, relating the history of the Salic Law of Pharamond, declares "This Salique . . . between Elbe and Sala Is at this day in G. called Meisen." In H8 v. 3, 30, Gardiner refers to the religious wars in G. which followed the Council of Trent and lasted till the Treaty of Passau in 1552. If Cranmer is allowed to have his way, Gardiner predicts "Commutations, uproars, with a general taint Of the whole state ; as of late days our neighbours, The Upper G., can dearly witness." The Emperor of G. in Greene's Friar is Frederick II, Fredericus Stupor Mundi, who reigned 1212-1250. When Greene makes him say, in sc. iv., "From Hapsburg I have brought a learned clerk" he is in error, for Frederick was the last of the Suabian Emperors, and had nothing to do with Hapsburg. In Marlowe's Faustus, chor. before sc. viii, we are told of "the Emperor Carolus the Fifth, at whose palace now Faustus is feasted." Sc. x. takes place at the Emperor's Court at Innsbruck. Charles V. was Emperor from 1519 to 1556. Chapman's Alphonsus deals with the disputed election to the Empire between Alphonso of Castile and Richd., Earl of Cornwall, in 1254. In i. 1, 12, Alphonsus claims, "I am the lawful Gn. Emperor." In Mertin iii. 6, 115, the Saxon invaders of Britain are called "The offal fugitives of barren G." Donne, Elegy i. 34 (1600), speaks of the Gns. scorning "the Pope's pride." Smith's Hector deals with an imaginary contest for the position of Emperor during the reign of our K. Edward III.

German Religion. The Protestant Reformation may be definitely dated from 1517, in which year Luther nailed his Theses to the ch. door of Wittenberg. By the middle of the cent. the N. States of G. had almost all accepted the Reformed Doctrines, and the Lutheran Ch. became dominant. In Marlowe's Faustus i., Faust boasts, "I . . . have with concise syllogisms Gravelled the pastors of the Gn. ch. And made the flowering pride of Wittenberg Swarm to my problems."

National Character. Heylyn (s.v. GERMANIE) says, "The men of the poorer sort are laborious, painful, and of sincere behaviour; the nobles either profound scholars or resolute soldiers, lovers of true honour; though Tacitus thought otherwise, saying, 'The Gauls fight for liberty, the Belgians for honours, the Germanes for gain'; They are little addicted to Venus and very much to Bacchus: whence the proverb, Germanorum vivere est bibere. They are of a strong constitution and much inclined to fatness; They [are] a people that take more pleasure to be commanded than to command. In matters of war, this people have been ever in a measure famous; yet not so much by valour of conduct of their Captains, as by their own hardiness. The women are of a good complexion, though by reason of their intemperance in eating and drinking they are somewhat corpulent: women of good carriage; good bearers and good breeders." In H6 C. iv. 8, 2, Warwick says, "Edward from Belgia With hasty Gns. and blunt Hollanders Hath passed in safety through the narrow seas." There is apparently a contrast intended between the heavy Dutch and the more sprightly Gns. The Gns., along with the Dutch and the Danes, had the reputation of being heavy drinkers. In Merch. i. 2, 90, Portia says of the young Gn. lord that she likes him "very vilely in the morning, when he is sober, and most vilely in the afternoon, when he is drunk." In Oth. ii. 3, 80, Iago says that in potting "your Dane, your Gn., and your swag-bellied Hollander are nothing to your English." In Cromwell iii. 3, Cromwell reports, "In G. and Holland riot serves, And he, that most can drink, most he deserves." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Macilente calls Carlo "my good Gn. tapster," when he is proposing to have a carouse. In B. & F. Wild Goose v. 6, Belieur says, "Say we pass through G. and drink hard?" In their Friends i. 1, Marius says that he has not travelled "to bring home a Gn. health." In Middleton's Gypsy i. 1, Roderigo says, "It is as rare to see a Spaniard a drunkard as a Gn. sober." In Glapthorne's Privilege iii. 1, Adorni says, "Your Gn. will carouse a score of goblets to provoke his stomach to his bread and butter." In Davenant's Albiovine i. 1, Grimold says that Albiovine "is a Gn. in his drink." In Tiberius 683, Sejanus says that the man who will climb must be all things to all men: "Drink with the German, with the Spaniard brave." Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "G. hath not so many drunkards . . . as Italy alone hath jealous husbands."

Appearance of the Germans. In Nero iv. 1, Nero speaks of overcoming "the grey-eyed Gn." Tacitus speaks of their "truces et cærulei oculi" (Germ. iv.). In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar speaks of the "big-boned Gn." In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 2, 261, Alexander says, "in G. A man must be a boy at 40 years, And dares not draw his weapon at a dog, Till, being soundly boxed about the ears, His lord and master gird him with a sword."

Dress. In Ado iii. 2, 34, Pedro says of Benedick: "[He is] a Gn. from the waist downward, all slops." In Merch. i. 2, 81, Portia thinks that the young Baron of England "bought his bonnet in G." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius, enumerating the hats of various nations, says, "The Gn. loves his cony-wool," i.e. rabbit-skin cap.

German Women. In H5 i. 2, 48, the Archbp. thinks that the Salic Law was due to the French "holding in disdain the Gn. women For some dishonest manners of their life." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calipso, characterizing the women of the nations she has visited, speaks of "the sober Gn." In Costly Wh. ii. 1, the D. says, "Courtesans are strange with us in G."

German Magic and Proficiency in the Black Art. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. v. 4, Carlo says to Puntarvolo, "You may have, as you come through G., a familiar for little or nothing, shall turn itself into the shape of your dog or any thing, what you will." Faust, in Marlowe's Faustus, is a Gn.; and in i. 96, he addresses Valdes as "Gn. Valdes": this may be a mistake for Herman, but if the reading is right it would seem to mean "Valdes proficient in magic." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, the Host, speaking of the conjurer Forobosco, says, "Were Paracelsus the Gn. now living, he'd take up his single rapier against his terrible long sword." In M. W. W. iv. 5, 71, Bardolph says that the Gns. "Set spurs and away like 3 Gn. devils, 3 Dr. Faustuses." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Thorowgood says that Holdfast has learned "to walk like Faustus or some high Gn. conjurer, in a cap fit for a costermonger."

German Skill in Mechanics. In Davenant's Wits v., 5 Thwack says, "I'll send him down to country fairs for a new motion made by a Gn. engineer." A motion means a puppet-show, or a mechanical marionette. The Gn. clocks with moving figures, like the clock in Strasbourg Cathedral, were very common. In L. L. L. iii. 1, 192, Biron says, "A woman that is like a Gn. clock, Still a-repairing, ever out of frame, And never going aright." In Jonson's Epicoene iv. 1, Otter says of his wife: "She takes herself asunder still when she goes to bed, into some 20 boxes; and about next day noon is put together again, like a great Gn. clock; and so comes forth and rings a tedious larum to the whole house."

In Middleton's R. G. iv. 1, Sir Alexander says, "Here, take my Gn. watch, hang 't up in sight." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 5, Hearsay speaks of the antiquary as "that old Eremitic thing That, like an image in a Gn. clock, Doth move, not walk." In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Birdlime says, "No Gn. clock requires so much reparation as a lady's face."

Miscellaneous allusions. In H4 B. ii. 1, 156, Falstaff speaks of "the Gn. hunting in a water-work": that is, in some sort of distemper or water-colour. The picture was probably one of a boar hunt, that form of sport being popular in G. In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, Passarello says of Maquerelle: "She gets all the picture makers to draw her picture; when they have done she most courtly finds fault with them; they, in revenge of this, execute her in pictures as they do in G., and hang her in their shops." But in Dodypoll i. 2, Moth says, "More art is shadowed here Than any man in G. can show."

The Boar was common in the forests of G., and was frequently hunted. In Cym. ii. 5, 16, Posthumus speaks of Iachimo as "a full-acorned boar, a Gn. one." In Davenant's Siege i. 1, Ariotto says, "We shall live worse than boars in G.," i.e. we shall be merely prey to Mervole's exactions. In Coryat's Crudities (1611) 396, we find: "Hunting of wild boars is more exercised by the Gns. than by any other Christian nation." In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont says, "The cymbals of India call Castilian cornets forth And Gn. viols wake the Tuscan lute." In Chapman's Alphonsus iii. 1, 148, when Edward says, "Alas! I cannot dance your Gn. dances," Bohemia says, "We Gns. have no changes in our dances, An Almains and an Upspring, that is all." The former was a grave, the latter a lighter measure. In Chivalry, Bowyer says of Peter: "His tongue crawls as fast as the cheese doth in G." In Brome's City Wit ii. 2, Crasy says, "The taking of my degree cost me 12 French crowns and five-and-thirty pound of salt butter in upper G." Heylyn (s.v. GERMANIE) says, "Their language is very harsh, by reason of its many consonants." Germania is used in the sense of the gibberish spoken by the Spanish rogues; in Middleton, Gipsy ii. 1, Alvarez says, "The arts of Cocco-quismo and Germania used by our Spanish pickaroes—I mean, filching, foisting, nimming, jilting—we defy."

Special allusions. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Moll says, "I have struck up the heels of the high Gn.'s size ere now"; and again (iii. 1), "A name which I'd tear out of the high Gn.'s throat, if it lay leiger there." This would appear to have been a Gn. fencer of great height and strength, who was in Lond. at the time. In the Curtain Drawer of the World (1612) 27, it is said: "Those escape very hardly, like the Gn. out of Wood-st." In Shirley's Opportunity iii. 1, Ascanio comes in disguised as the High Gn. who "has beaten all the fencers in Europe." In Noble Soldier ii. 2, Baltasar says, "Shall I be that Gn. fencer and beat all the knocking boys before me?" Dekker, in Owls Almanac (1618) 7, says, "The G. fencer cudgell'd most of our English fencers now about a month past." In Swetnam i. 2, Misogonus says, "I'll teach you the very mystery of fencing that you shall beat all the fencers in G." Dekker, in News from Hell, says of the Devil: "As for rapier and dagger, the Germane may be his journeyman." In Ret. Pernass. iv. 3, Philomusus inquires of the actor Kemp, "How doth the Emperour of G.?" Apparently the reference is to some recent visit of Kemp to G.: English comedians occasionally visited G. and were acting at Nurnberg in 1604. This play was first printed in 1606. In Shirley's Courtier iv. 1, Orsino says, "There is a famous painter sojourns here in Mantua, a Gn., Shadan Wierex." In his Honoria iii. 1, Maslin says of Fulbank: "He looks like the pyed piper in G. that undertook to cure the town of rats." This is the Piper of Hamelin, immortalized by Browning. The story is told in Verstegan's Restit. of Decayed Intelligence, published in 1634, and the date is there given as June 26, 1284. The piper's name was Bunting. The German method of execution was by breaking on the wheel. In Dekker's Dead Term (1608), Westminster says of Charing Cross that his limbs are broken "as if he were a malefactor and had been tortured on the G. wheel." W. Rowley, in Search 30, says, "There were others that offered to suffer the Gn. strappado for his [Money's] sake," i.e. hanging up by a rope and then being suddenly dropped, so as to dislocate the joints.

GERMAN SEA. On the E. coast of England, more properly called the North Sea. In Peele's Alcazar ii. 4, 126, Sebastian says of England: "The G. Seas alongst the E. do run." Drayton, in Polyolb. xv. 62, describes the Gt. Ouse as taking his course "directly down into the G. deep."

GERSEN. See GOSHEN.

GESUR, or GESHUR. A small Syrian state on the W. border of Bashan, S. of Hermon. David married Maacah, the daughter of Talmi, K. of G., and Absalom took refuge with him after the murder of his brother Amnon. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, David says to Absalom, "Live, and return from G. to thy home; Return from G. to Jerusalem."

GETÆ. A tribe inhabiting the dist. in Thrace between Mt. Hæmus and the Ister. They are often confused with the Gothi, but are really quite distinct from them. (see under GOTHs). In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1757, Hector speaks of "powerful skill in Geticke weapons tried."

GETULY. See GÆTULIA.

GHENT (French, GAND), usually spelt GAUNT. A city in Belgium, 30 m. W. of Antwerp. It was a great trading city in the Middle Ages. Its cathedral and Hôtel de Ville are amongst the most beautiful in Belgium. It was besieged and captured by the D. of Parma in 1584. Chaucer's Wife of Bath (C. T. A. 448) had of cloth-making "swich an haunt, She passed hem of Ypres and of Gaunt." John of Gaunt, D. of Lancaster, was born there in 1340. The scene of Acts I and II of B. & F. Begger's is laid at G. In Jonson's Fortun. Isles, Jophiel sings of "Mary Ambree Who marched so free To the siege of Gaunt And death could not daunt." This lady, who disguised herself as a soldier, is celebrated in the ballad beginning, "When captains courageous whom death could not daunt Did march to the siege of the city of Gaunt." Hall, in Epp. i. 5 (1624), says of it: "Gaunt, a city that commands reverence for age and wonder for the greatness."

GIBEAH. A town in the tribe of Benjamin in Palestine, probably to be identified with Tel-el-Ful, 3 m. N. of Jerusalem. It was the birth-place of Saul, and the scene of the outrage described in Judges xix. 14, etc. Milton, P. L. i. 504, refers to "that night In G., when the hospitable door Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape."

GIBEON. An ancient city of Palestine, now el-Jib, between 5 and 6 m. N.W. of Jerusalem. The inhabitants tricked Joshua by a false embassy and were in consequence condemned to be "hewers of wood and drawers of water" (see Josh. ix. 3-27). In Mariam i. 6, Con-stabarus says, "Make us wood-hewers, water-bearing wights, Use us as Joshua did the Gibonites." In Mar-mion's Leaguer i. 5, Agurtes says of some men who are announced to see him: "They are my Gibeonites, are come to traffic with me." In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, David recalls the defeat of Ishbosheth "by the pool of G." (see II Sam. ii. 13). The pool still remains, to the S.W. of the hill on which the vill. stands. Milton, P. L. xii. 265, quotes Joshua's command to the sun, "Sun, in G. stand, And thou, moon, in the vale of Ajalon" (see Joshua x. 12).

GIBALTAR. A fortress on the southernmost point of Spain on the Straits of the same name. The Moors made it the site of a fortress in the 8th cent., and named it Gebel Tarik (Rock of Tarik), from their leader. In 1462 it was taken by the Spaniards, and remained in their possession till 1704, when Sir George Rooke took it and hoisted the English flag. It was besieged by France and Spain in 1782, but unsuccessfully. It is still a British possession. In Stucley 2451, Muly Hamet boasts that his dominions "look upon Canaries' wealthy isles And on the west to Gibaltara's straights." In line 1562, Philip of Spain promises that a fleet shall wait the coming of Sebastian "near to the Straits Of Giberalter in a haven there Called El Porto de Sancta Maria." In Middleton's Changeling i. 1, Vermadero says of his father: "An unhappy day Swallowed him at last at G. In fight with those rebellious Hollanders." I cannot find any record of a fight with the Dutch at G. In Davenant's Plymouth iv. 1, Trifle invents the preposterous news that "The Spanish fleet that anchored at G. is sunk by the French horse." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 40), the Chorus says that Sir Thomas "is come unto the Straights of Gibralter." In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 23, Medina speaks of "the streights of Gibbraltar" as separating Africa from Europe. Milton, P. L. i. 355, speaks of the barbarian hordes spreading "Beneath G. to the Libyan sands," i.e. to the south of G. In Drayton's Merry Devil i. 2, 14, the Host says, "Let me cling to your flanks, my nimble Gibalters, and blow wind in your calves to make them swell bigger." The rock of G. is the only place in Europe where monkeys are found: hence the meaning is "monkeys." There is probably also some thought of the "gibbering" of these animals. Cf. Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation (1592) 158: "Cumane ass and fool, And dolt, and idiot, and Gibaltar." Puttenham, Art of Poesie (1589) ii., tells how Hercules set "2 pillars in the mouth of the strait G." with the motto Non plus ultra. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says that Coryat's fame stretches "from the Magellan strait to G." See also JUBALTAR.

GIHON. One of the rivers of Paradise. In Gen. ii. 13, we read: "the name of the 2nd river is G.; the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Cush." If Cush means the land of the Cassi, the river will be the Kerk-hah: others think that the Nile is intended, and that the tradition was that the 4 great rivers of the world, the Tigris, Euphrates, Nile, and Ganges, all rose in the Garden of Eden. In Greene's Orlando i. 2, Rodamant speaks of "that wealthy Paradise From whence floweth Gyhon and swift Euphrates." In his Friar xvi. 66, K. Henry compares England to "that wealthy isle Circled with Gihen and swift Euphrates," i.e. Paradise. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. v. 1, Tamburlaine says, "I will not spare these proud Egyptians For all the wealth of G.'s golden waves." Possibly Marlowe was confusing G. with the first river, Pison, "which compasseth the whole land of Havilah where there is gold." Greene, in Mourning Garment (Wks. ix. 127), describes the city of Callipolis as "seated in the land of Avilath compassed with G. and Euphrates, 2 rivers that flow from Eden." Spenser, F. Q. i. 7, 43, describes Eden as the land "Which Phison and Euphrates floweth by And Gehon's golden waves do wash continually."

GILBOA. Mtn. in Palestine on the S.E. of the Plain of Jezreel, now Jebel Fuqua. It is chiefly memorable as the scene of the defeat and death of Saul. In Middleton's Tennis, Pallas says of Joshua: "At his command Hyperion reined his fiery coursers in And fixed stood o'er Mt. G." Pallas is not quite exact in her knowledge of the scriptures. The passage in Joshua x. 12 runs: "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon": no doubt therefore G. is a slip of memory for Gibeon. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 3, Hamon says that the blood of Saul and Jonathan "from G. ran in channels through the wilderness of Ziph" (see I Sam. xxxi.). But the wilderness of Ziph was nearly 100 m. from Mt. G.!

GILDED KEY. A bookseller's sign in Lond. The Honest Lawyer was "Printed by George Purslowe for Richard Woodroffe and are to be sold at his shop near the great North-door of Paules at the sign of the gilded Key. 1616."

GILDERLAND. See GELDERLAND.

GILES (St.) CRIPPLEGATE. Ch. in Lond. at the W. end of Fore St. The 1st ch. was built in 1090, and was replaced by the present building in the 14th cent. It escaped the Gt. Fire, and is one of the few old Gothic churches yet remaining in the City. Margaret Lucy, the 2nd daughter of Shakespeare's Sir Thomas Lucy, was buried here, as were John Foxe, Martin Frobisher, and the John Miltons, father and son. There is an entry in the marriage register: "Married Ben Johnson and Hester Hopkins" July 27th, 1623. This may have been rare Ben. Nathan Field, the dramatist, and a child of James Shirley's were christened in the ch., and here Oliver Cromwell was married to Elizabeth Bourcher. Dekker, in Wonderful Year (1603), speaks of the ravages of the Plague in Lond., and says, "The 3 bald sextons of limping St. Gyles, St. Sepulchres, and St. Olaves ruled the roast more hotly than ever did the Triumviri of Rome." Limping St. Gyles means St. Gyles in Cripplegate as distinguished from St. Gyles-in-the-Fields.

GILES (St.)-IN-THE-FIELDS. Originally a vill. near Lond., S. of what is now New Oxford St. It grew up round a hospital for lepers founded by Matilda, Q. of Henry I, in 1101, and dedicated to St. Giles, the patron saint of lepers. It lay S. of High St., near the present parish ch. The hospital chapel became the parish ch., and so continued till 1623, when it was demolished, and a new ch. was built and dedicated in 1630. The present ch. took its place in 1734. The pound and cage stood in the middle of High St., but were removed in 1656 to the junction of Tottenham Court Rd. and Oxford St. Prisoners on the way to Tyburn to be executed passed the Hospital, and it was customary to give them there a bowl of wine. After the dissolution of the hospital the custom was kept up at the Bowl Inn, between the end of High St. and Hog Lane. Bowl Alley, on the S. side of High St., long preserved the name. The Angel Inn was a rival of the Bowl in this function. Executions not infrequently took place at St. G.' at the back of the hospital garden. George Chapman and James Shirley were buried in the churchyard.

In Bale's Chronicle of Sir John Oldcastle, we read: "They had a great assemble in Sainct Gyles-Field at Lond. purposing the destruction of the land." In Oldcastle ii. 2, the rendezvous is Ficket's Field, "behind St. G. i. t. field near Holborne." At which Murley exclaims: "Newgate, up Holborne, St. G. i. t. field, and to Tiborne: an old saw." Bale goes on to say that Sir John "was drawn forth into Sainct Giles-Felds where as they had set up a new pair of gallows": there he was executed by being burnt over a slow fire. In Hycke, p. 99, Freewill tells how he got into prison and his friend Imagination went to look for him: "He walked through Holborne and walked up toward Saynte Gyles in the felde," evidently expecting to see Freewill on his way to Tyburn. The town, as it was still called at the end of the 16th cent., was a poor dist. and a resort of bad characters. Harman, in Caveat ii., tells of his pursuit of a counterfeit crank, who dogged him by taking a boat to St. George's F.: "I had thought," says he, "he would have gone into Holborne or to Saynt Gylles in the felde." In Jonson's Devil v. 1, Ambler tells how he went with his doxy to Tyburn, and then had to lend her his shoes and "walk in a rug by her, barefoot, to St. G." In B. & F. Wit S. W. ii. 4, Wittybate and his fellow-thieves have their rendezvous "at the Three Cups in St. G." In Barry's Ram iii. 2, Throate, planning to abduct Frances, says, "Let the coach stay at Shoe-lane end; and when she's in, hurry towards St. G. i. t. F." In News from the Wood St. Counter (1642), it is mentioned in a list of places of a bad reputation. In Brome's Sparagus v. 6, Hoyden is carried in a sedan "up to a lodging in St. Gyleses." In Stucley 580, we are introduced to "Thomas Thump, the buckler-maker of S. G." To go by St. G. to Westminster is a proverbial expression for missing one's way or making a mistake. Nash, in Pierce E. i, says, "I would not have you think that all this that is set down here is in good earnest, for then you go by S. Gyles, the wrong way to Westminster." In Deloney's Craft ii. 11, the Green K. of St. Martin's "at St. G. i. t. f. met the rest of his company," and shortly after "they came to the highway turning down to Westminster."

GILES (SAINT), OXFORD. An ancient ch. in Oxford, at the N. end of St. G. St. In Seven Days the prologue is spoken by the clerk of St. Gyleses.

GILT BIBLE. The sign of a bookseller's shop in Paternoster Row. The relation of Sad and Lamentable Accidents at Wydecombe was "Printed at Lond. by G. N. for R. Harford and are to be sold at his shop in Queen's-Head-Alley in Paternoster Row at the Gilt Bible. 1638."

GILTSPUR STREET. A st. in Lond. running N. from the W. end of Newgate St. to W. Smithfield. Originally the part between Cock Lane and Smithfield was called Pie Corner. Stow says it was at first called Knight-riding St., because the knights coming to tournaments in Smithfield passed along it. Lady Alimony was "Printed by Tho. Vere and William Gilbertson and are to be sold at the Angel without New-Gate and at the Bible in G. st."

GINNEY. See GUINEA.

GIPSY. Applied to a wandering race originally from India, who appeared in England in the 16th cent. They were supposed to have come from Egypt, and the name is a short form of Egyptian, q.v. In As v. 3, 16, the 2 pages sing "both in a tune, like 2 gipsies on a horse." It is used depreciatingly of a dark beauty, the fashion in Elizabeth's reign being for blondes. In R. & J. ii. 4, 44, Mercutio says, "Cleopatra to this lady was a g." In A. & C. i. 1, 10, Philo says that Antony "is become the bellows and the fan To cool a g.'s lust." In iv. 12, 28, Antony says, "This false soul of Egypt . . . Like a right g. hath at fast and loose Beguiled me to the very heart of loss." "Fast and loose" was a trick like Pricking the Garter, by which the gs. cozened the simple folk. It is also used of a woman in the sense of a baggage or flirt. In Shirley's Love Maze iv., Thorold says of a lady: "She was a very g. You were no sooner parted but she used me basely." In B. & F. Gipsy, these people play a leading part. In Middleton's Dissemblers iv. 1, Aurelia disguises herself as a g. and joins a band of them. Gs. were usually fortune-tellers and astrologers. Randolph, in Hey Hon. i. 1, says, "Troth, and he may tell you your fortune, gipsie-like, and all out of your pockets too." In Lawyer iii., Robert says, "Sky-consulting Gypsiemen commit sins dark as night and blame the stars for it." The English Gs. had their head-quarters in the Peak of Derbyshire, as Jonson's Gipsies indicates. See under EGYPT.

GIRPEDES. See GEPIDÆ.

GLAMIS. Vill. in Forfarsh., Scotland, 45 m. N. of Edinburgh: 1 m. N. of the vill. is the ancient castle. Macbeth became Thane of G. by the death of his father Synel, and was so at the opening of the play. In i. 3, 48, the 1st witch addresses him, "Hail to thee, Thane of G." In 71, Macbeth says, "By Sinel's death I know I am Thane of G." In i. 5, 16, Lady Macbeth says, "G. thou art and Cawdor"; in ii. 2, 42, Macbeth says, "G. hath murdered sleep and therefore Cawdor Shall sleep no more." In iii. 1, 1, Banquo says, "Thou hast it now; k., Cawdor, G., all." But, as a matter of fact, Macbeth's father was Finley or Finel; and probably Sinel is merely a compositor's mistake for Finel, just as in i. 3, 39 he prints Sorres for Forres. Moreover, it was the thanedom of Ross, not of G., that descended to Macbeth from his father.

GLAMORGAN. A county in S. Wales on the Bristol Channel. The N. parts of the county are very mountainous. In Jonson's Wales, Howell declares that their music is as loud as "rumbling rocks in s'eere [i.e. shire] G." In T. Heywood's Royal King i. 1, the Welchman says, "If ever I shall meet you in G. or Radnock-shire, I will requite your kindnesses." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 33, says of Morgan: "He to those woody hills did fly, Which hight of him G."

GLASSENbury. See GLASTONBURY.

GLASS HOUSE. The first glass manufactory in Lond. was set up about 1580 in Crutched Friars by James, or Jacob, Verselyn, a Venetian. Another and better known one was established in Blackfriars, between Church Entry, Playhouse Yard, and Water Lane. It was a fashionable amusement to visit the glass-houses and see the process of glass-making. Dekker, in Knight's Conjuring, says of Hell: "Like the g.-h. furnace in Blackfriars, the bone-fires that are kept there never go out." In Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says to Judith, "You must to the Pawn to buy lawn; to St. Martin's for lace; to the Garden; to the G.-h." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 1, Mrs. Pleasant says, "I'll go to a play with my servant and so shall you; and we'll go to the g.-h. afterwards." Dekker, in Jests, says, "O Envy, wash thine eyes that looks flaming like the ceaseless fire of the Glashouse."

GLASTONBURY. A town in Somersetsh., 124 m. W. of Lond. The abbey, of which considerable ruins remain, was one of the oldest in England. According to legend the 1st ch. was built there by Joseph of Arimathæa, who also planted the famous G. Thorn from a slip of the Crown of Thorns placed upon the brow of our Lord. The actual thorn was destroyed at the Reformation, but specimens of it are still to be seen in different parts of the county. The monastery was founded by Ine in the 8th cent., but the buildings were restored by Henry II. The famous Dunstan was appointed abbot in 946. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report has been "at Gravelyn, at Gravesend, and at G." In Grim i. 1, Dunstan tells of a vision "Which I beheld in great K. Edgar's days Being that time Abbot of Glassebury." In S. Rowley's When you B. 1, Summers says, "There is other news: the great bell in Glasseberie has tolled twice, and K. Arthur and his knights of the Round Table are alive again."

GLENCORNE, or GLENCAIRN. A vill. in Dumfriessh. Scotland. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 17, James Coningham, "son to the Earl of G.," is mentioned as one of the hostages to England.

GLENDAL. In the island of Skye, 8 m. W. of Dunvegan. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 83, Jockey, who from his dialect is meant to be a Scotchman, appeals for justice against "Billy Grime of G." This probably means William Graham: Graham, or Græme, being a common Scottish name.

GLOBE. The famous theatre on the Bankside, Southwark. It was begun in Dec. 1598 by the brothers Richd. and Cuthbert Burbage, who pulled down their old house, the Theatre in Shoreditch, and used the materials for the new building. Dr. Wallace has recently proved that it stood, not where Barclay's Brewery is situated, S. of Park St. (formerly Maiden Lane), but N. of Park St., between Deadman's Place and Horseshoe Alley. It was a round wooden structure on a foundation of brick and cement, and had a thatched roof. Over the door was the sign of Hercules bearing the world on his shoulders. In Ham. ii. 2, 365, Rosencrantz declares that the boy actors carry away "Hercules, and his load too." Here Richd. Burbage acted and Shakespeare's greatest plays were produced, the poet being one of the shareholders in the house. On June 29th, 1613, a discharge of pieces in the performance of the play All is True set fire to the thatched roof, and the whole theatre was destroyed. It was at once rebuilt in an octagonal form and with a tiled roof. It was pulled down by Sir Matthew Brand on April 15th, 1644, to make room for tenement houses. Henry V was probably produced here in 1599, though others think that it was first played at the Cockpit. In the prologue 13, the Chorus says, "May we cram Within this wooden O the very casques That did affright the air at Agincourt!" Jonson's Ev. Man O. was produced the same year; and in v. 7, Macilente appeals to the audience, "We . . . entreat The happier spirits in this fair-filled G. . . . That with their bounteous hands they would confirm This as their pleasure's patent." In his Poetaster iii. 1, Histrion says that the theatres are "on the other side of Tyber," i.e. Thames. And Tucca answers: "An you stage me, your mansions shall sweat for it, your tabernacles, varlets, your Gs., and your Triumphs!" In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 558, Scattergood says, "Let's go see a play at the G." Jonson, in his Exercitation upon Vulcan, says, "O these reeds! thy mere disdain of them Made thee beget that cruel strategem, Which some are pleased to style but thy mad prank, Against the G., the glory of the Bank; Which, though it were the fort of the whole parish, Flanked with a ditch and forced out of a marish, I saw with 2 poor chambers taken in And razed, ere thought could urge this might have been. See the world's ruins! nothing but the piles Left, and wit since to cover it with tiles." Taylor, Works (iii. 31), says, "As gold is better that's in fire tried, So is the Bankside G. that late was burned; For where before it had a thatched hide, Now to a stately theatre 'tis turned." In Randolph's Muses i. 1, Mrs. Flowerdew, the Puritan, tells how she heard a brother pray "that the G., wherein, quoth he, reigns a whole world of vice, might be consumed." Glapthorne's Wallenstein was "acted at the G. on the Bank-side 1640." In prol. to Leaguer, Marmion, speaking of the rival theatres, says, "The one The vastness of the g. cannot contain." In 1607 the Stationers' Register states that "a book called Mr. William Shakespeare his history of K. Lear was played before the K.'s Majesty at Whitehall by his Majesty's servants playing usually at the g. on the Banksyde." Hugh Holland, in his verses on Shakespeare, prefixed to the 1st Folio, says, "His days are done that made the dainty plays Which made the G. of heaven and earth to ring." Lenten, in Young Gallant's Whirligig (1629), describes "His satin garments and his satin robe, That hath so often visited the G."

GLOBE. A tavern in Shoe Lane, with a passage into Fleet St., on the N. side at what was formerly No. 134. In 1629 one John Clopton was the landlord. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his tavern-list, sings "The G. the seaman doth not scorn." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Meercraft upbraids Everill with "haunting the Gs. and Mermaids, wedging in with lords still at the table."

GLOUCESTER (pronounced and often spelt GLOSTER; Gr. = Glosster). The county town of Gshire., on the left bank of the Severn, 107 m. W. of Lond. It is the ancient British Caer-Glou, the Roman Glevum. A monastery, dedicated to St. Peter, was founded in 679, and was placed under the Benedictine rule in 1022. The foundations of the present cathedral were laid about the end of the 11th cent. The tower belongs to the 15th cent. Henry I died here, Henry III was crowned in the cathedral, then the abbey ch., Robert, son of William I, and Edward II were buried in the abbey. The New Inn in Northgate St. dates from 1450. There are 14 churches in the city: hence the proverb "as sure as God's in G." The curfew is still rung at the Ch. of St. Michael. In Earle's Microcosmography xv. (1628), he says of the Carrier: "He is like the vault in G. Ch. that conveys whispers at a distance." In Tomkis's Albumazar i. 3, Ronca says that Albumazar has made an instrument to magnify sound, so that you may hear a whisper from Prester John "as fresh as it were delivered Through . . . G.'s list'ning wall." Burton, A.M. i. 3, 3, mentions "that whispering place of G." The triforium of the cathedral, carried in a curve under the E. window, forms a whispering gallery. In Willis's Mount Tabor (1639), he says, "In the city of G., the manner is, that when players of interludes come to town they first attend the Mayor, to inform him what nobleman's servants they are, and to get a licence for their public playing." In Lear i. 5, 1, Lear says to Kent, "Go you before to G." Shakespeare thus makes the residence of Cornwall to be in G., so that he may be near to the castle of the Earl of G., which is presumed to be adjacent to the city. The town has given their title to many noble families. In Mertin, there is an Earl of G. who is purely mythical; and another in Val. Welsh. In Lear, the Earl of G. is a principal character, and in his castle, which must be assumed to be near the city, scenes i. 2 ; ii. 1, 2, and 4 ; iii. 3, 5, 7 are laid. The heath of iii. 1 and the farmhouse of iii. 6 are in the immediate neighbourhood. In iii. 5, Cornwall creates Edmund Earl of G. in his father's place. The prototype of the old Earl is the Prince of Paphlagonia in Sidney's Arcadia. In Val. Welsh. iv. 7, Caradoc brings word that "the town of G." has been vilely betrayed to the Romans by the Earl of Cornwall.

The natural son of Henry I was Robert, 1st Earl of G., created 1109. In Span. Trag. i. 5, Hieronimo in his mask introduces 3 knights, the 1st of whom, he explains, is "English Robert, Earl of G., Who, when K. Stephen bore sway in Albion, Arrived with five-and-twenty thousand men In Portingale ; and, by success of war, Enforced the King, then but a Saracen, To bear the yoke of the English monarchy." The reference is to the capture of Lisbon from the Saracens in 1147, in which some English crusaders assisted, but Robert was not there at any time, and, indeed, died in England a week after the capture of Lisbon. Gilbert de Clare, 7th Earl of G., is one of the characters in Peele's Ed. I. He was appointed by Henry III Lord Lieutenant of the kingdom in the absence of Prince Edward. He marries the K.'s daughter, Joan of Acon, who dies suddenly in the course of the play. In R2 i. 1, 100, Bolingbroke charges Mowbray, "That he did plot the D. of G.'s death." This D. was Thomas of Woodstock, the youngest son of Edward III, who was created D. of G. in 1385. He had been removed by the K. from his Council in 1389 ; in 1396 he was arrested and taken to Calais (q.v.), where Mowbray was Governor, and it was reported that he died of apoplexy. There was little doubt, however, that he had been murdered, and that the K. was privy to it. York clearly thinks so (ii. 1, 165). In iv. 1, Bagot, the K.'s favourite, whilst trying to throw the responsibility on Aumerle, admits that "G.'s death was plotted." He is a prominent character in Trag. Richd. II, where he is called "Thomas of Woodstock" and "plain Thomas." His murder at Calais is described in v. 1, where the Governor is wrongly called La Poole. The D. of G. of H4 B., H5, and H6 A. and B. is Humphrey, youngest son of Henry IV. After his divorce from Jacqueline of Hainault he married Eleanor, daughter of Lord Cobham. He was created D. of G. in 1414, and the next year fought with great valour at Agincourt. He incurred the enmity of Q. Margaret and Suffolk, and was arrested in 1447 and a few days later was found dead in his bed. According to Shakespeare's account (in H6 B. iii. 2), he was murdered by hirelings of Suffolk. In Day's B. Beggar i., Bedford says of him: "G. is to blame And Winchester hath neither grace nor shame." In H6 C. and R3, Richard, D. of G., plays the leading part. He was the 8th son of the D. of York and younger brother to Edward IV. He was created D. of G. in 1461. After the murder of the young princes in the Tower he became K. in 1483, and was defeated and slain at Bosworth by Henry VII in 1485. He was buried in the Grey Friars Ch. at Leicester, but at the time of the suppression of the monasteries his tomb was defaced, and it is said that his stone coffin was used as a drinking-trough for horses till the beginning of the 18th cent. In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Meer-craft proposes to get Fitzdottrel the title of G., but Fitzdottrel objects on account of the bad luck of the Dukes of G. "Thomas of Woodstock, I'm sure was D., and he was made away at Calice, as d. Humphrey was at Bury ; and Richard the 3rd, you know what end he came to." He adds that he has found all this out from the playbooks. So, in H6 C. ii. 6, 107, Richd. himself says, "G.'s Dukedom is too ominous."

GLOUCESTERSHIRE. A county in S.W. of England. The Cotswold Hills are in the N. of the county. R2 ii. 3 is laid in the "wilds of G.," where Bolingbroke and Northumberland are discovered on their way to Berkeley, and meet Harry Percy. In H4 A. i. 3, 242, Percy recalls that it was in G. "where I first bowed my knee Unto this k. of smiles, this Bolingbroke." In R2 v. 6, 3, Bolingbroke says, "The rebels have consumed with fire Our town of Cicester in G." (see CIRENCESTER). In H4 A. iii. 2, 176, the K. directs Prince Henry to march to the rendezvous at Bridgnorth through G. In H4 B. iii. 2, Falstaff calls on Justice Shallow in G. In H4 B. iv. 3, 88, after the battle of Gaultree Forest, Falstaff asks leave "to go through G.," his object being to "visit Master Robert Shallow, Esquire." He does so, and v. 1 and 3 are laid in G. at Shallow's house. In M. W. W. iii. 4, 42, Slender, Shallow's cousin, says he loves Mrs. Anne "as well as I love any woman in G.," and in v. 5, 193, he says he'll make the best in G. know on 't," i.e. of how he has been cheated of Anne Page. In i. 1, 5, Slender describes Shallow as "In the county of G., Justice of Peace and Coram." The local allusions in H4 B. iii. 2, v. 1 and 3 show that Shakespeare was well acquainted with this part of G.: it has been suggested that he took refuge there for a time after his poaching exploit on Sir Thomas Lucy's deer. Sir Thomas was certainly the original of Justice Shallow.

GLOYAWE = GLOGAU. A town in Silesia on the Oder. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein ii. 3, the K. of Hungary speaks of "the General of your forces of G., etc."

GNIDON = CNIDOS. A city at the extreme S.W. corner of Asia Minor, at the end of a long peninsula. It was specially sacred to the worship of Aphrodite (Venus), and had 3 temples to her divinity. Her statue by Praxiteles in one of them was one of the finest things in Greek sculpture. In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Venus reproaches Adonis with having made her "leave Paphos, G., Eryx, Erycine, and Amathon." Greene, in a poem on Silvestro's Lady in Morando, speaks of "The Gnydian doves whose white and snowy pens Doth stain the silver streaming ivory." The dove was sacred to Venus. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 6, 29, says that Venus brought Amoretta to her joyous Paradise, "Whether in Paphos or Cytheron hill, Or it in Gnidus be, I wote not well." Percy, in Cælia (1594) v. 1, says, "Fair Q. of Cnidos, come, adorn my forehead."

GNOSSUS, or CNOSSUS. The capital of Crete, in the N. of the island near the coast. It was said to have been founded by Minos ; and the famous Labyrinth was in its neighbourhood. In Hon. Law. ii., Benjamin says to Vaster's wife, "Thou shalt make ebrious waste Of the sweet Gnosian wines" (see under CRETE). The author of Zepheria (1594) xxiv. 20 says to Zepheria, "A veil immortal shall we put on thee, And on thy head instar the Gnosian crown. Ariadne doth herself undeify, Yielding her coronal to thy installation." Ariadne was the daughter of Minos of Crete.

GOA = XOA or SHOA. A dist. in S. Abyssinia. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, it is mentioned as one of the kingdoms tributary to the Emperor of both the Ethiopias. See under ADEA.

GOAT. Apparently the sign of a tavern at Smithfield. In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Lady Ruinous exclaims to Ruinous, who comes in with a stolen purse, "The G.

at Smithfield Pens ! " There was another G. Tavern in Covent Garden. In Brome's Covent G. ii. 1, Belt says, " Come to my master to the G. in Covent-garden, where he dines with his new landlord to-day." It was also a bookseller's sign. Glapthorne's Wit was " Printed by Io. Okes for F. C. and are to be sold at his shops in Kings-st. at the sign of the G. and in Westminster Hall. 1640."

GOATHS. See GOTHs.

GOLDEN ANCHOR. A bookseller's sign in the Strand, Lond. Sampson's Vow was " Printed by John Norton and are to be sold by Roger Ball at the sign of the G. A. in the Strand near Temple-Barre. 1636."

GOLDEN FLEECE. One of the taverns mentioned in the song of Valerius in T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5 : " The knights unto the G. F." Most of the names are those of taverns in Lond., but I have not been able to identify this one. The knights go to the G. F. because it is the name of an order of knighthood instituted in 1430 by Philip the Good of Burgundy. When the Burgundian heritage passed into the hands of the K. of Spain (Charles V) it became the chief Order of Spain.

GOLDEN LANE, or GOLDING LANE. A st. in Lond. running N. from the E. end of Barbican, opposite Red Cross St., to Old St. The Fortune Theatre stood between G. L. and Whitecross St., and the famous nursery or training-school for actors, in the reign of Charles II, was in G. L. " It is of no great account," says Stow, " either for buildings or inhabitants." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon ii. 1, the Wise-woman, giving a list of fortune-tellers, mentions " Mother Sturton, in G. L., is for fore-speaking." Melton, in The Astrologaster, says, " Another will foretell of lightning and thunder that shall happen such a day, when there are no such inflammations seen; except men go to the Fortune in Golding-l. to see the tragedy of Doctor Faustus."

GOLDEN LION. The sign of several taverns in Lond. There was one in Fetter Lane, another near Hick's Hall in St. John St., and another on the W. side of Red Cross St., near Barbican. In Grim ii. 4, Harvey says, " The G. L. is my dwelling place."

GOLDEN TUN. The sign of a bookshop in Creed Lane. The 1st edition of Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar was " Printed and sold by Hugh Singleton, dwelling at the sign of the Gylden Tunne, in Creede Lane, near unto Ludgate."

GOLDING LANE. See GOLDEN LANE.

GOLDINGTON, or STOKE GOLDINGTON. A vill. in Beds., 14 m. W. of Bedford. In Hon. Law., the scene of which is laid in Bedford (iii), Gripe says, " Son Benjamin, you must to G. To view young Bruster's lands."

GOLDSMITH'S HALL. The Hall of the Goldsmiths Company, in Lond., on the E. side of Foster Lane at the corner of Carey St. The Hall of Shakespeare's time was built in 1407. It was used as the Exchequer of the Commonwealth from 1641 to 1660, and the Committee for dealing with the sequestered estates of the Royalists was held there: hence it was nicknamed Squeezing Hall. It was taken down in 1829 and the present Hall erected. In Middleton's Chaste Maid v. 4, Yellowhammer, who is a goldsmith, says, " I'll have the dinner kept in G. H., To which, kind gallants, I invite you all." In Brome's Moor iii. 2, Buzzard says, " 'Tis a rich room, this; is it not G. H. ? " In Cowley's Cutter i. 6, Cutter says that Worm " turned a kind of solicitor at G.-H. " : the reference is to the court held there as stated above.

GOLDSMITHS ROW. A row of " 10 fair dwellings and 14 shops all in one frame and uniformly built 4 stories high," stretching on the S. side of Cheapside from Bread St. to the Cross opposite the end of Wood St. They were built in 1491 by Thomas Wood, a goldsmith, and were mainly occupied by men of that trade. Howe complains in 1630 that many of the younger goldsmiths had left the R. and moved to Fleet St., Holborn, and the Strand; so that the shops were turned to " milliners, booksellers, linen drapers, and others." In 1634 Charles I issued an order that none but goldsmiths were to occupy shops in the R., but it was ineffectual. At present there is only one jeweller's shop in the R.

In Look about xx., Fauconbridge says, " I sought the G. R. and found him not." In Marston's Malcontent, Ind., Sly boasts, " I'll walk but once down by the G. R. in Cheap, take notice of the signs, and tell you them with a breath instantly. They begin with Adam and Eve; there's in all just five-and-fifty." In Wilkins' Enforced Marriage iv., Butler says, " I am now going to their place of residence situate in the choicest place in the city, and at the sign of the Wolf, just against G. R., where you shall meet me. You may spend some conference with the shopkeepers' wives; they have seats built a purpose for such familiar entertainments." In Dekker's Lanthorn, Jack in the Box is described, a sort of confidence-trick man; " 'tis thought his next hunting shall be between Lumbard-st. and the G. R. in Cheap-side." In Jonson's Devil iii. 5, Fitzdottrel says, " There's not so much gold in all the R., he says, Till it come from the Mint."

GOLETTA, or GULETTA. A city in N. Africa, in Tunis. It was taken from the Spaniards in 1574 by Selim II, and this is said to have brought about the death of Don John of Austria. In B. & F. Rule a Wife iv. 1, Estifania taunts the " copper captain," Perez, " Here's a goodly jewel! Did you not win this at G., Captain ? "

GOLGOTHA. The place outside the walls of Jerusalem where our Lord was crucified. The word means in Aramaic a skull; but it is doubtful whether it was so called as being the place of execution or from the rounded configuration of the hill. The traditional site is within the Ch. of the Holy Sepulchre, but many modern investigators prefer the hill to the N. of the city under which Jeremiah's grotto lies. It is used figuratively for a place of death and destruction. In R2 iv. 1, 144, the Bp. of Carlisle, predicting the wars of the Roses, says, " this land [shall] be called The field of G. and dead men's skulls." In Mac. i. 2, 40, the Sergeant, speaking of the exploits of Macbeth and Banquo against the rebels, thinks " they meant To memorize another G." In Marston's Malcontent iv. 5, Malevole says, " This earth is only the grave and g. wherein all things that live must rot." In his Antonio B. iv. 4, Antonio says, " My breast is G., grave for the dead." In Thracian ii. 1, one of the Lords says, " I think this be the land of G., Inhabited by none but by the dead." In Yarrington's Two Trag. v. 1, Allensso prays, " Wash away our faults in that precious blood Which Thy dear Son did shed in Galgotha." Milton, P. L. iii. 477, satirizes the pilgrims " that strayed so far to seek In G. him dead who lives in heaven." In Good Wife 1915, Anselm calls the vault " this G." See also CALVARY.

GOMORRAH. One of the " cities of the Plain " destroyed by fire from heaven for the sins of their inhabitants (Gen. xix.). These cities lay N. of the Dead Sea, and some ruins, marked Khumran, about 1 m. from the sea, are supposed to represent G.

In Bale's Promises iii., Pater Cœlestis says, "From Sodom and G. the abominations call for my great vengeance." In Phillips' Griissill 386, we read: "As God did plague Sodom and Gomora in his ire, So will he destroy the wicked with flaming fire." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, the Angel says, "I have brought thee unto Nineveh, As Sodom and G., full of sin." In Jack Drum iv. 205, Pasquil says, "Then comes pale-faced lust—next Sodom; then Gomorha." In Shirley's Duke's Mist iv. 1, Horatio says of a lady's over-painted face: "Her cheeks represent G. and her sister Sodom burning." In Webster's White Devil iii. 1, Monticelso says of Vittoria: "Like those apples travellers report To grow where Sodom and G. stood, I will but touch her, and you straight shall see She'll fall to soot and ashes." Mandeville tells of these Sodom apples: "whoso breaketh them or cutteth them in two, he shall find within them coals and cinders" (see SODOM). The destruction of Sodom and G. was the subject of a motion, or puppet-play. In Jonson's Barthol. v. 1, Leatherhead says, "O the motions that I have given light to! Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was Sodom and G., with the rising of the prentices and pulling down the bawdy houses upon Shrove Tuesday": a Lond. practice being transferred to the cities of the plain.

GONGARIAN. In the quarto of M. W. W. i. 3, 23, Pistol says to Bardolph, "O base G. Wight, wilt thou the spigot wield?" Stevens says that this is a parody on a line in an old play, "O base G., wilt thou the distaff wield?" He had forgotten what play it was, and no one has yet found the passage. The Ff. have Hungarian, q.v.

GOOD HOPE, CAPE OF. At the S. extremity of Africa. It was discovered in 1486 by the Portuguese Bartholomew Diaz, who failed to double it, and christened it Capo dos Tormentos. John II of Portugal changed the name to Capo de Bon Esperanza, and in 1497 Vasco di Gama doubled it and opened up the route to India. In Val. Welsh. iv. 5, Caradoc says, "Patience Must steer my reason to the C. of H." Milton, P. L. iv. 160, speaks of "them who sail Beyond the C. of H., and now are past Mozambic." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary iii. 3, 124, says, "The inhabitants of Capo di buona speranza (the Cape of Good Hope) are exceeding black." Rabelais, Pantagruel iv. 1, describes the course of the Portuguese to India as being round "Cape Bona Speranza at the S. point of Afric."

GOODRIG = GOODRICH. A vill. and castle in Herefordsh., 12 m. S. of Hereford, on the Wye. In H6 A. iv. 7, 64, one of the titles of Talbot is "Lord Talbot of G. and Urchinfield."

GOODWIN SANDS. A shoal off the coast of Kent between the Isle of Thanet and the S. Foreland. It is 10 or 11 m. long and from 3 to 4 broad at its greatest breadth. It lies some 4 or 5 m. from the coast. It is said to have been formed by the sea overflowing a part of the lands of Godwin, Earl of Kent, in 1097: hence the name. Sir Thomas More tells a story which has become a stock instance of the "post hoc ergo propter hoc" fallacy. An old man being examined before a Commission appointed to inquire into the decay of Sandwich harbour testified, "I think that Tenterton steeple is the cause of G. S. I remember the building of Tenterton steeple; and before the Tenterton steeple was in building there was no manner of speaking of any flats or sands; and therefore I think that Tenterton steeple is the cause of the destroying of Sandwich haven."

In Merch. iii. 1, 3, Salarino speaks of the G. S. as "a very dangerous flat and fatal, where the carcasses of many a tall ship lie buried." In K. J. v. 3, 11, a Messenger brings word that the Dauphin's supplies "Are wrecked 3 nights ago on G. s." The same news is brought to the Dauphin in v. 5, 13. In Webster's Weakest v. 3, Villiers says, "This gentlewoman . . . 'Twixt Sluys in Flanders, where she went aboard, And G. S., by sturdy adverse winds Was beaten back upon the coast of France." In Jonson's Case i. 1, Juniper asks the traveller Valentine if he has seen "Jerusalem and the Indies and G.-s. and the tower of Babylon." In Carew's Ode on Jonson's New Inn, he says, "Let the rout say, 'The running sands that, ere thou make a play, Count the slow minutes, might a Godwin frame,'" In Shirley's Peace, a projector is introduced who will "undertake to build a most strong castle on G. s." In Brome's Damozelle i. 1, when Drygound tells Vermine that he has a project, Vermine asks: "Is't not to drain the Goodwins? to be lord of all the treasure buried in the s. there?" Campion, in Book of Airs ii. (1601), says of his kisses, "Sooner may you count the stars . . . Or G. s. devouring." It is used metaphorically for a greedy moneylender. In Jack Drum i. 160, Drum says of a usurer: "He is a quicksand; a G.; a gulf."

GOOSE FAIR. See under Bow.

GOOSE LANE. Lond., off Bow Lane, Cheapside, by Bow Ch. There was also a G. Alley on the E. side of Fleet Ditch running into Seacoal Lane. In Ellis, Early Metrical Romances i. 279, we are told, "Through G.-L. Bevis went tho', There was him done right mickle woe; That lane was so narrowly wrought That Sir Bevis might defend him nought."

GORDIUM (Gn. = Gordian). A town in Bithynia, afterwards rebuilt by Augustus under the name of Juliopolis. It was the ancient capital of the Phrygian kings. According to the legend, Gordius, the 1st K., was originally a peasant. On being made K. he dedicated his wagon in the Acropolis, and an oracle predicted that whoever untied the knot of hide that fastened the pole to the wagon would rule over all Asia. Alexander the Gt. visited G. on his way to Persia and cut the knot with his sword. In Cym. ii. 2, 34, Iachimo, taking off Imogen's bracelet, says it is "As slippery as the Gn. knot was hard." Hence it is used of anything difficult of solution. In H5 i. 1, 46, Canterbury, praising the K., says, "Turn him to any cause of policy, The Gn. knot of it he will unloose, Familiar as his garter." In B. & F. Brother i. 1, Rollo says, "My title needs . . . my sword; With which the Gn. of your sophistry Being cut shall show the imposture." In Shirley's Honor i. 2, Alworth says, "The Gn. which great Alexander could not by subtlety dissolve his sword untwisted." In Davenant's Rhodes B. ii. Solyman says, "Even the Gn. knot at last was cut Which could not be untied." In Chapman's May Day ii. 3, Lodovico says, "I'll so hamper thy affections in the halter of thy lover's absence, making it up in a Gn. knot of forgetfulness, that no Alexander of thy allurements, with all the swords of thy sweet words, shall ever cut it in pieces." In his Chabot i. 1, 119, the Chancellor speaks of the political situation as "A Gn. beyond the Phrygian knot, Past wit to loose it, or the sword." Milton, P. L. iv. 348, says that the serpent "wove with Gn. twine His braided train." In Vacation Exercise 90, he asks, "What power . . . can loose this Gn. knot?" It is most often used of the bond of marriage. In Brandon's Octavia 1107, Octavia speaks of "This same ring that knit the Gn. knot" of her marriage with Antony. In the old Shrew (Haz., p. 530), Polidor says, "Stay to see our marriage rites performed, And knit in sight of heaven this Gn. knot." In Day's Humour iv. 1, Octavio characterizes marriage as "The Gn. knot which none but heaven can loose." In Massinger's Picture ii. 2, Honoria says, "The Gn. of your love was tied by marriage." In Tomkis' Albumazar v. 6, Antonio says, "Conformity of years, likeness of manners, Are Gn. knots that bind up matrimony." In these last two quotations the Gn. knot is not exactly marriage, but the love and mutual suitability that make marriage firm. In Greene's Orlando ii. 1, 580, Orlando says, "This Gn. knot together co-unites A Medor partner in her peerless love." In Mason's Mulleasses 1436, Ferrara says, "I ope my arms To tie a Gn. knot about her waist." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iii. 1, 43, Winifred says, "War not with heaven, Sir, To that is tied my nuptial Gordion."

GORGIAS. A misprint for Gordias, i.e. Gordium's. See GORDIUM. In Tiberius 2082, Drusus sees in a dream a monster whose tail was "Woven in G. hundred thousand knots."

GOSFORD GREEN. An open space just outside the walls of Coventry, where the lists were erected for the fight between Bolingbroke and Mowbray described in R2 i. 3.

GOSHEN. Dist. in Egypt granted by Pharaoh to Jacob and his sons when they came down into that country, as told in Gen. xlvii. 27. It lay W. of the present Suez Canal, between it and the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile, round the city of Pithom (Tel-el-Mashkuta). The Vulgate calls it Gessen. In York M. P. xi. 53, the 2nd Consol says of the Hebrews: "Sithen have they so-journed here in Jessen 400 year." In the corresponding passage in the Towneley M. P. it is called Gessen. Milton, P. L. i. 309, tells how the Egyptians "pursued The sojourners of G."

GOTHAM. A vill. in Notts., abt. 7 m. S. of Nottingham in the Leake Hills. According to the legend, when K. John was about to pass through the town in order to buy a castle in the neighbourhood, the people, not wishing him to do so, industriously played the fool when he came; so arose the proverb of the Wise Fools of G. Properly therefore a man of G. is one who plays the fool for some wise object, and is not such a fool as he looks, but the name came to be applied to anyone of preposterous folly. In the reign of Henry VIII was published The Merrie Tales of the Mad Men of G., in which, amongst many others, is told how they stood round a bush and joined hands in order to prevent a cuckoo in the bush from flying away. The bush is still shown about 1 m. S. of the village. In the Towneley M. P. xii. 180, we read of "the foles of G." In the Hundred Mery Tales there is a section headed "Of the 3 wise men of G." In Richards' Misogonus ii. 3, Cacurgus says, "The wise men of G. are risen again." In K. K. (Haz., vi. 568), the townsmen of G. present a petition to K. Edgar "to have a license to brew strong ale thrice a week; and he that comes to G. and will not spend a penny on a pot of ale, if he be a-dry, that he may fast." Nash, in his preface to Menaphon, p. 8, speaks of "the perusing of our Gothamists' barbarism." Dekker, in Hornbook iii., says, "If all the wise men of Gottam should lay their heads together, their jobbernowls should not be able to compare with thine." In Chauticleers vi., Ditty, the Ballad-monger, has "The Seven Wise Men of G." in his collection. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Merry Report mentions among the places he has visited "Gloucester, Guildford, and G." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon iv. 1, when Sir Boniface says, "I proceeded [i.e. took my degree] in Oxford," Sencer rejoins, "Thou would'st say, in G." Hall, in Satires ii. 5, 19, says to the simoniacal parson, "St. Fool's of Gotam mought thy parish be For this thy base and servile simony." Burton, A. M., Intro., says, "Convicted fools they are, madmen upon record; they are all of Gotam parish." Taylor, in Works (1630), mentions one "Gregory Gandergoose, an alderman of G.," who asked him whether Bohemia was a great town, and whether the last fleet of ships was arrived there.

GOTHS. A Teutonic people who first appear in history on the N. of the Lower Danube in the 3rd cent. A.D., though their original home was probably on the Baltic. This was the ancient country of the Getæ, and this fact, along with the similarity of the names, has caused the 2 peoples to be confounded. The Getæ and the Gothi, or Gothoni, are, however, probably quite distinct. During the 3rd cent. the G. gave great trouble to the Roman Empire, and made several inroads with varying success. In the 4th cent. we find them divided into E. and W., or Ostrogoths and Visigoths. Both sections were Christianized before the end of the 5th cent., and Wulfilas (310-380) gave the world the oldest monument of the Teutonic language in his translation of the Scriptures. For a time Rome extended her protection to the West G., but in 410 Alaric, K. of the W. G., sacked Rome to the amazement of the whole civilized world. Theodoric the Gt. united the 2 branches of the race, and established the E. Gothic Empire at Rome in 493. With his death the E. G. pass out of history, but the W. G. set up a dominion in Spain which outlasted the Empire, and was one of the most important factors in the formation of the Spanish nation. The background of Titus Andronicus is a war between the Romans and the G. in the reign of an imaginary Emperor Saturninus: Tamora, the Q. of the G., is equally unknown to history. The word frequently occurs in the play, and the G. are variously characterized as warlike (the commonest epithet), lusty, and trusty; while the Romans speak of them as giddy, lascivious, and traitorous. But there is nothing in this but pure conventionality. In Jonson's Queens, one of the galaxy is "the wise and warlike Goth, Amalasunta." She was the daughter of Theodoric the Gt., and was equally celebrated for her learning and her capacity for affairs. In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier i. 1, Henrick (Huneric), the successor of Genseric A.D. 477, is hailed as "K. of Vandalls and of G." These were the W. G., who, with the Vandals, invaded Africa from Spain under Genseric in 429. In Cockayne's Trapolin i. 1, Montemores says, "Would G. and Vandals once again would come into Italy," that he might have a chance of fighting them. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xviii., Magnificence mentions "Alericus, that ruled the Gothians by sword," as one of the world's heroes. In W. Rowley's Shoemaker ii. 2, 96, the Nuntius announces, "Allerick, K. of Goaths, hath entered France." In iii. 3, the K. of the G. is called Huldrick; but in any case there is an error of over a century, as the date of the play is A.D. 297. Donne, in Valediction to Songs and Sonnets (1623), says, "When this book is made thus Should again the ravenous Vandals and the G. invade us, Learning were safe." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iv. 2, Arthur's allies are "Islandians, G., Norwegians, Albans, Danes." It would seem that by G. the Scandinavians are meant, and it was long held that Scandinavia was the original home of the G., or, at all events, was taken possession of by them at an early date: there is little evidence, however, to support either of these theories.

In As iii. 3, 9, Touchstone says to Audrey, "I am here with thee and thy goats as the most capricious poet, honest Ovid, was among the G." The double pun will be noted: capricious is from caper, a goat. Ovid was banished by Augustus to Tomi, a town of Lower Mœsia, on the Black Sea, which dist. was formerly inhabited by the Getæ and later by the G. In Ret. Pernass. ii. 4, Academicus says, "Good Ovid in his life time lived with the Getes." In Brome's Covent G. iv. 1, Cockbrain speaks of "Monsters, as Ovid feigned among the Getes." To the men of the Middle Ages the destruction of Rome by the G. seemed a piece of barbarism; and so Gothic was used in the sense of savage, rude, uncultivated. Jonson, in Prince Henry's Barriers, speaks of "all the ignorant G. have razed." In Nero iii. 3, Seneca says, "O Rome, the Getes, The men of Colchis, at thy sufferings grieve." It is impossible to say whether the author means here the Getæ or the G.: probably the latter. In the old Timon ii. 4, Demeas cries to the sergeants who have arrested him, "Where hale ye me, Getes, cannibals, ye cruel Scythians?" where the metre demands that Getes should be pronounced as a monosyllable. In Shirley's Pleasure ii. 1, the Steward tells Frederick, who is fresh from the university, that his aunt means "to make you a fine gentleman and translate you out of your learned language, Sir, into the present Goth and Vandal, which is French." From the university point of view French is a barbarous tongue compared with Latin. In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 4, Lance asks whether all the gentry are to suffer interdiction for Valentine's sake: "No more sense spoken, all things Goth and Vandal." In their Philaster v. 3, Dion speaks of "the goatish Latin" which the shopkeepers write in their bonds. I take this to be intended for Gothish, which is a common form of the adjective: the meaning being barbarous Latin. In Shirley's Courtier ii. 2, when Volterre speaks in bad Spanish, Giotto calls it something "between Goth and Vandal Spanish." In his Honorio i. 1, Mammon says of scholars: "Next to the Goth and Vandal you shall carry The babble from mankind," i.e. shall bear the palm for incomprehensible jargon.

GOYAME. A dist. in Abyssinia, round Lake Tzana. In Cockayne's Obstinate iii. 3, it is mentioned as one of the kingdoms tributary to the Emperor of both the Ethiopias. See under ADEA.

GOZO. A small island in the Mediterranean close to Malta on the N.W. It has always belonged to Malta, q.v. In 1551 the Turks ravaged it and carried off a great many prisoners, though they were unsuccessful in their attack on Valetta. In B. & F. Malta v. 2, Colonna says, "My name is Angelo Who from the neighbour-island here of Goza Was captive led in that unfortunate day When the Turk bore with him 3000 souls." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) ii. 3, writes in 1580 of "the island of Gosa being some years since surprised and overrun by the Turks."

GRACE, ABBEY OF, or THE NEW ABBEY. E. of Tower Hill, Lond. It was built by Edward III in 1359 to the honour of God and our Lady of G., and handed over to the Cistercians. It was dissolved in 1539, and was pulled down and replaced by a storehouse for the Navy. In Deloney's Craft i. 14, Florence and Haunce are to be married "at the A. of G. on Tower Hill."

GRACE CHURCH. The Ch. of St. Bennet at the corner of Gracechurch St. and Fenchurch St. See BENNET'S (St.) and GRACIOUS ST.

GRACE-DIEU. The seat of the Beaumont family in the Charnwood Forest dist. of Leicestersh. Here Francis

Beaumont was born in 1586. In Bancroft's Epigrams 1639, we read: "G.-d., that under Charnwood stands alone, As a great relic of religion, I reverence thine old but fruitful worth That lately brought such noble Beaumonts forth."

GRACIOUS STREET. Now Gracechurch St., Lond., running S. from the junction of Cornhill and Leadenhall to East Cheap. It was originally Grass St., so called from its being the market for grass, corn, and malt. The parish Ch. of St. Bennet, which stood at the corner of Gracechurch St. and Fenchurch St., was for the same reason called the Grass Ch. When the reason for the name was forgotten, it was natural that it should become Grace Ch., and the st. becomes Grace's St., or, more commonly, G. St. After the Fire it was rechristened Gracechurch St., as it still continues. Leaden Hall, the poultry market for Lond., was built at the corner of Gracechurch St. and Leadenhall in 1445 by Simon Eyre, the hero of Dekker's Shoemaker's. There was a conduit towards the S. end of the st., erected by Thomas Hill's executors in 1491. Taylor mentions the Tabard near the Conduit in Gracious St. The name is preserved in Talbot Court by No. 55. Richard Tarlton, the clown, kept the Saba Tavern in this st.: other hosteleries were the Cross Keys, the Bell, and the Spread Eagle, q.v.

In Tarlton's Jests, we read that "Tarlton dwelt in G. St. at a tavern at the sign of the Saba," i.e. the Q. of Sheba. In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 2, Firk says, "Let's march together to the great new hall in G. St. corner, which our master, the new lord mayor, hath built." The last 2 scenes take place in the great hall, and the open yard before it. This is Leadenhall. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon, Sir Harry, the knight who is no scholar, lives in G. St. In i. 1, Chartley speaks of "Gratiana, the knight's daughter in G. Street." In ii. 2, Sir Harry says, "My house is here in G. St." In v. 1, Old Chartley tells the servant that he will be found "At Grace Ch. by the Conduit near Sir Harry." Sir Harry's, therefore, was at the S. end of the st. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv, the watch have come up Gracechurch St., and kept on "straight towards Bishopsgate"; then the Constable gives the word, "Come, let's back to Grace Ch., all's well." In S. Rowley's When You D. 3, the K. (Henry VIII) says, "Bid Charles Brandon to disguise himself And meet me presently at Grace Ch. corner." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. 153, Shore says he will go "to one Mrs. Blages, an inn, in G. St." As Jockey has already told us that Mrs. Blages keeps the Flower-de-Luce in Lombard St., it must have been at the corner of Lombard and Gracechurch Sts. In his F.M. Exch. ii. 7, Barnard says there is to be the rarest dancing "at a wedding in G. st." The poultry trade spread out from Leadenhall into Gracechurch St. In Dekker's Shoemaker's iii. 4, when Margery asks, "Canst thou tell me where I may buy a good hair?" Hodge replies: "Yes, forsooth, at the poulterer's in G. St." To which Margery retorts: "I mean a false hair for my periwig." In Killigrew's Parson v. 1, the Capt., preparing for Wild's wedding, sends one of the watermen "to G. st. to the poulterer's." In Jonson's Neptune, the Boy speaks of "a plump poulterer's wife in Grace's st." There was also a bookshop in the st. Jack Straw was "Printed at Lond. by John Danter and are to be sold by William Barley at his shop in G. st. over against Leadenhall. 1593." Harman's Ground work of Conny-catching was published by the same firm in 1592, and The Pedler's Prophecy in 1595. Thersites was "Printed by John Tysdale and are to be sold . . . in Alhallowes.ch. yard, near unto G. Ch."

GRÆCIA

GRÆCIA. See GREECE.

GRAFTON (more fully, GRAFTON REGIS). A vill. in Northants., on the boundary of Bucks., about 10 m. S. of Northampton. Here was the country seat of Sir Richd. Woodville: and here Edward IV met Woodville's daughter, Lady Elizabeth Grey, and married her privately. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i., the K. says, "Welcome to G., Mother; by my troth, You are even just come as I wished you here."

GRAIA. A Latinized name for Gray's Inn, q.v. In Marston's Mountebanks, presented at Gray's Inn in 1618, Paradox says that he has come to see the presentments "promised by the gallant spirits of G."

GRAMPIANS. A range of mtns. in Scotland, extending in a N.E. direction from Loch Awe along the N. of Perthshire, and then dividing into 2 ranges N. and S. of the Dee respectively. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 5, Belinus speaks of "the Albanian realm Where Grampius ridge divides the smiling dales." Drayton, in Polyolb. viii. 303, tells of the battle between Agricola and the Britons under Galgacus, "at Mt. Grampus."

GRANADA. The capital of the Spanish Province of G., at the confluence of the Darro and the Genil, 250 m. S. of Madrid. It was founded by the Moors in the 10th cent., and in 1235 it became the capital of the Kingdom of G. It was finally taken from the Moors by Ferdinand in 1492. Its chief glory is the Moorish fortress and palace of the Alhambra, built by Mohammed-ebn-Alahmar. In the days of its glory it had 400,000 inhabitants, but since the 16th cent. it has greatly declined. In the cathedral are buried Ferdinand and Isabella. It was once a great centre of the silk-weaving industry, but the production is now very limited. In Lust's Domin. ii. 3, the Q. says, "Spread abroad In Madrid, G., and Medina The hopes of Philip." In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 25, Medina speaks of "the streights of Gibraltar whose watery divisions their Affricke bounds from our Christian Europe in Granado and Andalusia." In Greene's Quip (p. 220), Velvet Breeches has his "netherstock of the purest Granado silk." In Jonson's Cynthia v. 2, the Milliner swears that his goods are "right Granado silk." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 5, the fantastical gull is described as wearing "a Granado stocking."

GRAN CANALE. The great canal in Venice, which runs through the city under the bridge of the Rialto in an S-shaped course from the Piazza of Saint Mark to the island of San Chiara. In Jonson's Volpone v. 8, the Avvocato says, "Thou, Corvino, shalt be rowed Round about Venice through the gd. c., Wearing a cap with fair long asses' ears." In Shirley's Gent. Ven. iii. 1, Thoma-zo says, "Go to the rendezvous, to Rosabella's on the G. C." In Brome's Novella i. 2, Astutta says, "You were best leap From the top o' the house into the Cavail [misprint for Canail] grande." In Dekker's London's Tempe, Oceanus says, "That Grand Canal, where stately once a year A fleet of bridal gondolets appear To marry with a golden ring . . . Venice to Neptune, a poor landscip is To these full braveries of Thamesis."

GRANDPRÉ. A vill. in France on the Aisne in the S.E. corner of the department of Ardennes, 120 m. N.E. of Paris. The Earl of G. is mentioned in H5 iii. 5, 44, as one of the lords summoned by the French K. to Agincourt. In iii. 7, 138, the Constable refers to him as "a valiant and most expert gentleman"; and it is stated that he measured the ground between the French and English forces. In iv. 8, 104, he is mentioned in the list of the slain. He was one of the leaders in the main body of the French army under the Dukes of Alençon and Bar.

GRANGE. A tavern in Lond., near Lincoln's Inn Fields between Carey St. and Clements Lane, near Portugal Row. It was taken down in 1853, and King's College Hospital now occupies the site. In Davenant's Playhouse i., the Player says, "Let him send his train to our house-inn, the G." The Playhouse in question was the Duke's Theatre in Portugal Row.

GRANSON (= GRANDSON, or GRANSEE). A town in Switzerland on the S.W. shore of Lake Neuchâtel. It was taken by Charles the Bold, D. of Burgundy, in 1475, but in 1476 he was defeated there by the Swiss. In Massinger's Dowry i. 2, Charalois speaks of "those 3 memorable overthrows At G., Morat, Nancy, where . . . The warlike Charalois . . . lost treasure, men, and life."

GRANTA. The old name of the Cam, the river on which Cambridge stands. In Domesday Book the town is called Grantebridge, and the vill. of Grantchester still keeps the old name. In the Ret. Pernass. ii. 1, Philomusus says, "Banned be those hours when 'mongst the learned throng By G.'s muddy bank we whilome sung." In v. 4, Ingenioso says, "And thou, still happy Academic, That still mayst rest upon the Muses' bed, Enjoying there a quiet slumbering, When thou reapest unto thy G.'s stream Wonder at thine own bliss, pity our case." Hall, in Satires i. 1, 28, asks "What baser Muse can bide To sit and sing by G.'s naked side?"

GRANTHAM. A town in Lincolnsh., on the Witham, 105 m. N.E. of Lond. The parish Ch. of St. Wulfran dates from the 13th cent., and has a fine spire 284 ft. high. In Ret. Pernass. iii. 1, Sir Radericke, in his oral examination of Immerito, asks him, "How many [miles] from Newmarket to G.?" and is answered: "10, Sir." The actual distance is about 50 m. But the answer is all of a piece with the rest; still, Immerito passes and gets his preferment. In Randolph's Muses iii. 1, Banausus mentions among his other projects, "I'll have 2 wondrous weathercocks Of gold, to set on Paul's and G. steeple." In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv., Alexander threatens the widow that he will strip himself "as naked as G. steeple or the Strand May-pole." In B. & F. Wit Money ii. 4, Lance proposes to spread rumours of "whirlwinds that shall take off the top of G. steeple and clap it on Paul's." Taylor, Works (ii. 178), speaks of "a hat like G. steeple, for the crown was large with frugal brim." The steeple seems to have been twisted in a storm at some time. Dekker, in the Owl's Almanac (1618), says, "A little fall will make a salt [i.e. a salt-cellar] look like G. steeple with his cap to the ale-house." Middleton, in Black Book (1604), p. 21, says, "They turn legacies the wrong way, wresting them quite awry like G. steeple." Drayton, in Polyolb. xxv. 241, speaking of old churches, says, "One above the rest . . . Of pleasant G. is, that pyramid so high, Reared (as it might be thought) to overtop the sky, The traveller that strikes into a wondrous maze, As on his horse he sits, on that proud height to gaze."

GRANTLAND. See GREENLAND.

GRASSHOPPER. A name given to the Royal Exchange, Lond., from the G., the crest of Sir T. Gresham, which formed its weathercock. Hall, in Satires iv. 6, says of the returned traveller: "Now he plies the newswfull g. Of voyages and ventures to inquire."

GRASSHOPPER. A bookseller's sign in Lond. Gascoigne's Government was "Imprinted at Lond. by H. M. for Christopher Barker at the sign of the G. in Paules Churchyard, A.D. 1575."

GRAVE, or GRÆF. A fortress of N. Brabant on the Maas, 55 m. S.E. of Amsterdam. It was taken by the D. of Parma in 1586 and recaptured by Prince Maurice in 1602. In Barnavelt iv. 5, Sir John says, "When Graves and Vendloe were held by the Spaniard, who rose up before me to do these countries service!"

GRAVELINES. Spt. in N. France, on the English Channel, 12 m. E. of Calais. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report has been "at Gravelyn, at Gravesend, and at Glastonbury." It was here that Wolsey met the Emperor Charles V on 10 July, 1520.

GRAVES. A dist. in Gascony in S.W. France. It is specially famous for its white wines. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 3, Bess brings wine, saying, "'Tis of the best G. wine, Sir." Montaigne (Florio's Trans. 1603) i. 40, asks, "Shall we . . . persuade our taste that aloe be wine of G.?"

GRAVESEND. A port in Kent on the S. bank of the Thames, 30 m. below Lond. It is the limit of the Port of Lond. The fare for a wherry from Lond. to G. in the 16th cent. was 2d. Ships for distant ports often started there. In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, Loveless is going to France: his brother says, "You'll hazard losing your tide to G." In Love & F. ii. 1, Simplicity says to Fraud, "I knew thee when thou dwelledst at a place called G." Seaports are usually a good field for swindlers and women of bad character. In Dekker's Westward i. 1, Justiniano speaks of women "as stale as wenches that travel every second tide between G. and Billingsgate." In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report, in the alliterative list of places he has visited, mentions G. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 1, Jarvis reveals a plot to carry Mary "down to the water-side, pop her in at Puddel-dock, and carry her to G. in a pair of oars." In Tomkis's Albumazar iii. 3, Albumazar says, "Speak a boat Ready for G., and provide a supper . . . and thus well fed and merry, Take boat by night." In Massinger's Madam iv. 1, Fortune tells how he has 2 ships returned from Barbary, near G. In Field's Weathercock iii. 3, the Capt. bids, "Go and provide oars; I'll see G. to-night." In Dekker's Edmonton iii. 1, Cuddy says, "This was an ill night to go wooing in; thinking to land at Katherine's Dock, I was almost at G." In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 3, Beaufort says, "My warrant shall overtake him ere he pass G." In T. Heywood's Fortune iii. 1, Anne has "a brother lives at G. who soon would ship you over into France." There was good drinking at G. In Look about vii., Skink says, "At G. I'll wash thy stammering throat with a mug of ale." In Dekker's Eastward iv. 4, Touchstone says, "For reaching any coast save the coast of Kent or Essex with this tide, I'll be your warrant for a G. toast." Dekker, in Raven's Almanac (1609), speaks of Londoners "that in all your lives' time scarce travel to G., because you are sworn to keep within the compass of the freedom." In Nash's Prognostication, he says, "Fishmongers shall go down as far as G. in wherries and forestall the market." In Webster's Weakest i. 2, Bunch tells that he was born "at G."

In letter prefixed to Milton's Comus, he says, "The passage from Genoa into Tuscany is as diurnal as a G. barge." There was evidently a daily service of barges from London to G. Dekker, in News from Hell, says that Charon's boat "is like G. Barge; and the passengers privileged alike, for there's no regard of age, of sex, of beauty, of riches; he that comes in first sits no better than the last." The Cobler of Canterburie contains tales "told in the barge between Billingsgate and G." Nash, in Prognostication, says, "There is like to be concluded by an Act set down in G. Barge, that he that wipes his nose, and hath it not, shall forfeit his whole face." Nash, in Somewhat to Read (1591), says, "Only I can keep pace with G. barge; and care not, if I have water enough to land my ship of fools with the Term: the tide, I should say." In Deloney's Craft ii. 2, Meg of Westminster says, "I am not so high as Paules nor is my foot as long as Graves-end barge." In ii. 10, "The Green K. of St. Martins sailed in G. Barge" on his way to Flanders. In Sharpham's Fleire ii. 387, Fleire says to the gallants, "I'll put you in the way of all flesh, I'll send you to Graves-end, I'll see you in the tilt-boat."

GRAY FRIARS. The monastery of the Franciscan F. who came to England in the 13th cent. and built their home on the N. side of Newgate St. in 1225. In 1327 the ch. of the monastery was rebuilt; in 1429 Whittington built the f. a large library and over £500 was spent in equipping it with books. It was seized by Henry VIII at the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and with unwonted generosity presented to the City for the use of the poor. The ch. became the parish Ch. of Christ Ch. Edward VI actually incorporated Christ's Hospital on the site of the old G. F. For further details, see under CHRIST'S HOSPITAL, CHRIST CH. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 276, Dean Nowell relates that "Sir Richard Whittington began the Library of G. F. in Lond."

GRAY'S INN. An Inn of Court in Lond., to which are attached 2 Inns of Chancery, Staple Inn and Barnard's Inn. It stands on 30 acres of ground on the N. side of Holborn and the W. side of G. I. Rd., formerly G. I. Lane. It was made up of 4 courts, Coney Ct., Holborn Ct., Field Ct., and Chapel Ct. N. of the Courts are the famous gardens, which were laid out by Lord Bacon, the most illustrious of the members of the I., about 1600. The Hall, which still remains, was erected between 1555 and 1560. The Gate from Holborn was built of red brick in the beginning of the 17th cent., and has recently been covered with stucco. The I. takes its name from Reginald de Grey, of the family of the Greys of Wilton, who held the property, then known as Portpoole, in the beginning of the 14th cent.: the name survives in Portpoole Lane, between G. I. Rd. and Leather Lane. After passing through the hands of Hugh Denny and the Prior of East Sheen, it came to the Crown at the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and was rented by Henry VIII to the lawyers, who had previously held it from the former owners.

Revels were annually held in the Hall under the presidency of a Lord of Misrule, who gloried in the title "The most high and mighty Prince of Purpoole [i.e. Portpoole], Arch-Duke of Stapulia and Bernarda, etc." The 1st Masque performed in the I., of which notice has survived, was written in 1527 by John Roo, who expiated in the Fleet his allusions to Wolsey in the Masque. In 1594 Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors was performed in the Hall, which thus shares with the Hall of the Middle Temple the distinction of being one of the 2 surviving buildings in which his plays were presented. Sir William Gascoigne, the Chief Justice in Henry IV B., who committed Falstaff to the Fleet, was reader at G. I. Lord Bacon had rooms in No. 1 Coney Ct., and took from them the ride which resulted in his death. Amongst the dramatists, George Gascoigne, George Chapman, Abraham Fraunce, and James Shirley resided for a time in G. I. In Dekker's Westward iii. 2, we learn that Monopoly, the lawyer, belonged to the I.: "I will have the hair of your head and beard shaved," he says, "and e'er I catch you at G. I." Taylor, in Works i. 122, mentions "the Green Dragon against G. I. Gate." In H4 B. iii. 2, 36, Shallow tells how "the very same day did I fight with one Sampson Stockfish, a fruiterer, behind G. I.": probably in G. I. Fields, q.v. Barry's Ram was printed by "Robert Wilson at his shop in Holborn at the New Gate of G. I. 1611." Glapthorne's Hollander was "Printed by I. Okes for A. Wilson and are to be sold at her [sic] shop at Grayes-Inne Gate in Holborne. 1640."

GRAY'S INN FIELDS. The open fields N. of G. I. Gardens, used as a practice ground for archers, and afterwards frequented by footpads and other undesirable characters. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton asks Moll for an appointment to meet her "somewhere near Holborn." And she replies: "In G. I. F. then." In Pasquill's Nightcap 1632, we read: "Fairer than any stake in G. I. F., Guarded with gunners, bill-men, and a rout Of bowmen bold which at a cat do shoot." Rout was evidently pronounced to rhyme with shoot.

GRAY'S INN LANE (now raised to the dignity of G. I. Rd.). Lond., running N. from Holborn on the E. side of G. I. to the junction of Pentonville Rd. and Euston Rd. James Shirley, the dramatist, lived for a time in G. I. L. T. Heywood's S. Age was "Printed by Nicholas Okes and are to be sold by Benjamin Lightfoote at his shop at the upper end of Graies Inne-Lane in Holborn. 1613."

GREAT OCEAN (the ATLANTIC OCEAN). In Elements 25, Experience says, "This sea is called the G. O., so great is it that never man could tell it since the world began; till now, within these 20 years, westward be found new lands that we never heard tell of before this."

GREECE (Gk. = Greek, Gn. = Grecian, Gsh. = Greekish). The S.E. promontory of Europe, S. of the Olympus and Acroceranian mtns. The inhabitants themselves called it Hellas: the name Græcia was given to it by the Romans, probably from the Epirot tribe of the Graii, with whom they first came into contact. In 146 B.C. it became a Roman province under the name of Achaia. Immediately after the conquest of Constantinople it fell into the hands of the Turks, and remained a part of the Ottoman Empire till 1830, when it was constituted an independent kingdom at the Conference of Lond.

Geographical references. In Shrew, Ind. ii. 95, we are told of "old John Naps of G." amongst the friends of Sly. We should read "Greet," which is a little vill. on the Tewkesbury Rd. between Greetton and Winchcombe. In Err. i. 1, 133, Ægeon tells the D., "5 summers have I spent in furthest G.," which seems to include the Gk. cities of Asia Minor. The same wider use of the word to include the Gk. cities of Asia Minor and Africa is found in Per. i. 4, 97, where the people of Tarsus pray for Pericles of Tyre: "The gods of G. protect you!" and in ii. 1, 67, where a fisherman of Pentapolis, in N. Africa, says, "Here's them in our country of G. gets more with begging than we can do with working." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Geraldine has travelled through "Spain and the Empire, G. and Palestine." Hycke, p. 88, has travelled in "G." In T. Heywood's B. Age iii., Jason speaks of "fertile and populous G., G. that bears men such as resemble gods." Milton, P. R. iv. 240, speaks of "Athens, the eye of G."

In iii. 118, the Tempter says that God requires glory, "and glory he receives Promiscuous from all nations, Jew, or Gk., Or Barbarous."

The Mythology of the ancient Gks. is constantly referred to in the dramas and poems of our period. The stories most often alluded to are the dethronement of Chronos (Saturn) by Zeus (Jupiter), and the division of the universe between Zeus (Jupiter), Poseidon (Neptune), and Pluto; the rebellion of the Giants against the Gods of Olympus; the story of Prometheus; the labours of Heracles; and the incidents connected with the siege of Troy, the early history of Thebes, Athens, and Sparta, and the oracles at Delphi and Dodona. The Gods are almost invariably mentioned under their Latin names, as follows: Chronos is Saturn; Zeus, Jupiter; Hera, Juno; Poseidon, Neptune; Ares, Mars; Aphrodite, Venus; Hephaistos, Vulcan; Artemis, Diana; Athene, Pallas; Dionysus, Bacchus; Heracles, Hercules. T. Heywood's Gold., S., B., and Iron Ages are a series of stories from the Gk. Mythology, and Lyly drew many of his subjects from the same source. Incidental allusions are exceedingly numerous in all our playwrights, their knowledge being gained for the most part from Ovid. Milton, P. L. i. 739, says that Mammon was not "unadored In ancient G.," and identifies him with Hephestus or Mulciber.

References to the Trojan War. This famous war was undertaken by the Hellenes to avenge the rape of Helen, the wife of Menelaus, K. of Sparta, by Paris, the son of Priam, K. of Troy. Agamemnon of Mycenæ, the brother of Menelaus, was the leader of the Hellenic forces, and amongst their chiefs were Achilles, Odysseus (Ulysses), Nestor, Ajax the Greater, and Ajax the Lesser. Of the Trojan heroes Hector stands pre-eminent; Æneas became famous through the legend which traced the origin of Rome to him, and which received world-wide currency through the Æneid of Vergil; Troilus has become immortal through the story of Cressida's faithlessness. The siege lasted 10 years and ended in the fall of Troy. That some such expedition took place in, or about, the 12th cent. B.C. is highly probable, but the details of the story are, of course, legendary. Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida is based on the incident of Cressida's infidelity to the Trojan hero. There is no hint of this in Homer's Iliad, and it is first found in the Roman de Troyes, by Benoit de Saintmore (1175). Boccaccio told the story in his Filostrato, and Chaucer followed him in his Troilus and Chryseyde. In Troil. prol., we are told how "from isles of Greece The princes orgulous . . . Put forth toward Phrygia, and their vow is made To ransack Troy." In i. 1, 7, Troilus says, "The Gks. are strong and skilful to their strength, Fierce to their skill, and to their fierceness valiant." In ii. 1, 13, Thersites says to Ajax, "The plague of G. upon thee!" He is probably referring to the plague which Apollo sent among the Gks., as related in the first book of the Iliad. In ii. 2, 78, Troilus speak of Helen as "A Gn. Queen whose youth and freshness Wrinkles Apollo and makes stale the morning." In iii. 3, 211, Ulysses says, "All the Gsh. girls shall tripping sing." The usage throughout the play is Gk. as a noun, Gn. or Gsh. as adjectives. In iv. 1, 7, Paris speaks of Diomed as "a valiant Gk." In iv. 1, 73, Diomed says of Helen: "She hath not given so many good words breath As for her Gks. and Trojans suffered death." In iv. 4, 78, Troilus says, "The Gn. youths are full of quality: They're loving, well composed with gifts of nature, And flowing o'er with arts and exercise"; and in go, "I cannot sing, nor heel the high lavolt, Nor sweeten talk, nor play at subtle games ; Fair virtues all to which the Gns. are Most prompt and pregnant." In v. 5, 24, Nestor says of Hector: "The strawy Gks., ripe for his edge, Fall down before him, like the mower's swath." In v. 6, 10, Troilus reviles Diomed and Ajax as "both you cogging Gks." In Merch. v. 1, 5, Lorenzo says, "In such a night Troilus methinks mounted the Trojan walls And sighed his soul toward the Gn. tents Where Cressid lay." In As iv. 1, 96, Rosalind says, "Troilus had his brains dashed out with a Gn. club ; yet he did what he could to die before and he is one of the patterns of Love." In All's i. 3, 74, the Clown sings of Helen: "Was this fair face the cause, quoth she, Why the Gns. sacked Troy?" In Cor. i. 3, 46, Volumnia says, "The breasts of Hecuba . . . looked not lovelier Than Hector's forehead when it spit forth blood At Gn. sword." In M. W. W. ii. 3, 34, the Host says to Caius, "Thou art a Hector of G., my boy." Hector was, of course, a Trojan, not a Gk.: the mistake may be intentional and humorous, but in Cor. i. 8, 12, Aufidius calls Hector "the whip of your bragged progeny," i.e. of the Trojans: where the obvious meaning is that Hector whipped the Trojans, though it may mean that he was the whip that they employed against the Gks. In H6 A. v. 5, 104, Suffolk, going to woo Margaret of Anjou for Henry, says, "Thus Suffolk goes, As did the youthful Paris once to G., With hope to find the like event in love," i.e. to win Margaret for himself. In H6 C. ii. 2, 146, Edward says to Margaret, "Helen of G. was fairer far than thou Although thy husband may be Menelaus," i.e. although he may have been cuckolded by Suffolk. In H4 B. ii. 4, 181, Pistol rants about "Cæsars and Cannibals and Trojan Gks." In Cym. iv. 2, 313, Imogen says, "Pisanio, All curses maddened Hecuba gave the Gks. . . be darted on thee!" When Hecuba, the mother of Hector, was taken by the Gks., she cursed them so vigorously that they killed her and buried her at Cynos Sema, i.e. the tomb of the bitch. In Tit. i. 2, 379, Marcus says, "The Gks. upon advice did bury Ajax That slew himself." The story is told in Sophocles' Ajax. The hero committed suicide after his fit of madness, and the Atreidæ would have refused him burial, but were compelled to bury him by Teucrus and Odysseus. In Tit. v. 3, 84, Marcus refers to the story told by Æneas to Dido "of that baleful burning night When subtle Gks. surprised K. Priam's Troy." The fall of Troy is the subject of the Player's speech in Ham. ii. 2, 472. In H6 C. ii. 1, 52, the Messenger describes the death of the D. of York: "He stood against them, as the hope of Troy Against the Gks. that would have entered Troy." In Sonnets liii. 8, the poet says of his mistress: "On Helen's cheek all art of beauty set, And you in Gn. tines are painted new." In Lucrece 1368, a painting is described, "made for Priam's Troy, Before the which is drawn the power of G., For Helen's rape the city to destroy"; and a detailed account of the siege follows. In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 5, Lancaster addresses Gaveston, "Monster of men That, like the Gsh. strumpet, trained to arms And bloody wars so many valiant knights." In Marlowe's Faustus xiii. 21, Faustus says, "You shall behold that peerless Dame of G. No otherways for pomp and majesty Than when Sir Paris crossed the seas with her." In Selimus 2480, Selim says, "When the coward Gks. fled to their ships . . . the noble Hector Returned in triumph to the walls of Troy" (see Iliad xv.). In Cæsar's Rev. i. chor., Discord says, "'Twas I that did the fatal apple fling Betwixt the 3 Idæan goddesses That so much blood of Gks. and Trojans split." The decision of Paris to give the apple, "for the most beautiful," to Aphrodite was the result of her promise that he should have the most beautiful woman in Hellas; which led to his abduction of Helen and the Trojan War. In Phillips' Grissill 1824, Diligence says that Grissill's daughter was "as beautiful as ever the Gsh. Hellin was whom Paris the Trojan hath won in fight." In Alimony ii. 5, Joculette talks of "Thersites, that disfigured Gk." (see Iliad ii. 211 seq.). In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 7, Cassibelanus says of Nennius: "Could Britain's genius save a mortal man, Thou hadst outlived the smooth-tongued Gk.," i.e. Nestor, of sweet speech, the oldest of the Gk. warriors (see Iliad i. 248). In Middleton's Blurt iv. 2, Lazarillo says, "I would I had the Gks.' wooden curtal to ride away." In May's Heir i., Roscio says he is "Tired more with wooing than the Gn. Q. In the long absence of her wandering lord." The reference is to Penelope and Odysseus. In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 167, Rodamant speaks of Helen as "that Gsh. giglot . . . That left her lord, Prince Menelaus, And with a swain made scape away to Troy." In Trouble. Reign. Haz., p. 245, the Bastard says, "I shall surprise his [Richd.'s] living foes As Hector's statue did the fainting Gks.": where statue seems to mean appearance. In Massinger's Old Law iv. 1, Gnotho says, "Do not I know our own countrywomen, Sure [he means Hiren, i.e. Irene] and Nell of G.?" Milton, P. L. ix. 18, tells of "Neptune's ire or Juno's that so long Perplexed the Gk., and Cytherea's son [Æneas]." In B. & F. Prize ii. 5, Petruccio denounces vengeance on Maria, "Were she as fair as Nell-a-G."

Allusions to Other Events in Ancient Greek History. In Cor. iii. 1, 107, Coriolanus speaks of the Roman senate as "a graver bench Than ever frowned in G." He is probably thinking of the Court of the Areopagus at Athens. Later, in 114, he speaks of giving forth "The corn o' the storehouse gratis, as 'twas used Sometime in G." The passage is taken verbatim from North's Plutarch. The system of doles to the citizens from the Theoric Fund became greatly abused at Athens from the 4th cent. onwards. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Menaphon says to Cosroe, "How easily may you with a mighty host Pass into Græcia, as did Cyrus once, And cause them to withdraw their forces home." Cyrus was never in G.: possibly Darius or Xerxes is intended. In Middleton's Old Law iv. 1, the Cook speaks of "Hiren the fair Gk." The reference is to Peele's The Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek. Hiren is meant for Irene. In H4 B. ii. 4, 172 Pistol, drawing his sword, says, "Have we not Hiren [quasi iron] here?" In Lochrine i. 1, 46, Corineus boasts of his victories over "The Gn. monarch, warlike Pandrassus." This is purely legendary. Milton, P. L. iv. 212, describes Seleucia as "built by Gn. kings." It was built by Seleucus, one of Alexander's generals, at the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. In P. L. x. 307, he speaks of Xerxes setting out "the liberty of G. to yoke." In P. R. iv. 270, he tells how the Athenian orators "fulminated over G. To Macedon and Artaxerxes' throne." The reference is to the patriotic orations of Demosthenes, Isocrates, and the rest against Philip of Macedon and the Persians.

Greek Empire. After the division of the Roman Empire in A.D. 395, the E. half, with its capital at Constantinople, is often spoken of as the Gk. Empire. In Massinger's Emperour ii. 1, Pulcheria says to the Emperor Theodosius of Amasia, sister to the D. of Athens: "If you think her worth your embraces And the sovereign title of the Gn. Empress," then marry her.

The Turkish Conquest of Greece. In Fulke-Greville's Mustapha, chor. ii., the Mahometan priests boast of their swords having bound "lett' red G., the lottery of Arts, Since Mars forsook her, subtle, never wise."

Greek = the language of Ancient Greece. In As ii. 5, 61, Jaques says that Duccame "is a Gk. invocation to call fools into a circle." Probably he means to suggest that it is unintelligible to his friends (see below). In Shrew ii. 1, 81, Gremio presents Lucentio as "cunning in Gk., Latin, and other languages." In 101, Tranio gives Baptista "a small packet of Gk. and Latin books" for his daughter's use. In J. C. i. 2, 282, Casca tells Cassius that Cicero "spoke Gk." In B. & F. Wit. S. W. i. 2, Witty decides that Priscian is "a very excellent scholar in the Gk."; and Sir Gregory mockingly says that if Achilles spoke but this tongue, "I do not think but he might have shaken down the walls [of Troy] in a sennight and never troubled the wooden horse." In their Wild Goose ii. 2, when Pinac comes courting Mirabel, the servant asks him: "Can you speak Gk.?" and as he cannot he tells him he has no chance with his mistress. In Shirley's Honoria i. 1, Mammon says that scholars "think themselves brave fellows when they talk Gk. to a lady." Jonson, in the verses prefixed to 1st Folio, says of Shakespeare: "Thou hadst small Latin and less Gk." In Gascoigne's Government i. 4, Phyllosarcus, a young man about to proceed to the university, says of himself and his brother: "We were also entered into our Gk. grammar." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. 1, Stephen declares that the hawking and hunting languages "are more studied than the Gk. or the Latin." Milton, in Sonnet on Detraction 14, refers to Sir John Cheek, who taught "Cambridge and K. Edward Gk." Sir John was the 1st Professor of Gk. at Cambridge, 1514-1557. In B. & F. Elder B. i. 2, Andrew, the servant of Charles, says, "Were it Gk., I could interpret for you," but he disclaims knowledge of Syriac and Arabic. In ii. 1, old Miramont says, "Though I can speak no Gk., I love the sound on 't; It goes so thundering as it conjured devils." In their Thomas iii. 1, Thomas says that a physician's head "is filled with broken Gk." Gk. not being commonly understood, the phrase "it is Gk. to me" means "it is unintelligible." In J. C. i. 2, 288, Casca says of Cicero's speech: "For mine own part it was Gk. to me." In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Subtle says of his alchemical terms: "This is heathen Gk. to you." In ii. 5, he says, "Is Ars Sacra a heathen language?" Ananias replies, "Heathen Gk., I take it."—"How?" says Subtle, "heathen Gk.?" Ananias replies, "All's heathen but the Hebrew." In Greene's James IV iv. 2, when Eustace asks Ida, "Will you wed?" she answers, "'Tis Gk. to me, my lord." In Killigrew's Parson iii. 5, the drawer at the Devil says, "I'll fetch you that, Sir, shall speak Gk. and make your worship prophesy." The wine will make the drinker talk nonsense. In Middleton's Blurt iii. 3, Imperia says, "Nay, 'tis Gk. to me."

Greek Authors, Orators, Poets, etc. In Chapman's Rev. Bussy ii. 1, 113, Baligny says, "What said the princess, sweet Antigone, In the grave Gk. tragedian, when the question 'Twixt her and Creon is, for laws of kings?" The reference is to the Antigone of Sophocles. In Massinger's Actor i. 1, Paris speaks of "The Gks., to whom we owe the first invention Both of the buskined scene and humble sock," i.e. tragedy and comedy. Gk. orators, headed by Demosthenes, were the most famous in the world. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Cassius speaks of Rhodes as "my nurse when in my youth I drew The flowing milk of Gsh. eloquence." There was a famous school of oratory at Rhodes. Jonson, in Discov. 128, says, "Which of the Greeklings durst ever give precepts to Demosthenes?" In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iii. 2, 47, Clermont says, "Demades (that passed Demosthenes For all extemporal orations) Erected many statues, which (he living) Were broke." Demades was contemporary with Demosthenes. The Gk. poets stand in the first rank of the world's literature. In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Vergil says, "Use to read (but not with a tutor) the best Gks. As Orpheus, Musæus, Pindarus, Hesiod, Callimachus, and Theocrite, High Homer; but beware of Lycophron, He is too dark and dangerous a dish." Jonson, in Underwoods xlvii. 31, says, "Gk. was free from rhyme's infection Happy Gk. by this protection, Was not spoiled." The Seven Wise Men of G. were Solon of Athens, Chilo of Sparta, Thales of Miletus, Bias of Priene, Cleobulus of Lindos, Pittacus of Mitylene, and Periander of Corinth. In Marmion's Companion ii. 4, Careless says, "I am now as discreet in my conceit as the 7 Sophies of G." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 2, young Knowell protests he did not recognize Brainworm, "an I might have been joined pattern with one of the 7 wise Masters for knowing him." G. was famous for its wisdom; but in Lyly's Endymion v. 3, Pythagoras says, "I had rather in Cynthia's court spend 10 years than in G. one hour." In Middleton's Old Law i. 1, the Lawyer calls G. "Our ancient seat of brave philosophers." In Davenant's Platonic ii. 1, Sciolto says, "Plato was an old Gk. fellow that could write and read." In Milton's Comus 439, the Elder Brother asks, "Shall I call Antiquity from the old schools of G. To testify the arms of chastity?" In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "The learned Gk. rich in fit epithets." In Lyly's Endymion iii. 1, Cynthia says, "If the philosophers of G. can find remedy I will procure it." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy i. 1, 335, Clermont quotes from Epictetus, whom he calls "the good Gk. moralist." Later (353) he refers to "The splenative philosopher that ever Laughed at them all," i.e. Democritus.

Arts, Luxury, Dress, etc. Milton, P. R. iv. 338, makes our Lord suggest that "rather G. from us [the Hebrews] these arts [music and song] derived." This was a common belief amongst the older theologians. In 360, he says that the Hebrew prophets taught the rules of civil government better "Than all the oratory of G. and Rome." In Jonson's Volpone iii. 6, Mosca says, "Let's die like Romans, since we have lived like Gns." The Gks. were held to be flatterers and dissemblers. In Tiberius 685, Sejanus advises the man who would succeed to do at Rome as Rome does: "Flatter in Creet and fawn in Græcia." In Lyly's Euphues Anat. Wit. 74, Philautus says, "It is commonly said of Gns. that craft cometh to them by kind." In Hoffman ii., Clois says to the actors, who are to disguise themselves as Gks., "Within are Gn. habits for your heads." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings, "Some like breechless women go, The Russ, Turk, Jew, and Gn."

Greek Calends. The Romans dated the days of the month from the Calends, which was the 1st of the month, but there was no such thing in G. Hence the Gk. calends means "never." In Shirley's Honoria iii. 2, Alamonde asks, "When is this day of triumph?" And Phantasm answers: "At the Gk. Calends." So, in Rabelais, Pantagruel iii. 3, Panurge says he will be out of debt "at the ensuing term of the Gk. calends." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 2, Phantastes says that the squaring of the circle, the philosopher's stone, and the next way to the Indies "will be found out all together, ad Græcas calendās," i.e. never.

Gk. is used in the sense of a frivolous, lively rascal; often in the phrase "merry Gk." The origin of the use is to be found in the Roman contempt for the Gk. adventurers who were attracted to the capital of the Empire. In Troil. iv. 4, 58, Cressida speaks of herself as "A woeful Cressid 'mongst the merry Gks." In Tw. N. iv. 1, 19, Sebastian says to the Clown, "I prithee, foolish Gk., depart from me." In Jonson's Case iv. 4, Juniper addresses Onions, "Sayst thou so, mad Gk.?" In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 549, Pursenet says of Spendall: "This is the Agamemnon of all merry Gks.," i.e. jolly good fellows. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. A. v. 1, George says there are madmen of all countries in Bedlam, "but especially mad Gks., they swarm." Mathewe Merygreeke is the clown in Roister. In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca says, "Go home and tell the merry Gks. that sent you, Ilium shall burn and I as did Æneas Will on my back carry this warlike lady." In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Bellamont, visiting Bedlam, says, "Let's see what Gks. are within." In Ret. Pernass. i. 1, we have: "Thou seems a mad Gk. and I have loved such lads from my infancy." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 26, Spicing addresses Falconbridge as "My brave Falconbridge! my mad Gk.!" Merry Gk. as applied to a woman means one of bad character—a courtesan. In Troil. i. 2, 117, when Pandarus tells Cressida that Helen loves Troilus better than Paris, she replies, "Then she's a merry Gk. indeed." In Massinger's Guardian ii. 5, Calipso, in a list of foreign females, mentions "The merry Gk., Venetian courtesan." In Middleton's Old Law iv. 1, the Drawer exclaims, "Here's a consort of merry Gks.!"

Gk. wines seem to have been highly esteemed in the 16th and 17th cents., though they are now looked upon as of inferior quality and lacking in body. In Troil. v. 1, 1, Achilles says of Hector: "I'll heat his blood with Gsh. wine to-night Which with my scimitar I'll cool tomorrow." In Massinger's New Way iii. 2, Overbury says to Lovell, "May it please my lord to taste a glass of Gk. wine?" In Marlowe's Tamb. B. ii. 3, Orcanes says, "With full Natolian bowls of Gsh. wine Now let us celebrate our happy conquest." In his Jew i. 1, Barabas speaks of his "Spanish oils and wines of G." In Shirley's Pleasure i. 1, Bornwell says, "We have no Gk. wine in the house, I think," and sends a footman to buy some. In Ford's Trial iii. 1, Benatzi, in a list of luxuries, says, "Gk. wines—rich!" In Massinger's Very Woman iii. 5, Antonio says to Pedro, "Send me 2 or 3 bottles of your best Gk. wine." In his Old Law iv. 1, the Drawer says, "Here's the quintessence of G.; the sages never drunk better grape." To which the Cook replies, "Sir, the mad Gks. of this age can taste their Palermo as well as the sage Gks. did before them." In Marston's Ant. Rev. A. ii., Piero says, "Fill out Gk. wines; we'll have a banquet." In Shirley's Honoraria iii. 1, Traverse says, "Let me indulge a glass of the Gk. wine." In Barnes' Charter iii. 5, Frescobaldi says to Bagniola, "I'll drink a flagon of Gk. wine with thee." In Chapman's Blind Beggar x., Cleanthes says, "Let us go to frolic in our Court Carousing free whole bowls of Gsh. wine." In Nabbes' C. Garden iv. 1, Dasher says, "I will but present a glass of Gk. sack to the hands of a noble lord, and return to serve you." In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 3, 361, Alvida asks, "Will he swear it to my Lord the King And in a full carouse of Gsh. wine Drink down the malice of his deep revenge?"

Greek Animals. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Puntarvolo is to bring back from his travels "a Turk's moustachio, my dog a Gn. hare's lip." The hare is common in G.

Greek Monastery. The Gk. religion has always been that of the Orthodox Gk. Ch., and there are a large number of monasteries there. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. v. 3, Prospero relates that Juliana "enjoined me to place her in a Gsh. monastery."

GREEN ARBOUR COURT. A lane in Lond., leading from the upper end of Old Bailey into Seacoal Lane. It was swept away when the Holborn Viaduct was built. The steps that led into it were called "Break Neck Steps." Prynne's Histriomastix was "Printed for Michael Sparke and sold at the Blue Bible in Grene A. in Little Old Bailey. 1633." The Book of Riddles was "Printed by T. C. for Michael Sparke dwelling in Greene A. at the sign of the blue Bible. 1629."

GREEN DRAGON. There were several taverns in Lond. with this sign. The best-known was the one at 56 Fleet St., which still keeps the old name. This is probably the one referred to by Taylor, who, on the 1st day of his Penniless Pilgrimage i. 122, visited "the G. D. against Grays Inn Gate." In Webster's Weakest v. 2, Bunch says that the best liquor in Andres is to be had "at the G. D." It was also a bookseller's sign. The 1st Quarto of Merch. was "Printed by I. R. for Thomas Heyes and are to be sold in Paules Church-yard at the sign of the Greene D. 1600." Brome's Five New Plays were "Printed for A. Crook at the G. D. in St. Paul's Church-yard. 1659."

GREEN GATE. The name of a house in St. Martins-le-Grand, Lond.: probably a mistake for Queen G. In More ii. 2, Lincoln says, "This is St. Martin's and yonder dwells Mutas, a wealthy Piccardye, at the Greene G." According to Holinshed his name was Newton, and his house was called Queene G., not G. G., and was in Cornhill.

GREENLAND. A large island or continent belonging to Denmark, lying between Iceland and N. America. A settlement was made there from Iceland by Red Eric in 986, the people were christianized, and bishops were appointed over a period of 5 cents. But from the middle of the 13th cent. G. passed out of history until it was rediscovered by Davis in 1585. It was resettled in 1721. In Jonson's Devil ii. 1, Meercraft gulls Fitzdottrel into thinking that he is to be Duke of Drowned Land: and Engine says encouragingly, "It goes like Groenland, Sir, if you mark it." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes speaks of the Christian armies including men from "Vast Grantland compassed with the frozen Sea." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forobosco threatens by his magical power to send the Clown "to G. for a haunch of venison." In a letter from Sir Philip Sidney to Hubert Languet (1577) we are told how Frobisher passed the Feroe isles and an island which he supposed to be Friesland discovered by the Venetian Zeni. This was probably G. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Floradin says that he has "travelled Frizland, Island, and Groenland." Drayton, in Elegy of his Lady (1627), speaks of ships putting out "Both to our G. and Virginia."

GREENWICH. A town in Kent on the S. bank of the Thames. The present Naval College occupies the site of an ancient royal palace in which Henry VIII, Mary, and Elizabeth were born. Henry VIII made it his chief residence and new-named it Placentia. James I and Charles I used it frequently, but Charles II pulled it down and began the building of the Naval Hospital, which was completed in the reign of Anne. G. Park, in which is the Observatory, built in 1675, was enclosed in 1433, and covers nearly 200 acres. Shabbag, in Feverham epi., "was murdered in Southwark as he passed to Greenewitch where the Lord Protector [the D. of Somerset: the date is 1551] lay." In Dekker's Eastward iv. 4, Golding brings word that "the Colonel and all his company, putting forth drunk from Billingsgate, had like to have been cast away on this side G." In Fair Women ii. 145, Beane asks, "Must I go first to G., Sir?" and adds: "I cannot go by water, for it ebbs; The wind's at west, and both are strong against us." The scene is at Woolwich, which is east of G. Chaucer's pilgrims passed above "Grenewych, ther many a shrewe is inne, at half way pryne" on the 1st day, i.e. about 7.30 a.m. (C. T. A. 3907). It would seem that Chaucer was residing in G. at this time, for, in Lenvoy a Scogan 45, he speaks of being "in thende of which strene," i.e. the Thames, and the MSS. add a note to the line—"G." This would account for the comment of the poet about the shrews. He was speaking from painful experience. In Oldcastle iii. 4, the K., at Blackheath, orders Butler to "Go down by G. and command a boat At the Friar's Bdge. attend my coming down." The easiest way from Kent to Lond. was by way of G. and the Thames. In Prodigal iv. 1, Delia, being in Kent, says, "I will first go to G., and so to Lond." In Nash's Quip, he says, "Now, Master Waterman, there is none so simple but that knows your fares and what is due between G. and Lond." In B. & F. Scornful i. 1, young Loveless says it is from Lond. "a long half-mile by land to G."

It was at the court at G. that Buckingham's Surveyor heard the treasonable talk which he reports to the K. in H8 i. 2, 188. In Fair Women ii. 217, Beane says he is going to Lond. "when I have been at the court at G." In Middleton's Chaste Maid i. 1, Yellowhammer says, "'Honour' and 'faithful servant!' they are compliments for the worthies of Whitehall or G." Plays were often performed at G. before the Court. At Christmas 1594 a company which included Kemp, Burbage, and Shakespeare, performed 2 unnamed comedies there. It was on the same day on which the Comedy of Errors was produced at Gray's Inn. Jonson speaks of "those flights [of the Swan of Avon] upon the banks of Thames That so did take Eliza and our James." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 317, Elizabeth says, "We at our Court of G. will dilate Further of these designs." Davies, in Hymns of Astræa (1599) ix. 3, says, "Empress of Flowers! Tell, where away Lies your sweet court, this merry May? In G. garden alleys; Since there the heavenly Powers do play." Skelton, in Colin Clout 742, speaks of "the order upon G. border called Observants." The Franciscan Observants had a settlement adjoining the palace, granted to them by Edward IV. They were favoured by Katharine of Aragon, and so vehemently opposed the divorce that Henry VIII suppressed the whole Order throughout England.

In Fair Women ii. 458, Browne says to Roger, "Go thou unto the hedge corner At the hill foot; there stand and cast thine eye Toward G. Park. See if Blackheath be clear." In Jonson's Gipsies, one of the gipsies sings of "The parks and the chases And the finer walled places, As St. James's, G., Tibals." Burton, A. M. ii. 2, 3, says, "Barclay the Scot commends that of G. tower for one of the best prospects in Europe." In Straw i., Jack says, "Upon Blackheath beside G., there we'll lie." When the K. went to meet the rebels, Newton says (in ii.), "The K. was rowed with oars As far as G. town."

GREET. A little vill. in N. Gloucestersh., near Winchcombe. In Shrew Ind., ii. 95, "John Naps of Greece" is mentioned as one of the friends of Christopher Sly: where we should certainly read "G." Shakespeare knew this dist. well, as is shown by the local references in H4 B. v. 1. It is mentioned in the ancient rhyme, "Dirty Greeton, dingy G., Beggarly Winchcombe, Sudeley sweet, Hanging Hartshorn, Whittington Bell, Dull Andoversford, and merry Frog Mill."

GREGORY'S (SAINT) CHAPEL. The chapel of St. G. Priory, Canterbury. It was suppressed by Henry VIII, and nothing is now left of its ruins. In Deloney's Craft i. 6, Crispine and Ursula are married "at St. Gregoryes C."

GRESHAM COLLEGE. In Lond., founded by the bequest of Sir T. Gresham for the delivery of lectures on Divinity, Civil Law, Astronomy, Music, Geometry, Rhetoric, and Physic to be read in the dwelling-house of the founder. This house was G. House on the W. side of Bishopsgate St. Within, with grounds reaching back to Broad St. The lectures began in 1596, and 7 professors were appointed. The house was taken down in 1768, and the lectures transferred to a room in the Royal Exchange. In 1843 the present C. was built at the corner of G. St. and Basinghall St. In Shirley's Love Maze iv. 2, Gerard says that in his Utopia "Lectures and public readings shall put down G.'s foundation for the liberal arts." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 301, G. says, "Lords, so please you but to see my school Of the 7 learned liberal sciences, Which I have founded here near Bishopsgate, I will conduct you."

GREVE, PLACE DE (NOW PLACE DE L'HOTEL DE VILLE). In Paris, in front of the Hotel de Ville, entered from the junction of the Quai Pelletier and the Quai de Grève, on the N. bank of the Seine. It was for many cents. the place of execution for criminals. In Chapman's Trag. Byron v. 4, 112, Harley announces that Byron is "condemned to lose his head upon a scaffold at the Greave."

GREYHOUND. A tavern in Fleet St., Lond., evidently, from the quotations, close to Fleet Bdge., at the E. end of the st. In Stucley 565, John Sparling, the vintner, demands £30 from Stucley "for tavern suppers and for quarts of wine at the G. in Fleet st." In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Justiniano says, "The G., the G. in Blackfriars, an excellent rendezvous." In Barry's Ram iii. 2, Thomas Smallshanks says, "They went in by the G. and so struck into Bridewell." The G. was also the sign of a bookseller's shop in Paul's Churchyard. Venus and Adonis was "Imprinted at Lond. for William Leake dwelling in Paule's Churchyard at the sign of the G. 1599." Selinus was "Printed for John Crooke and Richard Serger and are to be sold at their shop in Pauls Churchyard at the sign of the G.-H. 1638." Here the Passionate Pilgrim was published by W. Leake in 1599.

GRISONS, LES. Now the S.E. canton of Switzerland, and the largest one; in Elizabethan times an independent Confederation. In Davenant's Siege i. 1, Ariosto refers to "a skirmish at Milan against the G." The reference is to the wars of the early 16th cent. between the French and Milan, in which the Swiss took a great part, first on one side, and then on the other.

GROCERS HALL. The Hall of the Grocers Company in Lond. It was built in 1427 in what was then called Coneyhoop Lane, off the Poultry, E. of the Old Jewry. It lies between the Poultry and Princes St., into which an entrance was made in 1827. The 1st H. was destroyed in the Gt. Fire; a 2nd was built soon after, and the present H., the 3rd, dates from 1798. In B. & F. Pestle v. 3, Ralph, the Grocer's apprentice, exclaims, "I die! Fly, fly, my soul, to G. H."

GROENLAND. See GREENLAND.

GROLL = GROENLO. A town in Gelderland, 80 m. E. of Amsterdam. In Barnavel iv. 5, Prince Maurice says, "Who was the cause no greater power was sent Against the enemy, when he took the towns Of Oldensell, Lingen, G.?"

GROME. See GROYNNE.

GRONINGEN (formerly spelt GROYNING or the GROYNNE). A fortified city in Friesland, on the Hunze, 95 m. N.E. of Amsterdam. It was taken by the D. of Parma in 1580 and recovered by the United Provinces in 1594. The name suggested an obvious double entendre to the dramatists. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. v. 2, Bots says, "At the Groyne I was wounded in this thigh, and halted upon 't, but 'tis now sound." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trimtram tells the story of a pander, a bawd, and a whore: "The Low Countries did ever find 'em bread; they lived by Flushing, by Sluys, and the Groyne."

GROING LANE. Off Tower Hill, Lond. In News from Wood St. Counter (1642), we have: "It is worse than Pickthatch, Covent Garden, G. L., Tower Hill," etc.

GROYNNE. See GRONINGEN.

GROYNE. A sailor's corruption of Corunna, a seaport on the N.W. coast of Spain. In Earl of Essex's Ghost (1624) ii., we read: "This mighty fleet [the Armada] made to the G. in Galicia, it being the nearest haven to England." In Coventry M. P. of Mary Magdalen 478, the Taverner says he has "wine of Gyldyr and of Galles, that made at the grome": where probably grome is a misprint for G.

GRUB STREET. Lond., running from 96 Fore St. to 56 Chiswell St. In 1820 the name was changed to Milton St. According to Stow, it was inhabited by bowyers, fletchers, and bowstring-makers; and as archery declined their place was taken by bowling alleys and dicing houses. Its reputation as the resort of poor authors dates from the latter part of the 17th cent. In Randolph's Hey Hon., he says, "Let Cupid go to G. St. and turn archer"; and again, "Her eyes are Cupid's G. St.; the blind archer makes his love-arrows there." Taylor says, in Works ii. 2, "Strait I might descry, The quintessence of G.-st. well distilled Through Cripple-gate." In News from Hell, the Cardinal says, "This mess is . . . seasoned with the fees and bribes of all the whores and thieves that live in Westminster, Covent-Garden, Holborn, G.-st.," etc. Camilton's Discovery of Devilish Designs was "Printed by T. Fawcett dwelling in G.-st. 1641." Henry Welby, the Hermit of G. St., died there in 1636. Dekker, in Raven's Almanac (1609), says, "As for the thighs, over which Sagitarius the archer carries sway, any fletcher in G.-st. or any that ever shot in a long bow, will stand to the proof thereof."

GUALLATIA. See GALICIA.

GUARTHENION. A vill. in Wales. In Jonson's Wales, Evan sings the praises of "Oatcake of G. With a goodly leek or onion."

GUELDERLAND. See GELDERLAND.

GUERNSEY. The second in size of the Channel Islands, lying in the Gulf of Avranches, abt. 30 m. from the French coast. In Stubbs' Anat. of Abuses i. 57, we are told that the English "have netherstocks not of cloth, for that is thought too base, but of Jarnsey worsted, silk, thread, and such like"; and again, "Their netherstocks are of silk gearnsay, worsted, crewell, or at least of as fine yarn as is possible to be had." In N.E.D., Jarnsey, in the 1st passage above, is taken as being equivalent to Jersey, but in the light of the spelling in the 2nd, gearnsay, and that Heylyn calls the islands Jarsey and Gernsey, I venture to suggest that in both passages G. is intended. In Middleton's No Wit i. 1, Savourwit tells how Lady Twilight, "crossing to G., was taken by the Dunkirks." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 51, calls it "Jernsey, bravely crowned With rough-im-battled rocks."

GUIANA. A country on the N.E. coast of S. America, between the rivers Orinoco and Amazon. Part of it belongs to Brazil, the rest is divided into British, Dutch, and French Guiana. It was discovered by Vasco Nunez in 1504. Sir W. Raleigh ascended the Orinoco in 1595 in search for the Eldorado which was supposed to be in that part of the world. There is gold in G., but the mines were not discovered till the beginning of the 19th cent. In M. W. W. i. 3, 76, Falstaff says of Mrs. Page: "She bears the purse too; she is a region in G., all gold and bounty." The allusion was no doubt suggested by the interest of the Court and Q. in Raleigh's expedition. In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, we are told that young Franklin went on "the late ill-starred voyage to G." This is Raleigh's voyage of 1595. In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Claribel says that he has visited "Guinie, Florida, and Brasilea." Evidently G., not Guinea, is the place intended. Milton, P. L. xi. 410, says that Adam saw in vision "yet unspoiled G., whose great city Geryon's sons Call El Dorado": Geryon's sons are the Spaniards. Wilby, in Morley's Triumphs of Oriana (1601), says, "The Lady Oriana Was dight in all the treasures of G." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, 29, says, "Fortunio . . . gads to Guiane land to fish for gold." Burton, A. M. Intro., says of a pilgrimage to a saint's shrine: "It is like to be as prosperous a voyage as that of G." Donne, Satire iv. (1597) 22, speaks of "a thing stranger . . . Than Afric's monsters, G.'s rarities." In Hall, Characters (1608), The Busie-bodie says, "What every man ventured in G. voyage, and what they gained, he knows to a hair." In Ham., the 1st quarto makes the scene of the play within the play "Guyana": perhaps a mistake for Vienna or Guienne.

GUIENNE. The N. portion of the old duchy of Aquitania, in S.W. France, between the Bay of Biscay and the Cevennes. It came into the possession of the English Crown in 1152 by the marriage of Henry II to Eleanor, daughter and heiress of William, Earl of Poitou and D. of Guienne. It remained an English possession with short intervals until 1451, when it was recovered to France by Charles VII. In Ed. III i. 1, the D. of Lorraine demands from Edward homage to the French K. for "the Guyen Dukedom entayled to thee." In Florio's Montaigne i. 1, "Edward the Black Prince of Wales" is mentioned as having "long governed our country of G." In H6 A. i. 1, 60, a messenger announces "G., etc., Are all quite lost." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV B. i., Edward asserts his title to "all these Dukedoms following: 'Aquitaine, Anjou, Guyen, Aguilene.'" In Coventry M. P. of Mary Magdalen 479, the Taverner says he has "wine of Wyan and Vernage": where Wyan means G.

GUILDFORD. The capital of the county of Surrey, 29 m. S.W. of Lond. The keep of an ancient Norman castle stands on a hill on the S. of the town, and there is a fine bridge over the Wey. In Death Huntington ii. 1, the K. says, "You and Earl Salisbury shall hie ye to G." In Davenport's Matilda i. 1, K. John says to Oxford, "Post unto G. and being there (Pretending a visit unto Bruce's lady) Wind into observation of the Castle." The scene of i. 3 is G. Castle, which Oxford has seized.

GUILDHALL. The common Hall of the City of Lond. It was in existence in the 12th cent., but was rebuilt in 1411, and "of an old and little cottage made into a fair and goodly house" (Fabyan). Sir John Shaa, Mayor in 1501, added the kitchens, and from that time the Lord Mayor's banquet has been held there on Nov. 9th, the day of SS. Simon and Jude. The Gt. Fire destroyed the roof, but left the walls and crypt comparatively uninjured: it was at once restored, and a new st.—King St.—was opened up to give access to it from Cheapside. In 1864 the Hall was renovated, and the fine open oak roof, a replica, as nearly as possible, of the original one, was erected. The Hall is 153 ft. long, 50 broad, and 89 high. It contains the two wooden giants, Gog and Magog, supposed to represent Corineus and Gogmagog. The present statues were carved in 1708, but their predecessors existed as far back as 1415, and were carried in the Lord Mayor's procession and other City pageants. In the 16th cent. the main entrance was graced by a number of statues. William Wilderton, writing in 1560, says, "Jesus Christ aloft doth stand, Law and Learning on either hand, Discipline in the devil's neck, And hard by her are three direct; There Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance stand: Where find ye the like in all this land?" The Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council sit at the G.; and there are held the Court of Hustings, the Lord Mayor's Court, and the Sheriff's Court. The Library and Museum have been removed to Basinghall St., and a building for their accommodation was erected in 1872. The Museum contains a deed of Conveyance with the signature of Shakespeare attached. There is also an Art Gallery in G. Yard.

In R3 iii. 5, 73, Gloucester, at the Tower, says to Buckingham, "Go after, after, cousin Buckingham, The Mayor towards G. hies him all in post." Buckingham goes, and advises Gloucester, "Towards 3 or 4 o'clock Look for the news that the G. affords" (line 102). In True Trag. (Haz., p. 58), the Page announces "The D. of Buckingham is gone about it, and is now in the G. making his oration." More ii. 3 takes place in the G.; and in ii. 4 More says, "I think 'twere best we meet at the G. And there determine that through every ward The watch be clad in armour." In Stucley 645, Lady Curtis says, "Husband, you are sent for to the G., about the soldiers that are to be despatched for Ireland." In Dekker's Shoemaker's i. 1, the Lord Mayor says, "If it please your cousin Lacy come to the G., he shall receive his pay." In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 555, Staines says to Spendall, "Thou art the highest spirited citizen that ever G. took notice of." In Glapthorne's Wit iii. 1, Busie says, "I should have fined for Sheriff, but all G., hearing I was a Wit, cried 'Out upon him!'" In Straw iii., Tom Miller says, "I have been amongst the records, and all that I saw in the G. I have set fire on." In W. Rowley's New Wonder v., his wife says that Stephen "Is now the Sheriff of Lond., and in Council, Set at the G. in his scarlet gown." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV. A. 23, the Lord Mayor says, "We will withdraw to G. to take advice." In Mayne's Match i. 4, Bright says, "I' the name of G., who comes here?" In Shirley's Riches iii., Getting swears, "By the Hall ycleped Guild, and Lond. Wall." In Ibid. i., Clod says, "You march [on Lord Mayor's Day] to G., where you look upon the Saracen giants, and feed like Saracens till you have no stomach to Paul's in the afternoon." The reference is to the Lord Mayor's banquet and the service which followed at St. Paul's. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Greensland says, "Thou smellst like G., 2 days after Simon and Jude, of drink most horribly." In Webster's Cuckold iv. 1, Compass says, "Three Tuns do you call this tavern? It has a good neighbour of G.": meaning that G. is a great place for drinking. There were several taverns of this name. Dekker, in Armourers, says, "Had Jove been bidden to dinner to the GUILD hall on Simon and Jude's Day, he could not have had more welcomes given him than Money had." In Brathwayte's Barnabys Journal, the G. Giants are mentioned as the second of the 7 great sights of Lond. Corbett, in Iter Boreale, says, "O, you that do G. and Holmeby keep, You are good giants." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of Lond. "G. huge Corinæus." Hall, in Satires vi. 1, 9, speaks of "The crabtree porter of the G. gates." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Wellbred writes to young Knowell: "Draw your bill of charges, as unconscionable as any G. verdict will give it you." In Middleton's Michaelmas iii. 4, Shortyard has "a little urgent business at G." Look about was "Printed for William Ferrand and are to be sold at his shop at the sign of the Crown near G. Gate. 1600." The Wars of Cyrus was "Printed by E. A. for William Blackwal and are to be sold at his shop over against G. gate. 1594." The earliest recorded performance of a play in the City of Lond. is that of an unknown drama acted on Twelfth Night 1560 in the G. before the Lord Mayor.

GUINEA. A dist. on the W. coast of Africa, extending from Sierra Leone to Benin. It was originally called Bilad Ghana, i.e. land of wealth, by the Saracens, but Don Henrique of Portugal first opened it to European knowledge in the 15th cent. Trade with G. extended greatly during the 16th cent., and many products of the country became known, such as G. pepper, the G.-cock or turkey, and the G.-fowl or hen. The coin called a G. was first struck in 1663, "in the name, and for the use, of the Company of Royal Adventurers of England trading with Africa." In Cowley's Cutter iv. 6, Worm says that Jolly's brother "went 7 years ago to Guiney" as a merchant. G. hen became a slang word for a prostitute. In Oth. i. 3, 317, Iago says, "Ere I would say I would drown myself for the love of a g.-hen, I would change my humanity with a baboon." In Glapthorne's Wallenstein iii. 3, Newman says, "Yonder's the cock o' the game about to tread your ginny hen." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Face says to Doll, "Well said, my G. bird." In Armin's Moreclacke D. i., Sir William says to his wife, "Wife, coop up our ginnie hen," i.e. their daughter, who wants to marry. In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Peacham mentions amongst the sights of Lond. "St. James his Ginney hens, the Cassawarway moreover." These birds were kept in the aviaries in St. James's Park, which gave its name to Birdcage Walk. In Davenant's Albion ii. 1, Grimold says, "I'll bribe your lordship with a Ginny toothpick." Compare Benedick's undertaking in Ado ii. 1, 274: "I will fetch you a toothpicker now from the furthest inch of Asia." In Nabbes' C. Garden ii. 2, Warrant threatens to kill Spruce and have his skin stuffed: "and [I will] shew thee at country fairs and markets for a Ginney Pigmy." The tradition of a race of Pygmies in Africa is of long standing. In Webster's Law Case ii. 1, Ariosto says, "You have 'pothercaries will put 4 or 5 coxcombs in a sieve and searce [i.e. strain] them through like G. pepper."

GUINGAN = GUINGAMP. A town in Brittany, on the Trieux, abt. 250 m. W. of Paris. Nash, in Pierce B. 2, makes fun of the boastful traveller who "saith he hath adventured upon the barricadoes of Gurney or G., and fought with the young Guise hand to hand." The young Guise is Henry of Guise : the reference is to the wars of the eighties in France between the Guise and the Huguenots (under Henry of Navarre).

GUINIE. See GUIANA.

GUIPUZCOA. One of the 3 Basque Provinces in N.E. Spain on the coast of the Bay of Biscay. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 355, we read of 14 galleons "of Guipuscoa" in the Spanish Armada.

GUISE. A town in N. France, 100 m. N.E. of Paris. From it the house of G. took its title. The ancient 16th cent. castle still remains. The 1st D. of G. was Claude, who died 1550 : his son Francis died 1563 ; his son Henry died 1588 ; and his son Charles died 1640. Henry is the hero of Marlowe's Massacre, the subtitle of which is "The Death of the Duke of G." He also appears prominently in Chapman's two Bussy D'Ambois plays ; and was the subject of two lost plays, The G., by Webster, and The Duke of G., by Henry Shirley. Dekker, in News from Hell, says that all are equal there : "the D. of Guize and the D. of Shoreditch have not the breadth of a bench between them."

GUN. A bookseller's sign in Lond. The 1st quarto of Titus Andronicus was "Printed by John Danter and are to be sold by Edward White and Thomas Millington at the little North door of Paules at the sign of the Gunne. 1594." The 2nd and 3rd quartos came from the same publisher. Love and Fortune was also published there in 1589. Marlowe's Ed. II was "Printed at Lond. by Richard Bradocke for William Jones, dwelling near Holbourne Conduit at the sign of the Gunne. 1598." Mucedorus was published the same year at the same place. Brome's Five New Plays were "Printed for H. Brome at the Gunn in Ivy Lane. 1659."

GUN ALLEY. Lond., on the W. side of Little Moorfields, where the Moorgate St. station now stands. It was a place of bad reputation. In Glapthorne's Holander iii. 1, Fortress, the president of the Twiball knights, is described as "Duke of Turnbull, Bloomsbury, and Rotten Row, Lord Paramount of all Garden-alleys, G. A., and Rosemary Lane."

GUNPOWDER ALLEY. Lond., on the E. side of Crutched Friars, N. of John St. In Westward i. 1, Birdlime says, "I keep a hot-house in G. A., near Crutched Friars." There is another G. A. on the W. side of Shoe Lane, where Richard Lovelace died.

GURGUSTIDONIA. An imaginary country which Pseudocheus, in the old Timon i. 4, claims to have visited. "Up to the fields Gn. I rode on horseback ; the Antipodes Were distant thence about an hundred m." The name is taken from Plautus, Miles Gloriosus i. 1, 13, where Pyrgopolinices says he saved the life of Artotrogus "in campis Gurgustidoniis."

GURNEY = GOURNAY. A town in N. France on the Epte, 28 m. E. of Rouen. For reference in Nash's Pierce, see under GUINGAN.

GUTTER LANE. A st. in Lond. running N. from Cheapside to Gresham St. It was originally Guthrun or Goderoune Lane. It is used punningly for the throat. In Brathwayte's Cast of Characters (1631) 32, it is said, "Whatever he drains from the 4 corners of the City goes in muddy taplash down G.-L." In Dekker's Satiromastix iii. 1, 212, Tucca, who is calling Mrs. Miniver all the abusive names he can think of, says, inter alia, "Let me alone with my grannam in G.-L. there." Prof. Penniman, in his note on this passage, says that Cheapside was once so called from Guthrun, sometime the owner : I can find no authority for this statement.

GUYNES. A town in N.W. France some 5 m. S. of Calais. It belonged to England at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII, and the famous meeting between Henry and Francis of France in 1520, known as the Field of the Cloth of Gold (which, in H8 i. 1, 7, Norfolk speaks of as "Twixt G. and Arde"), was held between G. and Ardres in English territory. In Webster's Weakest iv. 3, Sir Nicholas says, "I promised to bowl a match at G. for a wager, viz. 2 gallons of Gascoigne wine." In Day's B. Beggar i., Momford reports that "Hance Beamart has betrayed the Fort of G." This was in the French wars in the early part of the reign of Henry VI, before the death of Bedford in 1432. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 110, Richd. proposes, in exchange for aid from France, to surrender up "Our forts of G. and Callys to the French."

GUYRON. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, 17, Gazellus says, "Proud Tamburlaine, that now in Asia, Near G.'s head, doth set his conquering feet." In line 47 he speaks of him as "marching from Cairon northward" : which suggests that in the former passage we should read "Cairon" for "G." Of course, Cairo is not in Asia, nor was Tamburlaine ever there, but that does not matter much.

GUYSORS, or GISORS. An ancient French town 33 m. N.W. of Paris. Near it are the ruins of a strong mediaeval castle. In H6 A. i. 1, 61, a Messenger announces, "G., Poitiers, Are all quite lost."

GYAROS. A small rocky island in the Ægean Sea, 12 m. S.W. of the S. point of Andros in the Cyclades. It was used as a place of banishment under the early Roman emperors. It is now uninhabited. In Nero ii. 2, Tigellinus says to Cornutus, "'Tis Nero's pleasure that you straight depart To G. and there remain confined." In Massinger's Believe v. 2, the practice is put back to the time of Antiochus the Gt. Marcellus says to him : "You are confined unto the Gyaræ With a strong guard upon you." This is quite unhistorical.

GYLDYR. See GELDERN.

GYLES (St.). See GILES (St.).

GYPTIAN. See EGYPTIAN.

HAARLEM. See HARLEM.

HABERDASHERS HALL. The Hall of the H. Company in Lond. It stands in Maiden Lane, opposite to the Goldsmiths H. The site was bequeathed to the Company by William Baker in 1478. The original H. was destroyed in the Gt. Fire. It was used as the meeting-place of the Commissioners of Parliament during and after the great Civil War, and many confiscations of cavaliers' property were made there. In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Jolly, the Cavalier, says that if he married the widow of Barebottle who had got his sequestered estate, "That were as hard a composition for one's own as ever was made at H.-H."

HABOR. A tributary of the Euphrates rising in Karej Dag and flowing S.W. into the Euphrates at Karkasea, after a course of abt. 200 m. According to II Kings xvii. 6, the Ten Tribes of Israel, after the capture of Samaria by Shalmaneser and Sargon, were transferred to "H., the river of Gozan." Milton, P. R. iii. 376, speaks of "those 10 Tribes Whose offspring in his territory yet serve In H." Milton, like the translators of the A. V., evidently regarded H. as the name of the dist., and did not know that it was a river.

HACKLEY, or HOCKLEY (i.e. HOCKLIFFE). A vill. in Bedfordsh., on Watling St., 6 m. N.W. of Dunstable and 5 E. of Leighton Buzzard. In Trag. Richd. II iii. 3, 48, the scene of which is laid at Dunstable, the Grazier says, "Here's my other neighbour, the butcher, that dwells at H., has heard his landlord tell strange tidings."

HACKNEY. A vill. N. of Lond., a little over 2 m. from St. Paul's. It is now incorporated in the great city, but was in the 16th cent. a fashionable country suburb where many noble families resided. It was a favourite resort of the citizens for an afternoon's outing, and it was even suggested that H.-coaches were so called from their constant employment in taking people there: this is, however, a wrong derivation.

Jonson, in his Epigram to Mime, says, "There's no journey set or thought upon, To Brentford, H., Bow, but thou mak'st one." In Webster's Cuckold ii. 3, the 1st boy says, "Did he not dance the hobby-horse in H. Morrice once?" In Middleton's Black Book, p. 25, we are told of 2 men hanging in chains "between Mile-end and H." In Trag. Richd. II iii. 2, 157, Woodstock says to the Lord who has come from Court to summon him thither, "You're pricked more with the spur than the provender, I see that. I think your dwelling be at H., when y' are at home." The point is that the Lord is a common h., or cheap roadster, in the service of the K. H., in the sense of a horse, has no connection with the place-name. Q. Elizabeth frequently visited H. with her Court. In Peele's Speeches of Q. Elizabeth iii. 7, the Mole-catcher says that in pursuit of the Q., "Next was I pointed to H.; there they said the Court was gone into the country."

HADLEIGH. A town in Suffolk on the Brett, 8 m. W. of Ipswich. The play of Apollo Shroving was written for the boys of the Free School of H., probably by William Hawkins, and was performed by them on Shrove Tuesday, 1626.

HADRIAN, SAINT. In Barnes' Charter ii. 1, the Pope orders Gaspar de Foix "on the turret of St. Adrian plant 6 more cannon." The reference is to the Castle of St. Angelo, q.v. It was originally the mausoleum of the Emperor H., built in A.D. 130. It is amusing to find the old Emperor turned into a saint.

HÆMUS. A range of mtns. running from the Black Sea to the Adriatic across N. Thrace, especially the E. half of the range, the modern Balkans. In Cæsar's Rev. v. 1, Antony, about to fight Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in Macedonia, S. of the H., says, "Hemus shall fat his barren fields with blood." In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 4, Laberius says, "Waken Gradius where he sleeps on top of H." Gradius is the god of War, Mars, to whom Thrace was specially sacred. In T. Heywood's Diallogues 5241, Io says that the Peneus "waters Hemonian Tempe." The epithet is not too happy, as Tempe lies a good way S. of the H. range. Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9, 22, tells how Enceladus, transfixured with the spear of Bellona, "down tumbled dead From top of H. by him heaped high." This was one of the legends of the war between the Giants and the Gods. In vii. 7, 12, he tells of the assembly of the gods "on H. hill" at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis. The marriage, however, took place on Mt. Pelion, not on H.

HAGUE, THE (the Dutch GRAVENHAGEN, or DEN HAAG). A town in S. Holland, 2 m. from the German Ocean, abt. 50 m. S.W. of Amsterdam. It is the handsomest and best-built city in the Netherlands. The court buildings in the centre of the city were bought by the States in 1595. It was sacked by the Spaniards in 1572, 1573, and 1574; restored by William I in 1576; and in 1584 made the seat of government for the United Provinces. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift boasts, "I have seen Flushing, Brill, and the H., with this rapier, Sir, in my Lord of Leicester's time." Leicester was in the Netherlands 1585-1587. In Barnavel ii. 1, Barnavel says, "I'll back to the Hage and something there I'll do." The last scene describes his execution in front of the court buildings of the H. In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, the fashionable Lady Cressingham exclaims: "O the new fashioned buildings brought from the H.!" 'Tis stately! In Davenant's Plymouth v. 1, Inland speaks of "2 lofty youngers of the H." In Cartwright's Ordinary iv. 1, Credulous inquires, "What news from Brussels or the H.?"

HAILES. An abbey in Gloucestersh., just N. of Sudeley, near Winchcomb. It was founded by Richd., K. of the Romans, brother of Henry III. Richd.'s son Edmund brought the Holy Blood of our Lord from Germany, and presented a portion of it to the Abbey, where it became an object of great veneration. In 1538 it was examined by Latimer. He describes it as "inclosed within a round berall, garnished and bound on every side with silver." It turned out to be an unctuous gum coloured like blood. It was subsequently exhibited at St. Paul's Cross by Hilsey, Bp. of Rochester. The Palmer in J. Heywood's Four PP. i. 1, had been "at the blood of Hayles." In Bale's Johan 229, "the good blood of Hales" is mentioned as "amongst Sedition's relics." In his Three Laws ii., Infidelity says, "It was a good day when we went to the blood of Hales where no good cheer fails." In Chaucer's C. T. C. 652, "By the blood of Crist that is in Hayles" is mentioned as a common oath. Latimer, in Serm. vii. before Edward VI (1549), speaks of "this great abomination of the blood of Hales."

HAINAULT. Now one of the S. provinces of Belgium, between Flanders and Namur. It formerly included a large part of the French Département du Nord. It belonged during the 10th and 11th cents. to the Counts of Flanders; fell to the house of Burgundy in 1436; and passed to the house of Austria in 1477. In 1678 the S. part was ceded to France, and in 1830 the rest became part of Belgium. In Marlowe's Ed. II iv. 2, Sir John of H. says to Q. Isabella, "Will your Grace with me to Henault And there stay time's advantage with your son?" This was in 1325. The invitation was accepted and young Prince Edward was affianced to the D.'s daughter Philippa. In Ed. III i. 1, Edward sends Derby as ambassador to "our father-in-law, the Earl of Henault," to solicit his aid against the French. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 10, 21, tells of the British chief Ebranck, who "Warried on Brunchild In Henault." And in 24, he speaks of the rivers being stained "With blood of Henalois which therein fell."

HALBERSTADT. An ancient town in Prussian Saxony, 110 m. S.W. of Berlin. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein v. 2, Newman offers to sing "a military madrigal; I learned it of a red-faced sergeant at H."

HALF-MOON. A very common tavern-sign in Lond. There was one in the Strand, at the lower end of Bedford St.; another in Cheapside by Gutter Lane; another in Aldersgate St. on the W. side; and another in Milk St. Taylor, in Works ii. 37, says, "I do purpose to go dine at the H. Moone in Milk St." In the Arraignment of Robert Drewerie (1607), it is stated, "The forenamed meeting together in Aldersgate-st., went into the H. Moone tavern to drink." In Chapman's All Fools, v. 2 takes place in the H. M. Tavern in Florence.

HALICARNASSUS. A town on the N. coast of the Sinus Ceramicus in Caria, a little S. of Miletus. It was a very strong fortress, and its principal citadel was on a steep rock N. of the city, called Salmacis. At its foot was a well gushing out near the temple of Aphrodite, which was supposed to have an enervating influence on those who drank its waters. In Davenant's Salmacida Spolia it is stated: "On the top of the right horn of the hill which surrounds H. is a famous fountain of most clear water and exquisite taste, called Salmacis." Here on the rock E. of Salmacis, Artemisia built the famous mausoleum in honour of her brother Mausolus, which was regarded as one of the 7 wonders of the world. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiii. 4279, Mausolus says, "I have a stately monument erected In H., famed for magnitude, With rare and never-equalled pulchritude."

HALIFAX. A town in W. Riding, Yorks., on the Hebble, 36 m. S.W. of York. The cloth manufacture began in the 15th cent., and was much increased in the latter part of the 16th cent. by an influx of Netherlanders who came over to escape the persecutions of the Spaniards. It was famous for its "Gibbet Law," according to which anyone found within the forest of Hardwick, which was part of the parish of H., with stolen goods to the amount of 13 pence halfpenny was decapitated on a rude sort of guillotine, the remains of which may still be seen in the gaol. Hence the proverb, "From Hell, Hull, and H. good Lord deliver us." The last execution of this sort took place in 1650, and during the cent. preceding this 49 persons had suffered death. Nash, in Lenten (p. 324), says that if the Pope wanted King Red Herring he could seek him, "and neither in Hull, Hell, nor H." In Taylor, Works ii. 12, we have "From Hull, from H., from Hell, 'tis thus, From all these 3 good Lord deliver us." Drayton, in Polyolb. xxviii. 60, says that Caldor travels along "by Heading-H." and in a note adds: "Beheading, which we call H. Law." In Deloney's Reading, one of the clothiers is "Hodgekins of H.": in chap. 4 he tells the K. that "the town of Halyfax lived altogether upon clothing," and gets the privilege of hanging at sight "whosoever they find stealing their cloth." In chap. 8 the story is told of the invention by a certain friar "of a certain gin that shall cut off their heads without man's help"; and Hodgekins gets leave of the K. to use it instead of hanging. To "H." is used in the sense of "to cut off." In Brome's Covent G. iv. 1, Nick says, "Mum, hold your tongue still in your mouth, lest I h. it with your teeth."

HALL, THE (WESTMINSTER HALL, q.v.). Middleton, in Black Book Intro., p. 8, says, "Ploughmen leave their field to till the H."

HALLA. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, the K. of Soria says, "Of Sorian from H. is repaired . . . 10,000 horse." Soria seems to mean Tyre, the old Sor, and H. must be some city of importance in N. Palestine. Possibly Aleppo may be intended.

HAM. There are 2 Hams in Essex. W. H. is 4½ m. from Lond. to the N.E., E. H. 6½ m. to the E., but both are now, in fact as well as in name, part of "Greater London." There is another H. in Surrey, on the Thames, abt. 10 m. S.W. of Lond., between Richmond Park and Teddington, where H. House was built for Henry, Prince of Wales, son of James I. In Dekker's Westward ii. 3, Whirlpool says, "We'll take a coach and ride to H." Probably the Surrey H. is intended. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. i. Josselin says, "My mansion is at H., and thence you know I come to help you." In Dekker's Edmonton i. 2, Carter says of Somerton: "He has a fine convenient estate of land in W. H. by Essex."

HAM, LAND OF. A scriptural name for Egypt, as being peopled by the descendants of H., the 2nd son of Noah. In Gen. x. 6, Mizraim (the two Egypts) is one of the sons of H., and no doubt the original inhabitants of Egypt were Hamitic, though the dominant race in historical times was Semitic in descent. In Psalms cv. 23 (Prayer Book vn.), it is said: "Israel also came into Egypt; and Jacob was a stranger in the land of H." In Middleton's Family v. 3, Gerardine, thinking of this passage, says to Purge, "You have made your wife A stranger in your land of H." In Mariam i. 6, Constabarus says, "Mildest Moses, friend unto the Lord, Did work his wonders in the land of H."

HAMATH (now HAMAH). An important city on the Orontes, in N. Syria, abt. 100 m. S.E. of Antioch. In Numbers xxxiv. 7, 8, it is mentioned as the N. limit of the part of Syria assigned to the Israelites. Milton, P. L. xii. 139, states that God promised to the progeny of Abraham "all that land From H. northward to the Desert S."

HAMBURG. The most important commercial city on the continent of Europe. It lies on the N. bank of the Elbe, at the point where it is joined by the Alster, 93 m. from its mouth. It was a leading member of the Hanseatic League and a free city of the Empire. It was famous for its beer. Taylor, in Works iii. 78, speaks of "kilderkins fraught with H. beer." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 2, Mrs. Carrack boasts, "My husband . . . took a prize from the Hamburgers." The late Mr. Carrack was a seaman. In Davenant's Playhouse i., the house-keeper mentions, in a list of applicants for the theatre: "The German fool, Yan Boridge of Hamb'rough." Heylyn (s.v. GERMANIE) says of H.: "In this town are 777 brewers, 1 lawyer, 1 physician, and 40 bakers." Fynes Moryson i. (1591), says, "The citizens are unmeasurably ill affected to the English," owing partly to the removal of the English trade to Stoad.

HAMES CASTLE. The castle of Ham in Picardy, on the Somme, 70 m. N.E. of Paris. It has frequently been used as a state prison, one of the most distinguished prisoners being Louis Napoleon, afterwards Emperor of France. In H6 C. v. 5, 2, after the battle of Barnet, K. Edward says, "Away with Oxford to H. C. straight." This is an anticipation of the event. Oxford escaped from Barnet, but was ultimately besieged and captured at St. Michael's Mt. in 1473 and sent to H. C., where he was kept a close prisoner for 12 years. In True Tragedy, p. 84, Richd.'s page says, "The valiant Earl of Oxford, being but mistrusted, is kept close prisoner in H. C."

HAMMERSMITH. Vill. on the N. bank of the Thames, 6 or 7 m. W. of St. Paul's, Lond. The ch. was built in 1631. In Jonson's Tub i. 2, To-Pan says that his ancestor To-Pan beat the first kettle-drum before Julius Cæsar on his march from Dover, "Which piece of monumental copper hangs up, scoured, at H. yet; for there they came over the Thames at a low water-mark." To-Pan is not so very far out in his identification of the place where Cæsar crossed the Thames. Mr. Montagu Sharp has recently brought forward many conclusive reasons for fixing the crossing described in De Bell. Gall. v. 11, 8, at Brentford, 3 m. W. of H. In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Cockbrin tells of a west-country gentleman who has come to Lond.: "he was to lie at H. last night." In his Northern ii. 1, Widgin says, "I am a Cockney and was never further than H."

HAMPSHIRE. A county on the S. coast of England. In Stucley 254, Stucley asks his father, "How does my mother, Sir, and all in H.?" This is a slip, as Devonshire, not H., was the home of the Stucley family. In May's Old Couple iv. 2, Sir Argent Scrape says, "I'll purchase all in parcels, far from home; In H. some." Edell, Earl of H., appears in the army of K. Etheldred in Brewer's Lovesick King. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 552, Scattergood describes himself as "of the Scattergoods of H." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 207, "H." is one of the counties granted by the K. to Bagot.

HAMPSTEAD. See HAMSTEAD.

HAMPTON (i.e. SOUTHAMPTON, q.v.). In H5 ii. 2, 91, the K. tells of the conspiracy of Cambridge and others "to kill us here in H." The Chorus (iii. 4) says, "Suppose that you have seen The well-appointed K. at H. pier Embark his royalty." The Ff. read "Dover," but Theobald's correction to "H." is generally adopted as being in accordance with the facts. In Thersites (A. P. i. 199), Mulciber, having armed Thersites, says, "If Bevis of H., Colburn, and Guy Will these essay, set not by them a fly." This Bevis was one of the heroes of mediaeval romance: a picture of him and the giant Ascupart, whom he slew, was long preserved in the Guildhall of Southampton, over Bar-Gate. His story is told in Drayton's Polyolb. ii.

HAMPTON COURT. A palace on the N. bank of the Thames, abt. 15 m. W. of Lond. It was built by Cardinal Wolsey and presented by him to Henry VIII, who enlarged it considerably. Wren built a 3rd quadrangle for William III. Its grounds are now a public park, and a number of decayed gentlemen and gentlewomen are granted the occupancy of rooms in it. In Greene's Friar, scene iv. is laid at "the C. at H. House," but this is an obvious anachronism. In Nash's Wilton, the Earl of Surrey exclaims, "O thrice imperial H. C., Cupid's enchanted castle." He met his Geraldine there. The Great Hall was often used for the production of plays: thus Bristowe was "played at H.

before the K. and Q." in 1605. Jonson, in Epigram to Mistress Carey, says, "Retired 'mongst H. shades, And Phœbus' grove of bays, I plucked a branch." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. 232, Philip says of the Princess Elizabeth: "We now will have her brought to H. C., There to attend the pleasure of the Q." Herrick, in Tears to Thamesis (1647), recalls his trips up the river "To Richmond, Kingston, and to H. C."

HAMSHIRE. See HAMPSHIRE.

HAMSTEAD, now HAMPSTEAD. A small vill. 5 m. N.W. of St. Paul's, Lond. Now a suburb of the great city, but in the 16th cent. a separate hamlet, chiefly inhabited by washerwomen. In the 18th cent. it became a favourite resort of Londoners. In Jonson's Tub i. 1, "Old Rasi' Clench of H., petty constable" is one of the members of the self-styled Council of Finsbury, who had set themselves to find a husband for Mrs. Awdrey Turfe, the daughter of the High Constable of Kentish Town.

HAMSTEAD HEATH. A piece of open ground, originally 500 acres in extent, lying N. of the vill. of H. In 1870 the Metropolitan Board of Works bought the manorial rights for £45,000, and made it the property of the citizens. In Jonson's Tub iv. 3, Hiltz says to Metaphor, "Thou, that when last thou wert put out of service, travelled'st to H. H. on an Ash-We'nesday, where thou didst stand 6 weeks the Jack of Lent, for boys to hurl, 3 throws a penny, at thee." This shows that the Heath was already in Jonson's time a holiday resort for the Londoners. One may still hear on any Bank Holiday the echo of Jonson's phrase: "3 shies a penny!"

HAND-IN-HAND. A Lond. bookseller's sign. Liberal-ity was "Printed by Simon Stafford for George Vincent and are to be sold at the sign of the H.-i.-H. in Wood st. over against St. Michael's ch. 1602."

HANGING STONES. The Druidical remains known as Stonehenge, 9 m. N. of Salisbury. In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Chough starts a catalogue of the places where he could have made conquests of women. Amongst them is "the H. S. in Wilts." In the names of most of the places there is a double entendre, as in this.

HANNOU, or HANAU. The capital of the province of Hanau in Hesse-Cassel, at the confluence of the Kinzig and the Main, near Frankfurt, 250 m. S.W. of Berlin. In 1593 it received a large number of refugees from the Low Countries, whose industry greatly developed its wealth. It was involved in the 30 Years' War, and was taken by the Swedes in 1632 and recaptured by the Imperialists in 1636 after a stubborn resistance. Jonson, in his Epigram cvii. To Capt. Hungry, says, "Keep your names Of H., . . . and Boutersheim For your next meal." The Capt. got his meals by telling stories of his imaginary exploits at these places.

HANSTON. In Mankind, p. 23, New Guise says, "First I shall begin at Master Huntington of Sanston; from thence I shall go to William Thurlay of H., and so forth to Pilchard of Trumpington." The mention of Trumpington suggests that H. and Sanston are to be looked for in the neighbourhood of Cambridge. Sanston I guess is meant for Sawston, an old vill. 6 m. S. of Cambridge; and H. I take to be Histon, a vill. 4 m. N.W. of Cambridge. Many villages are mentioned in this Morality; all of them in Norfolk or Cambridgesh. Obviously the play was written by someone familiar with this country—possibly some Cambridge man.

HAPPY ISLES (see FORTUNATE ISLANDS). These fabulous islands of the blessed were often identified with the Hesperides, q.v. They were supposed to be in the W. Atlantic, and some thought them to be the W. Indies. In B. & F. Bonduca i. 2, Petillius, speaking of the extravagant demands of the soldiers, says, "Orontes must be sought for, And apples from the H. I." In Lochrine ii. 1, 50, Estrild says of Britain: "These are the h. Iles." In B. & F. Prize ii. 1, Petronius says, "There they'll sail, As brave Columbus did, till they discover The h. islands of obedience."

HAPSBURG, or HABSURG (originally HABICHTSBURG, i.e. HAWK'S CASTLE). A castle, now in ruins, on the Aar, in the canton of Aargau, Switzerland. It gave their name to the Counts of H., from whom was descended Rudolf, elected K. of Germany in 1273, the founder of the Royal House of the Hs., from whom the late Emperor of Austria was descended. In Greene's Friar iv., the Emperor (Frederick II) says, "From H. have I brought a learned clerk . . . surnamed Jaques Vander-mast." Frederick was a Hohenstaufen, and had no connection with the Hs., but Greene is speaking in the language of his own time, when the H. Rudolph II was Emperor. By H. he means simply Germany, as in ix., where Bungay says, "H. holds none such, None read so deep as Oxenford contains." In T. Heywood's I. K. M. A. 202, Philip and Mary are proclaimed "Count and Countess of Hasburg, Majorca, Sardinia."

HARAN. A very ancient city in N.W. Mesopotamia, on the Belias, a tributary of the Euphrates, 600 m. N.W. of Ur of the Chaldees. Its tutelary god was Sin, the Moon-god, who was also the tutelary god of Ur. There is, therefore, ground for believing that it was a colony from Ur, and this would account for Abraham choosing it for his residence after his migration from Ur. (see Gen. xi. 31). It is the Carræ where the Parthians defeated and captured Crassus. It is now an insignificant vill. Milton, P. L. xii. 131, says of Abraham: "He leaves . . . Ur of Chaldæa, passing now the ford To H." Apparently Milton thought that H. was W. of the Euphrates, and that Abraham would have to cross the river to get to it.

HAREFIELD. A vill. in the N.W. of Middlesex county, 17 m. from Lond. Here was the seat of the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, who married Alice, the widow of the 5th Earl of Derby. After the Chancellor's death his widow retained her old title, "Countess of Derby." Milton's Arcades is styled, "Part of an entertainment presented to the Countess Dowager of Derby at H." The house was destroyed by fire in 1660.

HARFLEUR (spelt HARFLEW in the old editions, HARFLUE in Holinshed). A town in France on the N. bank of the estuary of the Seine, 4 m. E. of Havre. Its fine Gothic church was built by Henry V as a thank-offering after the battle of Agincourt. It was taken by Edward the Black Prince in 1346; and again by Henry V in 1415. In Ed. III iii. 3, Prince Edward says, "Some of their strongest cities have we won, As Harflew, Lo, Crotay, and Carantigne." In H5 iii., Chor. 17, we are told that the K.'s Fleet is "Holding due course to Harflew"; and in 27, that the ordinance are "With fatal mouths gaping on girded Harflew": iii. 1, 2, and 3 are laid before H., and describe its siege and capture. In iii. 5, 49, the French K. describes the English pennons as "painted in the blood of Harflew"; and in iii. 6, 128, Montjoy, the French Ambassador, tells Henry, "we could have rebuked him at Harflew."

HARFORD. See HERTFORD.

HARLEM. A city in N. Holland on the Spaaren, 12 m. W. of Amsterdam. It was taken by Alva in 1572. In Barnavelt v. 2, the executioner of H. throws dice with his brethren of Leyden and Utrecht for the honour of beheading Barnavelt. Utrecht wins. In Larum A. 4, the Gunner at the siege of Antwerp says, "We have raised the cannons that came last from Harlam." This refers to the cannon taken by the Spaniards at H. in 1572.

HARLESTON. A town in Norfolk, 17 m. S. of Norwich and 4½ from Fressingfield. In Greene's Friar i. 137, Prince Edward says, "Next Friday is St. James' And then the country flocks to H. fair." Scene III takes place at H. Fair, which is held on July 5th: St. James' Day is 25th July, so that the Prince is 3 weeks late in his calculation.

HARLING. A town in Norfolk, more fully E. Harling, 20 m. S.W. of Norwich. W. Harling is about 2 m. S. of it. In Day's B. Beggar, one of the prominent characters is "a Norfolk man, one Strowd of H."

HARLOWE-BERRY. Probably Harlow is meant, a town on the border of Herts. in Essex, 20 m. N. of Lond. It was formerly the seat of a considerable woollen manufacture, and its fair, known as Harlow Bush Fair, was widely celebrated. In Wit and Wisdom (A. P.) i. 2, Idleness says, "We came over the sea into Kent and we got us both down to H.-b."

HARROW. A bookseller's sign in London. Webster's White Devil was "Printed by Hugh Perry at the sign of the H. in Britaine's Burse. 1631." The Tragedy of Hoffman was published at the same place in the same year. Marston's Tragedies and Comedies was "Printed by A. M. for William Sheares at the H. in Britaine's Burse. 1633."

HARROW INN. A tavern on the outskirts of Lond., but there is nothing to show exactly where it was. In B. & F. Coxcomb iii. 2, the Tinker says, "There's ale will make a cat speak at the H."

HARROW-ON-THE-HILL. A vill. in Middlesex, 10 m. N.W. of Lond. The Hill is crowned by the ch. of St. Mary, founded in the reign of William I. It owes its chief reputation to the school founded by John Lyon of Preston in 1571 and actually opened in 1611. At first intended for the poor boys of the neighbourhood, it is now one of the great public schools of England. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report says, in his alliterative list, he has been ". . . at H.-o.-H." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2 (4 in old edns.), Puntarvolo mentions one "Signior Clog, that was hanged for the robbery at H. o' t. h." Harman, in Caveat 24, mentions a tavern, "Draw-the-pudding-out-of-the-fire in H. o. t. hyll," which was a common resort of rogues and vagabonds. In Jonson's Barthol. i. 1, one of the characters is introduced as "Master Bartholomew Cokes of H. o' t. H., in the county of Middlesex, esquire." In iii. 1, after his unfortunate experiences in the Fair, he says, "Lord, send me home once more to H.-o-t.-H. again; if I travel any more, call me Coriat with all my heart": "Coriat" being the eccentric author of the Crudities, who travelled over Europe on one pair of shoes, which he hung up as a votive offering in his native parish ch.

HARTFORD. See HERTFORD.

HARTLEY ROW. On the S.W. road from Lond., near Bagshot Heath, Surrey. Notorious for highway robberies. Parson Haben was robbed here by 7 thieves, who then made him preach them a sermon in praise of thieving "upon a mold hill at Hartely R." 2 copies of the sermon are preserved in MS., and are printed in Viles and Furnivall's Rogues and Vagabonds. It is satisfactory to know that the sermon so pleased the audience that the preacher's money was returned.

HARWICH. A spt. on the coast of Essex, on a promontory in the estuary of the Stour and Orwell, 70 m. N.E. of London. It has one of the finest harbours on the E. coast of England, and is the natural point of departure for Holland. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, Fittion suggests, as the subject of a sensational paragraph, that Spinola has a new project "to bring an army over in cork-shoes and land them here at H." Spinola was the famous Spanish engineer whose captures of Juliers in 1622 and of Breda in 1625, the year of the production of this play, were in everyone's mouth. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report includes H. in his alliterative list. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 33, speaks of the Stour that "Clare and Harwitch both doth beautify." In Deloney's Craft ii., Sir Hugh lands "at a place called H." The scene of Percy's Cuckqueans, written in 1601 for the Paul's Boys, was in part H.: Colchester and Maldon being at the same time supposed to be represented by other sections of the stage.

HASTINGS. A town on the coast of Sussex, one of the Cinque Ports, 64 m. S.E. of Lond. It has given its name to the battle in which William the Conqueror defeated Harold, though the battle was actually fought at Senlac, where Battle Abbey now stands, some 5 m. inland. The Lord H. who appears in H6 C. and R3 was descended from William de H., the steward to Henry I. He became Baron H. in 1461, and was beheaded on Tower Hill in 1483. The Lord H. of H4 B. was not a lord at all, but Sir Ralph H., beheaded at Durham in 1405. Drayton, in Barons' Wars v. 49, recalls how William the Conqueror "The fields of H. did defile With Saxon blood and Harold did surprise."

HATFIELD. A town in Herts., 18 m. N.W. of Lond. Near it is H. House, erected first as the palace of the Bps. of Ely. It came into the hands of Henry VIII in 1538, and remained a royal palace till 1607, when James I exchanged it for Theobalds with Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, in whose family it still remains. In H6 B. ii. 2, 12, York mentions "William of H." as the 2nd son of Edward III; and by a curious coincidence it is Salisbury who, in line 33, says "William of H. died without an heir." In Oldcastle iii. 1, Cambridge says, "William of H., and their 2nd brother, Death, in his nonage, had before bereft." A play entitled Holophernes was acted before the Princess Elizabeth at H. House in 1556.

HATTON HOUSE. A mansion built on the site of the orchard and garden of Ely Place, Holborn (q.v.), by Sir Christopher H. in the reign of Elizabeth. It came later into the hands of the D. of Richmond, whose corpse lay in state there in 1624. About 1654 it was pulled down and the present H. Gardens was built on its site. In Shirley's Peace, which was presented before the K. and Q. in Whitehall in 1633, "At Ely and H. Houses the gentlemen and their assistants met and prepared for the Court." The Masque was one of the most magnificent ever presented, and cost at least £21,000. Wright, in English Actors, tells how in 1648 a company of actors playing the Bloody Brother were arrested and carried away "to H. H., then a prison."

HAVERFORDWEST. The capital of Pembrokesh., S. Wales, on the W. Cleddy, 251 m. W. of Lond. In R3 iv.

5, 7, in answer to Derby, Sir Christopher Urswick informs him that Richmond is "At Pembroke or at H., in Wales." According to Hall, Chron., p. 410, "The earl arrived in Wales in the evening of August 7th at a port called Milford Haven, and at the sun-rising removed to Harford west where he was received of the people with great joy."

HAVILAH. A dist., according to Gen. ii. 11, encompassed by the Pison, "where there is gold, and the gold of that land is good." It is generally identified with N.E. Arabia, but there is much doubt about its exact locality. In Mason's Mulleasses 1409, Eunuchus says of Bordello's readiness to come to meals: "You speak of the days of hunger, when the slave was a stranger in the land of H., but the word is retrograde; the last age is a golden age with him," i.e. he used to be poor, but now has got into the golden age of the land of H.

HAWTHORNDEN. The home of the poet William Drummond, 7 m. S. of Edinburgh, on the Esk. Here Ben Jonson visited Drummond in 1619, and Drummond embodied his recollections of the visit in the well-known Conversations. In Jonson's New World (1620), the Printer says, "One of our greatest poets went to Edinburgh on foot and came back; marry, he has been restive, they say, ever since."

HAZANOTH. One of the fortresses in which, according to H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iii. 4, Huneric, K. of the Vandals, had Christian prisoners confined. I have not been able to identify it.

HAZOR (i.e. BAAL-HAZOR). The present Tell Asur, 5 m. N. of Bethel, in Palestine. Here Absalom had a farm, where he treacherously slew his brother Amnon (II Sam. xxiii). The murder is described in Peele's Bethsabe; and in ii. 3, David says to Absalom, "Hast thou slain [Amnon] in the fields of H.?" Amnon was inserted by Dyce, but it should be Amnon, not Ammon. Peele, however, calls the unhappy Prince Ammon throughout the play, probably by confusion with the nation Ammon, whose K. is one of the characters.

HEAVEN. A subterranean apartment under Westminster Hall, granted by Henry VII to Antony Keene in 1485. But the name was transferred to a house of entertainment opposite the end of Henry VII's Chapel. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 2, Dapper is instructed by Subtle, "Her Grace would have you eat no more Woolsack pies, no Dagger frumety"; and Doll continues, "Nor break his fast in H. and Hell."

HEBREW (commonly spelt EBREW in earlier English). A name first applied to Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13), and meaning "the man from over the river [Euphrates]"; then given to his descendants through Jacob, and equivalent to Jew, but without the offensive religious and social associations which have gathered round the latter name. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iv. 1, 1357, Jonas says, "I am an Hebrue born." Milton, P. R. iv. 335, speaks of "our H. songs and harps, in Babylon That pleased so well our victor's ear" (see Ps. cxxxvii. 3). In S. A. 1308, the Officer addresses the Chorus as "EBrews"; and in 1319, Samson says, "I am an Ebrew." So, in 1540, the chorus calls the Messenger "An Ebrew." In Merch. i. 3, 58, Shylock speaks of "Tubal, a wealthy H. of my tribe." In line 179, Antonio says of Shylock: "This H. will turn Christian." Chaucer, in House of Fame iii. 343, speaks of "the Ebrayke Josephus." In T. Heywood's S. Age ii. 1, Josua is called "Duke unto the H. nation." In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 54), Zariph says, "The H. God Bless them that cast kind greeting at the Jew." The word is used contemptuously, especially when amplified by "Jew." In Two Gent. ii. 5, 57, Launce says to Speed, "Go with me to the ale-house; if not, thou art an H., a Jew, and not worth the name of a Christian." In H4 A. ii. 4, 198, Falstaff, telling his story of the affair at Gad's Hill, says, "They were bound, every man of them; or I am a Jew else, an Ebrew Jew." The study of H. as the language of the O.T. was eagerly encouraged by the Puritans. In Mayne's City Match ii. 2, Banes-wright, talking about a Puritan lady, says, "She can expound, and teaches to knit in Chaldee and work H. samplers." The H. language is written from right to left. In Middleton's Old Law iii. 1, Gnotho hopes "the clerk understands no H. and cannot write backward what he hath writ forward already." Dekker, in Armourers, says that Violence "reads Law as men read H., backward." In Partiall iii. 2, Lucina says, "Dreams are always read, like H., backwards." In Chapman's Bussy iii. 2, 46, Bussy describes a luxurious cleric as eating pheasants and partridges, and "Venting their quintessence as men read H.," i.e. backwards! Few people understood H.: hence it comes to mean something unintelligible. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass i. 3, 304, Alcon says of a usurer: "Thou speakest H. to him when thou talkest to him of conscience." In Chapman's Bussy v. 1, Bussy cries: "Murdered! I know not what that H. means." In B. & F. French Law ii. 1, Clere-mont says, "Yield up my sword! That's H.; I'll first be cut to pieces." In Ev. Wom. i. iv. 2, Bos, when reproached for being too dark, says, "I speak H. indeed, like Adam and Eve before they fell to spinning." In Val. Welsh iv. 1, when the Roman Ambassador cannot understand Morgan's Welsh-English, he exclaims, "Doth Morgan speak H. or not?" In Brome's Queen's Exch. ii. 2, Jeffrey says, "We must forbear! What H.'s that? We understand not what 'must forbear' means."

The H. Cabbala was supposed to have some magic character. It was in fact the oral tradition of the interpretation of the O.T., but it was naturally an esoteric matter to the Gentile, and he attached all sorts of imaginary powers to it. In Underwit ii. 2, Device says, "Your Hieroglyphick was the Egyptian wisdom, your H. was the Cabala." In Brewer's Lingua i. 1, Lingua speaks of "The ancient H. clad with mysteries." One of the books of the N.T. is the Epistle to the Hs., frequently, but erroneously, ascribed to St. Paul. More probably it was written by Apollos; or, as some think, Priscilla. In Juventus, p. 157, Good Counsel says, "I will shew you what S. Paul doth declare in his epistle to the Hebrues, and the x chapter."

HEBRIDES. The group of islands lying off the W. coast of Scotland. There are about 300 of them, of which 80 are inhabited: the rest are little more than rocks. The most important are Lewis, N. and S. Uist, Skye, Jura, Islay, and Aran. Milton, Lycidas 156, pictures the body of his drowned friend, Edward King, as being hurled "beyond the stormy H." He was drowned in the Irish Sea. See also EUBIDES.

HEBRON. One of the oldest cities in the world, lying in a fertile valley in S. Syria, 19 m. S. of Jerusalem. It is now called Khalil-er-Rahman. Abraham was reported to have settled in its neighbourhood, and to have bought the cave of Machpelah from the Hittites, who then inhabited it, as a burial place. There Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were buried, and the mosque erected over the cave is one of the most sacred places in the Mahomedan world. David took it as his capital in the early part of his reign, before he had captured Jerusalem from the Jebusites. In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, David, being told of his son's approaching death, says, "Ye sprouting almonds, Droop, drown, and drench in H.'s fearful streams." In Milton, S. A. 148, the Chorus tell how Samson "bore the gates of Azza . . . up to the hill by H., seat of giants old" (see Judges xvi. 3). According to Joshua xv. 13, H. originally belonged to the Anakim, or Giants.

HEBRUE. See HEBREW.

HEBRUS. Now the Maritza, the principal river of Thrace, rising at the foot of Mt. Rhodope, and falling into the Aegean Sea opposite Samothrace. According to the Greek legend, Orpheus settled in Thrace after the return of the Argonautic expedition. His devotion to the lost Eurydice inflamed the jealousy of the Thracian Mænads, and they tore him limb from limb and flung the remains into the H. In Nero iii. 2, Nero says, "They tell of Orpheus, when he took his lute . . . H. stood still, Pangæus bowed his head." In Rutter's Shepherd Hol. iii. 3, a song begins: "Orpheus on the banks of H. torn." Milton, Lyc. 63, says of Orpheus: "His gory visage down the stream was sent, Down the swift H. to the Lesbian shore." Spenser, in F. Q. i. 11, 30, says of the Well of Life: "Ne can Cephise nor H. match this well." The waters of the H. were supposed to be specially pure. In Selimus 2491, Selim says, "Mars Scatters the troops of warlike Thracians And warms cold H. with hot streams of blood." Mars was specially associated with Thrace.

HECATOMPYLOS ("the city of a hundred gates"). The ancient capital of Parthia, lying somewhere S.E. of the Caspian Sea at a distance of 224 m. (Strabo) or 122 (Pliny). The exact site is uncertain. Milton, P. R. iii. 287, says, "Ecbatane her structure vast there shows, And H. her hundred gates." In Bacchus, the 16th guest was "a pleasant Parthian of the stately city Catompylon."

HEDON HALL (= EDIN'S, or ETIN'S HALL). In Berwicksh., on Cockburn Law, 4 m. N. of Duns. In Ford's Warbeck iv. 1, Surrey mentions that "the glory of H. H." has been "devasted" by the English. This was in the expedition against the Scotch, who had supported Perkin Warbeck in 1497.

HEIDELBERG. An ancient city now in Baden, formerly the capital of the Palatinate. It lies on the S. bank of the Neckar, 12 m. from its junction with the Rhine. The castle, on the W. of the town on a hill 330 ft. above the Neckar, is the finest in Germany. It was begun in the 13th cent., and much enlarged by the Elector Rupert and Ferdinand V. K. of Bohemia. Since 1764 it has been a ruin. In the vaults of the castle was the famous Tun of H., constructed 1589-1591. The present Tun, which holds 49,000 gallons, was made in 1751 to take the place of the earlier one. The university is the oldest in Germany, and was founded in 1356 by the Elector Rupert. After the Reformation it became a stronghold of Protestantism, and from it was issued in 1563 the famous H. Catechism. The city suffered much in the 30 Years' War, and was taken and pillaged in 1622 by Tilly. In Chettle's Hoffman C. 4, Ferdinand is styled "Prince of H., lord of Pomer, and D. of Prussia." This wild story of revenge has no historical foundation. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Ananias tells Subtle that the brethren will not venture any more in the way of supplying him with materials for converting into gold: for this reason amongst others, that "one at H. made it of an egg And a small paper of pin-dust." In iii. 1, Tribulation Wholesome reproaches Ananias for upbraiding Subtle "with the brethren's blessing of H.," i.e. their success in making gold as stated above. In Shirley's Wedding i. 1, Isaac says of Lodam: "The barrel of H. was the pattern of his belly." In Taylor, Works ii. 74, he says that Coryat needs a cask to hold his books "much bigger than the Hian. bumbard." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Thorowgood says, "The little Conduit shall be still, like the great Tun of H., filled with wine." In his Wallenstein v. 2, Newman says, "And 'twere the tun of H., I'd drink it off." Jonson, in Underwoods lxx., speaking of his own stoutness, says, "But yet the Tun at H. had hoops." Coryat, in Crudities 486 (1611), gives a very full account of the Tun and a picture of himself standing on top of it. According to his computation it contained about 34,000 gallons. Herrick, in Epig. on Spunge (1647), who boasts of his capacity for beer, says, "His triumph's poor; I know the Tun of H. holds more." In Cowley's Cutter ii. 5, Puny says, "We'll drink up a whole vessel . . . so big that the Tun of Heydelburg shall seem but a barrel of pickled oysters to it."

HELEN'S, SAINT. A ch. in Lond., in Gt. St. Helen's Pl., on the E. side of Bishopsgate St. Within. It was the ch. of the Priory of the Nuns of St. H., founded 1212, and also the parish ch. It has 2 parallel naves, one for each purpose, divided by a screen. It was one of the very few City churches that escaped the Gt. Fire. Here were buried Sir John Crosby and Sir T. Gresham. In an assessment roll of 1598, the name of William Shakespeare occurs 19th in the list of inhabitants of the parish of St. H. as the owner of property of the value of £5: probably the furniture of his rooms. A memorial window to the poet has been placed in the ch. by an American donor. In Brome's Covent G. iv. 1, the Puritanical Gabriel inquires of Madge, whom he supposes to have come from Amsterdam, "how the 2 zealous brethren thrive there that broke in St. Hellens." These were doubtless a couple of Puritans who had interfered with the ch. services in some way. In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 57, Crosbie says, "In little St. H. will I be buried." The altar-tomb with the recumbent figures of himself and his lady is on the S. side of the chancel.

HELIAS. The third of the 6 gates of Troy. The prol. to Troil. 16 speaks of "Priam's six-gated city, Dardan, and Tymbria, H., Chetas, Troien, and Antenorides." The list is taken from Caxton's Destruction of Troy iii. 4.

HELICON. A mtn., or rather a range of mtns., in Boeotia, between Lake Copais and the Corinthian Gulf. They were sacred to the Muses. The 2 fountains, Aganippe and Hippocrene, issuing from the slopes of the range, were supposed to inspire those who drank of them with poetic passion. In Nero i. 4, Lucan, speaking of his poem on the Civil Wars, says, "I love the unnatural wounds from whence did flow Another Cirrha, a new H.": where, as is common in the 16th cent. writers, the mtn. is confused with the springs. In Jonson's Cynthia v. 3, Crites condemns the company of self-lovers to "Pass to the well of knowledge, H." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Thorowgood asks: "Will the Cabalists drink their morning's draught of H. with you?" In Pilg. Pernass. ii. 1, Madido says, "There is no true Parnassus but the 3rd loft in a wine tavern, no true H. but a cup of brown bastard." In Ford's Sacrifice ii. 1, Mauruccio, the would-be poet, says, "I am rapt with fury; and have been for these 6 nights together drunk with the pure liquor of H." In Randolph's Hey Hon. v., we read of "poor shallow scoundrels that never drank any H. above a penny a quart." In H4 B. v. 3, 107, Pistol says, "Shall dunghill curs confront the Hs.?" I suppose by Hs. he means true poets, though it is wasted labour to try to discover anything but idle rhodomontade in much that he says. In Lyly's Maid's Meta. v., Phœbus addresses the Muses as "You sacred sisters of fair Hellicon." In Ev. Wom. I. ii. 1, Terentia exclaims, "Oh, a fine tongue dipped in H.!" In Chapman's May Day iii. 3, Lodovico says, "We have watered our horses in H.," i.e. we too are poets. In his D'Olive iii. 2, D'Olive proposes to have in his house a statue of a poet with his nose running as if he had a cold in the head: "it shall like a spout run pure wit all day long; and it shall be fed with a pipe brought at my charge from H. over the Alps and under the sea." In Brewer's Lovesick ii., Thornton says, "If there be any Hellicon in England, 'tis here at Newcastle, every coal-pit has a relish on't, for who goes down but he comes out as black as ink?" In Suckling's Goblins iv., the devil says of the Poet: "We have set him with his feet in a great tub of water in which he dabbles and believes it to be H." In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Gabriel says of a madman: "He was a poet that drunk too deep of H." In his City Wit ii. 1, Crasy addresses Sarpego as "Minion of the Muses, dear water-bailey of H." In his Academy ii. 1, Lady Nestlecock says of Whimby: "Alas, good Knight! He weeps pure H." In Marmion's Companion i. 4, Careless declares that he loves the Horseshoe Tavern "for the sign's sake; 'tis the very print of the shoe that Pegasus wore when he broke up H. with his hoof" (see HIPPOCRENE). In Jonson's Poetaster i. 1, Luscus swears "by the banks of H." In v. 1, Tucca says to Horace, "give me thy wrist, H.!" In Ret. Pernass. i. 2, Judicio says of John Marston: "He quaffs a cup of Frenchman's h.," i.e. he imitates the style of the French poets. In iii. 4, Furor invokes the Muses, "Awake, you paltry trulls of H." In Dekker's Satiromastix i. 2, 419, Tucca calls Crispinus "heir apparent of H." Milton, in Epitaph on M. of Winchester 56, says, "Here be tears of perfect moan Wept for thee in H." Davies, in Idea (1594) liii. 14, says to the stream that flowed by his native place, "Thou, sweet Ankor, art my H." Spenser, in Amoretti i. 10, says that his rhymes are "bathed in the sacred brook Of H." Heliconist is used for a poet. In Dekker's Satiromastix iv. 2, 130, Tucca says to Horace (Jonson), "Thou'lt . . . bring me and my Heliconistes into thy dialogues to make us talk madly, wut not, Lucian?" Hall, in Satires i. 8, 5, says in reference to the religious poetry of the time, "Now good St. Peter weeps pure H." Nash, in Lenten, calls Homer "that good old blind bibber of H."

HELL. Formerly a debtors' prison under Westminster Hall, but it became a tavern, and was much frequented by lawyers. In Jonson's Alchemist v. 2, Subtle tells Dapper, "Her Grace would have you eat no more Wool-sack pies, no Dagger frumery"; and Doll adds, "Nor break his fast in Heaven and H." Peacham, in Worth of a Penny (1647), says that if one marries a wife that is a perfect "linguist," he were "better to take his diet in H. than his dinner at home."

HELLAS (i.e. HELLASTON, now HELSTON). A town in S. Cornwall, on the Cober, 8 m. S.W. of Falmouth. In Cornish M. P. iii. 673, Pilate gives to the soldiers who have been guarding the tomb of our Lord "Penryn yn weth ha H.," i.e. "Penryn and likewise H.," as the price of their silence.

HELL-BREE = HELBRE. A small island in the mouth of the river Dee between Cheshire and Flintsh. In Middleton's Quiet Life v. 3, Water-Camlet says that if his loquacious wife goes to Ireland "she will be heard from H.-b. to Divelin." In other words, her strident voice will carry right across the Irish Sea. There is doubtless a double entendre intended both in H.-b. and Divel-in. In Merlin iii. 4, 130, the Clown says of Merlin: "I think his ancestors came first from H.-b. in Wales," i.e. he is a child of the devil. Drayton, in Polyolb. xi. 123, says that "Hilbre lifts his head" out of the foaming surge near the mouth of the Mersey.

HELLESPONT (now called the DARDANELLES). The strait connecting the Propontis, or Sea of Marmora, with the Ægean. It is about 40 m. long and from 1 to 4 m. broad. It was bridged by Xerxes in the neighbourhood of Abydos and Sestos, and it was at this point that Leander used to swim across to visit his mistress, Hero, until at last he was drowned. The name was supposed to be derived from the drowning of Helle there when she and her brother Phrixus tried to cross it on a ram. There is always a strong current setting outwards to the Ægean. Milton, P. L. x. 309, says, "Xerxes . . . over H. Bridging his way, Europe with Asia joined." In Fisher's Fuimus i. 2, Cæsar says, "I long to stride the H. Or bridge it with a navy." In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar boasts, "To chase The flying Pompey have I dreadless passed The toiling H." This is poetical licence: Cæsar went straight to Egypt after Pompey's flight thither. In Locrine i. 1, 104, Brutus says that he came "From Græcia, through the boisterous H. . . unto the fields of Lestrigon." As Lestrigon was in Sicily (if anywhere), Brutus was a good deal out of his way. In Oth. iii. 3, 456, Othello compares his bloody thoughts to "the Pontic Sea, Whose icy current and compulsive force Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the Propontic and the H." Pliny (Nat. Hist.) says, "The sea Pontus evermore floweth and runneth out into Propontis, but the sea never retireth again within Pontus."

The story of Leander, popularized by Marlowe's Hero and Leander, is constantly referred to. In Two Gent. i. 1, 22, Valentine charges Proteus with having read "How young Leander crossed the H."; and adds: "You are over boots in love And yet you never swum the H." In As iv. 1, 104, Rosalind says, "Leander went but forth to wash him in the H. and, being taken with the cramp, was drowned; and the foolish coroners of that age found it was 'Hero of Sestos.'" In Peele's Ed. I. p. 41, Elinor says, "Shouldst thou . . . with Leander swim the H. . . Thy Nell would follow thee." In Ed. III ii. 2, the K. says, "I will through a H. of blood To arrive at Cestus where my Hero lies." In the old Shrew i. 1, Polidore speaks of "good Leander For whom the Helespont weeps brinish tears." In Shirley's Master iv. 1, Bombo says, "Hero was a lady of Leander's lake." On which Guido exclaims, "There's a new word now for the Helespont." In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Nessus asks, "Have I not swum the H. When waves, high as yon hills, have crowned me?" In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 1, Trimalchio, intending to go to Holland's Leaguer, a brothel on the Surrey side, says, "I'll view this leaguer and swim Like a Leander o'er the H. That shall divide me from these Hero-ines." In Jonson's Barthol. v. 3, Littlewit, explaining his Motion of Hero and Leander, says, "As for the H., I imagine our Thames here."

HELMET. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard, Lond. Cæsar's Rev. was "Imprinted for Nathanael Fosbrooke and John Wright and are to be sold in St. Pauls Church-yard at the sign of the H. 1607."

HELMET COURT. Lond., in the Strand, opposite Somerset House, so called from the H. Inn at its corner. Henry Condell, co-editor of the 1st Folio of Shakespeare's works, left to his wife "my freehold messuages, etc., lying and being in H. C. in the Strand."

HELSEN = ELSINORE, q.v. In Chettle's Hoffman ii. C. 3, Jerom says, "I'll retire to my castle at H. and there write a new poem."

HELVETIA. Properly the country of the Helvetii, a warlike tribe of Germans conquered by Julius Cæsar B.C. 58. They occupied the lands between the Jura, the Rhine, and Lake Geneva, but the name H. came to be used for the whole of Switzerland. The word is also used punningly for Hell. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says, "The big-boned German and Hn. stout . . . Can Cæsar's valour witness, to their grief." In S. Rowley's When You H 3, Gardiner, referring to the religious wars in Germany, says, "Half the province of H. Is with their tumults almost quite destroyed." Switzerland was divided between the Romanists and the Protestants during the years following the Reformation, and there were many conflicts between the 2 parties, in one of which the famous Zwingli was killed (1531). In Dekker's If it be 277, Ruffman, the devil, says punningly, "I am an Hn. born": meaning that he comes from Hell. So Tarpax, the devil, in Kirke's Champions i. 1, tells his son, "Thou art by birth Duke of Styx, Sulphur, and H." In Webster's Malfi iv. 2, the 3rd madman says, "Greek is turned Turk; we are only to be saved by the Hn. translation." The reference is to the English version of the Bible, known popularly as the "Breeches" Bible, first published at Geneva in 1560.

HEMON, HEMUS. See HÆMUS.

HENAUT. See HAINAUT.

HENLEY. A town in Oxfordsh., on the N. bank of the Thames, 22 m. S. of Oxford and 35 m. W. of Lond. The H. Royal Regatta has made the name known throughout the civilized world. In Greene's Friar ii., Bacon asks Burden, "Were you not yesterday at H. upon the Thames?" And then by his conjuring he brings to Oxford the "Hostess at H., mistress of the Bell," who reveals that Burden was playing cards with her at H. the night before.

HENLEY STREET. A st. in Stratford-on-Avon in which the house stands where Shakespeare is reported to have been born. It is the road out from Stratford to H.-in-Arden, and was an inconsiderable st. in the outskirts of the town. John Shakespeare established himself there in 1551, and in 1556 bought 2 tenements, one in H. St. next to the birthplace house, and another in Greenhill St. These passed on to the poet on his father's death, and in his will he says, "I give unto my daughter Susanna Hall . . . 2 messuages or tenements situate, lying, and being in H. St."

HENUES. In Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 362, the Capt., enumerating the French forces, speaks of "The H. with their cutting glaves and sharp car-buckles." They come between the Picardes and the Borgondians; and I suppose the Hainaux, i.e. the men of Hainaut, are intended. See HAINAUT.

HERALD'S OFFICE. See DERBY HOUSE.

HERCULES, PILLARS OF. These were generally understood to be the rocks that guard the entrance to the Mediterranean by the Straits of Gibraltar: Calpe on the European and Abyla on the African side. One form of the legend was that H. tore the rocks asunder and so separated Europe from Africa; another, that he bent them over the Straits to make a bridge for the cattle of Geryon. At all events, they stood to the ancients for the limit of the world westward. Another form of the legend was that H. set up 2 brazen pillars near Cadiz, with the inscription "Ne plus ultra" (see under CALES). In B. & F. Philaster i. 1, Dion says of Megra: "The trophies of her dishonour [are] advanced beyond H.' P." In Day's Law Tricks ii. 1, Lurda says, "The world sees Colossus on my brows, H.' P., here's non ultra writ." In Marmion's Leaguer ii. 3, Autolicus says, "You shall have trophies . . . set up for you . . . more than Herculean p., to advance your fame to a non ultra." In Chapman's Rev. Bussy iii. 1, 5, Maillard says of the French soldiers: "With such men Methinks a man might pass th' insulting pillars Of Bacchus and Alcides." Alcides is H.: Bacchus was said to have erected similar pillars in India.

HEREFORD. The capital of Herefordsh., on the Wye, 120 m. N.W. of Lond. The cathedral was built by William I. It was usually pronounced as a dissyllable, Harford. Henry Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, afterwards Henry IV, married Mary, the daughter of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of H., in 1385, and was created D. of H. in 1397. In the early scenes of R2 he is called H., but after his father's death, when, in ii. 3, 69, Berkeley addresses him as "My lord of H.," he rejoins: "My lord, my answer is to Lancaster And I am come to seek that name in England." In H4 B. iv. 1, 131, Westmoreland, speaking of his quarrel with Mowbray, calls him the Earl of H., and says, "The Earl of H. was reputed then in England the most valiant gentleman." In R3 iii. 1, 195, Gloucester says to Buckingham, "When I am k., claim thou of me The earldom of H." but when, in iv. 2, 93, Buckingham claims the fulfilment of the promise, Richd. refuses to listen to him. His son, Edward Stafford, the Buckingham in H8, appears to have used the title, though he was never so created, for in i. 1, 200 he is addressed as D. of Buckingham and Earl of H., Stafford, and Northampton. He was beheaded in 1521; and in 1550 the title of Viscount H. was conferred on Walter Devereux, in whose family it still continues. Oldcastle opens with a fight in the streets of H. between the followers of Lord Herbert and Lord Powis. In J. Heywood's Weather, p. 100, Report claims to have been at H. In Jonson's Wales, Howell sings that the Welshman has goat's milk sufficient to "buy him silk Enough to make him fine to quarrel At H. sizes [i.e. assizes] in new apparel." Drayton, in Polyolb. vii. 166, says, "H. doth show Her rising spires aloft."

HEREFORDSHIRE. One of the counties in the W. of England bordering on Wales. In H4 A. i. 1, 39, Westmoreland announces to the K. that "the noble Mortimer, Leading the men of H. to fight Against . . . Glendower, Was by the rude hands of that Welshman taken." In Brome's Couple i. 1, Saleware affirms that his kinswoman is "a gentlewoman of the best blood in H."—"Yes," replies Wat, "Welsh-blood." In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 213, "Heriford" is one of the counties granted by the K. to his favourite, Bushy. H. was famous for its morris-dancers, of whom an interesting account is given in Old Meg, published in 1609, and reprinted in Misc. Antiq. Anglicana 1816.

HERMON. The highest peak in the Anti-Libanus range in N. Syria. It rises to a height of 9200 ft., and is snow-covered during the greater part of the year. Its lower slopes to the W. and S. are specially fertile. In Peele's Bethsabe i. 1, David speaks of the dew "That hangs, like chains of pearl, on H. hill." (see Psalms cxxxiii. 3). Milton, P. L. xii. 141, says that God promised to Abraham's sons "all that land . . . From H. E. to the great W. sea; Mt. H., yonder sea, each place behold In prospect, as I point them."

HERMUS. A brook in Attica, on the road between Athens and Eleusis, between the Cephissus and the temple of Apollo on Mt. Pæcilum. It gave its name to one of the demes of Attica. In England's Helicon (1614), p. 20, we have "Her golden locks like H. sands, Or than bright H. brighter."

HERNE'S OAK. A great oak-tree towards the S. end of the Little Park at Windsor. It was supposed to be haunted by the ghost of a certain Herne the hunter. Lord Redesdale, in a letter to Gosse, quoted in Gosse's Life of Swinburne, p. 321, says, "We used to take long walks together in Windsor Forest and in the Home Park, where the famous o. of Herne the hunter was still standing, a white, lightning-blasted skeleton of a tree." Swinburne was at Eton 1849-1853. In M. W. W. iv. 4, 28, Mrs. Page says, "There is an old tale goes that Herne the hunter, Sometime a keeper here in Windsor Forest, Doth all the winter time, at still midnight, Walk round about an o., with great ragged horns"; and Page adds: "Why, yet there want not many that do fear In deep of night to walk by this H. o." A plot is laid to get Falstaff there, and the last scene is laid at the o.

HERTFORD (pronounced, and often spelt, HARTFORD). The county town of Herts., on the Lea, 19 m. N. of Lond. The castle was built by Edward the Elder in 905. John II of France and David of Scotland were imprisoned there in the reign of Edward III. Its site is now occupied by Haileybury school, abt. 2 m. out of the town. In Davenport's Matilda i. 3, the K. says to the Q., "Post thou to Hartford Castle, whither we are certified young Bruce is fled"; ii. 3 takes place there. In Death Huntingdon ii. 2, Fitzwater says, "Your nephew Bruce shall post to H. Castle." The castle was taken by the revolting Barons in the reign of John: later John made Fitzwater governor of H. Castle. In Oldcastle v. 9, the Bp., being at St. Albans, directs: "See they be conveyed to H. Size, both this counterfeit and you, Sir John of Wrotham, and your wench." The next scene is at H. in a Hall of Justice.

HERTFORDSHIRE (pronounced HARTFORDSHIRE). One of the S.E. counties of England, lying N. of Middlesex. The New River water supply of Lond. was taken from springs near Ware. The air is salubrious and stimulating, and there was an old saying: "He who buys a home in H. pays 2 years' purchase for the air." In Merry Devil, p. 246, the Host of the George at Waltham, going on a poaching expedition, says, "I'll fence with all the justices in H.—I'll have a buck till I die." In Three Ladies ii. 1, Simplicity says to Fraud, "Thou didst go into H. to a place called Ware, and thou didst grease the horses' teeth that they should not eat hay." In Piers C. vii. 413, we read: "Ys non so hongry hounde in Hertforde-shire That thorst lape of that levynge," i.e. the vomit of Glutton. The name of the county was probably chosen for the sake of the alliteration. In Trag. Richd. II iv. 1, 231, "Harford-shere" is one of the counties granted by the K. Cowley's Cutter i. 2, young Truman says to his father,

"He plundered your house in H. and took away the very hop-poles."

HESEBON, or HESHBON. The chief city of the Amorites, 15 m. E. of the Jordan and 12 N.E. of the N. end of the Dead Sea. There are still extensive ruins there. Milton, P. L. i. 408, says that Chemos was worshipped "in H. And Horonaim, Seon's realm."

HESPERIA. (1) The land of the West, a poetical name applied by the Alexandrian and Roman poets to Italy. In Marlowe's Dido i., Cloanthus says, "There is a place, H. termed by us, An ancient empire . . . which now we call Italia." Milton, P. L. i. 520, tells of the ancient Greek gods "who with Saturn old Fled over Adria to the Hn. fields."

2. Hesperia is also used of Spain. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Cæsar says, "From Ganges to Hn. Gades Our name doth sound." In T. Heywood's Challenge ii. 1, Hellenia says to the Spaniard Bonavida, "Through all H. you may boast, Though my face please, yet shall my virtue most." In Fraunce's Victoria i. 4, 195, Onophris says to Fidelis, who has just returned from Spain, "Reversus es ab oris Hesperii."

3. Hesperian is used as the adjective of Hesperides; see HESPERIDES.

HESPERIDES. The daughters of Hesperus who had charge of the golden apples which Ge gave to Hera as a marriage gift. They had the assistance of the dragon Ladon in this function. The gardens of which they had charge are commonly called the H. by the Elizabethans, and their location was fixed by different poets in different parts of N. Africa, or further W. in the Islands of the Blessed in the Atlantic Ocean. The 11th labour of Heracles was the getting of the golden apples, which he accomplished by the aid of Atlas. In Per. i. 1, 27, Antiochus says to Pericles, who has come to try to win his daughter, "Before thee stands this fair H., With golden fruit, but dangerous to be touched." In L. L. L. iv. 3, 341, Biron says, "For valour, is not Love a Hercules, Still climbing trees in the H.?" In Greene's Friar ix. 82, Bungay undertakes to "Show thee the tree, leav'd with refined gold, Whereon the fearful dragon held his seat That watched the garden called H." In Middleton's Change-lin iii. 3, Antonio justifies his proposal to Isabella by saying, "Shall I alone Walk through the orchard of th' H., And, cowardly, not dare to pull an apple?" Marlowe, in Hero and Leander, end of Sest. ii., says, "Leander now, like Theban Hercules, Entered the orchard of the H.: Whose fruit none rightly can describe but he Who pulls or shakes it from the golden tree." In Glapthorne's Argalus ii. 2, Strephon says, "My arms are dragons that defend all these; Now view in me living H." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 4, Fastidius Brisk tells the company that if a man lives at Court, "he shall behold all the delights of the H. to be mere umbræ and imperfect figures." In Greene's Orlando i. 1, 56, Mandrecarde declares that Mexico is "richer than the plot H." In Barnes' Charter i. 5, Lucretia Borgia says to her husband, "The Esperian dragons kept not with more watch The golden fruit than thou my fatal beauty." In Devonshire i. 3, Henrico says, "With greater care than were the dragons supposed to watch the golden apples growing in the H. shall Henrico wait on his best-beloved." In Barnavelt iii. 6, Leidenberch, contemplating suicide, says, "Is there not Some hid H., some blessed fruit, Moated about with death?" In Milton's Comus 393, the 2nd Brother says, "Beauty, like the fair Hesperian tree Laden with blooming gold, had need the guard Of dragon watch." In Brewer's Lingua iv. 5, Phantastes says, "When Hercules had killed the flaming dragon of Hesperida, with the apples of that orchard he made this fiery meat, in memory whereof he named it snap-dragon." In Marmon's Leaguer iii. 4, Fidelio says, "You see that I have brought you to the treasure And the rich garden of th' H.; If you can charm those ever watchful eyes That keep the tree, then you may pull the fruit." In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Knowell objects to being regarded as playing "the Hesperian dragon with my fruit," because he takes good care of his apricots. In W. Rowley's All's Lost i. 1, 137, Roderique says of Jacinta: "By rapine's force We'll pluck this apple from th' H." Harvey, in Pierce's Supererogation 167, speaks of "the occidental islands of the Ocean called H." Milton, P. L. iii. 568, compares Eden to "those Hesperian gardens, famed of old." In iv. 250, he again says of Eden: "Hesperian fables true, If true, here only." In P. R. ii. 357, our Lord's banquet is waited on by "ladies of the H., that seemed Fairer than feigned of old." Linche, in Diella (1596), says of his mistress (xxii. 10): "Her breasts, 2 apples of H."

HETHITE. See HITTITE.

HEXHAM. A town in Northumberland on the S. bank of the Tyne, 20 m. W. of Newcastle. The Bailiff of H. is one of the characters in K. K. K. (Haz., vi. 531). Honesty says, "Here is a cluster of knaves; here lacks but the Bailly of H." The time is the reign of Edgar the Peaceable, but why the Bailly of H. has such a bad character I do not know.

HEYDELBURG. See HEIDELBURGH.

HEYL. A salt-water creek. It is applied to several creeks on the coast of Cornwall. The context shows that we must look for one on the E. coast: probably Helford Creek, 5 m. S. of Falmouth, is intended. Pedler identifies it with Hayle Bay, just N. of Padstow Creek, on the W. coast, but that would hardly suit the passage quoted, for there is nothing W. of it except the ocean. In Cornish M. P. ii. 2744, the executioner, who is boring a hole for one of the nails in the cross, boasts, "Nynsus guas a west the H. An tollo guel," i.e. "There is not a fellow W. of the H. Who can bore better."

HIBERNIA. Corrupted form of Iverna, from Ierne, the old name of Ireland. In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 6, the Chorus sings: "More ghastly monster did not spring from the Hn. flood With which Morvidius combatting Of foe became his food." Geoffrey of Monmouth tells how "there came from the Irish coasts a most cruel monster": Morvidius encountered it, but it "rushed upon him and swallowed him up like a small fish." In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 101, Pompey says, "I'd sooner trust Hn. bogs and quicksands" than Cæsar. In King Lear i. 2, Skalliger says to Ragan, "Your younger sister [i.e. Cordella] he would fain bestow Upon the rich k. of H."

HIDE-PARK. See HYDE PARK.

HIGHGATE. Vill. N. of Lond., 5 m. in a direct line from St. Paul's. It stands 350 ft. above the level of the Thames and commands a fine view of the City. In 1386 the Bp. of Lond. allowed the Gt. North Road to come through his park at H., and put a toll-bar at the top of the hill which was thought to have given rise to the name of the vill., the High Gate on the hill. The Gate House Tavern still marks its position. The way to Barnet and St. Albans by the N.W. Road lay over H. Hill, which rises pretty steeply from Holloway. At the bottom of the hill is Whittington's Stone. Higher up is Andrew Marvell's cottage, and opposite to it Cromwell House, built in 1630 for Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law. It is now a convalescent hospital for children. Higher still was Arundel House, where Jonson's Penates was performed before James I on 1 May, 1604, and where Lord Bacon died in 1626. In the main st. of the vill. were many taverns, and in most, if not all, of them was a pair of horns, on which the ceremony of swearing on the horns was carried out. A full account will be found in Hone's Year Book. H. Green stands at the top of West Hill, opposite St. Michael's Ch. It was a favourite resort of Lond. people. Drayton, in Polyolb. xvi. 255, says, "Then H. boasts his way, which men do most frequent." In Liberality v. 5, the Clerk says to Prodigality, "Thou art indicted that thou at H., in the county of Middlesex, didst take from one Tenacity, of the parish of Pancridge, £1000." All the great roads out of Lond. were infested with highway robbers. The scene of Oldcastle iii. 2 is "on a road near H."; and in iv. 1, Butler reports, "As I scouted to Islington The gray-eyed morning gave me glimmering Of armed men coming down H. Hill." In Jack Drum i. 1, there is a morrice dance and a song: "Let us be seen On Hygate Green To dance for the honour of Holloway." In Jonson's New Inn iv. 1, Barnaby, arriving at Barnet, tells how he lost his hat: "the wind blew't off at H." In Jonson's Tub i. 2, Clench says, "Zin Valentine! He was a deadly zin and dwelt at H.," and adds, to lend verisimilitude to his story, that he lived "at the Cock-and-Hen in H." In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 3, Ronca boasts that he has a perspective (i.e. telescope) by which he can read small print "as plainly, 12 long miles off, as you see Paul's from H." In B. & F. Wit Money iii. 1, Shorthose, annoyed at the prospect of having to drive his mistress out of town, prays: "May zealous smiths so housel all our horses That they may feel compunction in their feet, And tire at H.," i.e. before they have gone 5 m. In Middleton's Trick to Catch iv. 2, Freedom tells Lucre that his nephew is so melancholy that "you may hear him sigh in a still evening to your house at H." In Goosecap iii. 1, Rudesby asks: "Would any ass in the world ride down such a hill as H. is in such a frost as this, and never light?" In Dekker's Northward iii. 1, Doll says, "If you should but get 3 or 4 Cheshire cheeses, and set them a-running down H. Hill," the Welsh capt. would run after them. In Underwit iv. 3, Courtwell, savagely disparaging his mistress, says of her breasts: "H. compared with 'em is Paradise." In W. Rowley's New Wonder iii., Foster says, "He's in Ludgate again." To which Mrs. Foster replies: "No, he's in H.: he struts it bravely." Ludgate was used as a prison: the point of the pun is obvious; he is not in prison, but in high gait.

HIGH STREET. In Bologna: probably the Strada Maggiore is intended. It runs from the E. end of the Corso to the Porta Maggiore. In B. & F. Chances i. 1, Don Frederic arranges to meet Don John "I th' H. St." The scene is at Bologna.

HIGH STREET, PLYMOUTH. Running from the Guildhall, in Whimple St., to Notte St., the Parade, and Sutton Pool. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. iii. 2, Clem says to Roughman, "You lie, Sir, at the Raven in the H. St." In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Cable says, "If you walk but 3 turns in the H.-st., they will ask you money for wearing out the cobbles."

HILBRE. See HELL-BREE.

HILIA. In Cæsar's Rev. ii. 5, Cato says, "Raze out of thy lasting Kalenders Those bloody songs of Hs. dismal fight." I suspect a misprint for Allia's, q.v.

HIMETTUS. See HYMETTUS.

HINCKLEY. A town lying just off Old Watling St., on the border of Warwicksh. and Leicestersh., in the latter county. It is some 30 m. N.E. of Stratford and 50 from the Cotswold dist. In H4 B. v. 1, 27, Davy asks Shallow, "Do you mean to stop any of William's wages about the sack he lost the other day at H. Fair?" The Fair was held on August 26th, and was for horses, cows, sheep, and cheese. As Henry IV died on March 20th, Davy must have had a long memory!

HIND. A tavern in Stepney. I have not been able to trace any other reference to it. There is a H. Arms now in Upper North St., Poplar, but whether it represents the old tavern I cannot say. In Look about xxv., Lady Fauconbridge says, "At Stepney by my summer house . . . There is a tavern which I sometimes use: It is the H."

HINKSEY. Vill. in England, abt. 1 m. S. of Oxford. In Thersites 220, Mater, in her charm for worms, invokes "Mother Brice of Oxford and great Gib of H."

HINNOM, VALLEY OF. On the W. and S. sides of Jerusalem, and joining the valley of the Kedron at the S.E. corner of the city. The "opprobrious hill," or "Hill of Offence," where Solomon built temples to Chemosh and Moloch (I Kings xi. 7), lay S. of its E. end. It was used as the rubbish-tip of the city, and the refuse was kept constantly burning: hence it became the symbol of Hell, for which the Hebrew form of the name, Gehenna, is regularly used in the N. T. Milton, P. L. i. 404, says that Moloch led Solomon "by fraud to build His temple right against the temple of God On that opprobrious hill, and made his grove The pleasant v. of H., Tophet thence And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell." See also GEHENNA, TOPHET.

HIPPOCRENE (now known as MAKARIOTISSA). A fountain near Mt. Helicon in Bœotia, sacred to the Muses. It was said to have sprung from the foot-print of the horse Pegasus: hence it is called the "horse-foot spring." In Jonson's Poetaster v. 1, Tucca addresses Horace as Helicon and Virgil as "thy noble H. here": where the word is used as equivalent to Poet. Barry, in Ram prol., speaks of "those ancient streams Which from the Horse-foot fount do flow." In Day's Parl. Bees v., Poetaster says, "Drink 9 healths of sacred H. To the 9 Muses; this will make a poet." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano swears "by H., which was a certain well where all the Muses watered." In Alimony i., Timon speaks of "the precious rills of H." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Delight says, "Not far off stands the Hippocrenian well Whither I'll lead thee, and . . . to welcome thee 9 Muses shall appear." In Marston's Antiquary iii. 2, Lionel asks: "Have you lately drunk of the horse-pond or step on the forked Parnassus, that you start out so sudden a poet?" Drayton, in Odes (1606) ix. 12, commends Sack: "Which to the colder brain Is the true H."

HIRCANIA. See HYRCANIA.

HISPAHAN (more commonly spelt ISPAHAN). An important city of Persia, lying on the Zendarood, abt. 250 m. N.E. of the head of the Persian Gulf. Its mud walls were 24 m. in circuit. Timur took it and massacred its inhabitants in 1387; Shah Abbas I made it his capital, and under him it reached its highest splendour and had a population of upwards of 1,000,000. His 2 palaces still remain, as well as mosques, colleges, and bridges built or adorned by him. It is now in a state of decadence and filth, and is no longer a royal residence. In Milton, P. L. xi. 394, Michael points out to Adam "where The Persian in Ecstasy sat, or since In H."

HISPANIOLA. One of the great Antilles in the W. Indies. It is also known as San Domingo, or Hayti. It was discovered by Columbus in 1493, and Spanish settlements were soon made there. It is now the republic of Haiti. In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant tells how "H. was ravished by Drake": this was in 1585. In T. Heywood's I. K. M. B. 333, Chorus, referring to the same expedition, the famous Island Voyage, says, "Drake and Christopher Carlisle set on Cap de Verd, then H."

HITCHIN. A town in Herts., 13 m. N.W. of Hertford. The poet George Chapman was born near H., and lived there for some time. In his poem Euthymius Raptus, he speaks of Homer's visits to him "on the hill next H.'s left hand," i.e. probably Offley Hill, 2 or 3 m. W. of H. Browne, in his Pastorals, speaks of Chapman as "The learned shepherd of fair H. hill." Ralph Radclif (1519-1559), the author of over 12 plays, mostly on scriptural subjects, had a school in the dismantled Carmelite monastery at H., where his plays were performed in the old Refectory.

HITTITES. One of the 7 nations of Palestine who were to be dispossessed by the Children of Israel. They were of Mongol race, and from the 15th cent. B.C. were prominent amongst the peoples of Asia. They founded a great empire, which for a time was a dangerous rival to Egypt, and continued till the end of the 8th cent. to wield a formidable power. Their capitals were at Carchemish, and at Kadesh on the Orontes, and their curious carvings and inscriptions in N. Syria and Asia Minor have recently thrown quite a new light on their importance. Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba, who was murdered by David's orders, was a Hittite. In Mariam iv. 7, Herod says that if David had seen Mariamne, "The Hittits [i.e. Hittite] had then felt no deadly sting, Nor Bethsabe had never been a Q." In Peele's Bethsabe ii. 1, Nathan says to David, "Thou hast ta'en this Hethite's wife to thee," i.e. Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite. In i. 3, David speaks of Uriah's "true conversion from a Hethite To an adopted son of Israel."

HIVE. See HYTHE.

HOCKLEY IN THE HOLE. There are two places of the name: (1) A village lying in the Fleet Valley in Lond., N.W. of Clerkenwell Green: the site is marked by Ray St., off Farringdon Rd., N. of Clerkenwell Rd. The name Ray St. dates from 1774, and the further improvements of 1856-7 have altered the place beyond recognition. In the 18th cent. a famous bear-garden was established there (Pope writes: "Fox loves the Senate, Hockley Hole his brother"), but in our period it was still a country village. In Middleton's R. G. iii. 2, Gallipot cries out: "Are my barns and houses yonder at Hockley Hole consumed with fire?" In Brome's Academy iii. 1, Matchil says to Rachel, "Depart at your leisure, you know the way to your old aunt, the apple-woman at Hockley Hole."

(2) Hockcliffe in Beds., on the N.W. Road (Watling St.), between Dunstable and Fenny Stratford. It lies in the valley of a small stream which flows into the Ousel, a tributary of the Ouse, and may have got its name (In the Hole) from a recollection of the London Hockley.

It had an ill name for highway robbery. Middleton, in his Black Book, p. 20, says of his villains: "Sometimes they are clerks of Newmarket Heath; they make many a man stand at Hockley-in-the-Hole." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 5, Sogliardo says of Shift: "He has been the only Bid-stand that ever kept Newmarket, Salisbury Plain, Hockley i' the Hole, Gadshill, and all the high places of any request." In Merlin iii. 1, 127, the Clown says to Merlin, "Our standing-house is Hockley-i'-the-Hole and Layton Buzzard [4 m. to the W.], i.e. we are either footpads or fools. It was also a place of assignments. In Dekker's Northward i. 1, the Chamberlain says, "Your Captains were wont to take their leave of their London pole-cats at Dunstable. The next morning their wenches brought them to Hockley i' the Hole, and so the one for Lond., the other to West Chester." Taylor, Works ii. 238, says, "Every Gill Turntripe must be coached to St. Albans, Bruntwood [i.e. Brentwood in Essex, on the E. road], Hockley in the Hole, Croydon, Windsor, Uxbridge, and many other places."

HOE, PLYMOUTH. The cliff at the head of P. Sound, between Mill Bay and Sutton Pool. At the E. end of it is the Citadel, and a fine promenade now runs along the sea-front. It was here that Drake was playing bowls when the news came of the approach of the Spanish Armada, and his statue commemorates the incident. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 3, Fawcett brings word from Spencer to Bess: "He prays you, when 'tis dark, Meet him o' th' H. near to the new-made fort." Drayton, in Polyolb. i. 482, says of Corin and the giant Gogmagog: "Upon that lofty place at P. called the H. Those mighty wrestlers met."

HOEMONY. See EMONY.

HOG LANE. Now called Worship St., Lond., on the W. side of Norton Folgate, leading to Bunhill Field. Gabriel Spencer (see under HOGSDON) lived in H. L. It is probable that Shakespeare lived for a time in H. L. An entry in Bodleian MS., Aubrey 8, 45, runs: "Mr. Beeston, who knows most of him fr. Mr. Lacy he lived in Shoreditch at Hoglane within 6 doors f. Norton-folgate." The reference seems to be to Shakespeare. See discussion in Cornhill Mag., April 1916, p. 478.

HOGSDON, or HOGSDEN (called in Domesday Book HOCHESTON, and now HOXTON). H. is probably the result of a Hobson-Jobson derivation. A dist. N. of Lond., W. of the Kingsland Rd. and N. of Old Street Rd. Stow describes it in 1598 as "a large st. with houses on both sides." The H. Fields were a favourite place for afternoon jaunts by the Londoners, and they were also used as a drilling-ground for the Trainbands. Here stood a famous tavern, "The Pimlico," the name of which is preserved in Pimlico Walk.

In Oldcastle iii. 2, Acton names "H., Pancrudge [i.e. St. Pancras], Kenzington" as villages where the rebels were waiting. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Stephen says, "Because I dwell at H., I shall keep company with none but the archers of Finsbury! . . ." In Jonson's Alchemist v. 1, Lovewit says he has heard that "Gallants, men and women, and all sorts, tagrag [have] been seen to flock here . . . as to a second H. in days of Pimlico and Eyebright." In v. 3, one of Mammon's projects was to make a ditch of silver about the city "run with cream from H." In Jonson's Devil i. 1, Satan reproaches Pug for his paltry exploits: "Some good ribbie [i.e. old woman] about Kentish Town or H., you would hang now for a witch." T. Heywood's Hogsdon is concerned with such a woman. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Gallipot says, "Come, wenches, come; we're going all to H." In Shirley's Wedding iv. 1, Capt. Landly exclaims: "They point a duel! At H., to show fencing upon cream and cake-bread." In B. & F. Pestle iv. 5, Ralph says, "March out and show your willing minds, By 20 and by 20, To H. or to Newington, Where ale and cakes are plenty." In The Wizard (1640), we have: "You true ladies abhor it, upon one meeting, or over a H. cask, to clap up a match." I suppose the meaning is "on a picnic to H.," but it is not certain. Possibly for "cask" we should read "cake." Ben Jonson fought a duel in H. Fields with Gabriel Spencer, and killed him, in 1598. In Brome's Academy iii. 2, Strigood says that Cash is not "of those that gall their hands with stool-balls or their cat-sticks for white-pots, pudding-pies, stewed prunes, and tansies, to feast their tits at Islington or H." The author of Tarlton's Purgatory, in his preface, tells how, being prevented from going to the theatre by the crowd, "I stopt by dame Anne of Cleeres well, and went by the backside of H." for a country walk. In Nabbes' Bride ii. 4, Raven calls the Cheapside prentices "the learned youth of H." from their habit of frequenting that popular resort. In Jonson's Ev. Man I. i. 1, Wellbred writes: "Do not conceive that antipathy between us and H. as was between Jews and hogs-flesh." In Deloney's Craft i. 12, Haunce says to Florence, "Let me entreat you to go to H., and I will bestow a mess of cream upon you." Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 37 (Arber), says of loose women: "They live a mile from the city like Venus' nuns in a cloister at Newington, Ratliffe, Islington, H., or some such place."

HOGS NORTON. A humorous corruption of Hock Norton, a vill. in Oxfordsh., 24 m. N.W. of Oxford. On the principle of giving a dog a bad name and then hanging him, the village became proverbial for rusticity and boorishness. In Youth ii. 110, Youth says to Humility, "Were thou born at Trumpington and brought up at H. N.?" In Val. Welsh ii. 3, Morgan, the comic Welshman, says, "This fellow was porn at h. N. where pigs play on the organ." Nash, in Strange News K 4, says, "If thou bestowest any courtesy on me and I do not require it, then call me cut, and say I was brought up at Hogge N., where pigs play on the organ." In Randolph's Muses' iii. 1, Banausus proposes to build a cathedral ch., amongst his other wild projects: "It shall be at Hog's N., with a pair of stately organs; more than pity 'twere the pigs should lose their skill for want of practice."

HOLBORN. One of the main thoroughfares of Lond., running W. from the corner of Newgate St. and Old Bailey to Drury Lane. The traditional derivation is from a mythical Oldbourne which was reported to have run down the st. from the Bars to H. Bdge. The name in Domesday Book is Holeburne, and was probably another name for the Fleet river. The erection of the H. Viaduct, opened in 1869, has completely altered the old st. In the 16th cent. it crossed the Fleet river by a stone bdge. (H. Bdge.), then ascended steeply to the corner of Fetter Lane (H. Hill); from this point to the Bars, just W. of Brooke St., it was called H., and thence to Drury Lane, High H. W. of the Bars, which marked the boundary of the liberties of the City, was a block of buildings obstructing the st., called Middle Row: they were removed in 1868. H. was a great lawyers' quarter; on the N. side were Furnival's Inn and Gray's Inn; on the S., Thavies Inn, Barnard's Inn, and Staple Inn. As one of the main entrances to Lond., it had many taverns, amongst which were the George and Blue Boar, the Castle, the Old Bell, the Sun, the Bear, and the Black Bull. At the junction of Snow Hill (or Snor Hill) and H. stood the H. Cross, and by it a conduit, built in 1577 by William Lamb on the site of an older one that had fallen into decay. Prisoners from Newgate and the Tower were taken to Tyburn for execution along H., and H. Hill was nicknamed Heavy Hill in consequence.

In R3 iii. 4, 33, Gloucester says to the Bp. of Ely, "When I was last in H. I saw good strawberries in your garden there." Ely Place, the town house of the Bp. of Ely, was on the N. side of H., E. of Hatton Garden (see ELY PLACE). The Fleet was navigable up to H. Bdge. Jonson's Famous Voyage describes how Sir R. Shelton and Sir C. Haydon "proposed to go to H. in a wherry" from Bridewell Dock. Towards the end of the voyage we have: "Behold where Cerberus, reared on the wall Of H. Height (3 sergeants' heads) looks o'er. They cried out Puss. He told them he was Banks That had so often showed them merry pranks." The sergeants are Sergeants at Law in the Inns of Court on the top of H. Hill, and Banks—or rather the spirit of Banks, transmigrated, with that of his performing horse, into the body of a cat—is, as he has explained earlier, one of the cats that preyed for garbage on the banks of the Fleet. In Hycke, p. 99, Frewyll, having been put into prison for theft, his fellow Imagynacyon "walked through H. . . . And walked up towards St. Gyles in the fields," evidently expecting to see Frewyll led out to execution. In Oldcastle ii. 2, Acton says that Ficket Field is "Behind St. Giles in the field near H." (see FICKET FIELD). Murley retorts: "Newgate, up H., S. Giles in the field, and to Tiborne: an old saw." This is the route of prisoners to execution. In Middleton's Chess ii. 1, the Black Bp. says he undertook to cure Gondomar's fistula "with a High H. halter," and told him that "3 turns at Tyburn" was the only way to mend him. In Glapthorne's Hollander iii. 1, Fortress prescribes the keeping of the rules of the Twiball knights "under penalty of being carried up H. in a cart and at Tiborne executed." In Selimus 2082, Bullithrumbly says, "Marry, that had been the way to preferment, down Holburne, up Tiborne." In Dekker's Northward ii. 1, Horner, who has got round his neck a copper chain, says, "Better men than old Jack Horner have rode up H. with as bad a thing about their necks as this." Criminals wore the rope round their necks on the way to the gallows. In K. K. Knave Dods. vi. 591, Honesty says, "You must bear your sheet and in a cart be towed up H.-Hill." The prisoners going to Tyburn were dressed in a shroud. Taylor, Works i. 101, says, "A beggar seldom rides up H. Hill." In Shirley's Wedding iv. 3, Rawbones says, "Now I'm in the cart riding up H. with a guard of halbardiers." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Chough says to Meg, "Mayst thou be drawn from H. to Hounslow Heath!" H. was commonly chosen for the public carting and flogging of criminals: e.g. Titus Oates was flogged up H. In Jonson's Barthol. ii. 1, Knockem says to Ursula, "What! my little lean Ursula! art thou alive yet?"—"Yes," she replies, "and to amble a-foot to hear you groan out of a cart up the heavy hill."—"Of Holbourne, Ursula, meanest thou so?" says he. In Day's B. Beggar iii., Canby, when urged by Hadland to turn gipsy and go about fortune-telling, says, "That's the smooth footpath up H.; no, Jack." In Brome's City Wit iii. 1, when Crasy tells Crack he is "in the high way of preferment," he replies: "Not the high H. way I hope, Sir." In T. Heywood's Hogsdon v. 4, Young Chartley says, "I took post-horse, Rid out of H., turned by Islington, So hither, wench, to lodge all night with thee" at Hogsdon. In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton asks Moll to meet him "somewhere near H." And she answers: "In Gray's Inn Fields then." These lay just N. of H. In Barry's Ram iii. 3, Will Smallshanks, pursuing Lady Sommerfield's daughter, says, "Let's along Shoe-lane, then straight up H." Shoe Lane runs N. from Fleet St. to H. In World Child, p. 180, Folly says, "In H. was I brought forth and with the courtiers to Westminster I used to wend, for I am a servant of the law." In Middleton's Trick to Catch i. 4, Dampit, the rascally lawyer, calls his clients "motions of Fleet St., visions of H." In iv. 5, Audrey sings to Dampit, "Let the usurer cram him, in interest that excel, There's pits enow to damn him before he comes to hell: In H. some, in Fleet st. some." I am not sure whether she means lawyers or taverns: probably the former. In his R. G. iii. 3, Serjeant Curtlax dwells in H.: Moll says, "This H. is such a wrangling st."; and Trapdoor adds: "That's because lawyers walks to and fro in it."

H. had not a good reputation, especially towards the W. end of it, where the gardens lent themselves to loose behaviour. In Barry's Ram i. 1, Constantia says of her lover: "What makes he here in the skirts of H., so near the field and at a garden-house? he has some punk." In News from Hell, the Cardinal mentions H. as a haunt of whores and thieves. In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 1, persons wishing to learn the gentle art of roaring are advertised to "repair into H. at the sign of the Cheat-Loaf", so called because it was once a baker's shop. In Jonson's Alchemist i. 1, Face picked up Dapper, the lawyer's clerk, "in H., at the Dagger" (q.v.). In the Actors' Remonstrance (1643), we read of "the famous motion of Bell and the Dragon so frequently visited at H. Bdge."

There were several booksellers in H. Glapthorne's Wallenstein was "Imprinted by Tho. Paine for George Hunton and are to be sold at his shop within Turnstile in H. 1640." There were 2 turnstiles in H. leading from Whetstone Park, on the S. side, N. of Lincoln's Inn Fields. Glapthorne's Hollander was "Printed by I. Okes for A. Wilson and are to be sold at her [sic] shop at Grayes-Inn-Gate in H. 1640." Three Ladies was "Printed by Roger Warde dwelling near H. Conduit at the sign of the Talbot. 1584." Three Lords was "Printed by R. Thomas at the Rose and Crown near H. Bdge. 1590." Marlowe's Ed. II was "Imprinted by Richard Bradocke for William Jones dwelling near Holbourne conduit at the sign of the Gunne. 1598." Milkmaids was "Printed by Bernard Alsop for Lawrence Chapman and are to be sold at his shop in H., over against Staple Inne, hard by the Barres. 1620." John Milton lived from 1647 to 1649 in a house on the S. side of High H., between the Turnstiles, opening backward on Lincoln's Inn Fields. In 1660, after his deliverance from the perils of the Restoration, he lived for a short time on the N. side of H., near Red Lion Sq.

HOLDERNESS. A dist. in E. Riding, Yorks., in the extreme S.E. of the county, N. of the estuary of the Humber. Hall, in Satires v. 1, 65, speaks of "A starved tenement, such as I guess Stands straggling in the wastes of H." Being now drained, it is a very fertile dist. and well adapted for farming.

HOLE. In the Lond. Counters the prisoners were accommodated according to their ability to pay. The Master's side was the best and most expensive; then came the Knights' ward, the two-penny ward, and finally the H., which was the cheapest and worst. It was also used of the worst quarters in other prisons. From Enforced Marriage we learn that prisoners in the H. had straw mattresses. In The Puritan iii. 4, Puttock says of Pybord: "If e'er we clutch him again, the Counter shall charm him." And Ravenshaw adds: "The H. shall rot him." In Walks of Hogsdon (1657), there is a sort of thieves' litany: "Next from the stocks, the H., and Little-Ease, Libera nos, Domine." In T. Heywood's Woman Killed iv. 1, Susan, telling old Mountford of the arrest of Sir Charles, says, "He is denied the freedom of the prison, And in the H. is laid with men condemned." In Eastward v. 2, Wolf, the Keeper of the Counter, describes the penitence of his prisoners: "Mr. Quicksilver would be i' the H. if we would let him." In Ford's Warbeck ii. 3, Heron says, rather than let the Scots get all the glory of helping Warbeck, "Let me live first a bankrupt and die in the lousy H. of hunger." In Killigrew's Parson iv. 2, Wild says, "Make his mittimus to the h. at Newgate." In T. Heywood's F. M. Exch. i., Cripple asks Bowdler, "Didst thou lie in the Knights' ward or on the Master's side?" "Neither," says he. "Where then," rejoins the Cripple, "in the H.?" In Cooke's Greene's Quoque, p. 563, Spendall, being committed to prison, asks, "What ward should I remove in?" Holdfast replies: "Why, to the twopenny ward; it's the likeliest to hold out with your means; or, if you will, you may go into the h., and there you may feed for nothing." Spendall rejoins, "Aye, out of the alms-basket." In Webster's A. & Virginia iii. 4, the Clown says, "The Lord Appius hath committed her to ward, and it is thought she shall neither lie on the knight side, nor in the two-penny ward; if he may have his will of her, he means to put her in the h." A double entendre is intended. Middleton, in Black Book (1604), p. 8, says of certain fools: "They are dark . . . As is the H. at Newgate."

HOLLAND (D.=Dutch, Hr.=Hollander). The country in N.W. Europe, on the North Sea, stretching from the mouth of the Scheldt to the mouth of the Ems, with Belgium on the S. and Germany on the E. The people belong to the Low German division of the Teutonic family, and the language is Low D. Rome partially conquered the country in the 1st cent. A.D. In the 3rd cent. the Franks came, and, after a long struggle between them and the Saxons, H. became part of the Frankish Empire under Charlemagne. During the 9th and 10th cents. the Northmen harried the land, with the result that the people congregated into cities for safety and laid the foundations of the future greatness of such places as Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague. From the 11th to the 14th cent. H. was governed by a succession of counts, in nominal dependence on the Empire. Becoming part of the Burgundian territory, it passed eventually to Don Carlos of Spain (the Emperor Charles V), and from him it passed to his son Philip of Spain. H. accepted the principles of the Protestants: Philip was a devoted son of the Roman Ch. He determined to make H. conform to the Romish Ch., and so began the long struggle in which the D. of Alva represented the Spanish K. It resulted in the formation of the United Provinces under William the Silent in 1576. In the course of this struggle many Englishmen went to H. to assist the D. against the common enemy, Philip: amongst them Sir Philip Sidney, who was killed at Zutphen, and the Earl of Leicester. The conflict continued and was merged into the 30 Years' War. In 1648 Spain finally relinquished her claims, and the United Provinces were recognized as free and independent. The policy of Charles II led to war between the English and the D., but the Revolution of 1688 completely changed the position of affairs and made William of Orange K. of England. In 1814 H. and Belgium were united under William I, K. of the Netherlands, but in 1831 Belgium seceded and established itself as a separate kingdom.

Geographical and General Allusions. In Dekker's Northward iv. 2, Capt. Jenkins speaks of "all the Low Countries in Christendom, as H. and Zealand and Netherland and Cleveland too." Fuller, Holy State (1642) iii. 4, says, "H. is all Europe in an Amsterdam-print, for Minerva, Mars, and Mercury—learning, war, and traffic."

Allusions to the History of Holland. In H6 C. iv. 8, 2, Warwick tells that "Edward from Belgia With hasty Germans and blunt Hrs. Hath passed in safety through the narrow seas." In 1470 Edward had fled for refuge to the Flemish court of Charles the Bold, who had married his sister Margaret, and with his connivance he gathered a body of men and landed at Ravenspur in 1471. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, one of the items of news is "One Cornelius-son hath made the Hrs. an invisible eel to swim the haven at Dunkirk and sink all the shipping there." This was in 1625, when war was going on between the D. and Spinola: the Spaniards held Dunkirk and their fleet was assembled there. This is a curious anticipation of submarines. In Davenant's Wits v. 3, Thwack tells of an ape "led captive by the Hr. because he came aloft for Spain and would not for the States." There are many allusions to apes that were trained to show sympathy with Protestantism and dislike to the Pope in this way. This particular ape was, however, of an opposite mind. In Marmion's Companion ii. 1, Spruce boasts, "I serve your women as the Hrs. do by some towns they get: when they have won them they slight [i.e. dismantle] them straight." In Glapthorne's Wit v. 1, Busie says, "Let's drink a health to H. and the mad boys that trail the puissant pike there." In Davenant's Plymouth iii. 1, Trifle says, "We have peppered the H. hulks; I saw 3 of 'em sink." The reference is to the D. privateers, between which and the English merchants there was constant friction. So, in Shirley's Riches iii., the Soldier asks Riches, "Were you never taken by the Hr.?" In Devonshire ii. 1, the Soldier speaks of the good service of the Hrs. There were 16 sail of the Hrs. in the attack on Puntal. In Underwit iii. 3, Engine tells of a man who "went to sea in a Hr. and was taken by the Dunkirke." In Brome's Ct. Beggar i. 1, Gabriel talks of a treasure "of deeper value than all the Hrs. have waited for these 7 years out of the Spanish plate fleets." In Webster's Northward iv. 2, Bellamont says he will fight "like a Hr. against a Dunkirk." In the above 5 quotations Hr. means a D. man-of-war. Sidney, in Astrophel (1581) xxx. 7, says, "H.'s hearts, now so good towns be lost, Trust in the shade of pleasing Orange tree," i.e. of William the Silent, who was Prince of Orange. Hall, in Characters (s.v. The Busie-bodie), represents the Busybody as knowing "whether H. will have peace and on what conditions." In B. & F. Cure i. 1, Lamoral speaks of "H., with those Low Provinces that hold out Against the arch-duke." The date is the reign of Philip II of Spain. The Protestantism of H. was of an extreme Puritan type, and was not at all popular with the English, at any rate with those that frequented the playhouses. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Subtle speaks to Tribulation and Ananias, whose names declare their Puritan character, of "the Hrs., your friends."

The Dutch were great Traders and Merchants. In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Subtle promises to make of pewter "as good D. dollars As any are in H." In Davenant's

Wits iv., Thwack says, "Our French and Deal wines are poisoned so with brimstone by the Hrs. that they will only serve for medicine." In Webster's Law Case i. 1, Romelio says, "The Hrs. scarce trade More generally than I." In iv. 2, reference is made to the E. Indian trade of H: "How! go to the E. Indies? and so many Hrs. gone to fetch sauce for their pickled herrings! Some have been peppered there too lately." The allusion is to the massacre of the English by the D. in Amboyna, Feb. 1622. Burton, A. M. iii. 3, 1, 2, says, "H. [hath not so many] mariners as Italy alone hath jealous husbands."

H. was famous for its linen, which was called first H cloth and then H. In H4 A. iii. 3, 82, when Falstaff declares that the shirts the Hostess had bought for him were "dowlas, filthy dowlas": she retorts, "Now, as I am a true woman, h. of 8s. an ell." In H4 B. ii. 2, 26, Prince Hal says punningly to Poins about his lack of shirts, "The rest of thy low countries have made a shift [another pun] to eat up thy h." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iv. 1, Bryan says, "I preddee let me see some hollen to make linen shirts." In Tomkis' Albumazar ii. 6, Pandolo orders his daughter to "lay out the fairest H. sheets" to welcome his mistress. In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo, in an inventory of fine clothes, mentions "the ruff and cuffs of H." In Three Lords, Dods., vi. 484, Simplicity asks, "What do you lack? fine lockram, fine canvas, or fine H. cloth?" In Glapthorne's Wit iii. 1, Thorowgood asks, "Would'st trust me for 40 ells of H.?" In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Franklin speaks of "H., where the finest linen's made." In Goosecap v. 1, Rudesby says to Hippolita, "If the sun of thy beauty do not whiten me like a shipyard's h., I am a Jew to my Creator." In Wit Woman 1070, Balia says, "If he have e'er an odd piece of ordinary shepherd's H., I pray you I may have a pennyworth in it." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Mrs. Openwork says to her husband, "Keep you your yard to measure Shepherd's h." It is contrasted with "noble women's linen." In Ev. Wom. i. iv. 1, the Hostess says, "I shall go to court attired like an old dairy woman, a ruff h. of 8 groats, 3 inches deep, of the old cut." In Ford's Queen iii. 1771, Pynto tells of a drunken man who "lay all night in pure h. in's stockings and shoes." Gosson, in Pleasant Quips, speaks of "These H. smocks as white as snow."

H. has always had a high reputation for butter and cheese. In Mayne's Match ii. 1, Dorcas laments that "the price of H. cheese is very much increased," so that the "brethren" are feeling the strain. In More iii. 2, Randal, disguised as Sir Thomas, asks Erasmus, "I pray you, Erasmus, how long will the H. cheese in your country keep without maggots?" In Middleton's Quarrel v. 1, Russell "will believe the sun is made of brass"—and Chough interpolates, "And the moon of a H. cheese"—"rather than this impossibility." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, Forbosco proposes to divide the year "as a chandler with his compass makes a geometric proportion of the H. cheese he retails by stivers." In Greene's Quip (p. 230), he speaks of a beard "trimd with Christ's cut, round like the half of a H. cheese." In Glapthorne's Wit i. 1, Tristram says, "You make the ignorant believe by Logick the moon's made of a H. cheese." In Shirley's Imposture v. 1, Bertoldi says, "Would I were a mite in a H. cheese now!" Nash, in Pierce B. 2, satirizes the would-be politician who lives "all the year long with salt butter and H. cheese in his chamber." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "Rats going to the assault of a H. cheese could not more valiantly lay about them."

H. had a large fishing industry in the North Sea, and there was much jealousy between the D. and English fishermen. In Jonson's Staple iii. 1, the news from the Netherlands has been brought by "eel-boats out of H." In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Poppingate says, "I am come as hot from the sea as a Hr. from herring-fishing." The drunkenness of the D. was proverbial. In Oth. ii. 3, 80, Iago says that in drinking "your swagbellied Hr. is nothing to your English. He gives your Hr. a vomit ere the next pottle can be filled." In B. & F. Rule a Wife i. 5, Castro says, "I scorn the Hrs.: they are my drunkards." The D. are represented as great eaters of bacon, butter, and other greasy foods. In Shirley's Ball v. 1, Freshwater, in the description of his adventures in foreign parts, says, "I caught a surfeit of boar in H." See also DUTCH, FLANDERS, LOW COUNTRIES, and NETHERLANDS.

HOLLAND. One of the 3 old divisions of Lincs., containing most of the Fen country, in the S. and S.E. of the county. In Brome's Northern i. 2, Widgin says, "Our ancestors flew out of H. in Lincs. to prevent persecution." Spenser, F. Q. iv. 11, 35, tells of an old prophecy that the Welland "shall drown all H. with his excrement."

HOLLAND HOUSE. A mansion in Kensington in H. Park, lying N. of Kensington Rd., between H. Walk and Addison Rd. It was built in 1607 for Sir Walter Cope. By his daughter's marriage to Henry Rich, created Earl of H. in 1622, it passed into the Rich family. The Earl was beheaded in 1649, but his house was restored to his widow. In Wright's Historia Histrionica, we read: "In Oliver's time the players used to act privately 3 or 4 miles out of town, now here, now there; sometimes in noblemen's houses, in particular H. H. at Kensington."

HOLLAND'S LEAGUER. A notorious house of ill-fame in Southwark, at the corner of Holland St. and Bankside, just E. of where Blackfriars Bdge. now spans the river. It was originally an old moated manor-house, but fell to low uses. Leaguer is used in the sense of a military camp, the women being supposed to be the soldiers. In Nabbes' Tottenham iv. 4, the Tapster says of the trick Ballamie is playing: "Here's a Tottenham Court project translated over the water from Holland." Marmion's Leaguer takes its name from this place, and the scene is partly laid there. In iv. 2, one of the women says, "Some term us the L.;" and it is so called throughout the play. In Glapthorne's Hollander i. 1, Poppingate boasts, "None such soldier had H. L."

HOLLOWAY. A dist. in N. London, stretching along the H. Rd. from Highbury to Highgate. As it was on the Gt. North Rd., it had many taverns and houses of entertainment, amongst them the famous Mother Redcap Tavern, the sign of which still remains. In Jack Drum i. 1, the Morrice dancers sing, "Let us be seen, On Hygate-greene, To dance for the honour of H." In Jonson's Tub ii. 1, Hilts says, "That I would fain zee, quoth the blind George of H." In Pardoner, Hazlitt, i. 232, we have: "Marry that I would see, quod blind Hew."

HOLMBY HOUSE. A fine mansion in Northants., 6 m. N.W. of Northampton. It was built by Sir Christopher Hatton, and demolished by order of the Commonwealth Parliament. Here Charles I was seized by Cornet Joyce on June 4th, 1647. It was only a mile or two N. of Althorp, where Jonson's Masque, The Satyr, was performed in 1603 before the Q. on her way from Scotland to Lond. In the course of the Masque Nobody sings,

"There's none of these dancers doth hope to come by wealth to build another H." There may be a humorous allusion intended to the reputation Sir Christopher had as a dancer, and a suggestion that he got the money to build H. for that reason. There were 2 giants in front of the house, which were destroyed by Joyce when he arrested the K. Corbett, in Iter. Boreale, says, "O you that do Guildhall and Holmeby keep, You are good giants and partake no shame With those 2 worthless trunks of Nottingham."

HOLMEDON HILL. One of the Cheviot Hills on the boundary of Northumberland, near to Wooler. It was here that Percy defeated the Scots on 14 Sept. 1402. It was really 3 months later than Glendower's defeat of Mortimer, though Shakespeare, in H4 A. i. 1, makes them contemporaneous. In line 55 Westmoreland announces: "On Holy-Rood day Young Harry Percy and brave Archibald, That ever valiant and approved Scot, At H. met," and Sir Walter Blunt saw 10,000 Scots "balked in their own blood on H.'s plains." In i. 3, 24, Northumberland speaks of the "prisoners Which Harry Percy here at H. took." In v. 3, 14, Hotspur exclaims, "O Douglas, hadst thou fought at H. thus, I never had triumphed upon a Scot."

HOLMHURST HILL. The hill on which St. Albans is built (see ST. ALBANS). In W. Rowley's Shoemaker v. 2, 187, Crispin says, "A beauteous monastery On H. H. where Albon lost his head Offa shall build." In iv. 2, 28, it is called Holnurst H.

HOLY GHOST. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's churchyard. The sign would doubtless be a dove in flight. Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis was "Imprinted at Lond. for William Leake dwelling at the sign of the H. G. in Paule's Church yard. 1602."

HOLY LAMB. A bookseller's sign in St. Paul's Churchyard. Wily Beguiled was "Printed by H. L. for Clement Knight and are to be sold at his shop in Paules Churchyard at the sign of the H. L. 1606." In Dekker's Babylon, p. 215, Plain Dealing says that Truth "dwells at the sign of the H. L."

HOLY LAND. W. Palestine, and particularly Judæa, as being the scene of our Lord's crucifixion and resurrection. The earliest example of its use in English in N.E.D. is in Robert of Gloucester, 1297. In R2 v. 6, 49, Bolingbroke says, "I'll make a voyage to the H. L. To wash this blood off from my guilty hand." In H4 B. iii. 1, 108, the K. says, "We would, dear Lords, unto the H. L." In iv. 5, 211, the K. explains that he had a purpose "To lead out many to the H. L. Lest rest and lying still might make them look Too near unto my state." In Greene's Friar iv., Elinor speaks of "Edward's courageous resolution Done at the H. L. 'fore Damas walls." As a matter of fact, Edward was never at Damascus. In Massinger's Renegado v. 1, Francisco speaks of "Knights that in the H. L. Fought for the freedom of Jerusalem." In Bristowe A3, Harbert advises Sentloe, "Go to brave Richd. in the H. L." In Jonson's Magnetic i. 1, the Boy states as one of the constituents of a successful play "the knight to travel between the acts and do wonders in the H. L. or elsewhere." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Wincott's wife says to Geraldine, "My husband hath took much pleasure in your strange discourse about Jerusalem and the H. L." In Webster's Law Case ii. 3, Leonora says, "I have some earth Brought from the H. L., right sovereign To staunch blood." Milton, P. L. iii. 536, speaks of "Beersaba, where the H. L. Borders on Egypt."

HOLYWELL STREET

HOLYWELL STREET. Shoreditch, Lond., continuing Bishopsgate St. N. It is now called High St. Richd. Burbage, the actor, lived and died in H. St., and in the immediate neighbourhood were the Theatre and The Curtain, q.v.

HONEY LANE. Lond., off Cheapside, opposite Bow Ch. It was named, like Bread St., Milk St., Fish St., etc., from the commodity sold there. Honey was a much more important article of diet before the introduction of cane-sugar. In Jonson's Christmas, Father Christmas in a song, introduces the masquers to his audience, one of them "With orange on head And his gingerbread, Clem Waspe of H. L.'tis."

HONORÉ, RUE SAINT. One of the principal sts. in Paris, running E. and W. from the Rue Royale to the Rue des Halles, N. of, and parallel to, the Rue de Rivoli. In Davenant's Rutland, p. 223, the Londoner, in his critical account of Paris, says, "Lae rue St. Antoine, St. H., and St. Denis are large enough for the vista." Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, r88 (1595), says of the sts. of Paris: "Among them the fairest is that of St. Dennis, the 2nd St. H., the 3rd St. Antoine, and the 4th St. Martine."

HOOP. The sign of a tavern in Plymouth. In Davenant's Plymouth i. 1, Seawit says, "Your hostesses daughter at the H. desired I would speak with you."

HOPE THEATRE. On the Bankside, Southwark. It was originally a bear-garden, but was rebuilt as a combined playhouse and baiting-ring by Philip Henslowe and Jacob Meade in 1613. It stood between the Bankside and Maiden Lane, to the W. of Bear Garden Alley. Jonson's Barthol. was produced here in 1614. The house fell out of use as a playhouse in 1616, partly because the playgoers found the smell of the animals offensive, but continued to be used for bear-baiting until 1682. In Jonson's Barthol., Ind., the scrivener reads: "Articles of agreement between the spectators or hearers at the H. on the Bankside in the county of Surrey and the author of Bartholomew Fair." Later the author says: "Though the Fair be not kept in the same region that some here perhaps would have it, yet think that therein the author hath observed a special decorum, the place being as dirty as Smithfield and as stinking every whit."

HOREB. The name used in Deuteronomy for the mtn. where the Law was given to Moses. It is a mtn., or range of mtns., in the Sinaitic Peninsula: the actual peak is now generally identified with Ras Sufsafah. In Jack Drum i. 122, Sir Edward says, "I care not to be like the H. calf, One day adored, the next pashed all in pieces" (see Exodus xxxix). In Conf. Cons. i. 2, Philologus says, "Elias the Tishbite for fear of Jezebel did fly to H." (see I Kings xix). Milton, P. L. i. 7, invokes the Heavenly Muse "that on the secret top Of Oreb, or of Sinai, didst inspire That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed," i.e. Moses.

HORN (more fully the H. ON THE HOOP) A tavern in Fleet St., on the site now occupied by Anderton's Hotel (Nos. 162-165). The sign has been traced back to 1385, when the house belonged to John Phippe, a currier; the next owner was Thomas Atte Haye, who combined the businesses of goldsmith and brewer. In T. Heywood's Lucrece ii. 5, Valerius, in his list of the taverns of Rome (i.e. Lond.), sings: "The townsman to the H." In Underwit ii. 2, Thomas is sent to find out the lawyer Sackbury, and reports: "Inquiring at the H. tavern, I heard he had been there." Middleton, in

HOSIER LANE

Hubburt (1604), p. 67, says, "They were to dine together at the H. in Fleet St., being a house where their lawyer resorted." It was, of course, near the lawyers' quarters in the Temple. On p. 77 the lawyer advises the young would-be gallant that "his eating must be in some famous tavern, as the H., the Mitre, or the Mermaid."

HORN ALLEY. A lane in Lond. off the E. side of Aldersgate St., about midway, now Edmund Pl. In Alimony i. 2, Timon says of the play: "My scene is H. A., the name it bears is Lady Alimony." No doubt the locality was chosen for the sake of the double entendre on "horns," which the Elizabethans seem to have thought very funny.

HORNCHURCH. A vill. in Essex on Bowles Brook, 19 m. S.W. of Chelmsford. In Nash's Prognostication, he predicts: "If the parson of Hornechurch in Essex take not heed, there may hap to prove this year some cuckolds in his parish." This is the horn joke again.

HORN'S ORDINARY. An eating-house in Lond., but it is possible that it is a fictitious name for a brothel, with the usual Elizabethan play on the word horn. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iv. 2, Carlo says of Sogliardo: "He's a leiger at H. O. yonder."

HORONAIM. A city of ancient Moab, E. of the Jordan. Its site has not been certainly determined. Milton, P. L. i. 409, says that Chemosh was worshipped "in Hesebon And H., Seon's realm."

HORSE-FOOT-FOUNT, HORSE-POND. See HIPPOCRENE.

HORSELYDOWN. A dist. in Southwark extending from the E. end of Tooley St. to Dockhead. The H. stairs are just at the foot of the Tower Bdge. A fair used to be held here, of which there is a painting at Hatfield House by Hofnagle. Fair St. still preserves its memory. In Humorous Lovers (1617), one of the characters says, "I'll set up my bills that the gamesters of Lond., H., Southwark, and Newmarket may come in and bait the bear here before the ladies."

HORSE POOL. A pond on the N.W. side of W. Smithfield, "where the inhabitants of that part of the City did water their horses." In Jonson's Barthol. ii. 1, Quarulous, proposing to duck Dame Ursula, says, "Do you think there may be a fine cucking-stool in the Fair to be purchased? one large enough, I mean. I know there is a pond of capacity for her."

HORSE-SHOE TAVERN. A tavern in Lond. The sign was a common one: there was one on Tower Hill and another in Drury Lane. In Marmion's Companion i. 4, Careless says, "Entreat him to meet me at the H. tavern at dinner; I love that house for the sign's sake, 'tis the very print of the shoe that Pegasus wore when he broke up Helicon with his hoof." The fountain of Hippocrene on Helicon was said to have sprung from the hoof print of Pegasus. There was also a H. Tavern at Daventry, to the host of which—Mr. Andrew Hilton—Taylor dedicated his Scourge of Baseness.

HORTON. Vill. in S. Bucks., near Windsor, abt. 20 m. W. of Lond. Here John Milton lived, in his father's house, from 1632 to 1638 and wrote most of his earlier poems.

HOSIER LANE. In Lond., running from W. Smithfield to King St. Stow describes it as "not over well built or inhabited, having all old timber houses"; and says that during Bartholomew Fair all the houses were made public "for tippling and lewd sort of people." In

HOSPITAL

Barry's Ram v. 2, Smallshanks informs Throate that the supposed heiress whom he has married is "the wench I kept in H.-L."

HOSPITAL. See CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

HOSTIA. See OSTIA.

HOTHERSFIELD (= HUDDERSFIELD). A town in W. Riding, Yorks. The name is still locally pronounced Huthersfield. In Downfall Huntingdon i. 3, Little John says, "At Rowford, Sowtham, Wortley, H. Of all your cattle money shall be made And I at Mansfield will attend your coming."

HOUND. A tavern in Waltham mentioned in one of Tarlton's Jests.

HOUNDSDITCH. St. in Lond. running N.W. along the line of the old City moat from Aldgate to Bishopsgate. The name was originally applied to the whole extent of the City moat, but became confined in the 16th cent. to this section of it. It probably got its name from the City Hounds, which were kept in kennels there. The moat was filled in early in the 16th cent. and the st. was paved in 1503. It was mainly occupied by brokers, i.e. old clothes dealers, of whom many are still to be found there, though the centre of the trade has shifted east to Petticoat Lane, now more respectable under the title of Middlesex St. In Nabbes' C. Garden ii. 2, Warrant says to Spruce, "Thou buy'st thy laundry in Long-Lane or H." In Dekker's Seven Sins, Cruelty, "spying the brokers of H., he stops, calling them all his dearest sons." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 2, Brain, being asked where he got his coat, says, "Of a H. man, Sir, one of the devil's near kinsmen, a broker." Dekker, in Knight's Conjuring (1607), speaks of "all the brokers in Long Lane, H., or elsewhere." Rowland, in Liking of Humours (1611), calls H. "the brokers' Row." Middleton, in Black Book, p. 16, says, "Let brokers become honest and remove to heaven out of H." Taylor, in Works iii. 7, says, "Was H. H. called, can any tell, Before the brokers in that street did dwell? No, sure it was not, it hath got that name from them." In ii. 3, he says, "I come from H., Long Lane, and from Bridewell, Where all that have lived ill have all not died well." In Middleton's No Wit i. 1, Weatherwise exclaims: "Some lousy fiddler run away with your daughter! May Clerkenwell have the first cut of her, and H. pick her bones!" In W. Rowley's Match Mid. iv. 1, Crack writes: "I Randal Crack of Carmarden, do love thee Mary Ploodhounds of H., dwelling near Aldgate and Bishopsgate." In Dekker's Devil's Last Will, one item runs: "My will is that all the brokers in Long-lane be sent to me with all speed possible; and for their brethren (the rest of their Jewish tribe in the synagogue of H.) let them be assured they shall not be forgotten." In his Strange Horse-race (1613), Dekker says, "The Brokers went both away like a couple of hounds in astring together, and lie buried at the grate which receives the common sewer in the midst of H." In T. Heywood's Ed. IVA. 21, Spicing, he and his rebels having been driven back from Bishopsgate, says, "We are all like to feed hogs in H." See also DOGSNITCH.

HOUNSLOW. A town on the great Western coach road in Middlesex, 11 m. W. of Lond. Owing to its position it had many excellent taverns for the accommodation of travellers. Adjoining the town is the Heath, which was notorious for the frequency of its highway robberies. There appears to have been a sword factory on the Heath: it has, however, given place to a large manufactory of gunpowder. In Cromwell iv. 2, after Cromwell's exaltation, Seely and his wife wait upon him; and Cromwell exclaims: "What men are these? My honest Host of H. and his wife," and proceeds to help them. In Jonson's Ev. Man O. iii. 1, Shift undertakes to teach Sogliardo the Whiffe, which consists in taking 3 whiffs of tobacco, drinking 3 cups of Canary, and then riding from Lond. to puff out 1 whiff "at H., a 2nd at Staines, and a 3rd at Bagshot." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Chough prays that Meg may "be drawn from Holborn to H. Heath," where executed felons were often hung in chains. It was near enough to Lond. for an afternoon's excursion. In Jonson's New Inn iv. 3, Pinnacia tells how her lover would hire a coach-and-four and run "to Rumford, Croydon, H. or Barnet, the next bawdy road," with her. In Underwit i. 1, Underwit has "an old fox blade made at H. heath."

HULL. The third largest spt. in England, at the mouth of the Humber, in E. Riding, Yorks., 34 m. S.E. of York. It received its charter as a free borough from Edward I (who gave it the name of Kingston-on-Hull) in 1299, and from that time it rapidly grew in importance. Chaucer's Shipman (C. T. A. 404) was unrivalled in seamanship "from Hulle to Cartage." Barclay, in Ship of Fools (1517), begins: "Where may we best argue (5) At Lyn or else at Hulle? To us may no haven in England be denyed." In Beguiled (Dods., ix. 308), Robin Goodfellow professes, "By birth I am a boat-wright's son of H." In Massinger's New Way i. 3, Order says, "There came not 6 days since, from H., a pipe Of rich Canary." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 13, the men of Nottingham have petitioned the Q. to have the Trent made "navigable to Gainsborough, So to Boston, Kingston, Humber, and H." The author forgot that H. and Kingston are the same place. H. was noted for its ale, which was known as H. cheese. Taylor, in York for my Money, says, "There I got a cantle of H. cheese," and explains that H. cheese is composed of malt and water, and is cousin german to the mightiest ale in England. Taylor, in Works ii. 12, says, "From H., from Halifax, from Hell, 'tis thus, From all these 3 good Lord deliver us." This is a familiar Yorkshire proverb, and is called the Thieves' Litany. The magistrates of Hull were noted for their severity in dealing with thieves and vagabonds. In allusion to this, Nash, in Lenten (p. 324), says to the friars who want K. Herring, "Let them seek him, and neither in H., Hell, nor Halifax." See also HALIFAX.

HUMBER. The estuary between Yorks. and Lincs. which receives the waters of the Ouse and Trent. In Nobody 255, Vigenius says, "Thus we'll divide the land; all beyond Trent and H. shall suffice one moiety." In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 5, Belinus calls it "curl-pated H., Neptune's heir." In Sampson's Vow v. 3, 13, the men of Nottingham are reported to have petitioned that the Trent should be made "navigable to Gainsborough, So to Boston, Kingston, H., and Hull." The river is said to have taken its name from H., the Hunnish chief, who drowned himself there after his defeat by Lochrine. The story is told in Lochrine iv. 4, and by Spenser in F. Q. ii. 10, 16. Milton, in Vacation Exercise 99, speaks of "H. loud that keeps the Scythian's name." Spenser, in the river list in F. Q. iv. 11, 30, calls it "storming H."

HUNGARY (Hn. = Hungarian). In E. Europe, wedged in between Russia, Poland, Austria, and the Balkan provinces. It corresponds roughly to the Roman provinces of Pannonia and Dacia. The Romans abandoned it to the Goths in A.D. 274. It was successively taken possession of by the Huns under Attila, and the Lombards under Alboinus, or Albovine, the hero of Davenant's play Albovine, about 530. At the close of the 9th cent. the Magyars, a Mongolian people, crossed the Carpathians and overran Hungary and Transylvania, where they long formed the ruling caste. It was ruled by Magyar kings from Stephen the Saint (1000) to the death of Andrew III in 1301. Then Wencislaus usurped the throne and founded a dynasty which lasted till 1527, when Hungary fell into the hands of the House of Hapsburg. The Turks, after the capture of Constantinople in 1453, attacked H., and ultimately Solymán the Magnificent utterly defeated the Hns. at the famous battle of Mohacs in 1526. The sultans held the greater part of the country till they were finally expelled in 1686. The Crown of H. remained in the Hapsburg family, and, except during the long reign of Maria Theresa, was worn by the reigning Emperor until the end of the late war, when the "Dual Monarchy" was broken up. In Davenant's Albovine ii. 1, Grimold says to Albovine, "Since my last services in H. you remain in my tally 6000 ducats." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Uribassa announces to the Sultan, "K. Sigismund hath brought from Christendom More than his camp of stout Hns. That . . . Will hazard that we might with surety hold." Sigismund, who reigned from 1386 to 1437, was defeated by the Turks at Nicopolis in 1396. In Whetstone's Promos B. ii. 2, Corvinus is described as "the high and mighty k. of Hungaria and Bernia." The date is indeterminate, but probably Matthias Corvinus is the K. intended. In Selimus 540, Selim I, speaking of Samandria, says, "Here the Hn. with his bloody cross Deals blows about to win Belgrade again." Selim reigned 1512 to 1520. Earle, in Microcosmography lii., says a templar is as proud of repulsing a catchpole "as an Hn. of killing a Turk." In Middleton's R. G. v. 1, Trapdoor claims to have served "in H. against the Turk at the siege of Belgrade." So, in Jonson's Ev. Man I. ii. 2, Brainworm says he has served "in all the late wars in Hungaria." In Meas. i. 2, 1, Lucio says, "If the duke [of Vienna] with the other dukes come not to composition with the K. of H., why then all the dukes fall upon the K." To which a Gentleman replies: "Heaven grant us its peace, but not the K. of H.'s." The date of the play is quite indefinite. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein i. 2, the Emperor says, "Despatch a trusty messenger unto the K. of H." This was Ferdinand II. In Webster's White Devil v. 1, Lodovico and Gasparo, the conspirators, are disguised as "2 noblemen of H." who had served against the Turk at Malta and had then joined the order of the Capuchins in Padua. In Chapman's Alphonsus i. 1, 143, Alphonsus says that he has "rained a golden shower Of bright Hn. ducats and crusadoes Into the private coffers of the Bp.," i.e. money extorted from H.

Hn. is used with a punning reference to "hungry," to mean a hungry, needy fellow. In M. W. W. i. 3, 22, Pistol addresses Bardolph, "O base Hn. wight! wilt thou the spigot wield?" In Merry Devil i. 4, the Host says, "I have knights and colonels at my house and must tend the Hns." i.e. hungry fellows. In Dekker's Westward v. 2, Sir Gosling says to the musicians, "Play, you lousy Hns.!" In Shirley's St. Patrick v. 1, Rodomant calls 2 soldiers whom he discovers eating their dinner "my brace of Hns." In Merry Devil, p. 251, Blague says to his companions, "Come, ye Hn. pilchers, we are once more come under the Zona Torrida of the forest." Dekker, in News from Hell, says of a miser: "The lean jade Hn. would not lay out a penny pot of sack for himself." Dekker uses the word in this sense very often in his prose writings. In Marmion's Leaguer iii. 2, Trimalchio says, "I am in mine appetite an Hn." Hall, in Satires v. 2, says of the objects of his satire they are "So sharp and meagre that who should them see Would swear they lately came from H." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 1, Appetitus says, "Give me no sceptre but a fat capon's leg, to shew that I am the great K. of H.," i.e. the K. of hungry fellows. Lupton, in London Carbonadoed (1632) iii. 12, says, "The middle ile [of St. Paul's] is much frequented at noone with a company of Hns., not walking so much for recreation, as neede." In Gascoigne's Government i. 5, Eccho says to the procuress Pandarina, "Why, were you not mother of the maids unto the Q. of H.?" Maximilian was K. of H. at the date of the play, but I can find no point in the allusion, unless Eccho means "the Q. of the Hns." in the slang sense noted above. The princess Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander II, a king of H. in the 13th cent., was canonized, and her day was observed on Nov. 19th. In order to flatter Q. Elizabeth, this day was celebrated in her honour by joustings and other festivities. Possibly, therefore, in this passage the Q. of H. means Elizabeth of England. In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Luke, reproaching the women for their love of foreign fashions, speaks of "your Hungerland bands and Spanish quellio ruffs." I suppose by Hungerland he means Hungary. In Dekker's Match Me ii., Bilbo says, "I have excellent Hn. shag bands for ladies": shag being a kind of rough velvet. The scene of Massinger's Picture is laid in H. Hn. horses are described by Blundeville as having great hooked heads and long manes and tails; their pace was a hard trot. Fynes Moryson, in Itinerary i. 2, 174 (1594), records the buying of a Hn. horse in Padua for 20 crowns.

HUNGERFORD. A town on the borders of Berks. and Wilts. on the Kennet, 60 m. W. of Lond. It gives their title to the Barons of H. In H6 A. i. 1, 146, Lord H. is reported as having been taken prisoner by the French. This was Sir Walter H., who was created Baron in 1422. In H6 C. iv. 1, 48, Clarence says, "Lord Hastings well deserves To have the heir of the Lord H." Edward Hastings, son of the William Hastings of R3, married Mary, the daughter of Thomas, 4th Baron H., and in this way the Baronage came into the Hastings family. It is now held by the Earl of Loudon (Abney-Hastings.) In the passage from Massinger's Madam quoted in preceding entry, Gifford reads: "Hungerford bands." "Hungerland" is Symons' emendation required by the context.

HUNGERLAND. See HUNGARY.

HUNS. A tribe who first appear from the lands N. of the Caspian in A.D. 372. They reached their highest fame in the 5th cent. under the famous Attila. They finally settled, partly in Great Bulgaria in S. Russia, and partly in White Bulgaria on the Danube. In Fisher's Fuinus ii. 8, there is a song in which the lines occur: "Locrinus' eldest son Did drown the furious H." The legend of these wars between Locrine and the H., or Scythians, is told in the play of Locrine: it is needless to say that they are entirely unhistorical. Rabelais, Gargantua i. 54, speaks of men "worse than the H. or Ostrogoths."

HUNTINGDON. The county town of H.-shire, on the Gt. Ouse, on the North Road, 58 m. N. of Lond. At the Grammar School, founded by David of Scotland in 1200, Oliver Cromwell was educated. It gives their title to the Earls of H. Towards the end of the 16th cent. Robin Hood was raised to a mythical peerage as the Earl of H., or Huntington. Munday and Chettle's plays of the Downfall and the Death of Robert Earl of Huntington date from 1598; and in Look about Skink speaks of "young Robin Hood, the Earl of Huntington." His life in the greenwood may have suggested the title. In Davenport's Matilda i. 1, Matilda says to the K., "Remember, pray, your vows to my betrothed, Earl Robert Huntington"; and the K. replies, "For Huntington he like a heap Of summer's dust into his grave is swept." The H. mentioned in H5 v. 2, 85 was John Holland, who afterwards married the widow of Edmund, Earl of March. He is one of the characters in Oldcastle. He is also mentioned in Fam. Vict., Haz., p. 363. George Hastings, the grandson of the Hastings of R3, was created Earl of H. in 1529, and the earldom still continues in his family. An Earl of H. is one of the characters in Webster's Wyat.

HYBLA. A town in Sicily, at the mouth of the Cantaro, some 10 m. N. of Syracuse. It was close to, if not identical with, the Greek colony of Megara Hyblæa. The Latin poets celebrate the quality of its honey, and its reputation in this respect is perpetuated in the name of a vill. close to its site, Mellili. In H4 A. i. 2, 47, Prince Hal says that the Hostess is as sweet "as the honey of H." In J. C. v. 1, 34, Cassius says to Antony, "For your words, they rob the H. bees And leave them honeyless." In Lyly's Endymion iii. 4, Eumenides says, "Mistresses are as common as bees in H." In Marlowe's Dido v. 1, Æneas compares the rays of the sun to "labouring bees That load their thighs with H.'s honeyspoils." In Day's Paul. Bees v., Poetaster boasts, "No bee that frequents H. takes more pains Than we do in our canzon." In Jonson's Penates, Maia speaks of "all that H.'s hives do yield." In Fisher's Fuimus iv. 4, Cassibelan adjures the speckled bees, "Buz not about sweet H.'s bloomy head." In Dekker's Westward ii. 1, Justiniano says, "See what golden-winged bee from H. flies humming crura thymo plena." In Chapman's Usher iii. 2, Bassiolo swears his friendship will last "while there be bees in H." In Milkmaids i. 3, Ferdinand calls a swarm of bees "your people of H." Lyly, in Sapho prol., says, "In H., being cloyed with honey, they account it dainty to feed on wax."

HYDASPES (now the JELUM). One of the chief rivers of the Punjaub. It rises in the Himalayas and falls into the Indus at Mithun Kote. Here Alexander fought with Porus and founded Nicæa and Bucephala in memory of his victory. In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar says of Alexander: "He through H. and the Caspian waves Unto the sea his praise did propagate." In T. Heywood's Dialogues iii. 1806, Alexander says, "I golden-waved H. passed." In Jonson's Penates, Maia sings, "The odour that H. lends Or Phoenix proves before she ends." In Nero iv. 1, Nero says to Poppæa, "For thee H. shall throw up his gold." Milton, P. L. iii. 436, compares Satan to a vulture which "flies toward the springs Of Ganges or H., Indian streams."

HYDE PARK. Now applied to the open space in London lying between Park Lane and Kensington Gardens, and extending from Oxford St. to Knightsbridge. It covers 386 acres, but originally it included Kensington Gardens and with them made an open park of over 600 acres. It is the ancient manor of Hide, which belonged to the Abbey of Westminster until it was taken possession of by Henry VIII. From his time to the end of the reign of James I it was reserved as a royal hunting-ground for deer, heron, and other game; and it was enclosed by a paling fence. A succession of small pools ran along the S. side of the P., which were united into the Serpentine river in 1730. Early in the reign of Charles I the Ring, or Tour, was formed: it was a circular drive about 90 yards in diameter, and lay some 150 yards N. of the E. end of the Serpentine. It was used for horse, foot, and coach-races, and soon became a fashionable resort; and cakes and cream were provided for the visitors at the Cake House. During the Commonwealth the P. was sold to 3 private buyers, but was resumed by the Crown at the Restoration and became still more popular with the aristocracy and gentlefolk of the town.

In Jonson's New World, the Factor asks of the new world in the Moon: "Have they any places of meeting with their coaches and taking the fresh open air, and then covert when they please, as in our H. P. or so?" In Staple prol., Jonson asks: "What is it to his [the author's] scene to know How many coaches in H. P. did show Last spring?" In his Devil i. 3, Fitzdottrel promises, "I'll go bespeak me straight a gilt caroch for her and you to take the air in; yes, into H. P." In Shirley's Ball iv. 3, Winfield says to the ladies, "I do allow you H. P. and Spring Garden." In his Fair One i. 3, Fowler says, "There is no discourse so becoming your gallants now at a horse-race or H. P.—what ladies' lips are softest, etc." One of his plays is called Hyde Park, and Acts III and IV take place in the P. and give a vivid description of a footrace between an Irishman and an Englishman; and of a horse-race on which the ladies bet Spanish gloves to scarlet stockings. The whole should be read by the student. In Mayne's Match v. 2, Dorcas stipulates that she is to have "My footman to run by me when I . . . take the air sometimes in H. P." In Brome's Merry Beggars ii. 1, Vincent says, "Shall we make a fling to Lond. and see how the spring appears there in Spring Gardens and in H. P., to see the races horse and foot; to hear the jockeys crack; and see Adamites run naked afore the ladies?" In Killigrew's Parson i. 3, Jolly says, "To H. P. or so I may venture on your lady-fair days when the filly-foals of 15 come kicking in." Randolph, Poems (1634) ii. 539, satirizes one whose ambition it is to "Keep his race-nags, and in H. P. be seen." In Davenant's Wits i. 2, Palatine advises his son, "So live that usurers shall call their money in, remove their bank to Ordinaries, Spring Garden, and H. P." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Holdfast says, "I do intend to scour Hide P. this summer." In Brome's Couple i. 1, Wat tells Careless, "All your hidden ways in Hide-parke races are trod out and all your bowling booties beaten bare off o' the Grounds and Allies." In Brome's Academy iii. 1, Matchil says to Rachel's lover, "She shall not jaunt to this nor that town with you nor to Hide-P." In his Northern ii. 1, Fitchow surmises that Luckless has come to invite her forth "into the air of Hidepark or Maribone." In Cowley's Cutter iii. 1, Aurelia says to Jolly, who is proposing to marry the widow Barebottle, "You'd be very proud of a soap-boiler's widow then in Hide-P., Sir!"

HYMETTUS. A range of mtns. S.E. of Athens, some 4 or 5 m. from the city. In T. Heywood's Dialogues iv. 2237, Jupiter says of Timon: "His tedious clamours in mine ears sound shrill (Near unto Athens) from Himettus hill." In Brome's Ct. Beggar iv. 2, the mad Frederick cries: "Carry me up to H. top, Where she [Diana] affects to walk and take the air." Milton, P. R. iv. 247, says of Athens: "There flowery hill H., with the sound Of bees' industrious murmur, oft invites To studious musing."

HYPERBOREANS. A legendary race who were supposed to inhabit the furthest recesses of the North, beyond Boreas, i.e. at the back of the North Wind. Hence the word is used to mean Northern. In B. & F. Friends iv. 1, Marcus says, "Betwixt the parched Indians, short-breathed men, And longest-lived, cold H., Lives not a constant woman." In Greene's Orlando iv. 1, 994, Ogier says that the 12 Peers of France have "made our galleys dance Upon the Hyperborean billows' crests."

HYPPANIS. The river Hypanis, now the Bug, which flows into the Black Sea at Olbia. In Randolph's Muses v. 3, Roscius says that the Fates gave to human life "a thread no longer than the beasts of H." In Florio's Montaigne (1603) i. 19, we find: "Aristotle saith, there are certain little beasts amongst the river Hyspanis that live but one day." The reference is to Aristotle, Hist. Animal. v. 19. He says that the river Hypanis in the Cimmerian Bosphorus brings down certain sacks, from which, when they are burst, there comes forth a winged four-footed animal which lives and flies about till evening and then dies. Evidently he means some species of insect belonging to the group Ephemeridæ, or day-flies.

HYPPON (= HIPPO REGIUS). A spt. in Numidia, abt. 150 m. W. of Carthage. It was afterwards famous as the seat of St. Augustine's bishopric. In Kyd's Cornelia v., the Messenger, relating the death of Metellus Scipio, says, "A sudden tempest takes him by the way And casts him up near to the coasts of H." This was in 46 B.C., just after the battle of Thapsus.

HYRCANIA. A dist. on the S.E. coast of the Caspian Sea, N.E. of Media. It was rugged and mountainous, and Vergil (Æn. iv. 367) gave currency to the idea that its tigers were specially ferocious. Milton, P. R. iii. 317, speaks of hosts coming from "the Hn. cliffs of Caucasus." In Cyrus i. 1, Cyrus addresses his army as "Ye Persians, Medians, and Hns.;" and later the prowess of the Hn. archers is praised. In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 2, 126, Byron says that Alexander the Gt. "was said To teach the rapeful Hyrcans marriage." In v. 1, he refers to Pompey's conquest of the Hns. In Merch. ii. 7, 41, Morocco says, "The Hn. deserts . . . are as thoroughfares now For princes to come view fair Portia." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 2, Byron, praising Philip II of Spain, says, "He spent not [his treasure] on Median luxury Nor dear Hn. fishes." The Caspian Sea is noted for its fine salmon, and especially for its sturgeon, from which most of the world's supply of caviare and isinglass is obtained. The passage is taken from Plutarch, De Alexandri Magni Virtute.

In H6 C. i. 4, 155, York says to the Lancastrians, "You are more inhuman, more inexorable, O, ten times more, than tigers of H." In Macbeth iii. 4, 101, Macbeth says to Banquo's ghost, "Approach thou like . . . the Hyrcan tiger . . . and my firm nerves Shall never tremble." In Ham. ii. 2, 472, Hamlet begins the speech he wants the player to recite: "The rugged Pyrrhus like the Hn. beast." In Brandon's Octavia 1032, Octavia says of slighted love: "No fierce Hn. forest doth possess So wild a tiger." In Selimus 1237, Zonara says to Acmat, "The Hircanian tigers gave thee suck." In Marlowe's Dido v., Dido, in a passage translated from Vergil (Æn. iv. 367), says to Æneas, "Tigers of H. gave thee suck." In Massinger's Lover ii. 7, Uberti speaks of Farnezes pursuing "Such a revenge as no Hn. tigress, Robbed of her whelps, durst aim at." In T. Heywood's B. Age i., Deyaneira speaks of being attacked "By the Hyrcan tigers or the Syrian wolves." In Cockayne's Trapolin iii. 2, Mattemores denounces Hipolita as "more cruel than Hn. tigers." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Sensuality says, "We'll count the beasts lurk in Hircania's dens." In Chapman's Chabot v. 2, 118, the Advocate says, "What tiger of Hn. breed could have been so cruel?" Heylyn (s.v.) says, "These forests give lurking holes to infinite number of tigers, celebrated in all writers for their horrible fierceness." Daniel, in Sonnets after Astrophel (1591) xi. 12, exhorts his mistress, "Restore thy fierce and cruel mind To Hyrcan tigers and to ruthless bears."

HYTHE, or HIVE. One of the Cinque Ports, in Kent, half-way between Dover and Dungeness, 60 m. S.E. of Lond. It is at the foot of a steep hill. In Wager's The Longer A 3, Moros comes in singing, "Broom, broom, on Hive Hill The gentle Broom on Hive Hill."

IAGO, CASTLE OF SAINT. The scene of B. & F. Cure v. 3. It is in Seville, but I cannot find any reference to it further. St. Iago being the patron saint of Spain, his name is used generically for a Spanish castle.

IAGO'S (SAINT) PARK. See JAMES' (SAINT) PARK.

IAGO (SAINT) STREET. In Seville, running S.E. from the Ch. of Santa Catalina, in the E. of the city. In Tuke's Five Hours iii. 2, Don Carlos says, "At the 2nd house Beyond the ch. in St. I.'s St. He entered."

IAPYGIUM (now CAPO SANTA MARIA DI LEUCA). The promontory at the extreme S.W. point of Italy, at the tip of the heel. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiv. 4393, Crates tells of 2 rich men who "being from Sycon unto Cyrra bound, Were in the mid way near I. drowned": a violent storm indeed.

IBERIA. The dist. S. of the Caucasus, between the Black and Caspian Seas, roughly corresponding to the modern Georgia. It became a province of the Roman Empire in A.D. 115. Arbaces, K. of I., is the chief character in B. & F. King, and the scene of the play, except Act I, is laid in the metropolis of I. In Chapman's Cæsar ii. 5, 122, the K. of I. offers his services to Pompey in his war against Cæsar. The incident is entirely fictitious. The scene of J. S.'s Andromana is I., but the whole play is non-geographical; it is an adaptation of a story in Sidney's Arcadia. Milton, P. R. iii. 318, tells of hosts of soldiers coming from "the Hyrcanian cliffs of Caucasus and dark In. dales."

IBERIA. The Greek name for the Spanish Peninsula, derived from the river Iberus. It is used poetically for Spain. In Larum G. 1, a soldier speaks of the "great deluge of In. blood" in the wars in the Netherlands. In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Bertoldo, praising England, says: "The In. quaked, her worthies named." In Shirley's Arcadia v. 2, the champion of Musidorus is "Palladius of I." In Milton's Comus 60, the prol. tells of Comus "Roving the Celtic and In. fields." In Nabbes' Hannibal i. 2, the Capuan lady says to the soldier, "I'll fill thy burgnet with In. gold Stamped into medals." Drayton, in Polyolb. v. 252, says, "I takes her name of crystal Iberus." Milton, P. R. ii. 200, says, "Remember . . . How he surnamed of Africa dismissed, In his prime youth, the fair In. maid." The reference is to the story that Scipio Africanus, when he was 25, restored a young Spanish girl, of whom he was enamoured, to her parents. Hall, in Satires v. 2, 37, calls the Escorial "The vain bubble of In. pride." In Kirke's Champions iv. 1, Denis reads a prophecy: "I's earth must yield a knight That must extinguish this great light." The reference is to St. James of Spain.

IBERUS. The Latin name for the Ebro, the largest river in N.E. Spain. It rises in the Cantabrian mtns. and flows in a S.E. course to the Mediterranean. It is used poetically for Spain. Daniel, in Epist. Ded. to Cleopatra 75, claims that English poetry should "to I., Loyce, and Arve teach that we part glory with them."

ICELAND, ISLAND, or ISLING. An island a little larger than Ireland, on the border of the Arctic Ocean, between Norway and Greenland. It belongs to Denmark, but since 1919 has had complete Home Rule. Heylyn (s.v.) says it is "a damnable cold country!" In Elements, p. 24, Experience, in his geography lesson, says, "There lieth I. where men do fish, But beyond that so cold it is, No man may there abide." In Hughes'

Misfort. Arth. iv. 2, among Arthur's allies are enumerated "Islandians, Goths, Norwegians, Albans, Danes." In Cuckqueans iv. 8, Floridin says that since he left Oxford he has "travelled Frizland, Island, and Groenland." In Brewer's Lingua iv. 5, Gustus speaks of "Jet or marble fair, from I. brought." The I. dog, with pointed snout, short ears, curled tail, and short legs, was imported into England in the 16th cent., and was a fashionable lap-dog amongst ladies. In H5 ii. 1, 44, Pistol abuses Nym, "Pish for thee, I. dog! thou prick-eared cur of I.!" In Massinger's Picture v. 1, Ubaldo says, "Would I might lie Like a dog under her table, and serve for a footstool, So I might have my belly full of that Her Isling cur refuses." In B. & F. Corinth iv. 1, Onos cries: "Hang, hair, like hemp, or like the Isling cur's; For never powder nor the crisping-iron Shall touch these dangling locks." In Barry's Ram iii. 3, Oliver Smallshanks promises Mrs. Taffata, "You shall have jewels, a baboon, parrot, and an I. dog." In Alimony v. 3, we have "Lies the fault there, you Island cur?" Fleming, in English Dogs v. 37 (1576), speaks of "Iseland cur, curled and rough all over, greatly set by." Swetnam, in Arraignment of Women (1615), says, "If I had brought little dogs from Island, you would have wooed me to have them." Deloney, in Craft i. 10, describes the shoes worn in England in the 15th cent. as "very sharp at the toe, turning up like the tail of an Island dog." I., like other N. countries, was supposed to be plentifully supplied with witches. Burton, A. M. i. 2, 1, 2, says, "Dithmarus Bleskenius, in his description of I., reports that almost in every family they have yet some such familiar spirits."

ICENI. A British tribe who seem to have lived in Essex and Herts. Boadicea, the wife of Prasutagus, K. of the I., revolted against the Romans in A.D. 62, and, being defeated, committed suicide. In B. & F. Bonduca iv. 4, Junius says, "See the Icenian Q. in all her glory From the strong battlements proudly appearing."

ICONIUM. An ancient city in Asia Minor, now Koniye, at the foot of the Taurus range, 310 m. E. of Smyrna. It was incorporated in the Ottoman Empire in 1486, and is the capital of the vilayet of Caramania. In Selimus 1117, Acomat (Achmet) says, "My nephew Mahomet Departed lately from I." The plot of the play is cast about the beginning of the 16th cent.

IDA. A range of mtns. in Phrygia, one branch of which encloses the plain of Troy. The highest peak is Gargarus (4650 ft.). The rivers of Troy, Scamander and Simois, rise in the I. range. The range is covered with woods, and is described by Homer as rich in wild beasts. It was in I. that Paris fed his flocks and won the love of the nymph Enone; and here he made his famous judgment on the beauty of the 3 goddesses, Hera, Artemis, and Aphrodite, which ultimately led to the Trojan War. In Marlowe's Tamb. B. iii. 5, the Messenger compares the hosts of Tamburlaine to "the quivering leaves Of I.'s forest, where your Highness' hounds Pursue the wounded stag." In Taming of a Shrew (Haz., 513), Ferando swears: "More fair and radiant is my bonny Kate Than silver Zanthus when he doth embrace The ruddy Simies at I.'s feet." In Jonson's Poetaster i. 1, Ovid says, "Homer will live whilst Tenedos stands, and Ide, Or to the sea fleet Simois doth slide." Nero, in the play of that name (iv. 1), says of Poppæa: "Such Venus is, when on the sandy shore Of Xanthus, or on I.'s pleasant green She leads the dance." In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Flamineo tells Camillo that he need not be jealous if some flattering knave calls Vittoria's brow "the snow of I. or ivory of Corinth." In B. & F. Valentinian iv. 4, Maximus says that the funeral pile of Aecius "will be more and greater Than green Olympus, I., or old Latmus Can feed with cedar." In Chapman's Chabot ii. 3, 173, Chabot says to the K., "You . . . showed your royal palms as free and moist As I., all enchased with silver springs."

In Greene's Friar xvi., the Emperor, speaking of Elinor and Margaret of Lincoln, says, "If but a 3rd were added to these 2, They did surpass those gorgeous images That gloried I. with rich beauty's wealth," i.e. the 3 goddesses. Lyly, in Maid's Meta iii. 1, speaks of "the mtn. I. groves Where Paris kept his herd." In Cæsar's Rev. i. chor., Discord avows: "'Twas I that did the fatal apple fling Betwixt the 3 Idaean goddesses That so much blood of Greeks and Trojans spilt." In Rutter's Shepherd Hol. iii. 3, Mirtillus calls Enone "The fairest nymph that ever I. blessed." In Chapman's May Day iii. 3, Aurelio says, "Celestial sphere, wherein more beauty shines Than on Dardanian I., where the pride Of heaven's selected beauties strived for prize." In T. Heywood's Dialogues xviii. 4795, Mercury says of Paris: "There lives with him a smug Idaean lass": meaning Enone. The scene of Peele's Arraignment is laid in I., and i. 3 ends with a song: "O I., O I., happy hill! This honour done to I. may it continue still!" In Marmion's Leaguer i. 4, Philautus says, "Did you never hear of . . . 3 Goddesses that strove on I. hill, Naked before a shepherd, for a ball With an inscription, 'Let the fairest have it?'" Spenser, F. Q. ii. 7, 55, speaks of the golden apple "For which the Idaean Ladies disagreed." Milton, P. L. v. 382, says that Eve was fairer than "the fairest goddess feigned Of 3 that in Mt. I. naked strove." According to one form of the legend, Ganymede, the cup-bearer of the gods, was the son of Tros, and was carried off from Mt. I. by Zeus in the form of an eagle. In Marmion's Leaguer iii. 1, Philautus says, "For this cause [i.e. his beauty] Jove took up Ganymede from I. hill To fill him wine." Milton, Penseroso 29, makes Melancholy, the daughter of Vesta and Saturn, begotten "in secret shades Of woody I.'s inmost grove." In Brewer's Lingua iii. 1, Anamnestes says that the siderite, or magnet, "was found out in I. by one Magnes, whose name it retains." The more usual derivation is from Magnesia, where the magnet was supposed to have been first discovered.

IDA. The loftiest point of the mtn. range that forms the back-bone of Crete. It is the centre of the island, and is now called Psiloriti. It was connected with the legends about the early life of Zeus, and there was a cave in its side sacred to him. Milton, P. L. i. 515, says that the Greek gods of the dynasty of Zeus were "first in Crete And I. known."

IDALIA. A town in Cyprus, near to a grove sacred to Aphrodite. In Massinger's Parl. Love ii. 3, Clarindore begs Bellisant to dissuade her admirers from extravagant compliments: "Or, when you dance, to swear that Venus leads The Loves and Graces from the In. green." Jonson, in Epig. cv. 11, says that if Lady Wroth were dancing, "all would cry, the In. Q. Were leading forth the Graces on the green." In Hymen, he speaks of the planet Venus as "the bright In. star." In T. Heywood's Mistress iii., a song begins: "Phœbus, unto thee we sing, Oh thou great In. king." But why the epithet should be given to Phœbus I do not know.

In Cockayne's Obstinate i. 1, Carionil says, "As thou hast me, In. archer [i.e. Cupid], so On her use thy eternal stringed bow." In May's Agrippina iii. 162, Pallas calls Venus "the In. Queen."

IDUMÆA. The Latin form of Edom, the land lying S. and E. of the Dead Sea, and extending to the Gulf of Akaba. It was inhabited by the descendants of Esau, who were the object of special hatred on the part of the Jews, especially after the Babylonish captivity. Herod the Gt. was an In. according to the story of Josephus (see also EDOM). In Mariam i. 2, Alexandra, speaking of Herod, says, "My gracious father Did lift this In. from the dust." In Nabbes' Microcosmos iv., Temperance mentions amongst luxurious dainties "In. palms [i.e. dates] candied with Ebosian sugar."

IEO. The island of Ceos, now Zea, one of the Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, 13 m. S. of the S. point of Attica. Sir Thomas Shirley attacked it in 1603, but was repulsed and taken prisoner. The incident is described in Day's Travails, and the Chorus says (Bullen, p. 40) that he "is come to I. in the Turk's dominion."

ILFORD. Vill. in Essex, 7 m. N.E. of Lond., on the Roding. In Day's B. Beggar ii., young Strowd sends his man Swash to Chingford for £100, and promises "Soon towards evening I'll meet thee at I. for fear of base knaves." In Tarlton's Jests (1611), we are told: "Tarlton rode to I. where his father kept," and there made a poor fellow so drunk that next morning, "meaning to go towards Lond., he went towards Rumford to sell his hogs": Rumford being exactly in the opposite direction.

ILION, ILIUM, or ILLION (I. = Ilion, Im. = Ilium). Synonym for Troy, the famous city in the N.W. corner of Asia Minor, between the Scamander and the Simois, abt. 5 m. from the Hellespont. It was the scene of the Trojan War, which the Greeks undertook to avenge the rape of Helen by Paris. In Lucrece 1370, a painting is described of the "power of Greece, For Helen's rape the city to destroy Threatening cloud-kissing I. with annoy"; in 1524 Sinon's words are described as burning like wildfire "the shining glory Of rich-built I." In L. L. L. v. 2, 658, Hector is spoken of as "the heir of I." In Troil. ii. 2, 109, Cassandra exclaims: "Troy must not be nor goodly I. stand; Our firebrand brother Paris burns us all"; in iv. 4, 118, Troilus says to Diomed, "Name Cressid, and thy life shall be as safe As Priam is in I."; in v. 8, 11, when Hector is killed, Achilles cries: "So, I., fall thou next! Now, Troy, sink down!" In this play Im. is used for the citadel of Troy, I. for the city itself. In i. 2, 46, Pandar asks Cressid, "When were you at Im.?" and a line or two further down, "Was Hector armed and gone ere ye came to Im.?" In 194, Pandarus says, "Shall we stand up here And see them [the Trojan warriors] as they pass towards Im.?" In Ham. ii. 2, 496, the player recites: "Then senseless Im., Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top Stoops to his base." Here the meaning is the palace of Priam. In Marlowe's Faustus xiii., Faust exclaims, on seeing the vision of Helen: "Was this the face that launched a thousand ships And burnt the topless towers of Im.?" In his Tamb. B. iv. 4, Tamburlaine proposes to build a city "whose shining turrets Shall cast the fame of I.'s tower to hell." In B. & F. Prize ii. 2, Bianca says, "Im. shall burn and I., as did Æneas, Will on my back carry this warlike lady." Æneas carried his father Anchises out of the flames of Troy. In Wilson's Pedler, I. is used as a synonym for Lond., and its destruction is predicted. In Kyd's

Cornelia ii., Cicero apostrophises "Fair Im., razed by the conquering Greeks." In Locrine iii. 1, 48, Hecuba is called "the Q. of Im." In Sackville's Ferrex iii. 1, Gorboduc talks of "I.'s fall made level with the soil." In Richards' Messalina ii. 961, Silius says that Messalina is "More pleasing sweet to my innate desire Than was to Synon Ilion's lofty fire." Milton, P. L. i. 578, speaks of "the heroic race . . . That fought at Thebes and Im." W. Smith, in Chloris (1596) xxv. 11, says, "Love made a chaos where proud I. stood." In Fletcher's Valentinian ii. 5, a song says of Love: "I., in a short hour, higher He can build, and once more fire." In T. Heywood's Iron Age, Im. is generally spelt Islium: though doubtless the "s" was silent, as in island.

ILISSUS. A small stream in Attica, rising in Mt. Hymettus, and flowing through the S. part of Athens towards the Phaleric Bay, which, however, it only reaches in wet weather, as it dries up completely in the warmer part of the year. Milton, P. R. iv. 249, says of Athens: "there I. rolls His whispering stream."

ILLYRIA, or ILLIRIA. The Greek and Roman name for the dist. on the E. shore and inland of the Adriatic Sea. It is defined by Heylyn as bounded on the E. by Dalmatia, on the W. by Histria, on the N. by Croatia, and on the S. by the Adriatic Sea. Its chief town was the spt. of Zara. The scene of Twelfth Night is laid in "a city of I. and the sea-coast near it." Zara is probably intended. The historic period is quite indefinite. In H6 B. iv. 1, 108, Suffolk says, "This villain here, Being captain of a pinnace, threatens more Than Bargulus the strong In. pirate." Bargulus, whose real name was Bardyllis, is mentioned by Cicero in De Officiis. He was first a collier, then a pirate, and finally K. of I. He was defeated and killed by Philip of Macedon, the father of Alexander. Cicero calls him "Bargulus, Illyricus latro." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 5, Cassius says, "Brutus, thou hast commanded . . . the Ilirian bands." In Marlowe's Tamb. B. i. 1, Orcanes says, "We have revolted . . . Ins., Thracians, and Bithynians, Enough to swallow forceless Sigismund." Sigismund, the German Emperor, was defeated by the Turks at Nicopolis in 1396. In T. Heywood's Iron Age A. ii., Achilles speaks of Hector as having conquered "Pannonia, I., and Samothrace." In Tiberius 559, Germanicus says of Tiberius: "He tamed the foxes of Iliria." The reference is to the subjugation of the Pannonians by Tiberius in 10 B.C. Milton, P. L. ix. 505, says that Satan, when changed into a serpent, was loverlier than "those that in I. changed, Hermione and Cadmus." These two, Cadmus of Thebes and his wife, Harmonia, came to I. and were changed into serpents (see Ovid Metam. iv. 562). In Deloney's Newberie i., John says, "The people of Illyris kill men with their looks." The origin of this idea has not been discovered.

ILLYRIAN SEA. The Adriatic Sea, on the E. coast of which Illyria lies. In Locrine i. 1, 108, Brutus says that after leaving the land of the Lestrigonians (Sicily), "We passed the Ciccilian Gulf And so transfretting the Ilirian sea Arrived on the coasts of Aquitaine." He has just informed us that he came from Græcia to Sicily by way of the Hellespont. Evidently the author knew little of geography.

ILSINGTON. Vill. in Devonsh., 13 m. S.W. of Exeter. Here John Ford, the dramatist, was born in 1586.

ILVA (i.e. ELBA). An island off the coast of Tuscany, 5 m. from the mainland. It has been famous from old times for its iron mines. In Thersites 30, Thersites, wanting a helmet, says to Mulciber, "I would have some help of Lemnos and I." Hazlitt suggested Ithalia for I., in order to rhyme with galea in the next line. Ithalia, or Æthalia, was another name for Elba, and also for Lemnos. I incline to accept the emendation, but I think Elba is meant: there would be no point in repeating Lemnos by another name.

IMAUUS. The name given in Mercator's Atlas (1636) to the range of mtns. running N. from the N.E. corner of Afghanistan to the Arctic Ocean, now called the Bolor range. The name is sometimes used for the Himalayas, but the context shows that the Bolor range is meant in the passage following. Milton, P. L. iii. 431, compares Satan to "a vulture, on Imaus bred, Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds [which, being short of food] flies toward the springs Of Ganges or Hydaspes, Indian streams, But in his way lights on the barren plains Of Sericana."

INACHUS. A river in the Argolis, flowing past Argos into the Argolic Gulf. Io was said to be the daughter of the river-god I. In T. Heywood's Dialogues 5246, Io, in a list of the rivers of Thessaly, says, "Mongst these, my father, good old I., Lifts up his reverend head." The poet apparently thought the I. was in Thessaly.

INCURABILI, HOSPITAL OF. At Venice: possibly the Old Lazaretto is meant, which lay on an island S.E. of San Giorgio. In Jonson's Volpone v. 8, Volpone's property is "confiscate To the h. of the I."

INDIA (Is. = Indies, In. = Indian). From the Persian Hind, a river (the Indus), through the Greek; I. is properly the region of the Indus, Sindh. It was gradually extended to cover all I. E. of the Indus, and now includes also Further I. The form Inde, or Ynde, pronounced with a long vowel, to rhyme with mind, came through the French, and an early adaptation of the Latin I. was Indie, with the plural Indies. When Columbus discovered the islands off the E. coast of America it was supposed that they were connected with the islands E. of Ceylon, and they were called Is.; whilst the natives, both of the islands and the continent of America, were called Ins. When fuller knowledge showed the error of this supposition, the In. peninsula and islands were distinguished as E. Is. and the American islands as W. Is., or, rarely, N. Is. About the middle of the 17th cent. Hindu began to be used for the natives of Asiatic I., and it gradually became the regular name for them, whilst In. was restricted to the natives of America. Pretty much all that was known to our authors of the history of I. was that it was the E. limit of the ancient Persian Empire, and that Alexander the Gt. reached the Indus and defeated Porus at the Hydaspes in 327 B.C. They were familiar with the Spanish conquest of the American Is. and the exploits of the English seamen there. Both E. and W. Is. suggested the thought of great wealth in gold and gems, and it is most often of this that the dramatists think in their references. In many passages it is difficult to decide which of the Is. is referred to, as both had this connotation. There was much curiosity about the American Ins., and they were even exhibited as shows in Lond.

India in the sense of Continental India. In M. N. D. ii. 1, 69, Titania asks Oberon, "Why art thou here, Come from the furthest steppe of I.?" In 124, Titania says of the mother of her changeling: "In the spiced In. air Full often hath she gossiped by my side." In ii. 1, 22, Puck says that the changeling was "stolen from an In. King" and in iii. 2, 375, Oberon speaks of him as "her In. boy." In Merch. iii. 2, 272, Bassanio mentions that Antonio had ventures "in I." In Troil. i. 2, 80, Pandarus says that Troilus is not himself. Cressida says that he is; and Pandarus answers: "Condition I had gone barefoot to I," i.e. he is no more himself than I am able to perform an impossible feat. In Kirke's Champions ii. 1, Ancetes says to the Emperor of Trebizond, "That shield From the In. provinces was sent as tribute." In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 2, Tamburlaine says, "Not all the gold in I.'s wealthy arms Shall buy the meanest soldier in my train." In B. v. 3, Tamburlaine says, "I meant to cut a channel [between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea] That men might quickly sail to I.": an interesting anticipation of the Suez Canal. The much-travelled Hycke, p. 88, had been "in Caldey, Tartare, and Inde." In Nero iv. 1, Nero says to Poppæa, "The Seres and the feathered man of Ind Shall their fine arts and curious labours bring." In Chapman's Trag. Byron iv. 2, Byron says that Alexander the Gt. taught "The Ins. to adore the Grecian gods." In Milton's Comus 139, Comus says, "Ere the nice morn on th' In. steep From her cabin'd loophole peep": where In. means little more than Eastern. In Hester, p. 285, a proclamation runs: "We, Ahasuerus, k. and high regent from I. to the Ethiopian plain" (see Esther i. 1). The scene of Greene's Orlando iv. is partly laid in I. In Shirley's Gent. Ven. iii. 1, Thomazo says, "I'll return with In. spoils Like Alexander." In Elements, p. 25, Experience says, "This said N. part is called Europa, and this S. part called Affrica, this E. part is called Ynde, but this new lands found lately been called America." In York M.P. xlvii. 287, Thomas says, "To Ynde will I turn me and travel to teach." St. Thomas was said to have introduced Christianity into I. Milton, P.R. iv. 74, describes embassies coming to Rome "From I. and the Golden Chersonese, And utmost In. isle, Taprobane." In P.L. i. 781, he speaks of "the pygmean race Beyond the In. mount" i.e. the Himalayas. In iii. 436, he calls Ganges and Hydaspes "In. streams."

East Indies (=Asiatic India and the Islands of the Malay Archipelago). In Jonson's Magnetic ii. 1, Polish tells Diaphanous, "Her aunt has worlds to leave you; The wealth of 6 E.-In. fleets at least." The reference is to the fleets of the English E. In. Company, founded 1599. In Tomkis' Albumazar i. 5, Albumazar says, "My almanack, give 't th' E. I. company; There they may smell the price of cloves and pepper." In B. & F. Prize iv. 3, Bianca says to Livia, "Thy lips shall venture as many kisses as the merchants do dollars to the E.-Is." In Middleton's Quiet Life i. 1, Franklin says, "Your Lordship, minding to rig forth a ship To trade for the E. Is., sent for me." In Launching, the poet says, "My brother Would powder up my friend and all his kindred For an E. In. voyage": powder means to salt-down meat. In Marlowe's Tamb. A. i. 1, Cosroes is acclaimed "D. of . . . E. I. and the late discovered Isles." By these last the W. Is. are meant, in spite of the flagrant anachronism. In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 2, Andelocia says, "Gold riseth like the sun out of the E. Is., to shine upon every one." In B. & F. Fair Maid I. ii. 2, the Clown says of England: "Another shows bawdy E. In. pictures, worse than ever were Aretine's." In Milkmaids v. 1, Ranoff says of his mistress: "Thou look'st like the Phoenix of the E. Is., burning in spices, for cloves, mace, and nutmegs are in thy breath." In Webster's Law Case i. 1, Romelio is represented as trading to the "E. Is."; in iii. 3, he proposes to send 2 inconvenient surgeons "to the E. Is.," where he hopes they will catch "the scurvy or the In. pox." This is unfair to the E. Is.: it is generally believed that this disease was introduced into Europe from the W. Is. by the Spanish discoverers. In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Col. Jolly enters "in an In. gown and night-cap." In Tw. N. iii. 2, 86, Maria says that Malvolio "does smile his face into more lines than is in the new map with the augmentation of the Is." Mr. C. H. Coote, in a paper contributed to the New Shakespeare Society, June 14th, 1878, gives good reason for supposing that this new map was one published to go with the 2nd edition of Hakluyt's Voyages about 1599. It contained much hitherto unknown detail in I., Ceylon, Cochinchina, and Corea, and also more parallels of latitude and longitude than had been used in earlier maps. It seems to have been drawn by Mr. Emmeria Mollineux, of Lambeth, and to have been published separately as a companion to Hakluyt's Voyages. Fuller, Church Hist. (1656) i. 6, 11, says, "All far countries are E. Is. to ignorant people."

North-West or North-East Passage to India. Attempts were made by a succession of English navigators to find a passage to I. through the Arctic Ocean. John Cabot tried in 1496, and discovered Newfoundland; Willoughby followed in 1553, and further expeditions were made between 1576 and 1616 by Frobisher, Davis, Hudson, and Baffin: all without success. In Massinger's Madam ii. 3, Sir Maurice says to Plenty, "I will undertake To find the N. passage to the Is. sooner Than plough with your proud heifer." In Brewer's Lingua ii. 2, Phantastes opines that "the next way to the Is." will be discovered "ad Græcas calendas" i.e. never. For further illustrations, see under NORTH-EAST PASSAGE.

India was proverbial for its wealth in gold and gems. In Tw. N. ii. 5, 17, Sir Toby addresses Maria as "my metal of I.," i.e. my girl of gold. In H4 A. iii. 1, 169, Mortimer says that Glendower is "As bountiful as mines of I." In H8 i. 1, 21, Norfolk says that at the Field of the Cloth of Gold the English "Made Britain I.; every man that stood Showed like a mine." In Troil. i. 1, 103, Troilus says of Cressida: "Her bed is I.; there she lies, a pearl." In H6 C. iii. 1, 63, K. Henry says, "My crown is . . . Not decked with diamonds and In. stones." In Dekker's Shoemaker v. 5, Lacy protests that he would not lose his Rose "for all I.'s wealth." In the old Shrew (Haz., p. 507), Aurelius says he has got by merchandise "precious, fiery-pointed stones of Indie." In Dekker's Fortunatus i. 1, Fortunatus speaks of his inexhaustible purse as "an In. mine in a lamb's skin." In Marlowe's Dido v. 1, Æneas says, "From golden I. Ganges will I fetch" to enrich the newly built Carthage. In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass i. 1, 101, Rasni says, "I'll strip the Is. of their diamonds." In Lady Mother i. 3, Bonville says, "Persuade an In. who has dived Into the ocean and obtained a pearl To cast it back again." In Ford's Sun i. 1, Raybright says, "Honesty's a fine jewel, but the Is. where it grows is hard to be discovered." In Greene's Alphonsus v. 2, 1614, Alphonsus promises Iphigina, "The In. soil shall be at thy command Where every step thou settest on the ground Shall be received on the golden mines." In Milton, P.L. ii. 2, Satan's throne "outshone the wealth of Ormuz and of Ind." Toft, in Laura (1597) vii. 6, speaks of pearls "so just and round That such in I. rich cannot be found." Some of these passages may, however, allude to the gold mines of Peru and Mexico. Indian Devil is used in the sense of money, because of the wealth of the Is. In Tourneur's Revenger i. 3, Vendice, being offered money as a bribe, says, "This In. devil will quickly enter any man but a usurer; he prevents that by entering the devil first."

Indian Customs and Practices. In Massinger's Milan i. 3, Sforza says, "The slavish In. princes, when they die, Are cheerfully attended to the fire By the wife and slave that, living, they loved best." The reference is to the Suttie. In Tiberius 165, Tiberius says, "Arabians [are] simple fools and Ins. droyles," i.e. dull slaves. The Ins. were clever in cheating those who bought from them, as every traveller to the East knows they still are. In Massinger's Maid Hon. i. 1, Adorni hopes that Fulgentio's words are "not like In. wares, and every scruple To be weighed and rated." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier iv. 3, the Camel-driver says, "I fare hard and drink water; so do the Ins.; so do the Turks." He is thinking of the Mohammedan Hindus, who are forbidden to drink wine.

The Indians were dark in colour. In Merch. iii. 2, 99, Bassanio says that "Ornament is . . . the beauteous scarf Vailing an In. beauty." Dark women were regarded as ugly by the admirers of the blonde Q. Elizabeth: an In. beauty means a beauty that is really ugly if her face could be seen. In Brewer's Lovesick King iii. 1, Grim says, "700 black Ins. or Newcastle colliers your Worship keeps daily to dive for treasure 500 fathom deep for you." The scene of the play is Newcastle. Davies, in Nosce, says that the sun "Makes . . . the East In. red." Barnes, in Parthenophil Sonn. lxxv. 5, says to Cupid, "Seek out thy kin Amongst the Moors and swarthy men of Ind."

The historians of Alexander's campaigns in I. brought back the report of an ancient sect of philosophers in I., called Gymnosophists, who almost entirely abjured clothing. In Massinger's Believe ii. 1, Chrysalus relates that Antiochus went "To I. where he spent many years With their gymnosophists." Heylyn (s.v. I.) says, "These Gymnosophists were to the Ins. as the Magi to the Persians . . . and are called by the Ins. Brachmanni. They are held in great reverence, and live for the most part a very austere and solitary life in caves and deserts; feeding on herbs and wearing poor thin weeds; and for a certain time abstain from all kind of vice." The Brahmins had been heard of, and were considered to be a kind of philosophical priests. Burton, A. M. Intro., couples together "Britain Druids, In. Brachmanni, Æthiopian Gymnosophists."

Various things described as Indian. In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon says, "My meat shall all come in in In. shells." In T. Heywood's B. Age ii., Meleager speaks of the Calidonian boar as having "tusks like the In. Oliphant's." In Davenant's Wits ii., Pert says of the elder Palatine: "All he swallows is melting conserve and soft In. plumb." The In. plum is Flacourtia Cataphracta. In B. & F. Fair Maid I. iv. 2, the Muleteer, who has got money by showing strange beasts, says, "Your camelion or East-In. hedgehog gets very little money." The Common Chamelion is found in S. Asia. In Davenant's Nightcap i. 1, Abstemias says, "You are just like the In. hyssop, praised of strangers for the sweet scent, but hated of the inhabitants for the injurious quality." Gascoigne, in Steel Glass 767, speaks of "The crimsonine and lively red from Inde." In Greene and Lodge's Looking Glass ii. 1, 526, Rasni says, "Herbs, oils of Inde, alas! there nought prevail." In Fisher's Fuinus i. 2, Cæsar says, "The Pellæan Duke [i.e. Alexander] Did eastward march, adorned with In. rubies." In Davenant's Italian v. 3, Altamont says, "The cymbals of I. call Castilian cornets forth." In Cyrus G. 2, Panthea says, "Make sweet fumes of In. cassia." In H. Shirley's Mart. Soldier ii. 3, Bellizarius says, "In. Aramaticks were nothing scented unto this sweet bower." In Nabbes' Microcosmus iii., Bellanima talks of "an air making perfume which no In. balsam can imitate." Lyly, in Euphues Anat. Wit., p. 101, says, "Amomus and Nardus will only grow in I." In Wilson's Swisser i. 1, Clephis says, "Thou never leav'st licking till, like an In. rat, thou hast devoured the bowels of his honour." The In. Rat, or Rat of Inde, is the In. Ichneumon, or Mongoose. Holland, in Pliny i. 103, speaks of "Rats of Inde, called Ichneumones."

In. Blue, or Indigo, became known in Europe early in the 14th cent. It is obtained from certain plants of the leguminous order. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xviii., Courtly Abusion promises Magnificence a mistress with "the strains of her veins as azure Inde blue." Milton, P. L. ix. 1102, says that Adam and Eve made their first clothing from "The fig-tree—not that kind for fruit renowned, But such as to this day to Ins. known In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms Branching so broad and long that in the ground The bended twigs take root," i.e. the Banyan (Ficus Indicus). "There oft [he goes on] the In. herdsman . . . shelters in cool." In Jonson's Neptune, the Poet describes the tree of Harmony: "brought forth in the In. Muscana first," and proceeds to describe the Banyan: "from every side The boughs decline, which, taking root afresh, Spring up new boles." Davies, in Orchestra (1594) xc. 3, speaks of "the bashful bride Which blusheth like the In. ivory Which is with dip of Tyrian purple dyed." In Philotus 61, Flavius compares Emily's breasts to "In. ebur."

Indies and India in the sense of the West Indies and America, specially Spanish South America. Fabulous wealth came to Spain from her American possessions. In Err. iii. 2, 136, Antipholus, catechising Dromio about his kitchen-maid, asks: "Where America, the Is.?" And Dromio answers: "Oh, Sir, upon her nose, all o'er embellished with rubies, carbuncles, sapphires, declining their rich aspect to the hot breath of Spain." In Merch. i. 3, 19, Shylock says that Antonio "hath an argosy bound to the Is." In H8 iv. 1, 45, one of the Gentlemen, looking at the Q., says, "Our K. has all the Is. in his arms . . . when he strains that lady." In Jonson's Alchemist iii. 2, Subtle promises Ananias wealth enough "to buy Spain out of his Is." In Massinger's Madam iii. 3, Lacy asks Luke to "Receive these Ins., lately sent him from Virginia, into your house." They were really Englishmen disguised. In Marlowe's Massacre i. 1, Guise says, "From Spain the stately Catholics Send In. gold to coin me French écus." In B. & F. Cure i. 2, Lucio speaks of "the In. maid the Governor sent my mother from Mexico." In Tuke's Five Hours i., Geraldo says that the K. of Spain is "master o' th' Is. Where money grows." In Middleton's Blunt iv. 2, Lazarillo says, "The Spanish fleet is bringing gold enough, All from the Is." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, the K. of Spain says, "I would not have thy sin scored on my head For all the In. treasury." In Devonshire i. 2, the merchant recalls how "Drake, that glory of his country and Spain's terror, Harrowed the Is." In Ford's Fancies i. 3, Livio speaks of a clever man as "One whose wit's his Is.," i.e. the source of his wealth. In Dekker's If it be i. 1, Charon says, "Men, to find hell, New ways have sought, as Spaniards did to the Is." In Mayne's Match iii. 2, Quartfield says of the supposed strange fish that is being exhibited: "We took him in the Is. near the mouth of the Rio de la Plata," so that practically all S. America is included in the term. In Dekker's Northward v. 1, Bellamont says, "You gallants visit citizens' houses as the Spaniard first sailed to the Is.; you pretend buying of wares or selling of land, but the end proves 'tis nothing but for discovery and conquest of their wives for better maintenance." In Webster's Law Case iii. 1, Crispiano says, "The K. of Spain [Philip II] suspects that your Romeo here has discovered some gold mine in the W. Is." Spenser, F. Q. ii. pro. 2, asks: "Who ever heard of th' In. Peru?" In Jonson's Magnetic v. 5, Needle calls Alderman Parrot's rich widow "an In. mag-pie," because she has, like a magpie, hidden her wealth "in little holes in the garden." In B. & F. Cure iv. 2, Malroda speaks of women of the town as ladies "That make their maintenance out of their own Is." In the same play (v. 3) Syavedra says that the reconciliation between Vitelli and Alvarez "will be a welcomer present to our master Philip [i.e. Philip II of Spain] Than the return from his Is." In W. Rowley's Shoemaker iv. 2, 160, Hugh says, "Could I give In. mines, they all were yours": a curious anachronism, as the date of the play is A.D. 297.

West Indies specifically so called. In Span. Trag. iii. 14, the K. of Spain says, "We now are kings and commanders of the W. Is." But his statement that the Portuguese once were so is inaccurate. In Middleton's Gypsy iv. 3, Roderigo says to Alvarez, "Send me to the W. Is., buy me some office there." In Marlowe's Jew iii. 5, Ferneze says, "Gold's to be gotten in the W. Ind." In Tailor's Hog hath Lost his Pearl iii. 3, when Hog the usurer enters, Haddit cries: "Here comes half the W.-Is., whose rich mines I mean this night to be ransacking." In Noble Soldier v. 2, Baltasar says, "You were better sail to Bantom in the W. Is. than to Barathrum in the Low Countries." In Devonshire i. 2, the Merchant says, "Did not Spayne fetch gold from the W. Is. for us?" In T. Heywood's Challenge i. 1, Aldana says, "How, Mistress daughter, have you conquered the W. Is. that you wear a gold-mine on your back?" In Dekker's Satiromastix iii. 1, 226, Tucca says to Mrs. Miniver, "Thou shalt be my W. Indies and none but trim Tucca shall discover thee." Herrick, in Ode on Country Life (1647), speaks of the cares "The industrious merchant has, who for to find Gold, runneth to the W. Inde." Note the rhyme.

In. is used for a native of America, most often of the Spanish America. In Temp. ii. 2, 61, Stephano, seeing Caliban, says, "Do you put tricks upon us with savages and men of Ind?" In Oth. v. 2, 347, Othello speaks of himself as "one whose hand, Like the base In., threw a pearl away Richer than all his tribe." So the Qq.: the Ff. read "Iudæan," but there can be little doubt that the Qq. are right. Compare Habington's Castara: "So the unskilful In. those bright gems Which might add majesty to diadems 'Mong the waves scatters"; Howard's Woman's Conquest: "Behold my Queen—Who with no more concern I'll cast away Than Ins. do a pearl that ne'er did know Its value"; and Drayton's Matilda: "The wretched In. spurns the golden ore." Nash, in Pierce I. 3, says, "The Ins. have store of gold and precious stones at command, yet are ignorant of their value." In Chapman's Rev. Hon. iv. 2, 136, Caropia says, "I prize My life at no more value than a foolish Ignorant In. does a diamond." In Cowley's Cutter ii. 1, Aurelia says, "The poor wench loves dyed glass like an In." In Jonson's Eastward iii. 3, Seagull says the Virginian colonists have "married with the Is." In Chapman's Mid. Temp., the principal actors are In. princes from Virginia. In Lust's Domin. i. 3, Mendoza says, "To beg with In. slaves I'll banish you." The Spaniards enslaved the natives of Spanish America and treated them with terrible cruelty. In Chivalry B. 4, Katharine says to Pembroke, "You vanquish beauty with no lesser awe Than In. vassals stoop unto their lords." In Marlowe's Faustus i. 119, Valdes tells how "In. moors obey their Spanish Lords." In Dekker's If it be, p. 307, Rufman says, "The Ins. are warm without clothes, and a man is best at ease without a woman."

Ins. from America were exhibited as curiosities in England. Frobenius brought some over in 1577; and in 1611 5 Indians were brought to Lond., of whom one died and his body was exhibited as a show. In Temp. ii. 2, 34, Trinculo says of the English: "When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out 10 to see a dead In." In H8 v. 4, 34, the Porter says to the crowd, "Have we some strange In. with the great Toole come to Court, the women so besiege us?" The double entendre needs no explanation: there may be a reference to Arthur Severus O'Toole, in honour of whom Taylor, the Water Poet, in 1622, wrote a poem in which he says, "The great O'Toole is the tool that my muse takes in hand." When, in Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Meg says, "I and my Amazons Strip you as naked as an In.," she is thinking of one of these unfortunate exhibits, who were shown in puris naturalibus.

The American Ins., specially those of S. America, were sun-worshippers. In Harcourt's Voyage to Guiana (1613), he says, "As touching religion, they have none among them more than a certain observance of the sun and moon." The sun was the chief object of worship amongst the Peruvians, whose Incas were supposed to be the children of the Sun. In L. L. L. iv. 3, 222, Biron says, "who sees the heavenly Rosaline, That, like a rude and savage man of Inde At the first opening of the gorgeous east, Bows not his vassal head, and stricken blind Kisses the base ground?" It may be noted that Inde rhymes with blind. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein v. 1, the Emperor says, "They all look on him As superstitious Ins. on the sun, With adoration." The American Ins. have flat noses. In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 2, Mrs. Carol says to Fairfield, "Your nose is Roman, which your next debauchment at tavern, with the help of pot or candlestick, may turn to In., flat."

Indian Customs and Practices. Montaigne's Essay, Of the Caniballes (Florio's trans. i. 30), gives a full and interesting account of the manners and customs of the American Ins. In Glapthorne's Wallenstein iv. 2, Leslie says, "In. princes Do carry slaves into the other world To wait on them." Spenser, F. Q. ii. 11, 21, speaks of "arrows . . . Headed with flint, and feathers bloody dyed, Such as the Ins. in their quivers hide." In iii. 12, 8, he speaks of the painted plumes "Like as the sunburnt Ins. do array Their tawney bodies."

Various things described as Indian. In Marston's Malcontent ii. 4, one of the components of Maquerelle's aphrodisiac is "pure candied In. eringoes." In Ford's Trials ii. 1, Guzman speaks of "pearls which the In. cacique presented to our countryman De Cortez." Cacique means a native prince of an American tribe. In Jack Drum i. 326, Brabant says of his brother: "His jests are like In. beef, they will not last." In B. & F. Pilgrimage i. 1, Incubo asks: "What do you hear of our In. fleet? They say they are well returned." This was the Spanish Plate Fleet which brought the tribute from the W. Is. to Spain year by year. Nash, in Lenten, speaks of "In. canoes or boats like great beef-trays or kneading troughs." In Davenant's Distresses ii., Claramante, who is disguised as a man, says, "I shrink like the In. flower which creeps within its folded leaves when it is touched." This is Mimosa Pudica, or the Sensitive Plant, a native of tropical America. In his Love Hon., Alvaro speaks of "the chaste In. plant that shrinks and curls its bashful leaves at the approach of man." In Underwit, Justina says, "In I. there is a flower, they say, Which, if a man comes near it, turns away." In Alimony v. 2, the Officer says, "Here be those In. rats that cant and chirp in my pocket," i.e. coins.

Indian Weed used for Tobacco. In Kirke's Champions i. 1, Tarpan advises the Clown, "If they cloud the air with I.'s precious weed, Kindle that fuel—let thy chimney smoke too." In Marmion's Companion ii. 4, Careless (who really speaks for the poet after an evening at the Apollo Club) says, "Thence do I come, my brains perfumed with the rich In. vapour." Dekker, in Horn-book, apostrophizes tobacco as "Thou beggarly monarch of Ins. and setter-up of rotten-lunged chimney-sweepers"; and again: "As for the nose, some make it serve for an In. chimney." In Ret. Pernass i. 1, 447, we have: "Long for a reward may your wits be warmed with the In. herb." Taylor, in Works, speaks of "carousing In. Trinidad smoke." In Day's Law Tricks ii. 1, Adam says, "He is in love with the In. punk, Tobacco." In Jonson's Ev. Man i. iii. 2, Bobadill, speaking of tobacco, says, "I have been in the Is., where this herb grows." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 1, Laxton says of Mrs. Gallipot, who "minces tobacco" in her husband's shop: "She's a gentlewoman born, though it be her hard fortune now to shred In. pot herbs." Tobacco was first brought into England in 1565; in 1573, Harrison, in Chronology, says, "In these days the taking-in of the smoke of the In. herb called Tabaco by an instrument formed like a little ladel is greatly taken up and used in England." King James' Counterblast was issued in 1604. Drayton, in Polyolb. xvi. 351, praises the good old times "Before that In. weed so strongly was imbraced." Scoloker, in Preface to Daiphantus (1604), says, "If I seem mystical or tyrannical . . . it is an In. humour I have snuffed up from divine Tobacco." Donne, Satire (1593) i. 87, speaks of one "which did excel The Ins. in drinking his tobacco well." In Sharpham's Fleire i. 359, when Sparke swears "by the divine smoke of tobacco," Petoune says, "Profane not the In. plant."

The East and West Indies specifically differentiated. In As iii. 2, 93, Orlando's verses begin: "From the E. to W. Ind. No jewel is like Rosalind." The succeeding rhymes (wind, mind, hind, etc.) show the pronunciation. In M. W. W. i. 3, 79, Falstaff says of Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page: "They shall be my E. and W. Is.; and I will trade to them both." In Day's Parl. Bees vii., Acolastes says, "Had I my will, betwixt my knee and toe I'd hang more pearls and diamonds than grow In both the Is." In T. Heywood's Traveller i. 1, Delavil says, "A scholar is to seek When a plain pilot can direct his course From hence unto both the Is." In Massinger's Guardian v. 4, Severinus, on seeing Alphonso's treasures, exclaims: "The spoils, I think, of both the Is." In Davenant's Favourite v. 1, Cramont, being challenged to fight by Amadore, replies: "Not for the wealth of both Is." In Shirley's Honorio iii. 1, Traverse, the lawyer, says, "Wax [i.e. sealing-wax] more precious than a trade to both the Is." In Ford's Sun ii. 1, Health says, "Who, for 2 such jewels [health and youth] would not sell the E. and W. Is.?" In Suckling's Aglaure iv. 1, Aglaure says, "Wouldst thou not think a merchant mad If thou shouldst see him weep and tear his hair Because he brought not both the Is. home?" In Dekker's Wonder iii. 1, Philippo says, "This proud fellow talks As if he grasped the Is. in each hand." In iv. 1, Torrenti says, "I'd melt both Is. but I'd feast 'em all." In Shirley's Gamester iv. 1, Hazard says, "If thou part'st with her for less than both the Is. thou'lt lose by her." In Spenser's F. Q. i. 6, 2, Una "wandred had from one to other Ynd Him for to seek": where Ynd rhymes with behind and find. Milton, P. L. v. 339, describes Eden as producing "Whatever Earth, all-bearing mother, yields In I. East or West." Spenser, in Amoretti xv. 3, says, "Ye tradeful merchants that . . . both the Indias of their treasure spoil."

North Indies—apparently used for the W. Indies. In Satiromastix v. 2, 161, Sir Vaughan says, "I rejoice very near as much as if I had discovered a New-found-Land, or the N. and E. Is." Nether Inde is also used for the W. Is. and N. America. Drayton, in Polyolb. xvii. 347, says that Elizabeth "sent her navies hence Unto the nether Inde, and to that shore so green, Virginia which we call."

Is. is used vaguely without any indication whether E. or W. Is. are intended. In Jonson's Case i. 1, Valentine, in his travels, has seen "Constantinople and Jerusalem and the Is.," and many other places. In his Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon promises, when he gets the philosopher's stone: "I'll purchase Devonshire and Cornwall And make them perfect Is." In his Ev. Man O. ii. 1, Fastidius Brisk affirms, "I possess as much in your wish as if I were made Lord of the Is." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 4, the K. says, "Ere my sweet Gaveston shall part from me, This isle shall fleet upon the ocean And wander to the unfrequented Inde." In his Faustus i., Faustus will have his spirits "fly to I. for gold." In Davenant's Siege iii. 2, Ariotto says, "I have not the Is. nor the philosopher's stone." Sidney, in Astrophel (1581) xxxii. 12, says of Stella's charms: "No Indes such treasures hold."

Indian Customs and Practices not definitely specified. In Davenant's Wits iv. 1, Palatine speaks of lying "7 days buried up to the lips like a diseased sad In. in warm sand."

INDUS. The great river rising in Thibet and flowing in a generally S. direction through the Punjab, past Hyderabad, to its mouths in the Indian Ocean. Its length is abt. 1650 m. Spenser, F. Q. iv. 7, 6, says that the ears of the giant were "More great than th' ears of Elephants by I. flood." In the list of rivers in iv. 11, 21, he calls it "deep I." Jonson, in Neptune's, ad fin., speaks of a ship coming "From aged I. laden home with pearls." In Milton, P. L. ix. 82, Satan surveys all the world from Darien "to the land where flows Ganges and I." In P. R. iii. 272, the Tempter shows to our Lord the old Assyrian Empire "As far as I. E., Euphrates W."

INGHAM. In Bale's Laws iv., Infidelity says he has a pardon in his sleeve "of our Lady of Boston, I., and St. John's Friary." There are 3 villages of the name: (1) 8 m. S.W. of Lincoln; (2) 16 m. N.E. of Norwich; (3) 4 m. N. of Bury St. Edmunds. But there does not appear to be any trace of a shrine of the Virgin in any of them. Is it possible that I. is short for Walsingham, where there was a famous shrine of the Virgin? See WALSINGHAM.

INNER TEMPLE. One of the 4 great Inns of Court in Lond. It lies on the E. side of the Temple, and is approached by a gateway of the time of James I. The Hall is modern, and was opened in 1870, but it stands on the site of the great Hall and Refectory of the Knights Templars (see INNS OF COURT and TEMPLE for further details). James Becket had a bookseller's shop at I. T. Gate in Fleet St. in 1640. Glapthorne's Argalus was "Printed by R. Bishop for Daniel Pakeman at the Rainbow near the I. T. Gate. 1639." Beaumont supplied the Masque performed by the members of the I. T. on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth in 1613.

INNSBRUCK. A city on the Inn, the capital of the Tyrol, 60 m. S. of Munich. After the union of the Tyrol with Austria in 1363 it was a favourite residence of the Emperors. The monument to Maximilian I in the Franciscan Ch. is one of the finest pieces of sculpture in the world. Some of the best steel imported into England came from I. Scene x. of Marlowe's Faustus is laid in the Court of Charles V at I. In Oth. v. 2, 252, Othello says of his sword: "It is a sword of Spain, the Ise brookes temper." This may mean I., Isebrook being a recognized spelling of I. in the 16th cent. Modern editions mostly read "ice brook's." Nash, in Lenten (p. 306), says, "As for iron: about Isenborough, and other places of Germany, they have quadruple the store that we have."

INNS OF COURT. Legal societies in Lond., established about the end of the 13th cent. Their chief function is the admission of persons as barristers. They constitute what is practically a legal University. There were 4 principal I., with others subordinate to them, as follows:

(1) Lincoln's Inn with the Inn of Chancery, Furnival's Inn, and Thavie's Inn; (2) Inner Temple with Clifford's Inn and Clement's Inn; (3) Middle Temple with New Inn; (4) Gray's Inn with Staple's Inn and Barnard's Inn. Serjeants' Inn was limited to Serjeants-at-Law, and ceased to exist with them in 1877. There were some other minor Inns like Lyon's Inn, Scrope's Inn, and Chester (or Strand) Inn, which have passed out of existence. In H4 B. iii. 2, 14, Shallow says that his cousin William, who is at Oxford, "must to the Inns o' C. shortly," and goes on to say that in his time "you had not 4 such swinge-bucklers in all the I. o' c." as the 4 whom he has just mentioned. In H6 B. iv. 7, 2, Cade orders his followers, "Go some, and pull down the Savoy; others to the I. of c.; down with them all." Jonson dedicated his Ev. Man O. "to the noblest nurseries of Humanity and Liberty in the Kingdom, the I. of C." Lawyers are called I. o' C. men, and they had the character of being decidedly rowdy and fast. In Barry's Ram iii. 1, Throate says, "Come you to seek a virgin in Ram Alley, So near an Inn-of-C.?" In i. 1, Smallshanks says, "No puny Inn-a-c. but keeps a laundress at his command." In Middleton's R. G. ii. 3, Laxton, waiting in Gray's Inn Fields for Moll, says, "Yonder's two I.-o-c. men with one wench; but that's not she." In Mayne's Match ii. 4, Aurelia speaks of Bright and Newcut as "Two I.-o'-C. men . . . known cladders through all the town"; and defin:s cladders as "Catholic lovers, from country madams to your glover's wife, or laundress." In Jonson's Barthol., Induction, the Stagekeeper suggests that it would be a good scene to have a pump on the stage and a punk set on her head and "soused by my witty young masters o' the I. of C." In Glapthorne's Wit iii. 1, Knowell speaks of girls having "wit sufficient to withstand the assaults of some young I.-a-c. man." In Jonson, Ev. Man O. i. 1, Sogliardo boasts that he has "a nephew of the I. of C." Earle, in Microcosmography xiii., defines a tavern as "the i.-a-c. man's entertainment." In Jonson's Devil iii. 1, Guilthead tells his son he will learn in business "that in a year shall be worth 20 . . . Of sending you to the I. of C., or France." Masques and Revels were frequently celebrated by the various I.: the last being performed at the Inner Temple in 1734. Details will be found under the several I. In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Bellamont says, "she doth clip you as if she had fallen in love with you at some I.-a-c. revels." Shirley's Peace is entitled, The Masque of the Gentlemen of the Four Honourable Societies or I. o. C. A Master of the Revels was appointed. In Shirley's Sisters ii. 2, Lucio speaks of one of the characters as "Some monarch of I. of C. in England, sure." In Nabbes' Totenham ii. 5, Stitchwell says of his wife: "I have trusted her to a Maske and the I. a C. revelling; she knew the way home again without a cryer."

INQUISITION CHAPEL (MADRID). The I. was in the N.W. part of the city, in the Calle de Isabel la Catolica, which runs N. from the Plaza de Santo Domingo to the Ministry of Justice. In Middleton's Gipsy i. 4, Louis says, "Diego, walk thou the st. that leads about the Prado; I'll round the W. part of the city; meet me at the I. c."

INSKEITH (i.e. INCHKEITH). An island in the Firth of Forth, on the E. coast of Scotland, a little over 3 m. N. of Leith. In Sampson's Vow i. 3, 20, the Herald is instructed to convey the Scots hostages "from the red Brayes to I." In iii. 3, 1, Crosse brings word that the Bp. of Valens is "Newly anchored in the haven of I."

INVERNESS. An ancient city in Scotland on the Ness, abt. $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from its mouth, at the head of Moray Firth, 155 m. N.W. of Edinburgh. The castle of Macbeth, in which he murdered Duncan, is said to have been on a hill S.W. of the town. It was razed to the ground by Malcolm Canmore, who built another on the S. of the town on the site now occupied by the courthouse and gaol. In Mac. i. 4, 42, Duncan says to Macbeth, "From hence to I. And bind us further to you"; and the rest of Acts I and II take place in Macbeth's castle at I.

IONIA. A dist. on the W. coast of Asia Minor, extending from Phocæa to Miletus. It was colonized by the Greeks about 1050 B.C., and included the cities of Ephesus and Miletus, and the islands of Samos and Chios. In Ant. i. 2, 107, the Messenger brings Antony word of Labienus: "His conquering banner shook from Syria To Lydia and to I." This was in 40 B.C., when Labienus, having allied himself with Orodes, K. of Parthia, overran the whole of Asia Minor after routing Antony's lieutenant. In T. Heywood's Dialogues xiii. 4271, Mausolus boasts, "The great'st part of I. I laid waste." In Chapman's Cæsar iii. 1, 126, Pompey says that the Roman Genius is not "rocked asleep soon, like the In. spirit." The reference is to the easy acquiescence of the Ins. in the Persian rule, but in the passage in Plutarch's De Fortuna Romanorum ii. from which this is taken the words are "neque subito sopitus ut Colophoniorum." Colophon was an In. city on the coast of Asia Minor, 15 m. N. of Ephesus. The Ionic order in architecture is more ornate than the Doric, but less elaborate than the Corinthian. It is characterized by the spiral volute of the capitals. Hall, in Satires v. 2, 36, says, "There findest thou some stately Doric frame Or neat Ionic work." The name In. was applied by the Hebrews, in the form of Javan, to the whole of the Hellenic world. Milton, P. L. i. 508, speaks of the Greek gods, Saturn, Jove, etc., as "The In. gods—of Javan's issue held Gods."

IONIAN SEA. The portion of the Adriatic Sea between Greece and S. Italy: it is sometimes used as synonymous with the Adriatic. The I. Islands take their name from it. In A. & C. iii. 7, 23, Antony, speaking of Cæsar, says, "Is it not strange That from Tarentum and Brundusium He could so quickly cut the I. sea And take in Toryne ? " This was in 31 B.C., just before the battle of Actium. In Cæsar's Rev. i. 6, Cæsar says, " To chase the flying Pompey have I cut The great I. and Egean seas." This was in 48 B.C., after the battle of Pharsalia. In the old Timon iii. 3, Pseudolus tells Gelasimus at Athens that the ship which is to transport him to the Antipodes " as yet is in the I. sea "; whereupon Gelasimus sends a messenger to Pyreum to enquire " If any ship hath there arrived this day From the I. Sea." In Randolph's Muses v. 1, Mediocrity speaks of the Isthmus of Corinth as " the small isthmus That suffers not the Ægean tide to meet The violent rage of the I. wave." In Hercules iv. 3, 2255, Jove, in the person of Amphitruo, claims to have subdued the pirates who " awed . . . the I., Ægean, and Cretick seas."

IOS. The chief town of the island of the same name in the Ægean Sea, lying N. of Thera and S. of Naxos. It was famous as the burial place of Homer. In Lyly's Gallathea, prol., he says, " I. and Smyrna were 2 sweet cities, the 1st named of the Violet, the latter of the Myrrh; Homer was born in the one and buried in the other."

IPSWICH. The county town of Suffolk, at the head of the estuary of the Orwell, 68 m. N.E. of Lond. It received its 1st charter from John in 1199. In Bale's Johan 272, Verity says of John: " Great monuments are in I., Dunwich, and Bury, Which noteth him to be a man of notable mercy." Wolsey was born in I., and founded a college there in 1528, of which the gateway still remains. It was overthrown at his fall. In H8 i. 1, 138, Buckingham, speaking of Wolsey, says, " I'll to the K. and quite cry down This I. fellow's insolence." In iv. 2, 59, Griffith says of Wolsey: " He was most princely; ever witness for him Those twins of learning that he raised in you, I., and Oxford; one of which fell with him." In Mayne's Match ii. 2, Aurelia says of the Puritan maid, Dorcas: " As though She were inspired from I., she will make The Acts and Monuments in sweetmeats; quinces Arraigned and burnt at a stake." The reference is to Prynne's book, The News from Ipswich and the Divine Tragedy, Recording God's Fearful Judgments against Sabbath-breakers. 1636." for which he was sentenced to lose the rest of his ears. In Dekker's News from Hell, he says, " The miles [between England and Hell] are not half so long as those between Colchester and I. in England." The Ch. of St. Mary possessed an image of the Virgin which was credited with special virtues and was the object of numerous pilgrimages. Sir Thomas More, in Works, p. 140, says, " They will make comparisons between our Lady of Ippiswitch and our Lady of Walsingham; as wening that one image more of power than the other."

IRASSA. A dist. on the N. coast of Africa, abt. 75 m. E. of Cyrene, where Pindar (Pyth. ix, 114) locates the wrestling between Heracles and Antæus. Milton, P. R. iv. 564, says, " Satan . . . fell, as when Earth's son, Antæus . . . in I. strove With Jove's Alcides and, oft foiled, still rose, Receiving from his mother Earth new strength."

IRELAND (Ih. = Irish, In. = Irishman, Ien. = Irishmen). The island separated from England by the Ih. (or St. George's) Channel. It was inhabited by a branch of the Celts, and the language was akin to the Gælic and Welsh. It was christianized by St. Patrick in the early part of the 5th century, but there were some Christian communities there before his arrival. It was governed by local chieftains, who were often at war with one another. In 1155 Pope Hadrian

IV granted I. to Henry II of England, and the beginning was made of the English settlement in and around Dublin, in what came to be known as the English Pale. Richard II visited I., but no English king crossed the Ih. Channel again until James II, after his flight from England, went to I. and began the campaign which ended in the battle of the Boyne. Elizabeth's policy was successful in bringing all I. under English control, and James I, by his colonization of Ulster, laid the foundations of the future prosperity of the N.E. of the island, and incidentally furnished an outlet for energetic but impecunious English and Scotch men, who went there, as they did to Virginia, to repair their fortunes.

Geographical features. The channel separating England from I. was known as the Rase of I. Huycke, p. 88, tells how, on his travels, he met " a great navy full of people that would into Irlonde," and he rejoices that they " were all drowned in the rase of Irlonde." About 1/4th of the surface of I. is covered with bogs. In Err. iii. 2, 119, Dromio says that I. is in the buttocks of his kitchen-maid: " I found it," he says, " by the bogs." In T. Heywood's Ed. IV A. 28, Spicing, the rebel, says to the Londoners, " We made your walls to shake like Ih. bogs." Armin, in Ninnies Pref., says, " I have in this book gone through I.; if I do stick in the bogs help me out, not with your good skene head me." In Jonson's Ev. Man O. ii. 11, Carlo talks of " our nimble-spirited catsos that will run over a bog like your Wild Ih."

Allusions to history. In Mac. ii. 3, 144, Donalbain, after the murder of Duncan, takes refuge in I. In K. J. i. 1, 11, Arthur lays claim to I. as part of the possessions of the K. of England. In Bale's Johan 1364, Private Wealth arranges for the publication of the Interdict laid on England in John's reign " In Wales and in Erlond." In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 4, the K. appoints Gaveston " governor of I." This was in 1308, and Gaveston held the office with vigour and success for over a year. In R2 i. 4, 52, Richard decides to " make for I. presently" in order to deal with " The rebels that stand out in I." He goes thither in the interval between ii. 1 and ii. 2, and in ii. 2, 141, Bagot says, " I will to I. to his Majesty." During his absence Bolingbroke returns to England, as he relates in H4 A. iv. 3, 88: " When he was personal in the Ih. war "; and in v. 1, 53, he says that Richd. " held So long in his unlucky Ih. wars That all in England did repute him dead." This was in 1399. In Trag. Richd. II, one of the characters is the Duchess of I. This lady was the wife of Robert de Vere, whom Richd. had created D. of I. He was driven into exile by Gloucester and his party in 1387, and died in the Netherlands. In H6 B. i. 1, 194, Salisbury refers to York's " acts in I. In bringing them to civil discipline." York was sent as viceroy to I. in 1449. In iii. 1, 282, news comes that " the rebels in I. are up," and the task of quelling the rebellion is committed to York, who accepts it with the view of making I. his base for an attack on the Lancastrians. Accordingly, in iv. 9, 24, it is reported that " The D. of York is newly come from I. [and] is marching hitherward." In v. 1, York enters with his army of Ih. in the fields between Dartford and Blackheath, and says, " From I. thus comes York to claim his right." This was in 1450. In Ford's Warbeck i. 3, Clifford informs the K. that Warbeck shapes his course " for I." Warbeck landed at Cork in 1492 and secured many partisans there. In H8 ii. 1, 42, one of the gentlemen speaks of " Kildare's attainer, Then deputy of I.; who removed, Earl Surrey was sent thither ": Kildare had besieged Dublin in 1534, and was deprived of his position in consequence. In iii. 2, 260, Surrey upbraids

Wolsey with having sent him "deputy for I." in order to get him out of the way when Buckingham was arrested and executed. In Peele's Alcazar v. 1, 157, Stucley says, "There was I graced by Gregory the Gt. That then created me Marquess of I." The Pope encouraged Stucley to attack I. in 1578, and gave him this title, but he turned aside to help Sebastian and was killed at Alcazar. Stucley had previously been sent to I. by Cecil in 1565, entered into negotiations with Shane O'Neil, and defended Dundalk against him in 1566. The story is told in Stucley. In H5 v. prol. 31, we have: "Were now the general of our gracious Empress, As in good time he may, from I. coming, Bringing rebellion broached upon his sword, How many would the peaceful city quit To welcome him!" The Earl of Essex left England to suppress Tyrone's rebellion on March 27th 1599, and returned, after failing to do anything, on Sept. 28th. This fixes the date of this passage (not necessarily of the whole play) as being between these dates. In Ret. Pernass. iv. 2, Sir Roderick says, "What have we here? 3 begging soldiers. Come you from Ostend or from I.?" The reference is to beggars who pretended to have served in the Ih. expedition of Essex. In Jack Drum i. 1. Drum says that a usurer "will waste more substance than Ireland soldiers." Again the reference is to the cost of Essex's expedition. In Chapman's Bussy iv. 1, 153, Pero says, "Whence is it You rush upon her with these Ih. wars More full of sound than hurt?" This passage appears only in the 2nd edition of the play, and probably refers to the futile revolts of Tyrone and Tyrconnel in 1607, and of O'Doherty in 1608. Armin, in Ninny's Pref., says, "If you should rebel like the Ih., 'twere much." In Jonson's Epicoene ii. 3, Morose threatens that his nephew's fortune "shall not have hope to repair itself by Constant-nople, I., or Virginia." The reference is to the efforts made by James I to colonize Ulster in 1611, when the title of Baronet was created to raise funds for this purpose, and desperate men were invited to repair their fortunes by settling there. In Cooke's Greene's Quoque i. 2, Staines says, "I am spent; my refuge is I. or Virginia."

The patron Saint of I. is St. Patrick. He was a Scotchan, born at Kilpatrick near Dumbarton, and went as a missionary to I. in the early part of the 5th cent. Shirley's St. Patrick gives a highly imaginative story of his career. In Kirke's Champions, Patrick appears as the champion of I. Patrick became a favourite name in I., and In. are often called "Patricks," or "Pats." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii. 1, Orlando, speaking of Bryan, the Ih. footman, says, "Little St. Patrick knows all." The arms of I., according to Heylyn, are "Blue, an Ih. harp Or, stringed Argent."

The Shamrock (Trifolium Minus) was used by St. Patrick as an emblem of the Trinity, and so became the national plant of I. It was often eaten by the native Ih. In Sharpham's Fleire iii. 342, Fleire names amongst his customers "Master Oscabath the In., and Master Shamrough his lackey." Taylor, in Sir Greg. Nonsense (1622), says, "All the Hibernian kerns in multitudes Did feast with shamerags steeped in usquebaugh." Wither, in Abuses Stript (1613) i. 8, speaks of people who "feed on shamrootes as the Ih. do."

National character. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge iii, describes the In. as loving to wear a saffron shirt (saffron being supposed to be fatal to lice), hasty in temper; keeping a hobby, a garden, and a cart; he can make good Ih. frieze, aqua vitæ, and good square dice; he is bitten by lice, eats sitting on the ground;

boils his food in a beast's skin, and lives in poverty in his own country. Heylyn (s.v. IRELAND) says, "The people are generally strong and nimble of body, haughty of heart, careless of their lives, patient of cold and hunger, implacable in enmity, constant in love, light of belief, greedy of glory; in a word: if they be bad, you shall find nowhere worse; if they be good, you shall hardly meet with better." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says of the Ih.: "they are very proper men, many of them, and as active as the clouds; and stout, exceeding stout; why, I warrant this precious wild villain would fight more desperately than 16 Dunkirks." The Ih. native soldiers were known as gallowglasses and kerns. According to Dymmok, Ireland (1600), 7, the Gallowglasses were "picked and selected men of great and mighty bodies, cruel without compassion." They were armed with pole-axes or hatchets. The word is the Ih. gall-oglach, i.e. a foreign warrior. Dymmok, Ireland 7, describes the kern as "a kind of footman, slightly armed with a sword, a target of wood, or a bow and sheaf of arrows with barbed heads, or else 3 darts." The word is the Celtic "Ceithern," pronounced "kehern." In R2 ii. 1, 156, the K. says, "Now for our Ih. wars; we must supplant These rough, rug-headed kerns." In H5 iii. 7, 56, the Dauphin says to the Constable, "You rode like a kern of I., your French hose off, and in your strait strossers," i.e. tight-fitting trews. Theobald absurdly takes it to mean with no breeches, but their own skins! In H6 B. iii. 1, 310, the Cardinal says, "The uncivil kerns of I. are in arms." Later, in 361, York tells how Cade in I. "Opposed himself unto a troop of kerns," and disguised himself "like a shag-headed crafty kern" to spy on them. In iv. 9, 26, news is brought that "The D. of York is come from I. And with a puissant and a mighty power Of gallowglasses and stout kerns Is marching hitherward." In Mac. i. 2, 13, the Serjeant reports: "The merciless Macdonwald . . . from the western isles Of kerns and gallowglasses is supplied." But Macbeth "Compelled these skipping kerns to trust their heels." In v. 7, 17, Macduff says, "I cannot strike at wretched kerns whose arms are hired to bear their staves." In Marlowe's Ed. II ii. 2, Lancaster says, "The wild Oneyl, with swarms of Ih. kerns, Lives uncontrolled within the English Pale." In Hughes' Misfort. Arth. iii. 1, Arthur describes Modred's army as made up of "sluggish Saxons crew and Ih. kerns." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says, "Look what difference there is between a civil citizen of Dublin and a wild Ih. kerne." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxv. 12, says, "Let the Bards within that Ih. isle . . . mollify the slaughtering Gallowglass."

The native Ih. were also known as the Wild Ih., as distinguished from the English-Ih. of the Pale; and as red-shanks, from their going bare-legged. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge iii., says, "The other part of I. is called the wild Irysh; and the Redshanks be among them." In Middleton's Quarrel ii. 2, Chough calls the Scotch and the Ih. "redshanks." In Ford's Warbeck iii. 2, we have the direction: "Enter Warbeck's followers disguised as 4 Wild Ih. in trowses, long-haired, and accordingly habited." In Brome's Covent G. i. 1, Crosswill says to his son, who is studying the Law, "Dost thou waste thy time in learning a language that I understand not a word of? I had been as good have brought thee up among the wild Ih.": who, of course, talked Erse. In Dekker's Match me iv. 1, the K. says, "Sirrah, cast your darts elsewhere." And Cordolente responds: "Among the wild Ih., Sir." The reference is to the dart which was carried as a badge of office by the Ih. footboys in London. In his Lanthorn 3, he says: "The devil's footman was very nimble of his heels, for no wilde-Ih. man could outrun him." In Middleton's Phoenix i. 5, the jeweller's wife asks: "Would he venture his body into a barber's shop, where he knows 'tis as dangerous a place as I.?" The English in the Pale were in constant danger of attacks by the wild Ih. The English charged them with savage cruelty. In Webster's White Devil iii. 2, Francesco de Medici says of Brachiano, "Like the wild Ih., I'll ne'er count thee dead Till I can play at football with thy head."

To break wind in an In.'s presence was regarded as a deadly insult. In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Bryan says, "Dow knowest an In. cannot abide a fart." In Marston's Malcontent iii. 3, Mendoza says, "The D. hates thee." And Malevole adds: "As Irishmen do bum-cracks." In Webster's White Devil ii. 1, Flammineo tells of a doctor who "was minded to have prepared a deadly vapour in a Spaniard's fart that should have poisoned all Dublin." In Ford's Sun iv. 1, Folly says, "Hey-hoes! a god of winds! there's four-and-twenty of them imprisoned in my belly; and how sweet the roaring of them will be, let an In. judge!" Nash, in Pierce D. 1, says, "The In. will draw his dagger and be ready to kill and slay, if one break wind in his company." In B. & F. Cure iv. 3, Bobadilla says of the effeminate Lucio: "He looks as if he were murdering [i.e. trying to suppress] a fart Among wild Ih. swaggerers."

Dress and general appearance. In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings of the headgear of various nations, "The German loves his cony-wool, The In. his shag too": where shag means a cap of rough frieze. In Webster's White Devil v. 3, Francesco says to Zanche, "Lest thou should'st take cold, I covered thee with this Ih. mantle," i.e. a cloak of rough frieze: a double entendre may be suspected. Heylyn (s.v. FRANCE) speaks of "The trouzers which are worn by the Ih. footmen, and are called in Latin braccæ." Shirley, in Love Tricks i. 1, uses the phrase "as close as a pair of trusses to an In.'s buttocks." In T. Heywood's Challenge iii., Manhurst says, "I am clean out of love with your Ih. trowises; they are like a jealous wife, always close at a man's tail." See also above the quotation from H5 iii. 7, 56. In the directions for the dumb show in Hughes' Misfort. Arth. ii. 1, we have: "A man bare-headed with long black shagg'd hair down to his shoulders, apparelled with an Ih. jacket and shirt, having an Ih. dagger by his side and a dart in his hand." Dekker, in Hornbook iii., says, "It was free to all nations to have shaggy pates as it is now only for the In." In B. & F. Coxcomb ii. 3, Antonio, who is disguised as an Ih. footman, is addressed by Maria as "Sirrah Thatched-head." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says, "It goes, the In. for his hand, the Welshman for a leg, the Englishman for a face, the Dutchman for a beard."

Customs and practices of the Native, or Wild, Irish. It was the custom, both in I. and Scotland, to use a withy instead of a rope in hanging malefactors. In Oldcastle v. 11, the In. prays: "Let me be hanged in a withe after my country—the Ih.—fashion." The Ih. were inveterate gamblers. In Webster's White Devil i. 2, Flammineo compares Camillo to "an Ih. gamester that will play himself naked, and then wage all downwards at hazard." The Ih. game was a kind of backgammon: the object of the game is to remove all the men from the board after they have completed the round; the technical word for this is "bearing." The after-game, or 2nd game, was often very long protracted and difficult to finish. Barclay, in Ship of Fools (1509) 14, says, "Though one knew but the Yrishe game Yet would he have a gentleman's name." In Tarlton's Purgatory 74, we have: "Her husband, that loved Ih. well, thought it no ill trick to bear a man too many." In B. & F. Hon. Man v. 1, Montague, wishing to qualify himself as a good, domesticated husband, says, "I shall learn to love ale and play at two-hand Ih." In Shirley's St. Patrick, the Epilogue says, "Howe'er the dice run, gentleman, I am the last man borne still at the Ih. game." In Middleton's R. G. iv. 2, Gallipot says, "Play out your game at Ih., Sir; who wins?" And Mrs. Openwork adds: "The trial is, when she comes to bearing": with an obvious double entendre. In Webster's Law Case iv. 2, Sanitonella tells of a law-case which "has proved like an after-game at Ih.," i.e. has been long protracted. In B. & F. Scornful v. 4, the Lady says, "I would have . . . been longer bearing than ever after-game at I. was." Howell, in Familiar Letters (1650), says, "Though you have learnt to play at backgammon, you must not forget Ih., which is a more serious and solid game." It was the custom for the women to offer to kiss the men when they wished to show affection. In W. Rowley's Match Mid. i. 1, the Widow says, "I was bred in I., where the women begin the salutation." The Ih. were apt to get noisy and rowdy in their social gatherings; and the word Hubbub was coined from the Ih. war-cry "Abu": to mean a noisy gathering. In Ford's Warbeck ii. 3, when a masque is proposed in connection with Warbeck's visit to I. in 1492, Astley says, "There have been Ih. hubbubs where I have made one too." The Ih. jig was, and is, a well-known lively dance. In Middleton's Women beware iii. 3, the Ward says: "Her heels keep together, so, as if she were beginning an Ih. dance." Dekker, in Catchpol, says, "The dance was an infernal Ih.-hay, full of mad and wild changes." The Bards, or Filid, formed an important element in the literary life of I. during the earlier times, and individual members of the order were still credited with the power of prophecy. In R3 iv. 2, 109, Richd. says, "A bard of I. told me once I should not live long after I saw Richmond." The Ih. lords were for the most part impecunious, through the constant disturbances in the country. In Massinger's Madam iii. 1, Dingem tells Goldwire that an Ih. lord has offered Shavem "5 pound a week" to marry him.

The Irish belonged to the Roman Ch., and after the Reformation in England religious animosity fanned the flame of political controversy between the 2 countries. In Cowley's Cutter i. 4, Cutter tells of the arrival of an Ih. priest "in the habit of a fish-wife . . . he's to lie ligger here for a whole Ih. college beyond sea." In Ford's Warbeck i. 3, the K. says that Warbeck has "advanced his fiery blaze for adoration to the superstitious Ih." In Jonson's Devil v. 1, Ambler tells how he had "to walk in a rug, barefoot, to St. Giles's." Whereon Meercraft exclaims: "a kind of Ih. penance." Funerals were celebrated with vigils or wakes, where much whisky was drunk, with the usual effect. In Webster's White Devil iv. 1, Brachiano says, "Ye'd furnish all the Ih. funerals With howling past wild Ih." In Devonshire iv. 2, the Friar says, "We, though friars in Spain, were born in I." The national instrument was the harp, which appears in the coat-of-arms. In Underwit ii. 2, Courtwell says, "I shall hear sadder notes Upon the Irich harp." Drayton, in Odes (1606) i. 71, says, "The Ih. I admire And still cleave to that lyre As our Music's mother." In verses prefixed to Coryat's Crudities (1611), Vadianus says of the author: "Tom is an Ih. harp whose heartstrings' tune As fancies wrest doth strain or slack his cord." The bagpipes were also native to I. In Dekker's If it be 288, Brisco speaks of "Welsh harps, Ih. bagpipes, Jews' trumps, and French kitts." The national drink was usquebaugh, i.e. "uisge beathè," water of life, or aqua vitæ: our modern whisky. It was distilled from malted barley. In M. W. W. ii. 2, 318, Ford says, "I will rather trust an In. with my aqua-vitæ bottle than my wife with herself." In T. Heywood's Lucrece iii. 5, Valerius sings: "The Briton he metheglin quaffs, The Ih. aqua-vitæ." In Marston's Malcontent v. 1, there is a song: "The Dutchman for a drunkard, The Dane for golden locks, The In. for usquebaugh, The Frenchman for the pox." In B. & F. Coxcomb ii. 3, Antonio, disguised as an Ih. footman, is addressed by Maria as "aqua-vitæ barrel." In Penn. Parl. 35, it is enacted: "He that takes Ih. aqua-vitæ by the pint may by the Law stumble without offence and break his face." In Marston's Insatiate iv. 4, Zucco says, "The In. shall have aquavity, the Welshman cheese." In Webster's Law Case iii. 2, the surgeon talks of "choking an In., that were three quarters drowned, with pouring usquebaugh in's throat." In Cartwright's Ordinary i. 4, Slicer says, "The Ih. savour of usquebaugh." Almost the only manufacture of I. was a rough kind of frieze of which rugs were made. In W. Rowley's New Wonder ii. 1, Stephen says, "It had been better thou hadst been pressed to death under 2 Ih. rugs." Ih. money was a base coinage and of little value. In Middleton's Phœnix iii. 1, Falso says, "Your master feeds you with lean spits, pays you with Ih. money."

Natural Products of Ireland. Animals: The Ih. horses, known as hobbies, were small, ambling ponies. In Boorde, Intro. of Knowledge iii. 131, the In. says: "I am an Iryshe man . . . I can keep a hobby." In Stucley 1910, Stucley presents "30 Ih. jades" to Philip of Spain. Dekker, in Hornbook iv., says that the Gull must "keep an Ih. hobby, an Ih. horseboy, and himself like a gentleman." In Davenant's Albivine iv. 1, Grimold says, "Be cropeared like Ih. nags." In Davenport's Matilda iii. 2, the K. says, "They would have called a scare-crow stuffed with straw, And bound upon a 10 groats Ih. garron The glorious Richmond on his fiery steed." The Ih. rat was supposed to be readily killed by incantations, or magic rhymes. In As iii. 2, 188, Rosalind says, "I was never so be-rhymed since Pythagoras' time, when I was an Ih. rat." Randolph, in Jealous Lovers v. 2, says, "My poets Shall with a satire steeped in gall and vinegar Rhyme 'em to death, as they do rats in I." In Jonson's Poetaster Epil., the author says of his critics: "I could rhyme them to death, as they do Ih. rats, in drumming tunes." Sidney, in Apol. for Poetry 72, prays "not to be rimed to death, as is said to be done in I." In Jonson's Staple iv., Intermean. Censure, speaking of Pennyboy Canter, says, "I would have . . . the fine madrigal-man in rhyme to have run him out of the country, like an Ih. rat." I. is free from venomous snakes. According to tradition, they were all expelled by St. Patrick. Boorde, in Intro. of Knowledge iii., says, "In Ierland is stupendous things; for there is neither pyes nor venomous worms . . . English merchants do fetch of the earth of Irlonde to cast in their gardens, to keep out and kill venomous worms." In R2 ii. 1, 157, the K. says, "We must supplant those rough, rug-headed kerns, Which live like venom, where no venom else, But only they have privilege to live." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii. 1, Hippolito calls Bryan "that Ih. Judas, bred in a country where no venom prospers but in the nation's blood." Flamíneo, in Webster's White Devil ii. 1, says, "I. breeds no poisons." In Fisher's Fuimus iii. 1, Cassibelan says, "Ih. earth doth poison poisonous beasts." In Brome's Concubine iv. 9, Horatio says, "I'll undertake to find more toads in I. Than rebels in Palermo." Hall, in Satires iv. 3, says, "An Ih. toad to see Were as a chaste man nursed in Italy," i.e. there is no such thing. Connected with this was the belief that Ih. wood is deadly to spiders. The roof of Westminster Hall was built of Ih. wood for that reason (see WESTMINSTER HALL). In Jonson's Alchemist ii. 1, Mammon says that cedar wood, which is proof against worms, is "like your Ih. wood 'gainst cobwebs." Lice were, however, plentiful enough; saffron and staves-acre were used to destroy them. In Dekker's Westward iii. 3, Justiniano says, "There were many punks in town, as common as lice in I." In Middleton's Blurt i. 2, Lazarillo says, "Your Ih. louse doth bite most naturally 14 weeks after the change of your saffron-seasoned shirt." In Wise Men vii. 1, Insatiato says, "This saffroning was never used but in I., for bodily linen, to dissipate the company of creepers." Nash, in Lenten Pref., (p. 289), speaks of the "quantity of Staves aker we must provide us of to kill lice in that rugged country of rebels," i.e. I. There were large numbers of wolves in I. up to the end of the 17th cent. In 1662 the House of Commons was moved to take measures to deal with "the great increase of wolves" in I. The last of them is said to have been killed in 1710. In As v. 2, 119, Rosalind says, "No more of this; 'tis like the howling of Ih. wolves against the moon." In Day's Gulls iv. 1, Dorus says, "Like an Ih. wolf, she barks at her own shadow." Other products: There are some good marbles to be obtained in I., particularly the black marble of Kilkenny and the white of Connemara. Spenser, F. Q. ii. 9, 24, speaks of "Jett or marble far from I. brought." A variant reading is Ireland.

There are still about 120 curious round-towers in different parts of I. They are circular in shape and somewhat tapering towards the top. They are usually near to a ch. They date between the 8th and the 13th cents., and were probably intended as refuges in times of inter-tribal war. Nash, in Lenten (p. 316), says that Hero's Tower was "such another tower as one of our Ih. castles, that is not so wide as a belfry, and a cobbler cannot jerk out his elbows in."

The Ih. language, or Erse, is a branch of the Celtic family of the Indo-European group. It is still spoken in parts of I., and a patriotic attempt to revive it is now going on. In H4 A. iii. 1, 241, Hotspur, being asked to hear Lady Mortimer sing in Welsh, says, "I had rather hear Lady, my brach, howl in Ih." Probably the dog was an Ih. terrier. In Dekker's Match me iii., Gazetto says, "I do speak English when I'd move pity, when dissemble, Ih." Dekker, in Lanthorn, says that before the confusion of tongues there was "no unfruitful, crabbed Ih." The Ih. pronunciation of English is ridiculed in many plays. The chief points are the use of "sh" for "s," the sharpening of the flat mutes ("p" for "b," etc.), the substitution of "t" or "d" for "th" and the pronunciation of "i" as "e." It is nothing like the Ih. brogue as we understand it, which is a product of the 18th cent., and in some points reproduces what was then the current pronunciation, e.g. "say" for "sea," "jine" for "join." Examples are Captain Macmorris, "an In., a very valiant gentleman," in H5 iii. 2; Bryan, the Ih. footman in Dekker's Hon. Wh. B.; the In. in Oldcastle; the disguised Andelocia in Dekker's Fortunatus; the disguised Antonio in B. & F. Coxcomb; and the 4 footmen in Jonson's Irish Masque.

The Irish in England. The Ih. who had come over to England were usually of the lowest class. Many of them were beggars; and we find others employed as chimney-sweeps, costermongers, footboys, foot-racers, and beaters for game. In Day's Humour ii. 2, Octavio says, "I am like an Ih. beggar, will stick close where I find a good nap." Dekker, in Bellman, says, "An Ih. Toyle is a sturdy vagabond who stalks up and down the country with a wallet at his back in which he carries laces, pins, points, and such like, and so commits many villainies." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico asks: "Why should all your chimney sweepers be Irishmen?" And Carolo explains that it is because St. Patrick keeps purgatory: "he makes the fire and his countrymen could do nothing if they cannot sweep the chimneys." In Noble Soldier iii. 3, Baltasar says, "I can be a chimney sweeper with the Ih." In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 1, Face says that Doll's father was "an Ih. costermonger." In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. i. 1, Lodovico says, "In England all costermongers are Ien." In his Fortunatus iv. 2, Andelocia and Shadow enter "disguised as Ih. costermongers," and talk the usual English-Ih. lingo. In his Westward ii. 2, Birdlime says, "Ien. love to be costermongers." In Field's Amends ii. 3, "Enter Maid like an Ih. foot-boy with a dart." The dart was carried as a badge of office. Brathwayte, in Time's Curtain Drawn (1621), mentions "two Ih. lacquies" amongst the attendants of a courtier. Bryan, "an Ih. footman," is one of the characters in Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. Talking of him, Lodovico says, "You have many of them like this fellow, especially those of his hair, footmen to noblemen and others, and the knaves are very faithful where they love." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 4, Trim wishes that Meg may be escorted by "10 beadies running by, instead of footmen"; and Chough adds: "with every one a whip, 'stead of an Ih. dart." In B. & F. Coxcomb ii. 3, Antonio disguises himself as "an Ih. footman with a letter." Middleton, in Black Book, says, "Away they ran like Ih. lacquies." In Puritan i. 4, Pyeboard says he will cause the devil "with most Ih. dexterity to fetch his [Sir Godfrey's] chain." In Shirley's Hyde Park iii. 1, a race takes place on the stage between "an Ih. and an English footman," and is run amid shouts of "A Teague! A Teague! Well run, Ih.!" In Dekker's Hon. Wh. B. iii. 1, Orlando, speaking of Bryan, the Ih. footman, says, "That Ih. shackatory beats the bush for him and knows all." Shackatory is possibly a corruption of the Italian "Cacciatore": a hunter, or beater.

IRELAND YARD. A court in Lond., on the W. side of St. Andrew's Hill, formerly Puddledock Hill, off Q. Victoria St., near Blackfriars Bdge. Shakespeare bought a house here. The Deed of Conveyance is shown in the Guildhall Library. It is described as "abutting upon a st. leading down to Puddle Wharf, and now or late in the tenure or occupation of one William I.": from him no doubt I. Y. got its name.

IRISH SEA. The sea between England and Ireland: sometimes known as St. George's Channel. In Marlowe's Ed. II i. 4, Mortimer speaks of "that vile torpedo Gaveston, That now, I hope, floats on the I. seas." It is called the Rase of Irlonde by Hycke, p. 88: he rejoices that all the ship's company of Virtues were "drowned in the Rase of Irlonde." Drayton, in Polyolb. ix. 146, speaks of Carnarvonsh. as "that straitened point of land Into the I. sea which puts his powerful hand." In note prefixed to Lycidas, Milton says, "In this Monody the Author bewails a learned friend unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the I. Seas, 1637." Burton, A. M. i. 2, 3, 10, says, "Our whole life is an I. sea, wherein there is nought to be expected but tempestuous storms and troublesome waves." In iii. 2, 5, 3, he says: "An I. sea is not so turbulent and raging as a litigious wife."

ISCA (now the Usk). A river rising in, and flowing through, Brecknocksh. and Monmouthsh. into the estuary of the Severn at Newport, after a course of 60 m. In Lochrine iii. 1, 68, Camber says that he has an army "in the fields of martial Cambria Close by the boisterous Iscan's silver streams." Browne, in Britannia's Pastorals ii. 3, says, "Not Pelops' shoulder whiter than her hands, Nor snowie swans that jet on I.'s sands."

ISEBROOK, ISENBOROUGH. See INNSBRUCK.

ISHMAEL, CHILDREN OF. The descendants of Ishmael, the son of Abraham by Hagar: the Arabs. It is applied also, though wrongly, to the Turks. In Webster's Malfi i. 1, Castruccio tells of a jest his wife made "of a captain she met full of wounds." She "told him he was a pitiful fellow to lie, like the children of Ismael, all in tents." There is a play on the double meaning of tent: a tabernacle and a roll of lint for bandaging or probing a wound. In Jonson's Alchemist iv. 3, Doll, in her assumed mad fit, talks of raising "the building up of Helen's house Against the Ismaelite." This is intended to be mere nonsense. In Day's Travails (Bullen, p. 17), Sir Antony says to the Turkish Bashaw, "Stir not, thou son of Ismael, or thou diest." Spenser, F. Q. iii. 3, 6, speaks of "the Africk Ismael" as a remote part of the world: apparently identifying the Saracens who conquered N. Africa with the Iites. Milton, in Trans. Ps. lxxxiii. 22, speaks of "the brood Of scornful I." amongst the enemies of Israel.

ISIS. Strictly the name of the Thames, from its source in the Cotswolds, close to Cirencester, up to its junction with the Cherwell, just below Oxford: Oxford and Cambridge being often referred to as the universities of the I. and the Cam respectively. Indeed, it is poetically used as a synonym for the Thames from source to mouth. In Fisher's Fuimus ii. 8, there is a song: "Brutus by I.' current a 2nd Troy did frame." In Cæsar's Rev. iii. 2, Cæsar, recounting his own exploits, says, "I wept to see her daughter Thames Change her clear christal to vermilion sad." He refers to his defeat of the Britains at the Thames. Peele, in Farewell to Drake (1589), says, "Pleasant Thames from I.' silver head Begins her quiet glide." Spenser, in his river-list in F. Q. iv. 11, 24, says that the mother of the Thames is "The Ouzé, whom men do I. rightly name; Full weak and crooked creature seemed she, And almost blind through eld, that scarce her way could see." Drayton, in Idea (1594) xxxii. 9, says, "Cotswold commends her I. to the Tame."

ISLAND, ISLING. See ICELAND.

ISLANDS, THE. Specifically for the Spanish I. in the Atlantic (the Azores and W. Indies), especially in the phrase "the island voyage" = an expedition against the Spanish islands. In T. Heywood's Maid of West A. i. 1, the Capt. says, "Most men think the fleet's bound for the I." The reference is to the expedition against the Azores in 1597. In Dekker's Northward ii. 2, Kate says, "He pretended he would go the Island voyage." This refers to the expedition to Hispaniola in 1585. Dekker, in Hornbook v., says, "If you be a soldier, talk how often you have been in action: as the Portingale voyage, Cales voyage, the Island voyage." Drake led this expedition, which consisted of 21 ships, manned by 2000 volunteers. They took San Domingo, Cartagena, and St. Augustine, and returned in 1586 with a booty of £60,000. In B. & F. Custom iii. 5, the Governor of Lisbon says that Hippolyta has lent the city 100,000 crowns "Towards the setting forth of the last navy Bound for the I."

ISLINGTON (also spelt ISENDONE, ISELDONE, YSELDON, EYSELDON, and HISSLTON). One of the N. suburbs of Lond., lying N. of Clerkenwell as far as Highgate and W. of Hackney as far as St. Pancras, and covering about 3000 acres. Until the 19th cent. it was a rural vill., quite separate from the City. Latimer, in Sermon before Edward VI (1550), says, "What is Lond. to Ninive? Like a vill., as I. or such another, in comparison of Lond." In 1559 Elizabeth was beset by a number of rogues "in her coach near Islyington" (Letter of Fleetwood to Cecil). In Laneham's Letter (1575), it is described as "the worshipful village of I. in Middlesex, well known to be one of the most ancient and best towns in England next Lond. at this day." In Oldcastle, Acton mentions I. as one of the villages round Lond. where the rebels are assembled (iii. 2). There they are to draw to a head (iii. 4); and in iv. 1, Butler says that he was scouting near to I. when he saw "armed men coming down Highgate Hill." In Jonson's Tub i. 1, Hugh mentions "In-and-In Medlay, cooper of I., and head-borough" as one of the self-styled Council of Finsbury. In T. Heywood's Hogsdon v. 4, Chartley, on his way to Hoxton, "rid out of Holborn, turned by I." In Middleton's Quarrel iv. 1, Chough says he heard the "roarers from the 6 windmills [in Finsbury Fields] to I." In Shirley's C. Maid iv. 1, Close, when found wandering about by the watch, explains: "I have been at I. about business." In Davenport's New Trick iii. 1, Friar John says, "We are now at I.; what hope have we to get to Crutched Friars before the gates be shut?" The fields were a haunt of thieves and beggars. In T. Heywood's Royal King iv., the Clown says, "Let me find you between Wood's Close stile and I. with 'Will it please your worship to bestow the price of 2 cans upon a poor soldier?'" They were also used as a practising ground for archers and for the trainbands. In Glapthorne's Hollander ii. 1, Sconce speaks of "the great training last summer when the whole city went in arms to take in I." Duels were often fought there, one of the most famous being that between Sir James Stewart and Sir George Wharton in 1609, when both were killed. In Cooke's Good Wife v. 3, Old Arthur says to Old Lusam, "Meet me to-morrow morning beside I. and bring thy sword and buckler, if thou dar'st."

It was a favourite place for outings with the citizens, and the many dairies there supplied them with cream and cakes. Nash, in Wilton 35, says, "He made it as light a matter as to go to I. and eat a mess of cream." In Massinger's Madam iv. 4, Mary speaks of "Exchange wenches Coming from eating pudding-pies on a Sunday At Pimlico or I." In Shirley's Pleasure i. 2, Celestina, finding fault with her coach, says: "Twill hackney out to Mile-End, or convey your city tumblers, to be drunk with cream and prunes at I." In Glapthorne's Wit ii. 1, Valentine says, "You can have your meetings at I. and Green Goose Fair, and sip a zealous glass of wine." One of the favourite dishes was a whitepot, made of milk, eggs, and sugar, baked in a pot. In Dekker's Shoemaker's v. 4, Eyre says to Margery, "Away, you I. white-pot!" Withers, in Britannia's Remembrances (1628), says, "Hogsdone, I., and Tothnam Court For cakes and cream had there no small resort." The scene of Jordan's Walks of I. and Hogsdon (1641) is laid at the Saracen's Head, I., and the poet says, "Though the scene be I., we swear We will not blow ye up with bottle beer, Cram ye with creams." In Brome's Couple ii. 1, Careless offers to escort his aunt to "I., Newington, Paddington, Kensington, or any of the city out-leaps, for a spirt and back again." In his Academy iii. 2, Strigood says that Cash is "none of those that feast their tits at I. or Hogsden." Lodge, in Answer to Gosson, p. 30, says to his opponent, "I would wish him beware of his I. and such like resorts." In Middleton's R. G. iii. 1, Laxton, in Holborn, sees "two Inns-a-Court men with one wench: they walk toward I. out of my way." In Deloney's Craft i. 12, John and Florence "Appointed the next Sunday to go to I. together, and there to be merry." Gosson, in School of Abuse (1579), p. 37 (Arber), says of loose women: "They live a mile from the City like Venus' nuns in a cloister at Newington, Ratcliffe, I., Hogsdon, or some such place."

The Ducking Ponds were on I. Green, near White Conduit House, in the Back Road, where the reservoir of the New River Head afterwards stood. They were so called because they were used for the sport of duck-hunting. In Jonson's Ev. Man i. i. 1, Stephen says, "Because I dwell at Hogsdon, shall I keep company with none but the citizens that come a-ducking to I. ponds?" In Field's Amends iii. 4, Feesimple says, "Let the pond at I. be searched; there is more have drowned themselves for love this year than you are aware of." In Field's Weathercock iii. 3, Pendant says, "I think the pond at I. Will be her bathing tub, and give an end To mortal misery." Davenant, in Long Vacation, says: "Ho, ho! To I.! Enough; Fetch Job my son and our dog Ruffe; For there in pond through mire and muck We'll cry, 'Hey, duck there, Ruffe, hey, duck!'" The reservoir for the New River, constructed in 1613, was at I. In Middleton's Triumph of Truth, in the title, we read: "The running stream from Amwell Head in to the cistern at Islington." In B. & F. Wit S. W. iv. 1, Pompey says, "Direct him and his horses toward the New River by I."

ISMENUS. The eastern of the two rivers, or rather brooks, on which Thebes in Boeotia stands. It is now called Ai Ianni. Milton, P. R. iv. 575, describes how the Theban monster, the Sphinx, "Cast herself headlong from the Ismenian steep," i.e. from the cliffs near Thebes.

ISRAEL. The name given to Jacob after his wrestling with the Angel at the brook Jabbok: meaning "he who strives with God" (see Gen. xxxii. 28). It became the national name of the Hebrews, first in the form "children of I.," and then simply "Israelites," or "I." It is almost always used of the Hebrews of the Bible story, and has not the offensive connotation which was attached to "Jew." In Ham. ii. 2, 422, Hamlet exclaims to Polonius, "O Jephthah, judge of I., what a treasure hadst thou!" The reference is to an old ballad beginning: "I read that many years ago When Jephthah, Judge of I., Had one fair daughter and no more Whom he loved so passing well" (see Judges xi. 34). In Bale's Promises iv., Pater Coelestis says, "I will punish them, all I. shall it see." The reference is to the tribes who fought against I. In Greene & Lodge's Looking Glass iii. 1, Jonas says: "Lo, I., once that flourished like the vine, Is barren laid." In Marlowe's Jew ii. 1, Barabas prays: "O Thou that with a fiery pillar ledst The Sons of I. through the dismal shades" (see Exodus xiii. 21). In Marston's Malcontent iii. 2, Malevole says to Bilioso, an elderly husband with a pretty young wife, "Elder of I., when did thy wife let thee lie with her?" The allusion seems to be to the story of Susanna and the Elders told in the apocryphal book of Susanna. In Skelton's Magnificence fol. xvii., Magnificence speaks of "Syrus [i.e. Cyrus] that solemn czar of Babylon That Israell released of their captivity." In Gascoigne's Government i. 4, Gnomaticus says, "When the people of I. provoked Him at sundry times, He did yet at every submission stay His hand from punishment." In King Leir, Haz., p. 372, Leir says of his food: "It is as pleasant as the blessed manna That rained from heaven amongst the Israelites" (see Exodus xvi. 13). In Candlemas Prol., we are told, "Herod . . . commanded his knight forth to go anon Into all Israell to search every town and city" for the new-born king.

Milton uses the word frequently. In P. L. i. 412, he speaks of the apostasy of "I. in Sittim" (Numbers xxv.); in 432, of the frequent lapse of "the race of I." into idolatry; in 482, of I. worshipping the golden calf (Exodus xxxii.); in xii. 267, of their victory over the Canaanites at Ajalon (Joshua x.). In P. R. i. 216, our Lord reveals his early ambition "To rescue I. from the Roman yoke"; in 254, our Lord is known to the Magi as the "K. of I." (Matthew ii. 1); in ii. 36, the disciples rejoice in the hope that through our Lord "The kingdom shall to I. be restored"; and appeal to the "God of I." to send his Messiah forth; in 89, Simeon's word is quoted: "to the fall and rising he should be Of many in I." (Luke ii. 34). In ii. 311, the Tempter says, "All the race Of I. here had famished, had not God Rained from heaven manna" (Exodus xvi. 31); in 442, our Lord predicts that David's offspring shall "reign in I. without end." In iii. 279, the Tempter says of Salmanassar: "[his] success I. in long captivity still mourns." Shalmaneser took Samaria and carried the 10 tribes into captivity into Assyria 722 B.C. In 378, he speaks of the 10 tribes as "lost Thus long from I." In 410, David's sin in "numbering I." is referred to (I Chron. xxi. 1); in 441, our Lord is called "I.'s true king." In Milton's S. A. 179, Samson is said to have been "the glory late of I." In 285, the Chorus recalls how Jephtha "Defended I. from the Ammonite" (Judges xi. 4); in 1428, Jehovah is called "the Holy One Of I." I. was also used by the Puritans to mean the true ch., the I. of God. In Wise Men iv. 2, Rusticano's Puritan wife, when it is suggested that marriage should be abolished, objects: "How shall the I. of God be multiplied?" Land of I. is used for Palestine. In York M. P. xii. 114, the Prol. says, "He [Jacob] says the sceptre shall not pass Fro Juda of Israell Or he come that God ordained has" (see Gen. xlix. 10).
